by the complaint, and in holding, by implication, that mere permission granted to plaintiff 'to commence and maintain this suit, as she may be advised,' without notice to defendant, in any wise precluded consideration of the adequacy of these pleadings to support a cause of action or injunction, as it does not follow that the court granting leave 'to commence this suit,' predetermined that any complaint the plaintiff might be advised to frame would suffice to constitute a cause of action, be immune from any plea apparent on its face, or it would support an injunction temporary or otherwise.

"(2) That his honor erred in holding that in considering the rule and return herein he could not consider whether or not the plea of res judicata was established upon the face of the complaint and exhibits submitted therewith; whereas, he should have held the same showed an adjudication upon the very acts complained of in another suit, to which the parties herein were privy, and that a motion for permanent injunction, based upon practically identical cause of action and allegations, was pending in such other suit, and should have consequently refused the application for injunction in this case.

"(3) That his honor erred in holding the return irrelevant in showing the pendency of a motion in another jurisdiction for the same injunction sought in the present motion, and in not discharging the rule and refusing the motion after it appeared that the order of Judge Prince referred to had been granted."

In order that there may be a clear understanding of the matters herein presented, the "case" for appeal herein, except Exhibit F, which is the opinion of this court reported in 85 S. C. 1, 66 S. E. 117, 1057, should be incorporated in the report of this case.

We will first consider the proposition urged by the defendants in the fourth clause of their return to the rule to show cause issued by Judge Gage on April 30, 1910, in this matter, wherein the defendants took the position that Judge Gage had no jurisdiction at chambers without consent to grant a permanent injunction upon the merits before trial of the issues in this action. This proposition is not included in the exceptions of the defendants, but it is proper for this court to consider it. It is true that this order required the defendants to show cause why they should not be "perpetually enjoined and restrained," etc. But this appeal cannot be sustained on the ground that Judge Gage undertook to grant at chambers a permanent injunction decisive of the case, for the order appealed from herein shows on its face that it is not permanent, but only a temporary injunction pending the hearing of the cause on its merits, and that the motion therefor was so treated; Judge Gage using the following language in said order, viz.: "Just now the motion is for a temporary order of injunction of the nuisance to stand until the issues shall have been tried." And quoting from another part of said order wherein the judge required the plaintiff to give bond "conditioned to save the defendants harmless in the event of a failure of the plaintiff's action." In addition to this, we fail to find any objection made by the defendants on this ground to the issuance by Judge Gage of a temporary injunction. The order appealed from is only a temporary injunction until the case is heard on its merits, and this is all it purports to be.

All of the other questions raised by the defendants appellants in their said return and exceptions are collateral issues or matters of defense, involving the merits of the case, which Judge Gage could not consider except in so far as he may have done so in reaching the conclusion as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to the temporary injunction appealed from herein. "Where it appears by the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and such relief, or any part thereof, consists in restraining the commission or continuance of some act, the commission or continuance of which, during the litigation, would produce injury to the plaintiff, * * * a temporary injunction may be granted to restrain such act." Quoted from section 240, 2 Code of Laws of S. C. 1902. The sole object of this section of the Code is to preserve the subject of controversy in its then existing condition, and, without determining any question of right, merely to prevent a further perpetration of wrong or the doing of any act whereby the right in controversy may be materially injured or endangered, until a full and deliberate investigation of the case is afforded to the party.

In passing upon an application for an interlocutory or preliminary injunction the court must satisfy itself, not that the plaintiff has certainly the right, but that he has a fair question to raise as to the existence of such a right. It is true that the court will not interfere if it thinks there is no real question between the parties; but, seeing that there is a substantial question to be decided, it will preserve the property until such question can be disposed of. The complainant may be entitled to a preliminary injunction in cases where his right to the relief sought may fall on a hearing on the merits. 16 Am. & E. Enc. L. p. 345.

Under the decisions of our court it is not proper for a circuit judge to consider the merits of a case of this kind at chambers on a motion for a temporary injunction, except in so far as they may enable him to come to a proper conclusion as to whether a prima facie showing has been made. When such showing is made, a temporary injunction will be granted without regard to how the case may terminate on the hearing on the merits. Our courts hold that where the action is for the sole purpose of an injunction, and a temporary injunction is essential to the assertion and preservation of a legal right, if established in the complaint, it would be error of law to refuse a temporary injunction. Alderman & Sons Co. v. Wilson, 69 S. C. 156, 48 S. E. 85, and cases therein cited. Ordinarily, however, an interlocutory injunction is not a matter of right, but of grace, resting in the sound discretion of the judge. Pelzer Rodgers & Co. v. Hughes, 27 S. C. 415, 3 S. E. 781. And we do not see that Judge Gage committed any error of law, or abused his discretion, in granting the temporary injunction herein appealed from.

For these reasons, the exceptions of the defendants are overruled and the order of Judge Gage herein appealed from sustained.

GARY, C. J., concurs.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). A short history of the litigation between the plaintiff and the Halle Gold Mining Company will be necessary to a clear understanding of this case.

On May 1, 1907, plaintiff brought an action against the Halle Gold Mining Company for damages and injunction, damages for injury to her land caused by said defendants discharging into the streams which flow through it the tailings from its mining operations, which polluted the waters, and, when thrown upon the land in times of freshet, destroyed its fertility, and injunction to prevent the continuation thereof. The verdict of the jury established the fact that the acts of the defendant constituted a nuisance, and plaintiff recovered a judgment for damages. Thereupon the court, his honor, Judge Gage, presiding, held that the nuisance established consisted of discharging into the streams tailings from the company's mining operations which had been affected by the chlorinating process in extracting the gold from them, and he held that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to stop the nuisance so established. On appeal that judgment was affirmed; and the questions whether tailings which had not been subjected to the chlorinating process were or were not injurious to plaintiff's land, and whether the company had acquired a prescriptive right to discharge such tailings into the streams, were left open. 85 S. C. 1.¹ On March 23, 1909, while that appeal was pending in this court, the defendants in this action were appointed receivers of the Halle Gold Mining Company, with authority to carry on the business of the company. When the case of Williams v. Halle Gold Mining Company went back to the circuit court, that court, his honor, Judge Prince, presiding, on motion of plaintiff's attorneys, granted a permanent injunction which was broader in its scope than had been indicated by the previous order of Judge Gage. On appeal Judge Prince's order was modified so as to make it conform to the injunction which Judge Gage had held the plaintiff entitled to. 88 S. C. 522, 71 S. E. 26.

After the motion before Judge Prince had been heard, and while he had the matter under advisement, plaintiff commenced this action against the receivers. As defendants have interposed the plea of res judicata and the pendency of the action above mentioned as a bar to this action, it will be necessary to state the substance of the complaint, in order that the sufficiency of the pleas may be determined. Omitting formal allegations, the complaint recites the proceedings in the former case, and the pleadings, order for injunction, and the opinion of this court are attached as exhibits. Plaintiff further alleges, in substance, the insolvency of the Halle Gold Mining Company, the inadequacy of her remedy at law, and irreparable injury resulting from the conduct of the defendants in continuing to discharge into the streams which flow through her land the tailings from their mining operations, because the same are charged with mineral or chemical matters which pollute the waters, so that the cattle in her pasture will not drink thereof, and destroy the fertility of the soil, when cast thereon by recurring freshets, so that about 40 acres of her land have been greatly injured, and the injured boundary is rapidly extending on account of the continuance of the nuisance; that, but for the continued discharge of acidulated and chlorinated tailings into said streams, she could and would adopt measures for the restoration of her lands lying thereon, and they would soon be restored to fertility and become valuable, whereas they are now worthless. The relief prayed for is that defendants be restrained "from further letting loose or emptying into the said Mine branch or Little Lynchess creek any acidulated water, chlorinated water, or any other detritus, substance, or chemicals from its mining operations or plant, so that said waters of said streams may be free from said poisonous or harmful substances, and that said waters may have only the flow which naturally belongs thereto, and that the said receivers, their servants or agents, be further enjoined and restrained from committing any acts whereby plaintiff's rights may be damaged, impaired, or injured, or interfered with, by the manner and means herein set out."

Upon the verified complaint Judge Gage issued a rule, returnable at chambers, requiring defendants to show cause why the injunction prayed for should not be granted. For cause defendants alleged (1) that plaintiff had not obtained leave of court to sue them; (2) that it appeared from the complaint and exhibits that the matters which plaintiff seeks to litigate are res judicata; (3) that a motion was then pending before Judge Prince in the other case, in which plaintiff could obtain all the relief to which she was entitled; (4) that the court had no jurisdiction to grant a permanent injunction at chambers. His honor overruled the return and granted an order restraining defendants until the hearing on the merits "from casting upon the plaintiff's lands any sulphides, tailings, acids, or chemicals which may be hurtful to lands or to vegetation."

The exceptions assign error in overruling the grounds of the return. As the complaint alleges that the suit was commenced by leave and as the injunction granted at chambers was only temporary, the first and fourth grounds were properly overruled.

The controlling questions in the case are whether the matters sought to be litigated in this action are res judicata, and whether the pendency of the other action is a bar to this. These grounds required refusal of plaintiff's motion. It will be noticed that plaintiff does not sue in this action for damages which have accrued since the rendition of the verdict in the other action. She sues only for injunction. If the tailings whose discharge into the streams she seeks in this action to enjoin were affected by the chlorinating process, the injunction which she seeks has been granted in the other case and the matter is res judicata. Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35. If they are not of that character, then the questions whether they were and are injurious to her lands or not, and whether the defendants have the right by prescription to discharge them into the streams, were expressly left open in the other case, and either party has the right to have those issues tried by a jury in that case. The defendants are privies in estate with the Halle Gold Mining Company, and they are concluded by the judgment in the other case. It appears, therefore, that another action is pending between the same parties or their privies for the same cause, and that action is a bar to this.

Respondent contends that the points made by the return should have been raised by demurrer or answer, and, not having been so raised, they were waived. Defendants had 20 days after service of the complaint within which to answer or demur. As the rule required them to show cause in less time than the law gave them to answer or demur, they had the right to raise any point by return which they could have raised by demurrer or answer. His honor held that he could not determine the plea of res judicata, because, "if that plea should be sustained now, it would be equivalent to finally determining the action now on a motion. That ought not to be done, and cannot be done." If his honor meant that he could not finally decide the question on a motion at chambers, he was correct; but, if he meant that he could not consider that plea in reaching a correct conclusion as to whether the motion ought to be granted or refused, he was in error. While a judge at chambers cannot finally decide anything as to the merits, he can, and of necessity must often, look into the merits, whether they present issues of law or of fact, and consider them to the extent necessary to enable him to wisely exercise the discretion vested in him. In Sease v. Dobson, 34 S. C. 345, 13 S. E. 530, the second syllabus, which correctly states the point decided, is as follows: "A circuit judge has the right to refuse an injunction, and such refusal is not a decision on the merits, even though he base his decision upon a ground which would be decisive of the case if so held at the hearing on the merits; but, if his refusal is rested upon an erroneous proposition of law, it may be corrected by appeal." In Crawford v. Lumber Co., 77 S. C. 81, 57 S. E. 670, the court said that, even if the complaint states a cause of action for injunction, a temporary injunction should not follow automatically, "for the court should consider the showing made in opposition thereto, and must determine, in view of all the circumstances [italics added], whether an injunction is reasonably essential to protect the legal right of the plaintiffs pending the litigation, subject to review by this court." In Hutchison v. York, 86 S. C. 405, 68 S. E. 578, the court said: "If plaintiff's prima facie case depends upon allegations that a statute is unconstitutional, the judge hearing the application must consider that matter in determining the reasonable necessity for temporary injunction, and, if he hold the statute valid, the necessity is not made to appear. The question is one of law, in which the presumption is in favor of the validity of the statute. In order to reverse the refusal of temporary injunction in such a case, this court must review the constitutional question."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed.

PARKER v. DANIELS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1912.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 32*)—PROMISE TO PAY THE DEBT OF ANOTHER.

The statute of frauds, requiring a promise to answer the debt of another to be in writing, only invalidates verbal agreements to be surety of the debt of another for which the latter remains liable, and does not forbid a verbal contract to assume the contract of another, discharged from liability on the promisor becoming sole debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 32*)—PROMISE TO PAY THE DEBT OF ANOTHER.

Where a plaintiff refused to go on with his agreement with a corporation to carry freight because of the insolvency of the corporation, and when the management was changed and defendant became president of the corporation, a parol contract between plaintiff and defendant was made, whereby defendant personally assumed liability to plaintiff for the payment of the amounts which he should earn, and credit was given exclusively to defendant, the contract was not within the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by J. A. Parker against E. R. Daniels. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following issues were submitted without objection:

"1. Did defendant contract with the plaintiff to personally pay for the freight hauled as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"2. What amount is due plaintiff by defendant? Answer: $399.10."

E. F. Aydlott and W. A. Worth, for appellant. I. M. Meekins and Ward & Thompson, for appellee.

BROWN, J. We have considered the several assignments of error set out in the briefs of the learned counsel for the defendant, and do not think that any of them can be sustained. The matter seems to be one almost entirely of fact, and was settled by the jury adversely to the defendant under the clear charge of the court. The only assignment of error we deem it necessary to consider is that which relates to the statute of frauds. The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant the sum of $399.10, alleged to be due plaintiff by the defendant for freights hauled by plaintiff for the Le Roy Steamboat Company, a corporation of which the defendant was president; the plaintiff contending that the defendant agreed to be responsible for the indebtedness. The defendant denied the contract, and contended, further, that it was a contract to answer for the debt of another, was not in writing, and came within the statute of frauds.

Upon this feature of the case his honor charged the jury: "That if you shall find from the evidence and by the greater weight thereof that the defendant agreed to be responsible to plaintiff for such sums as might become due to the plaintiff if he would continue his work of freighting, and would see that plaintiff should be paid such sums as he earned thereby, then you should answer the first issue, 'Yes'; otherwise, you should answer it, 'No.'" There is abundant evidence in the record sustaining the charge of the court intending to prove a contract upon the part of the defendant, not so much to assume a debt of the Le Roy Steamboat Company, as to create a new responsibility for which the defendant alone agreed to be held responsible. The evidence tends to prove that the plaintiff had been operating a boat between Weeksville and Elizabeth City in conjunction with the Le Roy Steamboat Company under an agreement whereby he was to receive a certain portion of the freights; that on June 14, 1911, the said company owed the plaintiff about $700, which has never been paid; that at that time the management of the said company changed hands, and the defendant became its president. The testimony tends, further, to prove that on that date the plaintiff refused to carry any further freight, or to go on with his work in connection with the said company, because it had failed to pay him the aforesaid indebtedness; that plaintiff had a conversation with the defendant, and told him that he would not do any more work under the contract with the said company; and that the defendant said that he would not be responsible for any past debt of the company, but that if Parker would go on with his work, from then on the defendant would be personally responsible for what Parker should earn. This statement was made by the defendant on the 14th of June, 1911, and is proven by several witnesses and expressed in various forms of language.

Under this contract with the defendant the plaintiff worked up to the 19th of July, 1911, at which time the amount due him by the defendant was $399.10. It is to be observed that the defendant does not plead the statute of frauds, nor does he object to the evidence when it was offered, and strictly speaking the point cannot be fairly raised upon this record. But, as that seems to have been waived, we consider the question upon its merits as if the statute had been properly pleaded, or the point raised upon an objection to the evidence.

[1] We are of opinion that upon this evidence, which is scarcely controvertible, the contract is not one within the statute of frauds. This statute, which requires a special promise to answer the "debt, default, or miscarriage of another" to be in writing, is intended only to invalidate verbal agreements to be surety for the debt of another, for which that other continues to remain liable. It does not forbid a verbal contract to assume the contract of another, who may be discharged from all liability to the creditor; the promisor becoming sole debtor in his place. Haun v. Burrell, 119 N. C. 547, 26 S. E. 111; Whitehurst v. Hyman, 90 N. C. 489; Sheppard v. Newton, 139 N. C. 533, 52 S. E. 143; Jenkins v. Holley, 140 N. C. 380, 53 S. E. 237, 111 Am. St. Rep. 846; Clark on Contracts, p. 57.

[2] Applying this principle to the evidence in this case, it is apparent that the plaintiff had ended his contract with the Le Roy Steamboat Company because of its insolvency and refused to go on further with his work. When the management was changed and the defendant became president, the evidence shows that a new contract was entered into, not between the Le Roy Steamboat Company and the plaintiff, but between the defendant and the plaintiff, whereby the defendant personally assumed the liability to the plaintiff for the payment of the amounts which he should earn, and that the credit was given exclusively to the defendant. This was not, in any view of the evidence, an assumption of a debt for and on account of the Le Roy Steamboat Company, but was in every sense a new contract, for which the defendant became personally liable. Mason v. Wilson, 84 N. C. 51, 37 Am. Rep. 612; Packer v. Benton, 35 Conn. 350, 95 Am. Dec. 246.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Cline, Judge.

Action by the Frank Hitch Lumber Company against Walter R. Brown. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

This is an action, with claim and delivery, to recover the possession of certain sawlogs. In January, 1903, James Morris sold the poplar, pine, and gum timber on his tract of land in Bertie county to Brown and Bundy, who assigned the contract to the plaintiff. The timber was to be cut and removed from the land within eight years from January 1, 1903. Brown and Bundy "cut a lot of sawlogs," and left them on the land after the time for cutting and removing them had expired. The Morris land was sold and conveyed to T. J. White, who sold and conveyed it to the defendant, W. R. Brown. In his own behalf the defendant testified: "When I bought the land, I asked Mr. White about the timber. He said: 'The time is out on it, and it all now belongs to me. I sell you the land and everything there is on it. I can show you the timber deed and satisfy you about it.' When I bought the land from White, I bought the logs that were on the land. When I bought the land, I got a deed for it. I asked him about the timber. I told him I wanted a straight deed for everything there—to be no strings to it. I told Mr. White about the timber logs and stuff, and he said he sold me his entire holdings." After Brown bought the land, and, as he alleges, the sawlogs, White sold the logs and conveyed them to plaintiff on May 10, 1911, who immediately brought this action to recover the logs. In the pleadings the plaintiff describes the property as "a certain lot of gum, poplar, and cypress sawlogs on the James Morris land, in the possession of defendant." The defendant requested the court to charge the jury that, if White sold the logs to Brown at the time he sold the land to him, they would answer the first issue, "No," as the plaintiff would not be the owner of the logs. The court stated, in response to this prayer, that there was no evidence of a sale of the logs to defendant. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Winston & Matthews, for appellant. Winborne & Winborne, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] There was error in the refusal to give the prayer for instructions. The defendant testified that he had bought the logs from White. This was the statement of a fact, and not a conclusion of law as to the construction of the timber deed. It may be that he referred to the timber deed as conveying the logs, but it does not so appear. The jury might well have inferred that White had sold him the logs independently. Besides, White said to him: "The time is now out, and it all belongs to me. I sell you the land and everything there is on it. * * * I told Mr. White about the logs and stuff, and he said he sold me his entire holdings." This surely was some evidence of a sale of the logs.

verted into sawlogs. A parol conveyance was sufficient to pass the title. Wall v. Williams, 91 N. C. 477. If White sold the logs to defendant, it can make no difference that it was done by parol, and was not inserted in the deed; it not being necessary that the sale of the logs should be in writing. Nissen v. Mining Co., 104 N. C. 309, 10 S. E. 512.

[4] The timber cut and not removed after the time fixed by the contract had expired belonged to White, who had the right to sell it to the defendant. This is settled by numerous cases. Hornthal v. Howcott, 154 N. C. 228, 70 S. E. 171; Bateman v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 248, 70 S. E. 474, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615; Bunch v. Lumber Co., 134 N. C. 116, 46 S. E. 24; Lumber Co. v. Corey, 140 N. C. 462, 53 S. E. 300, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 468; Hawkins v. Lumber Co., 139 N. C. 160, 51 S. E. 852; Strasson v. Montgomery, 32 Wls. 52. The evidence of a sale to defendant, which was disregarded by the learned judge, if again offered, must be submitted to another jury, with proper instructions as to its legal effect.

New trial.

BROWN J. [1] This action is brought to recover damages against the defendant construction company for an injury to the defendants' vessel, a three-masted schooner called the "Edna A. Pogue," while attempting to pass through an opening in the bridge across Albemarle Sound, en route from Elizabeth City to Plymouth for a cargo. There are several assignments of error contained in the record, but we deem it unnecessary to consider more than one or two.

The defendants request the court to instruct the jury that, if they believe the evidence, they should answer the first issue, "No." This prayer for instruction, we think, was properly refused. At the time of the injury to the Edna Pogue, the defendant company was engaged in constructing a bridge across Albemarle Sound for the Norfolk-Southern Railway Company. While they had the right to construct this bridge under the authority of the state, as well as the War Department, it was the duty of the defendants to leave open a space sufficient to enable passing vessels to go through. This the evidence shows that the defendants' agents in charge of the work undertook to do. The evidence shows that on the 12th of December the Pogue sailed up to within three-quarters of a mile of the bridge and anchored to wait for a favorable breeze. It is common knowledge to all who are familiar with sailing craft that it is impracticable to "beat them" against a head wind through an opening in a bridge. The evidence shows that at half past 2 o'clock on the following morning, the wind having arisen, the captain weighed anchor and got under way up the Sound. The evidence shows that at that time the regular drawbridges intended for the passage of vessels, one on one side of the Sound, and one on the other, had not been completed and were not in use for the passage of vessels. The evidence further shows that the open space through which the master of the Pogue attempted to sail her was in use with the knowledge and permission of the defendants' agents for the passage of craft going up and down the Sound.

The captain testifies that he saw a large tugboat, with large raft, and a number of other vessels, passing through this same opening, and that there was a light put there for the purpose of indicating that it was intended to be used for the passage of vessels. In attempting to make the passage through the bridge, the vessel came in contact with a raft of piling material which had been tied by the constructors of the bridge to the east side of it, and to the south side of the gap by a rope made fast to one end of the raft of piling, leaving the other end of the raft loose, so that it had swung around into the opening and the vessel had come in contact with it, causing her to lose her headway, whereby she fell off to the leeward, and her rigging became entangled with the pile driver, which had been left on the north end of this opening, and the vessel was very greatly injured. The evidence shows that the wind increased very much at the time, so that the captain was unable to free his vessel and get her away from the bridge, and, a large sea making up in the morning, she was badly chafed before she could get away. The testimony of one of the witnesses, who was an employé of the defendants at the time, was to the effect that this gap or opening was being used by all the craft going up and down the Sound while the drawbridges were being completed.

It scarcely needs the citation of authority to prove that, although the right to build this bridge cannot be gainsaid, it was nevertheless the duty of the constructors to do the work in a safe and careful manner, to leave open during the constructive period spaces amply sufficient for the safe passage of vessels navigating the waters of Albemarle Sound, and to keep those spaces free from all obstructions that would endanger the passage of vessels through such spaces. There are numbers of cases which support the contention of the plaintiffs in this case. Jutte v. Bridge Co., 21 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 422; Maxon v. Railroad (D. C.) 122 Fed. 555; Kelley Lime Co. v. Cleveland (D. C.) 144 Fed. 207. In this case it is said that a company constructing a bridge is liable for injury resulting from its negligence when a vessel collides with the partly constructed bridge, or with works used in the construction, when such collision could have been avoided by reasonable precaution upon the part of the constructors. See, also, 29 Cyc. p. 214; Jutte v. Keystone Bridge Co., 146 Pa. 400, 23 Atl. 235; Casement v. Brown, 148 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 672, 37 L. Ed. 582; Wilson v. Chicago (D. C.) 42 Fed. 506.

At a prior term of this court we considered the case of Whitehurst v. Norfolk-Southern R. Co., 156 N. C. 48, 72 S. E. 73. We think it has no bearing whatever upon this controversy. There was no evidence of negligence whatever upon the part of the defendant in that case, as it was perfectly manifest that the vessel was lost before she ever reached the bridge, by failing to respond to her helm at a critical moment.

[2] The defendants except because the court permitted witnesses to testify to the meaning of certain lights and what such lights are intended to communicate in nautical terms. It is true that these are fixed by the rules and regulations of the national government; but they are not known to jurors, but only to navigators and persons familiar with nautical regulations. It was entirely competent to prove by witnesses the meaning of such terms, and what certain kinds of lights were intended to indicate.

We have examined the charge of the judge, and deem it unnecessary to comment upon the exceptions relating to that. The charge was eminently clear and fair, and presented the matter to the jury fully and completely, with conspicuous impartiality.

Upon a review of the whole record, we find no error.

The motion to nonsuit is covered by the ruling on the prayer for instruction, and is therefore overruled.

LEACH v. FOSBURGH LUMBER CO.

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 99*)—CONVEYANCE OF RIGHT OF WAY—SUFFICIENCY OF "MEMORANDUM."

The mere indorsement and deposit for collection of a check tendered in payment for a right of way is not a sufficient "memorandum," within Revisal 1905, § 976, which requires a conveyance of an interest in land to be in writing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Cline, Judge.

Action by M. T. Leach against the Fosburgh Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial granted.

Civil action to recover damages for entering upon the plaintiff's land and occupying a right of way across the same. The defendant claimed the right of way under a contract alleged to have been executed by the plaintiff. The following issues were submitted to the jury:

"1. Is the paper writing set out in the complaint, providing for a one-year right of way and a one-year privilege, the contract and agreement entered into between the parties hereto? Answer: No.

"2. Is the paper writing originally prepared by Joseph P. Pippin, providing for a five-year right of way and a five-year extension privilege, the contract and agreement between the parties, as alleged in the answer? Answer: Yes.

"3. Has the defendant failed and refused to comply with its agreement, as alleged in the complaint? Answer:

"4. Is the defendant trespassing upon plaintiff's lands, as alleged in the complaint? Answer:

"5. What are the plaintiff's damages? Answer:"

From the judgment rendered, the defendant appealed.

W. E. Daniel, E. L. Travis, and R. C. Dunn, for appellant. Mason, Worrell & Long and Geo. C. Green, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The defendant was negotiating with the plaintiff for a right of way across his lands in Halifax county, and the question to be determined is whether the defendant acquired any title thereto. The desired right of way was three-quarters of a mile long and was to be used for a lumber road to haul out the defendant's logs. The negotiations were conducted with the plaintiff by one Joseph Pippin, an attorney. The evidence shows that Pippin prepared a contract for a five-year right of way and sent it to Leach, together with a check for $275. The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury substantially in the fifth and sixth prayers for instruction that there was no sufficient evidence, that Leach executed or assented to the contract for five years as first prepared and sent to him, and that the jury should be directed to answer the second issue "No." His honor refused to give this instruction, and in so doing we think he was in error.

The evidence shows that, when the plaintiff received the five-year contract, he placed the check in the bank for collection for his credit, and that he returned the contract for five years to Pippin, refusing to sign it. The plaintiff testified that he told Mr. Gray, defendant's agent, that he would not sign a contract for any specific number of years beyond one. It is further in evidence by the testimony of Pippin himself, a witness for the defendant, that he returned the contract to the plaintiff with instructions to make such changes as he saw fit, and that the plaintiff changed it to its present form, then executed and returned it to Pippin, who delivered it to the defendant's agent. As returned to Pippin, as delivered to the defendant, and as executed by the plaintiff, the contract conferred a right of way for one year for the consideration of $275, with the right of renewal for one additional year upon the payment of the further sum of $275.

[1] There is no evidence whatever that the plaintiff ever executed any other contract than this. A mere indorsing of a draft for money and placing it in the bank for collection upon the part of the plaintiff would not be sufficient of itself to convey a right of way or any other interest in the plaintiff's land. This is not such a memorandum as fulfills the requirement of the statute. Pell's Rev. § 976, and cases cited; Hall v. Misenheimer, 137 N. C. 186, 49 S. E. 104, 107 Am. St. Rep. 474.

[2] The act of receiving the check and depositing it in the bank for collection is an act which in itself is open to explanation. Clark on Contracts (2d Ed.) p. 27. This opportunity to explain why he deposited the check was denied to the plaintiff, and is the basis of one of his exceptions. All the evidence, we think, shows that the plaintiff deposited the check in the bank to his credit, being admittedly solvent, to await the result of further negotiations. That he did not accept it in payment for a five-year contract for the right of way is conclusively shown by the admitted fact that he at once returned the contract to Pippin, refusing to execute it in its then form. Besides, he had also informed Mr. Gray, the defendant's agent, he would not sign a contract for five years. It appears in evidence that, when the plaintiff received the contract from Pippin, and changed its terms to one year, and signed it and returned it to Pippin, Pippin delivered it to the defendant's agent.

[3] The question, then, to be determined, is: Did the defendant, after receiving this contract from Pippin, as executed by the plaintiff, accept it, and enter upon the plaintiff's lands, and prosecute his work under it? If so, the defendant would be bound by it, and compelled to perform it; for one who accepts a deed is bound by its terms and conditions. Fort v. Allen, 110 N. C. 184, 14 S. E. 685.

[4] If the jury should find that the defendant did not accept the contract as finally executed and returned by the plaintiff, and did not act under it, then there would be no contract in existence between the plaintiff and the defendant, no coming together of two minds, and the parties would stand upon their legal rights as if no contract had been attempted to be made. We do not think in any view of the evidence, that the defendant can be held to be a willful trespasser; for he entered upon the land by the plaintiff's permission, although there seems to have been a misunderstanding as to terms.

Such being the case, it would be liable to the plaintiff for the value of the right of way, its use and occupation, and any real injury that the land had sustained in consequence of such occupation; but the defendant could not in any view be held for exemplary damages. At the same time the plaintiff must necessarily account for the $275 and interest thereon accruing since he received it.

We are of opinion that a new trial should be had, to the end that proper issues be submitted to the jury.

New trial.

WALSH MFG. CO. v. PLYMOUTH LUMBER CO.

SALES (§ 286*)—CONTRACTS OF SALE OR RETURN—DUTY OF BUYER.

A contract to sell a dry kiln apparatus, warranted as to quality and workmanship, under a provision that, on the failure of the kiln to do the work as warranted, the buyer should notify the seller, giving the latter opportunity to correct any defects, and providing that if, after such correction, the kiln still failed to do the work as warranted, the buyer should return it to the seller, and that thereupon all money paid on the price, etc., should be refunded, without further responsibility of the seller, is an enforceable contract for sale or return, and the buyer's failure to comply with the conditions of the warranty is fatal to a counterclaim for damages resulting from breach of the warranty in a suit brought by the seller for the price; the buyer retaining the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by the Walsh Manufacturing Company against the Plymouth Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover the contract price for a certain green gum dry kiln, and is based upon a written contract. The defendant resisted the right of the plaintiff to recover: First, because the material and workmanship of the equipment was not first-class in every particular, as guaranteed in said contract, but, on the contrary, was of an inferior quality, and in many respects defective; second, because the dry kiln failed to do the work which the plaintiff guaranteed it would do. The defendant further contended that because of defects in the material of the dry kiln, and its failure to do the work guaranteed, it lost a large amount of lumber while testing same under the direction of the plaintiff. The defendant offered evidence tending to sustain its contention, and there was evidence to the contrary offered by the plaintiff.

The material parts of the written contract, under which the plaintiff sold the kiln to the defendant, are as follows: "We guarantee the material and workmanship of the above-specified equipment to be first-class in every particular, and, in consideration of payments being made as agreed, we further guarantee that, when kiln is constructed in strict accordance with our plans, and operated as per our instructions, and furnished with steam at 14 hours per day, and exhaust steam at 2 to 5 pounds, the remaining 10 hours 70 pounds' pressure at kiln, to be of ample capacity to dry 7,500 feet 1-inch x 16-foot gum lumber per day of 24 hours' continuous operation, without adding to any defects the stock may have when placed in the kiln, such as checking, mildewing, molding, or discoloring, and the material so dried will not warp or twist to any greater extent than by outdoor piling. It is understood that you are to furnish all the necessary material for testing the capacity of the kiln, material to be green from the saw when it is placed in the kiln." "In the event of the failure of the kiln to do the work as guaranteed, you having given us due notice in writing to that effect, and afforded us the opportunity of making any necessary corrections, and after such corrections, the kiln should still fail to work as guaranteed, you are to reload the material furnished within 10 days and return to us. Upon receipt of bill of lading covering the shipment of same in good condition, we will refund all money covering freight charges paid by you, also the amount of any cash payments made to us, and further responsibility on our part shall then cease. It is agreed that, should you violate any of the provisions of this agreement, then the right to return apparatus shall be forfeited, and you will pay to us as liquidated damages the sum of money herein specified under the heading of price, the same as though you had volunteered your acceptance in writing."

After the jury was impaneled, defendant admitted the execution of the contract and amount of debt, nothing else appearing, and assumed the burden upon its counterclaim and recoupment. There was no evidence that, after notice in writing, the plaintiff was given the opportunity to correct any defects, or that the defendant offered to return the property, and the defendant failed to make the cash payment of $700, and retained the kiln, and has continued to use it. After the conclusion of the evidence, the court, being of opinion that the failure of defendant to allow plaintiff to make test, together with defendant's failure to return or offer to return the property to plaintiff, the defendant could not maintain its counterclaim against plaintiff, and granted the motion to dismiss the alleged counterclaim, and gave judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepted.

H. S. Ward and Gaylord & Gaylord, for appellant. Pruden & Pruden, Wm. Bond, and Wm. Bond, Jr., for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The correctness of the ruling in the superior court depends on the construction of the written contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant. By its terms the plaintiff agreed to furnish the defendant a complete dry kiln apparatus for the sum of $1,725, of which $700 was to be paid in cash, and it guaranteed its quality and workmanship, and it was provided therein that, upon failure of the kiln to do the work as guaranteed, the defendant should notify the plaintiff to that effect, and give it the opportunity to correct any defects, and if, after such correction, the kiln still failed to do the work as guaranteed, the defendant agreed to reload the material furnished and ship to the plaintiff. It was further stipulated in the contract that, upon return of the material, the plaintiff would refund all money covering freight charges and cash payments paid by the defendant, and that further responsibility on the part of the plaintiff should then cease. The defendant did not give the plaintiff the opportunity to correct defects, if they existed, nor did it offer to return the material.

The contract is fair and reasonable on its face, and in the absence of fraud, which is not alleged, must be enforced. It belongs to the class of contracts called "Contracts of Sale or Return," of which it is said in Parsons on Contracts (5th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 539: "In these the property in the goods passes to the purchaser, subject to an option in him to return them within a fixed time or a reasonable time; and if he fails to exercise this option by so returning them, the sale becomes absolute, and the price of the goods may be recovered in an action for goods sold and delivered"—and in Cyc. vol. 35, p. 237: "Where the contract provides for a return of the goods if not satisfactory, the buyer cannot relieve himself from liability for the price, unless he returns or offers to return them, and the offer to return must be unconditional." This principle, as applicable to the facts in this case, is approved in Main v. Griffin, 141 N. C. 43, 53 S. E. 727, Main v. Field, 144 N. C. 307, 56 S. E. 943, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 245, 119 Am. St. Rep. 956, and Piano Co. v. Kennedy, 152 N. C. 197, 67 S. E. 488, in which last-cited case the court says: "We have recognized the principle that there can be no implied warranty of quality in the sale of personal property where there is an express warranty, and that where a party sets up and relies upon a written warranty he is bound by its terms and must comply with them. 30 Am. & Eng. p. 199; Main v. Griffin, 141 N. C. 43, 53 S. E. 727. We recognize the further principle, applied by us in that case, that a failure by the purchaser to comply with the conditions of the warranty is fatal to a recovery for breach of the warranty in an action on it, or where, as in this case, damages for the breach are pleaded as a counterclaim in an action by the seller for the purchase money."

The defendant, having failed to return the material, and not having offered to do so, and having failed to perform other stipulations contained in the contract, was not entitled to recover on his counterclaim, and on the admitted facts judgment was properly rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the contract price.

1. EASEMENTS (§ 3*)—RIGHT OF WAY—GRANTS.

A grantee of a part of a parcel of land abutting on a street, together with a right of way over the remaining part to the street, acquires a right of way appurtenant to the land conveyed, inuring to himself, his heirs and assigns, as owners and occupants of the land, and not otherwise; and he may not convey to another a right of way in gross or a right of way appurtenant as owner of an entirely separate parcel of land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Stephen C. Bragaw, Judge.

Action by John Q. A. Wood and another against W. J. Woodley and another. From an order continuing a preliminary restraining order until the hearing, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Worth and E. F. Aydlett, for appellants. Ward & Thompson, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] On the hearing it was made to appear: That on May 8, 1899, one Wiley N. Gregory owned a parcel or lot of land in Elizabeth City, N. C., abutting on the south on Matthews street, and on said day he conveyed to W. J. Broughton and wife the northern portion of this lot, to the amount of one acre. The deed, after describing and conveying the acre in question, contained the following: "Together with the right of ingress and egress for the space of 20 feet wide along the Riggs line to Matthews street"—the habendum being as follows: "To have and to hold the said lot of land as follows, with the right and privileges thereto belonging to the said Wm. J. Broughton and his heirs and assigns forever." And on March 28, 1900, said Broughton and wife conveyed said acre of land by apt words to defendant W. J. Woodley; this deed containing the same stipulation for ingress and egress with habendum as follows: "To have and to hold the aforesaid land, etc., together with all improvements, privileges, and appurtenances thereto belonging, to the said W. J. Woodley and his heirs and assigns," etc. That on the 11th of November, 1904, said Wm. Gregory conveyed the southern portion of the aforesaid land to one Joseph A. Byrum, subject to the above right of way, and on September 1, 1908, said Byrum conveyed said southern portion to plaintiff subject to the same right of way, etc. That on February 16, 1912, defendant A. C. Stokes owned a parcel or lot of land adjoining the acre conveyed by Gregory to Broughton, and from Broughton to Woodley, and on said date said Woodley undertook to convey to A. C. Stokes, owning and occupying this adjoining lot, the right to use and enjoy the right of way created and conveyed by said deeds of Gregory and Broughton in terms as follows: "Do bargain, sell, give, grant, and convey unto the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, a right of way over and along the southwest corner of the property purchased by said W. J. Woodley from W. J. Broughton and wife, said right of way to be 20 feet wide east and west, and 40 feet long north and south, together with the right of ingress and egress over and along a 20-foot alley leading from Matthews street to the property described above, along the eastern side of the Riggs land in so far as the parties of the first part have authority to convey, and for further reference see deed to said W. J. Woodley from W. J. Broughton and wife, recorded in Book 21, page 644, register of deed's office for Pasquotank county." It was further alleged and admitted that said defendant A. C. Stokes intended presently to use and enjoy said way, claiming the right to do so under said deed from his codefendant, Woodley.

Upon these facts the restraining order was properly continued to the hearing. The deeds from Gregory to Broughton and from Broughton to Woodley conveyed the land therein described, and a right of way over the remaining portion of the tract to Matthews street. It was, however, a right of way appurtenant to the land conveyed, inuring to Woodley, his heirs and assigns, as owners and occupants of said land and not otherwise, provided that, even as to them, the burden could not be unduly increased. "It may accordingly be stated as a general principle that, if an easement has become appurtenant to an estate, it follows every part of the estate into whosoever hands the same may come by purchase or descent, 'quacunq̃ue servitus fundo debetur, omnibus ejus partibus debetur,' provided the burden upon the servient estate is not thereby increased." Washburn on Easements (3d. Ed.) p. 36. This being the extent of his right over plaintiffs' lands, Woodley had no power to convey to Stokes either a right of way in gross or a right of way appurtenant as owner of an entirely distinct and separate parcel of land. In Jones on Easements the doctrine is stated as follows: "Sec. 28. An appurtenant easement cannot be conveyed by the party entitled to it separate from the land to which it is appurtenant. It can be conveyed only by a conveyance of such land. It adheres in the land and cannot exist separate from it. It cannot be converted into an easement in gross." And further at section 360: "One having a right of way appurtenant to certain land cannot use it for the benefit of other land to which the right is not attached, although such other land is within the same inclosure with that to which the easement belongs. Except for this rule, the burden upon the servient estate might be increased at the pleasure of the owner of the dominant estate. This rule is therefore applicable, whether the way was created by grant, reservation, prescription, or as a way of necessity. In either case the way is created by grant, either express, presumed or applied. The way is granted for the benefit of the particular land, and its use is limited to such land. Its use cannot be extended to other land, nor can the way be converted into a public way without the consent of the owner of the servient estate."

[2] The deed of W. J. Woodley therefore conveyed to defendant Stokes no right of way over plaintiffs' land. On the facts as they now appear the threatened exercise of such right was properly enjoined. 23 A. & E. (2d Ed.) p. 35.

There is no error, and the judgment continuing the restraining order to the hearing is affirmed.

Affirmed.

5. EVIDENCE (§ 587*)—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

When a fact is to be proven by circumstantial evidence, the finding of the jury is not dependent altogether upon belief in the truth of the evidence, as the jurors must not only believe the witnesses, but must also draw from their testimony the inferences arising from the facts proven.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County.

Action by Edmond Snowden against C. M. Bell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial granted.

The plaintiff brings this suit to restrain the defendant from interfering with his use of a lane from the Etheridge farm, owned by plaintiff, and running eastwardly to the public road leading to Snowden station.

Plaintiff's evidence tends to prove that the Etheridge and Humphrey lands were originally owned by Isaac Snowden; that this lane in controversy runs between the Bell land on the north and the Humphrey land on the south, and runs to the Etheridge land; that for years the Isaac Snowden fence to Humphrey land was inside the lane, and that there was a line tree of the Etheridge farm at the end of this lane; that the lane has been kept up jointly by Bell and Snowden heirs, and plaintiff when he succeeded the Snowden heirs, since its establishment; also that for 50 to 60 years the owners of the Etheridge and Humphrey farms have continuously used this lane for any and all purposes. The plaintiff also offered evidence that he did not know of permission to use the lane being asked at any time, and that he used it as of right. There was also evidence that the defendant caused a warrant to issue against a tenant of the plaintiff for using the lane, and that the plaintiff gave the defendant a bond to repair any injuries to the lane caused by his hauling logs over it, at a time when he wished to use it for that purpose.

The following issues were submitted to the jury:

"1. Is the plaintiff the owner of an easement entitling him to use the lane in controversy? Answer: Yes.

"2. If so, has defendant obstructed plaintiff in the use of said lane as alleged? Answer: Yes."

At the conclusion of the evidence, his honor instructed the jury to answer the first issue, "Yes," if they believed the evidence, and the defendant excepted. Judgment was rendered on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Ward & Grimes, for appellant. E. F. Aylett and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] It is well established in this state that the right to a private way may be acquired by a continuous adverse use for 20 years and that a mere user for the required period is not sufficient to confer the right. Ingraham v. Hough, 46 N. C. 43; Mebane v. Patrick, 46 N. C. 23; Ray v. Lipscomb, 48 N. C. 186; Boyden v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539; Id., 86 N. C. 397. In the last case cited the doctrine is well stated as follows: "It would be unreasonable to deduce from the owner's quiet acquiescence, a simple act of neighborhood courtesy, in the use of a way convenient to others and not injurious to himself, over land unimproved or in woods, consequences so seriously detracting from the value of the land thus used, and compel him needlessly to interpose and prevent the enjoyment of the privilege in order to the preservation of the right of property unimpaired. And so it is declared in Mebane v. Patrick, 46 N. C. 23, and reiterated in Smith v. Bennett, Id. 372, by the late Chief Justice, in his comments upon the charge that, if the plaintiff had continuously and without interruption used and enjoyed the way for more than 20 years, he was entitled to recover. He says: 'The charge is correct as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. There is another and very essential requisite, in order to raise the presumption of a grant. The user must be adverse and as of right.' Again, in Ray v. Lipscomb, 48 N. C. 185, referring to those adjudications, he says: 'These cases, as it seems to us, put the doctrine of presumption of a right of way from user on its true basis; and as was said in the argument, considering the state of things among us for many years past in regard to a neighbor's passing on the uninclosed land of another, either on horseback or with his wagon, any other conclusion would have resulted in great and general inconvenience.' There must, then, be some evidence accompanying the user, giving it a hostile character, and repelling the inference that it is permissive and with the owner's consent, to create the easement by prescription and impose the burden upon the land."

[2, 3] The term "adverse user" or "adverse possession" implies a user or possession that is not only under a claim of right, but that it is open and of such character that the true owner may have notice of the claim, and this may be proven by circumstances as well as by direct evidence. In Parker v. Banks, 79 N. C. 485, the court, speaking of an adverse possession, says: "Mr. Angell says 'that the clearest and most comprehensive definition of a disseisin and adverse possession is an actual, visible, and exclusive appropriation of land, commenced and continued under a claim of right.' The claim must be adverse, and accompanied by such an invasion of the rights of the opposite party as to give him a cause of action. It is the occupation with an intent to claim against the true owner, which renders the entry and possession adverse; and it is the settled doctrine that this question of adverse possession, as one of intention, ought to be found by the jury, or in some other way ascertained as an essential fact, without which the quality of the possession cannot be determined."

[4] Applying these principles, we are of opinion that the plaintiff introduced evidence of an adverse user for more than 20 years, which entitled him to have his case submitted to the jury, but that it was not of such conclusive character as to warrant a peremptory instruction in favor of the plaintiff. A user for more than 40 years is clearly shown, but much of the evidence is consistent with the contention that it was not hostile and adverse, but permissive, and the evidence of notice to the defendant that it was under a claim of right was entirely circumstantial.

[5] When a fact is to be proven by circumstantial evidence, the finding of the jury is not dependent altogether upon belief in the truth of the evidence, as the jurors must not only believe the witnesses, but must also draw from their testimony the inferences arising from the facts proven. There is also evidence, although not clearly stated, that the defendant objected to one of the tenants using the way, and that he required the plaintiff to execute a bond to him to repair any injuries caused by hauling timber over it.

[6] We think it was the duty of his honor to explain to the jury the meaning of the term "adverse user," and to instruct them to answer the issue in the affirmative if they found, by the greater weight of the evidence, there had been such user for 20 years, and otherwise to answer the issue in the negative, and that there was error in the instruction given.

DOLES v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.

CONTRIBUTION (§ 5*)—JOINT TORT-FEASORS—LIABILITY.

Where the negligence of an express company in leaving its truck near a railroad track and the negligence of the railroad company in operating its train concurred in causing the death of a passenger, unable to gain a foothold on the train because of its speed and the crowded condition of the platform, and knocked under the cars by the truck, the two companies were joint tort-feasors as to the administrator of the deceased passenger, suing for his death, and as between the companies there was no right of indemnity or contribution, though the negligent act of the express company would not have injured the passenger, if the railroad company had not also been negligent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Cline, Judge.

Action by J. W. Doles, administrator of Frank Brown, deceased, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mason & Worrell and Murray Allen, for appellant. S. T. Stancell, Peebles & Harris, and Gay & Midyette, for appellee.

WALKER, J. It is not necessary to make an extended statement of the facts in this case. The plaintiff's intestate, Frank Brown, was killed at Suffolk, Va., while, as alleged, he was boarding the defendant's passenger train at that place, bound for Margaretsville, in this state. The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that the intestate purchased a ticket for his passage from Suffolk to his destination, and was in the act of getting upon the passenger coach just after the conductor had given the call, "All aboard!" when the train was started, "at once after the signal was given," and the intestate, who was unable to gain a foothold because of the speed of the train and the crowded condition of the steps and platform of the car, was knocked under the cars by a truck of the Southern Express Company, which had been left on the platform at the station, within a few feet of the passing train, and killed. One witness testified that the train started with a jerk and "with full force," while passengers were trying to alight from the train and the intestate was attempting to get on the steps, and that plaintiff could have been seen by the engineer and the porter, who called for passengers to get aboard. On the contrary, there was evidence tending to show that the train started at its usual speed, and that intestate was leaving the car, and jumped on the truck, and was killed. There was also evidence that he was warned not to leave the car by the porter, who told him that he would have the train stopped, so that he could get off safely. It may be said, generally, that some of the evidence tended to show negligence on the part of the defendant, which proximately caused the intestate's death, while there was other evidence which tended to prove that the intestate's death was caused entirely by his own fault in jumping from a rapidly moving train.

The court submitted the case to the jury in a charge which fully explained every phase of the evidence and clearly set forth the law applicable to the facts as they might find them to be. The charge of the court was in accordance with the principles laid down in Roberts v. Railroad, 155 N. C. 79, 70 S. E. 1080, and the essential facts of the two cases cannot well be distinguished. That case must control our decision in this one on all the points raised by the defendant, except the contention that the court should not have entered a nonsuit upon the evidence as to the Southern Express Company. The defendant objected to this ruling of the court, and relies upon Gregg v. Wilmington, 155 N. C. 18, 70 S. E. 1070, to sustain his objection. But we do not see the analogy between the two cases. In that case, Wolvin's negligence was active and the efficient cause of the injury, while the negligence of the city of Wilmington was merely passive, in allowing the dangerous condition, brought about by Wolvin's negligence, to exist in one of its streets. The city did not actually co-operate with Wolvin in committing the wrong to the plaintiff's intestate. In the Gregg Case, approving what is said by Judge Cooley in his treatise on Torts (3d Ed., p. 254), we stated the general rule to be according to the maxim that no man can make his own misconduct the ground for an action against another in his own favor. If he suffers because of his own wrongdoing, the law will not relieve him. The law cannot recognize equities as springing from a wrong in favor of one who was concerned in committing it. 155 N. C. 24, 70 S. E. 1070. Where two or more persons have participated in the commission of a wrong, the general rule undoubtedly is that a right to contribution or indemnity will not arise in favor of the one held responsible by the injured party. 88 Cyc. 493. There are exceptions to the rule, but this case is not included in any of them.

The case of Churchill v. Holt, 181 Mass. 67, 41 Am. Rep. 191, seems to be a strong authority against the contention of the defendant. It appeared that Churchill left his hatchway in an unsafe condition. Defendant's servant, in the performance of his master's business, interfered with it, so that it became more dangerous—that is, the danger already existing by the fault of Churchill was increased—and Mrs. Meston fell into the hatchway, and was thereby injured, and recovered damages of Churchill. It was held that Churchill was not entitled to indemnity or contribution from the defendant, Holt, whose servant interfered with the hatchway. With respect to the right of indemnity, upon the facts presented, the court said: "In such a case, both parties, whether they act with a common purpose or independently, aid in creating the danger or nuisance, and it is impossible to apportion the degree of their respective negligence, or to determine by whose individual negligence the injury was caused. They are both wrongdoers, whose unlawful acts contribute to produce the injury. They are in pari delicto, and therefore neither can recover indemnity or contribution of the other. The plaintiffs contend that they had the right to go to the jury upon the question whether the sole cause of the injury to Mrs. Meston was the negligent acts of the defendants' servant. We must presume that proper instructions were given as to other aspects of the case; but, in the aspect of the case supposed in the instruction we are considering, that is, if the jury found that the plaintiffs negligently left the hatchway in a dangerous condition, and that the acts of the defendants' servant merely made it more dangerous, it is impossible for the jury to find that the fault of the plaintiffs did not contribute to the injury. It is like the case of a man injured by falling into a hole dug partly by one person and partly by another. The acts of both aid in creating the danger which causes the injury, and it cannot be ascertained whether the acts of one excluding the acts of the other would have caused the same injury. If the acts are unlawful, both are wrongdoers in pari delicto, and, though each would be liable to the person injured, neither could recover indemnity or contribution of the other." Churchill v. Holt, 181 Mass. 67, 41 Am. Rep. 193. When the same case was before the court on a former appeal (127 Mass. 165, 34 Am. Rep. 355), it was said: "The rule that one of two joint tortfeasors cannot maintain an action against the other for indemnity or contribution does not apply to a case where one does the act or creates the nuisance, and the other does not join therein, but is thereby exposed to liability. In such case the parties are not in pari delicto, as to each other, though as to third persons either may be held liable."

But that is not our case. Here the express company left the truck near the track of the railroad company, and, if this was a negligent act, it would not have harmed the intestate if the defendant had not also been negligent. The two acts concurred in producing the injury, and, upon the assumption that the express company was negligent, it and the railroad company were joint tortfeasors, as to the plaintiff and as between themselves, and there is no right of indemnity or contribution. It may also be said that the defendant's wrong was the active and dominant cause of the injury, without which it would not have occurred, and it therefore has no ground whatever upon which to base a claim for compensation against its codefendant. Commissioners v. Indemnity Co., 155 N. C. 219, 71 S. E. 214.

BROCK v. SCOTT.

1. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 11*)—PENDENCY OF OTHER ACTION.

The pendency of an action begun before a justice of the peace at the time of the institution in the superior court of an action on the same cause of action does not justify a dismissal of the action in the superior court, where judgment of nonsuit was entered in the prior action before pleadings were filed in the subsequent action.

2. COURTS (§ 121*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

The sum demanded in good faith by plaintiff determines the jurisdiction of the superior court; and a plaintiff, instituting an action in the superior court pending an action begun in justice's court on the same cause of action, and alleging facts which, if proved, justify a judgment in excess of $200, shows a case within the jurisdiction of the superior court, though he is mistaken as to the legal effect of remitting in the first action the excess over $200 to confer jurisdiction on the justice, so that he cannot recover in the superior court more than $200.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 44*)—REMITTING EXCESS OVER $200 TO CONFER JURISDICTION—EFFECT.

Revisal 1905, § 1421, providing that where, in an action by a justice, the principal sum demanded exceeds $200, the justice shall dismiss the action unless plaintiff shall remit the excess above $200, and the justice shall make the entry that plaintiff remits to defendant the excess, gives to a creditor the opportunity of a speedy trial before a justice by reducing his debt to $200, but he need not sue before a justice; but where he does so, and remits the excess over $200 to confer jurisdiction, he releases such excess, and any recovery before the justice or in a subsequent action is limited to $200.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by C. H. Brock against S. J. Scott. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This was a civil action for debt; the plaintiff demanding, in his complaint, $251.02. An action had previously been instituted between the same parties before a justice of the peace on the same cause of action, in which the amount above $200 was remitted to confer jurisdiction. An appeal from the judgment rendered by the justice was taken to February term, 1910, of the superior court of Currituck, at which term, and on Wednesday of the same, the plaintiff took a voluntary nonsuit. Prior to the taking of this nonsuit, summons in this action was issued and served, which summons was returnable to this same February term, 1910, at which the nonsuit above mentioned was taken. The nonsuit in the action instituted before the justice was taken before any pleadings in this action were filed by either party. At this term the defendant appeared, and both parties asked and obtained time to plead. Between this and the succeeding term the plaintiff filed his complaint for the whole amount of $251.02 and at the succeeding or fall term, 1910, the defendant filed no plea, and made no motion to dismiss, but again asked for time to answer. Between September term, 1910, and March term, 1911, the answer of defendant was filed, setting up, among other defenses, a plea that an action was pending between the same parties for the same cause at the time of the institution of this action. No motion for the determination of the plea filed was made by the defendant, though the cause was continued from term to term until February term, 1912, from which this appeal was taken. At this last term, when the case was called, defendant for the first time moved to dismiss the action. The motion was allowed, and plaintiff excepted, and appealed to this court.

E. F. Aydlett and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellant. Ward & Grimes, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The pendency of the action, commenced before the justice of the peace, at the time this action was instituted in the superior court, did not justify the judgment of dismissal, because a judgment of nonsuit was entered in the former action before pleadings were filed in this, or it came on for trial. Grubbs v. Ferguson, 136 N. C. 60, 48 S. E. 551; Cook v. Cook, 159 N. C. —, 74 S. E. 639. In the case last cited, Justice Hoke, speaking for the court, says: "As a general rule, this right to plead the pendency of another action between the same parties before judgment had is regarded to a large extent as a rule of convenience, resting on the principle embodied in the maxim, 'Nemo debet bis vexare,' etc. The defect is one that can be waived, and it may also be cured by dismissing the prior action at any time before the hearing."

[2] Nor do we think it is true, as contended by the defendant, that the superior court has no jurisdiction of the plaintiff's cause of action. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint facts which, if true, entitle him to a judgment for more than $200, and it has been repeatedly held that it is the sum demanded in good faith which determines the jurisdiction. Sloan v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 487, 36 S. E. 21; Cromer v. Marsha, 122 N. C. 564, 29 S. E. 836; Horner School v. Wescott, 124 N. C. 518, 32 S. E. 885; Boyd v. Lumber Co., 132 N. C. 186, 43 S. E. 631; Shankle v. Ingram, 133 N. C. 254, 45 S. E. 578; Thompson v. Express Co., 144 N. C. 392, 57 S. E. 18.

The fact that the plaintiff was mistaken as to the legal effect of remitting the excess over $200, in order to confer jurisdiction on the justice, and cannot now recover more than that sum, does not oust the jurisdiction. In Boyd v. Lumber Co., supra, the sum demanded was $225, and the plaintiff admitted on the trial that he was not entitled to recover more than $178.25, and Justice Walker says, in discussing a motion to nonsuit, which was denied: "The aggregate sum demanded in good faith is the test of jurisdiction, and if the plaintiff claimed more than $200, the fact that he failed in his proof to establish all of his claim did not oust the jurisdiction of the court. The plaintiff may claim a sum sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, and a part of his claim may be based upon an erroneous principle of law, and for this reason he may fail to recover that part, and the total recovery may therefore fall short of the jurisdictional amount; but the court will still have jurisdiction of the case, and may award judgment for the smaller sum, provided it appears that the right to recover the larger amount was asserted in good faith." And in Horner School v. Wescott, supra, it was held that the superior court had jurisdiction of a cause of action based on a contract; the plaintiff demanding $479.25, when he was mistaken as to the construction of the contract and under its terms could not recover more than $200.

There is no suggestion that the plaintiff was not acting in good faith and did not believe that he was entitled to recover the amount demanded, and no reason can be assigned, upon the facts appearing in the record, for taking a nonsuit in the action commenced before the justice, except that he believed he was entitled to and would claim the full sum alleged to be due him, as an appeal had been taken, and the case would be tried in the superior court in any event.

[3] We are of opinion, however, that the act of the plaintiff in remitting the excess over $200, in order to confer jurisdiction on the justice, operates as a release, and that the recovery must be limited to that sum. The statute (Rev. § 1421) provides that: "Where it appears in any action brought before a justice, that the principal sum demanded exceeds two hundred dollars, the justice shall dismiss the action and render a judgment against the plaintiff for the costs, unless the plaintiff shall remit the excess of the principal above two hundred dollars, with the interest on said excess, and shall, at the time of filing his complaint, direct the justice to make this entry: 'The plaintiff, in this action, forgives and remits to the defendant so much of the principal of this claim as is in excess of two hundred dollars, together with the interest on said excess.'" The justice of the peace has no jurisdiction in civil actions founded on contract, if the sum demanded, exclusive of interest, exceeds $200, and the plain purpose of section 1421 of the Revisal is to give to one holding a debt the opportunity of a speedy trial before a justice, by reducing his debt to $200, instead of requiring him to wait for a term of the superior court.

The plaintiff was not compelled to sue before a justice, but he had the privilege of doing so, and the statute imposes as a condition to the exercise of this privilege that he "forgive and remit to the defendant" so much of the principal of the claim as is in excess of $200, which is in effect a release. If this is not the correct interpretation of the statute, it would seem that but one other conclusion could be reached, and that is that the plaintiff, having a claim in excess of $200, can remit the excess and recover judgment for $200, and hold the excess as a claim against the debtor, which could not have been contemplated. The case of Coggins v. Harrell, 86 N. C. 320, sustains this view. In that case the plaintiff sued a surety on the bond of a constable, the penalty of the bond being $4,000, to recover $140, and undertook to remit the penalty of the bond in excess of $140, and the court, after holding that the plaintiff did not have the right to remit, says: "If this plaintiff could remit the penalty of the bond, as attempted in this case, the bond would be satisfied by the judgment rendered upon it, and no action would lie for any further breaches thereof by other parties claiming to be injured thereby."

We conclude that the superior court has jurisdiction, but that the plaintiff cannot recover more than $200 principal money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Webb, Judge.

Action by J. B. Hodges against R. L. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following issues were submitted to the jury:

"1. Did defendant warrant and represent to plaintiff that the horse in question was gentle in harness and safe to drive, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"2. If so, was said warranty and representation false, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"3. If so, was plaintiff injured in consequence thereof, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"4. What damage is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant? Answer: One thousand dollars ($1,000)."

From the judgment rendered the defendant appealed.

F. G. James & Son and Ward & Grimes, for appellant. Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This case was before this court on a former appeal, and is reported in 158 N. C. 256, 73 S. E. 807. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the running away of a horse purchased by him of the defendant, on the ground that the horse was falsely warranted to be gentle. On a former trial a motion to nonsuit was sustained, and this court held that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury and ordered a new trial.

[1] The issues as to warranty and false representation as to the qualities of the horse have been found against the defendant on a charge not excepted to, and those findings may be considered as settled. The case now comes before this court upon the sole question as to whether, in any view of the evidence, there is sufficient ground to warrant a recovery for damages for injuries consequent upon the running away of the horse.

[2] As we read the case upon the record now sent up, the facts and evidence as developed in the second trial are substantially the same as on the former trial, and are recited fully in the opinion of Mr. Justice Walker. It is contended, however, upon this hearing, that the plaintiff can recover only the difference between the value of the horse as warranted and as he actually turned out to be, upon the ground that there is not evidence of a false representation upon the part of the defendant, or that he knew of the vicious character of the animal.

We think the contention of the learned counsel for the defendant cannot be sustained. It was held by us on the former trial that there was evidence tending to prove that the defendant falsely and knowingly represented that the horse was kind and gentle. The evidence on both trials seems to be practically the same. The plaintiff testified that he went to the defendant's stables in Greenville to purchase a horse, and that he told the defendant that he wanted a gentle horse, "one for my mother and father to drive; that they are old, and I want one that is safe." He said: "All right, we have got him. Here is one that I can sell you that I know is gentle. I can guarantee this horse to be gentle, and that any lady can drive him." The plaintiff testified that he told the defendant that he did not know anything about horses, that he had never bought one before in his life, and the defendant repeatedly stated that he knew this horse to be gentle, and that he guaranteed him to be perfectly gentle. If the evidence introduced by the plaintiff is to be believed, the animal was anything else but gentle, and his "natural gait was running away and kicking." He ran away shortly after the plaintiff got him, threw him out of the buggy, and seriously injured him.

It is not necessary to offer evidence that is conclusive of the defendant's knowledge of the vicious character of the horse, but it is only necessary to offer such evidence as is sufficient to go to the jury. The defendant was told by the plaintiff the purpose for which the plaintiff desired the animal, and the defendant repeatedly stated that he knew the horse to be gentle. The horse had been in the defendant's possession for some time, and it is a fair inference, although not a necessary one, that the defendant knew the vicious character of the horse, and misrepresented his qualities to the plaintiff. It is not for us nor for the judge below to draw such inferences; but the evidence in the case is of such a character that his honor was well warranted in submitting it to the jury, that they might draw such inferences if they saw fit.

[3] Assuming that the defendant made this representation as to the horse's qualities in good faith, he had no right to do it, unless he positively knew that the horse was a gentle one, which the evidence shows that he was not, but was an animal of the most vicious and unreliable character. The case of Allen v. Truesdell, 135 Mass. 75, cited in the former opinion of this court, is almost on all fours with the present case, and fully warrants the judgment of the court upon the issues as found by the jury.

[4] It being thus adjudicated on the former hearing of this case that there is evidence of false warranty and deceit in the sale of a horse, the rule of damage does not confine the plaintiff solely to such as was in the contemplation of the parties; but, having established to the satisfaction of the jury a tort, the plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as naturally flow from, and as were consequent upon, the wrongful and tortious conduct of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Cline, Judge.

This is an action to recover certain personal property, in which the defendant alleges a counterclaim, and demands damages for breach of a logging contract, and this appeal is based upon exceptions relating to the counterclaim; the jury having awarded damages in favor of the defendant. The defendant offered evidence tending to prove that he entered into a contract with the plaintiffs, under which he was to deliver the timber from two tracts of land at Plymouth for $5 per thousand; that the plaintiffs were to furnish him money and equipment to enable him to perform the contract on his part; that they were to furnish him iron for a railroad track and other equipment; that the plaintiffs failed to perform their agreement, and that he was damaged thereby; that among other elements of damage he lost a profit of $1.50 per thousand, which he would have made under said contract. The plaintiff offered evidence to the contrary, and particularly that the defendant would have made no profit under said contract, or in any event less than $1.50 per thousand. There was no evidence that the contract could not have been completed prior to the commencement of this action.

The defendant was examined as a witness and testified, among other things, that the iron for the railroad was not furnished him, and that he made complaints about it; that he told Mr. Bash that he did not have enough iron, and he replied, "We can't get any more right now, and as we can get boats we will send you more." Mr. Bash was general manager for the plaintiffs, with authority to make contracts, and was dead at the time of the trial. The plaintiffs objected to this evidence, under Revisal, § 1631, because it was a conversation with a deceased person. The objection was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted. One Smithwick was a witness, and testified that he had heard the defendant complain of the failure of the plaintiffs to furnish iron, and plaintiffs excepted. His honor explained to the jury that this evidence was admitted in corroboration of the defendant only. The defendant was examined before the trial, under Revisal, § 865, and at the trial the plaintiffs introduced a part of this examination, and the defendant was permitted, over the objection of the plaintiffs, to introduce the whole examination, and plaintiffs excepted. The examination is omitted from the record at the request of the plaintiffs, and there is no statement as to its contents.

The plaintiffs excepted to the part of the charge as to the recovery of profits by the defendant, because of failure to state a rule for measuring the damages. There was a verdict for the defendant on his counterclaim, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Pruden & Pruden, Gillham & Davenport, and S. Brown Shepherd, for appellants. Winston & Matthews, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. Four exceptions are considered in the plaintiffs' brief, and all others are deemed abandoned. The first three relate to rulings upon the evidence, and none of these can be sustained.

[1, 2] The evidence of the defendant as to a conversation with a deceased agent of the plaintiffs is not condemned by Revisal, § 1631 (Roberts v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 870, 14 S. E. 106; Gwaltney v. Assurance Co., 132 N. C. 925, 44 S. E. 659), and it was clearly competent to prove by the witness Smithwick that he had heard the defendant complain of the failure to furnish iron, in corroboration of the evidence of the defendant, for which purpose alone it was admitted.

[3] The exception to the introduction of the examination of the defendant, taken under Revisal, § 865, cannot be considered, because we are unable to see that it was in any way prejudicial to the plaintiff, as there is no statement of what was in the examination, and it was omitted from the record by direction of the appellant. It would seem, however, that the exception could not have availed the plaintiffs, as they introduced a part of the examination, and, further, the statute (Revisal, § 867) provides that the examination "may be read by either party on the trial."

[4] The charge of his honor is subject to the criticism that he did not state explicitly the measure of damages; but, when the part excepted to for this reason is considered as a whole, we do not think the jury could fail to understand that they were to award the defendant as damages the net profit he would have made under the contract, if any. He stated fully the contentions of the parties, and instructed the jury substantially that the defendant was entitled to recover damages if the plaintiffs had agreed to furnish iron and had failed to do so; that the defendant contended that, if the contract had been performed by the plaintiffs, he would have made a clear profit of $1.50 per thousand; that the plaintiffs contended that his profits would have been nothing, or in any event less than $1.50 per thousand; and that they must ascertain the amount of this damage under the fourth issue. If the plaintiffs thought more specific instructions necessary, it was their duty to call it to the attention of the court by prayers for instruction. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225; Ives v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 131, 55 S. E. 74, 115 Am. St. Rep. 732, 9 Ann. Cas. 188.

The case of Wilkinson v. Dunbar, 149 N. C. 20, 62 S. E. 748, sustains the ruling that the defendant is entitled to recover the profits he would have made, but it is not authority in favor of the plaintiffs upon the exception taken, as in that case a new trial was ordered on account of an erroneous rule laid down in the charge for estimating damages, and not because of failure to charge.

We find no error.

No error.

MIDGETT v. MEEKINS et al.

1. DEEDS (§ 97*)—CONSTRUCTION—REPUGNANT CLAUSES.

The rule that a clause in a deed, irreconcilable with a former clause and repugnant to the general purpose of the instrument, will be set aside, is subject to the rule that the intent of the parties, as embodied in the entire instrument, is to be given effect, if that can be done by any reasonable interpretation.

2. DEEDS (§ 130*)—CONSTRUCTION—REVERSION.

A deed from a husband to his wife and her heirs, to have and to hold as long as she should live and remain a widow after his death, with provision that at her death or remarriage the land should go to their children, and that, on her dying before him, the property should revert to him, gives him an estate in fee, and not a mere life estate, on her predecease; there being no irreconcilable conflict in the different clauses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Dare County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Thomas P. Midgett against Rosa Meekins and others. Judgment for de-defendants, and plaintiff appeals. New trial granted.

On the trial it was made to appear that on April 28, 1898, plaintiff, Thomas P. Midgett, executed a deed for two tracts of his land; the grantees being his then wife, Sarah H. Midgett, and the children of the marriage. The terms of the deed relevant to the inquiry are as follows: "This deed, made this the 28th day of April, 1898, by Thomas P. Midgett, of Manteo, Dare county, North Carolina, of the first part, to Sarah H. Midgett, of Manteo, Dare county, North Carolina, of the second part, witnesseth: That said Thomas P. Midgett, in consideration of one dollar and other valuable consideration to him paid by the said Sarah H. Midgett, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have bargained and sold, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and convey, to said Sarah H. Midgett and her heirs two certain lots or parcels of land, situated in the town of Manteo, county of Dare, and state of North Carolina, bounded as follows, viz.: [Here follows description of land in detail.] To have and to hold the aforesaid lots or parcels of land and all privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging to the said Sarah H. Midgett and her heirs as long as she lives and remains a widow after my death, and at her death or remarriage I do hereby convey the aforesaid lots or parcels of land, with the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, to my children that has been or may hereafter be born of her, the said Sarah H. Midgett, by me, the said Thomas P. Midgett, to their only use and behoof, forever. Provided, however, that, should the said Sarah H. Midgett die before I, the said Thomas P. Midgett, does, then and in that event the said property shall revert to me, the said Thomas P. Midgett." The wife having died, the children, the other grantors of the deed, made claim to the land, subject to a life estate of the grantor, their father. On issues submitted, and under charge of the court construing the deed, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"Is the plaintiff the owner in fee of the land set out and described in the complaint? Answer: No.

"What interest, if any, has the plaintiff in the land set out in the complaint? Answer: A life estate."

There was judgment on the verdict, declaring the children the owners of the land, subject to a life estate in the grantor, their father, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

B. G. Crisp, for appellant. E. F. Aydtlett and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] In Davis v. Frazier, 150 N. C. 451, 64 S. E. 201, the court said: "It is an undoubted principle that a subsequent clause, irreconcilable with a former clause and repugnant to the general purpose and intent of the contract, will be set aside. This was expressly held in Jones v. Casualty Co., 140 N. C. 262 [52 S. C. 578, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932, 111 Am. St. Rep. 843], and there were many decisions with us to like effect; but, as indicated in the case referred to and the authorities cited in its support, this principle is in subordination to another position, that the intent of the parties as embodied in the entire instrument is the end to be attained, and that each and every part of the contract must be given effect, if this can be done by any fair or reasonable interpretation; and it is only after subjecting the instrument to this controlling principle of construction that a subsequent clause may be rejected as repugnant and irreconcilable. Jones v. Casualty Co., supra; Lawson on Contracts, §§ 388, 389; Bishop on Contracts, §§ 386, 387." This decision was cited and approved in Gulf v. Refining Co., 157 N. C. 280, 72 S. E. 1003, and by Allen, Judge, in Hendricks v. Furniture Co., 156 N. C. 569, 72 S. E. 592, and the general principle has been directly applied to deeds conveying realty in several recent and well-considered decisions of the court. Acker and Wife v. Pridgen, 158 N. C. 337, 74 S. E. 335; In re Roberta C. Dixon, 156 N. C. 26, 72 S. E. 71; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514; Featherston v. Merrimon, 148 N. C. 199, 61 S. E. 675.

[2] In our opinion these authorities are decisive, and are against the defendants' position as to the interpretation of the present deed. From a perusal of the entire instrument, and giving to every clause its reasonable effect, we think it clear that the grantor had in mind the two conditions or events—one in case he survived his wife, and the other if she survived him. In the latter case the land is in effect conveyed to her during her life or widowhood, and then to the children of the marriage in fee, and in the former "the property shall revert to me." There is nothing in the instrument to indicate that the grantor intended only a life estate should revert, as in Dixon Case, supra; but by correct and reasonable interpretation, in case he survived his wife, the property and all interest in it should revert. Revisal 1905, § 946. There is, therefore, no irreconcilable conflict in the different clauses of the deed, and on the facts and evidence and under the authorities cited the grantor should be declared the owner of the property in fee. In Fortune v. Hunt, 152 N. C. 715, 68 S. E. 213, and in Wilkins v. Norman, 139 N. C. 40, 51 S. E. 797, 111 Am. St. Rep. 767, it was held that the former and the latter clauses of the deeds were in irreconcilable conflict, and the court applied the familiar principle that in such case and as to deeds the former should prevail.

For the error indicated, the plaintiff is entitled to a new trial; and it is so ordered.

NICHOLSON et al. v. EUREKA LUMBER CO.

1. DEEDS (§ 207*)—IDENTITY OF GRANTOR—EVIDENCE.

On the question of the identity of a grantor, the heir of the record owner of the land conveyed, evidence held sufficient to justify a finding that the grantor was the surviving grandchild and heir at law of the deceased record owner.

2. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 57*)—VALIDITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a woman was intrusted by a sister state with a notarial seal, and she acted in such state as a notary public in taking an acknowledgment to a deed, the court will presume that she was rightfully appointed to the office and that she acted rightfully in taking the acknowledgment, unless the contrary is proved.

3. TRIAL (§ 253*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action of trespass and to try title, the issue involved the location of a boundary line, and the evidence showed that a theoretical variation of the magnetic needle was controlled to some extent by an old and marked line, a charge that the burden was on plaintiff to show, by the greater weight of the evidence, that defendant had cut within plaintiff's lines, the course of which would be determined by the lines of the grant and the proper variation for the difference in time, was not objectionable as disregarding evidence of variation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Webb, Judge.

Action by P. A. Nicholson and another against the Eureka Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 156 N. C. 59, 72 S. E. 86, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162.

The jury rendered the following verdict:

"1. Are the plaintiffs the owners of the land described in the complaint? Answer: Yes; all the lands lying east of the lines E down to 3, then to A.

"2. Did defendant trespass on said land, as alleged? Answer: Yes.

"3. If so, what damages are plaintiffs entitled to recover? Answer: Seven dollars and fifty cents ($7.50)."

Rodman & Rodman and Ward & Grimes, for appellant. B. B. Nicholson and E. A. Daniel, Jr., for appellees.

HOKE, J. Both parties claimed title to the land in controversy under Ruel Windley, deceased; the plaintiffs, by deed purporting to be from Sadie Delany and her husband, the said Sadie (née Sadie Tooker) being the grandchild, and only heir at law of James Windley, to whom Ruel Windley had devised it. This deed, admitted in evidence over defendant's objection, was from Sadie Delany and her husband, Thomas, to P. A. Nicholson, plaintiff, bore date of December 12, 1908, and had been duly registered in Beaufort county on acknowledgment formally correct as follows: "State of Texas, McLennan County; I, Della Sadler, a notary public in and for the said county of McLennan, do hereby certify that Thomas Delany and wife, Sadie Delany, personally appeared before me this day and acknowledged the due execution of the within deed of conveyance; and the said Sadie Delany, being by me privately examined, separate and apart from her said husband, touching her voluntary execution of the same, doth state that she signed the same freely and voluntarily, without fear or compulsion of her said husband or any other person, and that she doth still voluntarily assent thereto. Witness my hand and notarial seal this the 14th day of December, 1908. Della Sadler, Notary Public, McLennan County, Texas."

[1] It was chiefly urged for error by defendant that there was no testimony amounting to legal evidence that the Sadie Delany, grantor in said deed, was the Sadie Delany (née Tooker) who was the grandchild and heir at law of James Windley, deceased; but, on the facts in evidence, the position cannot be sustained. On this question a witness, Wm. Draper, testified in substance that James Windley was dead, and all of his children had died without descendants, except Lovey, who married one Capt. Tooker; that she died, leaving two children; that one was drowned in a mill pond, and Sadie Tooker, the surviving child, married Thomas Delany, and was now in Waco, Tex.; that he had received several letters from her, and answered them, which he had at home, the letters being about this land. There was other testimony from this witness as to this 100 acres, the land in controversy, which was the James Windley land, and as to its correct location. On cross-examination, the witness stated that this Sadie Tooker was named Sadie Delany before she ever left Bath, N. C.; that he had never seen her husband, and had never seen Sadie Delany write in her life; did not know her husband, except what was said about him in these letters; "that he answered the letters he received from Mrs. Delany, and received replies from her; that he got the replies out of the post office and had them at home now." A motion to strike out this testimony was properly overruled, and the identity of name, the subject-matter of the correspondence, and attendant circumstances, were in our opinion amply sufficient to justify the conclusion, as stated, that the grantor in plaintiff's deed and Sadie Delany, the sole surviving grandchild and heir at law of James Windley, were one and the same person. Freeman v. Loftis, 51 N. C. 524; 1 Greenleaf (16th Ed.) § 43 a; Lawson, Presumptive Evidence, p. 309; 16 Cyc. p. 1055.

[2] It was further objected that the acknowledgment is invalid because taken by a woman. The only evidence that the officer taking this acknowledgment was a woman is the fact that the certificate is signed, "Delia Sadler, a notary public in and for said County of McLennan," and in favor of the stability of titles and the regularity of judicial proceedings we might, if required, rest the case here on the position that it does not sufficiently appear that this notary was a woman; but, whether man or woman, we think it entirely safe to hold that, having been intrusted by the state of Texas with a notarial seal and having acted and professed to act in that state as a notary public, it will be assumed that she was rightfully appointed to that office, and that she acted rightfully in taking this probate, until the contrary is made to appear. As an open question this would be so from convenience, and the position is, we think, in accord with authority. Piland v. Taypor, 113 N. C. 1, 18 S. E. 70; Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 41; Elliot on Evidence, § 103. The controversy between these litigants was really one of boundary, dependent largely on the correct location of plaintiff's deeds: "Beginning on an oak at or near the head of Ashe Branch," and thence various specified courses and distances, inclosing the property. Under a comprehensive charge the jury have established the location as contended for by plaintiffs, and after careful examination we find no good reason for disturbing their verdict.

[3] The objection made that the court in its charge ignored or disregarded evidence tending to show that a proper allowance for the variation of the magnetic needle would give the land a somewhat different placing is without merit. It would seem from the testimony that the theoretical variation was controlled to some extent by an old and marked line, and, further, there are no data in the record from which the court could determine that any substantial change in the location would have resulted. Apart from this, a perusal of his honor's charge will disclose that he directed the jury to make the allowance for the variation which the facts would require; the language of the court in reference thereto being in part as follows: "The burden is upon the plaintiffs to satisfy you by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant has cut within their lines, the course of which will be determined by the lines of the grant and the proper variation for the difference in time."

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment in plaintiffs' favor is affirmed.

No error.

CLARK, C. J., did not sit in this case, being related to some of the parties, but on the collateral question as to whether the certificate of a notary public in Texas to a legal instrument is valid here or not, because it appears that she was a woman, observes that each state or country is sole judge of the qualifications for voters and for office therein, and that such matter cannot be inquired into in any other jurisdiction. In Great Britain the chief executive in two of its longest and most brilliant reigns—Queen Victoria and Queen Elizabeth—was a woman, and the same is true even of Russia, whose most brilliant reign was that of Catherine the Great. In six states of this country, and in many foreign nations, women have now equal suffrage with men, and usually the right of suffrage carries with it the right to hold office. While the women have the full right of suffrage in only six states of this country, they vote in school matters and on local assessment in most of the other states. These are matters for each jurisdiction to settle for itself, and when a certificate of a notary public is sent to this state from another under a notarial seal, our courts cannot go back of it to inquire into the qualifications of the officer, though it cannot be doubted that a notary public is a public office, for "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state." Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1 (Comp. St. 1901, p. lxxxviii). At common law in England women held not only the office of queen, but that of sheriff and others. Some courts in this country (but none in England) have held that at common law she could not be a notary public. 29 Cyc. 1068, 1071, where the matter is fully discussed.

McKEEL-RICHARDSON HARDWARE CO.
v. BUHMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 163*)—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—MOTION TO VACATE—FINDINGS—DUTY TO MAKE.

On motion to set aside a default judgment on the ground of excusable neglect, it is the court's duty to find the facts; but defendants should request such finding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 323; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1008*)—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—MOTION TO VACATE—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

On motion to vacate a default judgment on the ground of excusable neglect, the trial court's finding of facts is conclusive; only the conclusion of law based thereon being reviewable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3955-3969; Dec. Dig. § 1008.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1071*)—HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO MAKE FINDINGS.

On motion to vacate a default judgment on the ground of excusable neglect, the trial judge's failure to find the facts is immaterial, on defendants' appeal from an order refusing to vacate the judgment, where the moving affidavits show inexcusable neglect.

4. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—DEFAULT—EXCUSE—SUFFICIENCY.

A defendant, against whom default judgment has been taken, cannot excuse his failure to answer within the time required by statute because of a custom at the bar of the particular county to allow 60 days in which to answer, in the absence of a written or admitted agreement between the parties to that effect.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 170*)—REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS NOT MADE BELOW.

No exception can be considered by the Supreme Court on appeal which was not regularly taken below, except that the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter or that the complaint does not state a cause of action; and hence, on appeal from an order refusing to vacate a default judgment, an objection that the judgment should be set aside for irregularity, in that on the verified complaint a judgment by default and inquiry should have been entered, and not a judgment by default final, where that objection was not made below.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1199*)—PROCEEDINGS AFTER REMAND.

Affirmance of an order refusing to vacate a default judgment on the ground of excusable neglect does not preclude defendant from subsequently moving to vacate the judgment below on the ground of irregularity in entering judgment by default final, instead of judgment by default and inquiry.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Webb, Judge.

Action by the McKeel-Richardson Hardware Company against W. C. Buhman and another. From an order refusing to set aside a judgment on the ground of excusable neglect, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Little, for appellants. Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1-3] This is an appeal from the refusal of a motion to set aside a judgment on the ground of excusable neglect. The court held that no excusable neglect had been shown. It is true that it is the duty of the court in such case to find the facts, as to which its finding is conclusive, and that upon such facts the conclusion of law only is reviewable. Norton v. McLaurin, 125 N. C. 185, 34 S. E. 269, and cases there cited. The failure of the judge to find the facts in this case, however, is immaterial; for, taking the affidavits of the appellant as correct, he has shown inexcusable neglect. It appears therefrom that the defendant employed a lawyer residing in New Hanover county to appear in a case pending in Beaufort superior court, which he was not in the habit of attending, and such counsel was not present at the term of the court and did not file answer. Manning v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 825, 28 S. E. 963; Williamson v. Cocke, 124 N. C. 585, 32 S. E. 963. Indeed, the appellant should have asked the judge to find the facts. Albertson v. Terry, 108 N. C. 75, 12 S. E. 892.

[4] The excuse of the counsel is that in New Hanover there was a "custom" that the defendant was allowed 60 days in which to answer. But it is not contradicted that this was not the custom in Beaufort county. Besides, if it had been such custom, it would not justify the defendant in failing to comply with the statutory requirement as to the time in which the answer should be filed, in the absence of a written or admitted agreement to that effect. Brown v. Hale, 93 N. C. 188. The judgment should therefore be affirmed.

[5, 6] It was suggested in this court by the appellant that the judgment should be set aside for irregularity, in that upon the verified complaint a judgment by default and inquiry should have been entered, and not a judgment by default final. There was no motion below, nor exception in this appeal, presenting that point, and no exception can be passed upon in this court which was not regularly taken below, except that the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, or that the complaint does not state a cause of action. But the order refusing to set aside the judgment for excusable neglect, which is affirmed by us, does not bar the defendant from hereafter making his motion in the cause below upon the ground of irregularity, if the facts and the law will justify the judgment being set aside or modified on that ground. Jeffries v. Aaron, 120 N. C. 167, 26 S. E. 696.

Affirmed.

VINSON v. WISE et al.

1. PARTITION (§ 12*)—SALE FOR PARTITION—ACTION—PARTIES—REMAINDERMEN.

An action for sale of a remainder interest in land for partition among the remaindermen cannot be maintained, where all the parties are contingent remaindermen; Revisal 1905, §§ 1590, 2508, requiring that plaintiff, Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Cline, Judge.

Action by J. C. Vinson against Bartelle Wise and others. Action dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

It appeared that J. C. Vinson, plaintiff, having acquired and holding by deed and mesne conveyances the interest of K. R. Wise and his daughter, Emma, the same being a portion of the estate in remainder, subject to the life estate of M. L. Wise, instituted this action against his grantors and the other remaindermen to obtain a sale of the land for division; the life tenant, M. L. Wise, mother of K. R. Wise, not being a party or in any way seeking relief. Defendants demurred, assigning for cause in part "that plaintiff has no right to maintain the action, in that the interest held by him in the land described in the complaint is not vested, but a contingent interest." The demurrer was sustained on the ground stated, and, plaintiff having declined to amend, judgment was entered that the action be dismissed. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Winborne & Winborne, for appellant.
Lloyd J. Lawrence, for appellees.

HOKE, J. The land in question, a storehouse and lot in Murfreesboro, N. C., is a part of the property devised by W. N. H. Smith, deceased, in item 3 of his last will and testament, and the terms of the said devise and the facts material and relevant to the inquiry are as follows: "(1) That William N. H. Smith, late of Wake county, in the state of North Carolina, died on the 14th day of November, 1889, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly proved and admitted to record in the superior court of said county of Wake. (2) That item 3 of said will is as follows: 'The land at Murfreesboro belonging to Major W. Wise, by him conveyed in trust to John C. Laurence and bought by me at the trustee's sale, I give the use of the same remaining to him for life, and to his surviving widow for life, and thereafter to his children, now three in number, and after the death of all with no issue then living the same in remainder to my children, William and Edward.' (3) That said Major W. Wise died on the 8th day of July, 1902, leaving him surviving his widow, M. L. Wise, referred to in said item 3 of said will, and who is still living, and his said three children, K. R. Wise, Bartelle Wise, and Eula Wise Smith, wife of the defendant W. W. Smith. (4) That said Eula Smith, wife of said W. W. Smith, died intestate on the 2d day of January, 1911, leaving her surviving the defendants W. N. H. Smith, Gordon Smith, and Louis Smith as her only children and heirs at law, and her husband, W. W. Smith. (5) That said K. R. Wise and Bartelle Wise are still living. (6) That the defendant Emma S. Wise is the only child of K. R. Wise. (7) That the defendant Bartelle Wise has never married. (8) That the defendants Ed. Chambers Smith and W. W. Smith are the sons of said testator, W. N. H. Smith, and referred to in said item 3 of said will as his sons 'William and Edward.' " That plaintiff has acquired the interest of said K. R. Wise and his daughter Emma in said store and lot, having purchased the same for full value from A. Brinckley and wife, who bought at foreclosure sale under a mortgage executed by said K. R. Wise and his daughter, and under and by virtue of said deeds claims to be the present owner of one undivided third interest in the property, subject to the life estate of M. L. Wise; the other present holders and claimants of the estate in remainder being parties defendant.

[1] If it be conceded that, under our statutes and the principles of law as they obtain with us, the plaintiff could maintain the present action without joinder of the life tenant and asking for a sale of the land itself, it is very properly admitted by the parties that he can only do so on the position that he is the owner of a vested estate in remainder. The statute under which he is endeavoring to proceed requires this in express terms. Rev. §§ 1590, 2508. And unless plaintiff now has a vested interest, or in any event unless some holder of a vested interest is a party, the demurrer was properly sustained.

[2] By the terms of this will, and on the death of the testator, K. R. Wise and the other children referred to became the devisees of a contingent estate in remainder, to determine in case "all of them die with no issue then living." Smith v. Lumber Co., 155 N. C. 389, 71 S. E. 445; Richardson v. Richardson, 152 N. C. 705, 68 S. E. 217; Perrett v. Bird, 152 N. C. 220, 67 S. E. 507; Bowen v. Hackney, 136 N. C. 187, 48 S. E. 633, 67 L. R. A. 440; Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 571, 20 S. E. 295. Under numerous decisions of the court in a devise of this character, and unless a contrary intent appears from the will, the event by which the estate must be determined will be referred, not to the death of the deviser, but the holder of the particular state itself, and the determinable quality of such an estate or interest will continue to affect it till "the event occurs by which same is to be determined or the estate becomes absolute." Smith v. Lumber Co., supra; Harrell v. Hagan, 147 N. C. 111, 60 S. E. 909, 125 Am. St. Rep. 539; Kornegay v. Morris, 122 N. C. 199, 29 S. E. 875; Williams v. Lewis, 100 N. C. 142, 5 S. E. 435, 6 Am. St. Rep. 574; Galloway v. Carter, 100 N. C. 112, 5 S. E. 4; Buchanan v. Buchanan, 99 N. C. 308, 5 S. E. 430. In the case of Harrell v. Hagan, supra, this general principle was applied, and it was held that, when either child died leaving issue, that interest became absolute, but that was by reason of a different wording of the contingent clause: "And if either or all of the above girls die without leaving a lawful heir," etc. In our case the devise is to the children of Major W. Wise, now three in number, and "in case all of them die with no issue then living the same in remainder to return to my children, William and Edward;" the intent evidently being to pass the estate to this Wise stock, if there were issue of that stock to take it when the last child of Major W. Wise, who took as devisee under the will, died, and, if not, the same was to return to members of his own family, to wit, his sons William and Edward.

There is no error and the judgment dismissing the action is affirmed.

GRANT v. GRANT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 18, 1912.)

1. APPEARANCE (§§ 9, 24*)—SPECIAL OR GENERAL.

A special appearance can be only for purpose of moving for dismissal for want of jurisdiction. One for purpose of moving to remove the action to another county, though styled special, is general, and therefore cures any defects in the process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52, 118-143; Dec. Dig. §§ 9, 24.*]

2. APPEARANCE (§ 20*)—EFFECT OF GENERAL APPEARANCE.

Entering a general appearance and moving for continuance makes service of summons unnecessary.

3. DIVORCE (§ 105*)—COMPLAINT—VERIFICATION.

Revisal 1905, § 1563, providing for the accompaniment of a complaint for divorce by affidavit of plaintiff that the facts alleged in the complaint are true to the best of his knowledge and belief, is satisfied by plaintiff's oath that the complaint is true of his own knowledge except as to those matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to them he believes it true, particularly where the complaint alleges no facts on information and belief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 340-343; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Claud Grant against Ella Early Grant. From an adverse order and judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action, commenced in Bertie county, to obtain an absolute divorce, and at the return term of the summons the defendant, through counsel, filed the following motion: "The defendant, by her attorneys, appears specially in this action and moves to dismiss this action, for want of jurisdiction of this court for the following causes: (1) That at the time this action was begun the plaintiff was not a resident of this county, but a resident of the county of Northampton, N. C., and is still a resident of that county. Wherefore, the defendant prays that this action be dismissed, but, if the court be of opinion that the defendant is not entitled to have this action dismissed, then that it be removed to said Northampton county for trial." His honor refused to dismiss the action, but found as a fact that the plaintiff was a resident of Northampton county, and on motion of the defendant, based on affidavits of Alex Lassiter and others, filed by her, removed the action for trial in that county. The defendant excepted and appealed.

On of the affidavits filed in support of the motion was made by the father of the defendant, in which, among other things, he says: That he is the father of the defendant, Ella Early Grant, and that she left this state last summer to make her residence and domicile in a distant state beyond the borders of this state, where she still resides. That she has written to him, expressing a strong desire to be at this term of this court, but was unable to reach here in time to be present during this term. That if the case is removed to Northampton county, N. C., for trial, she can be at the next term of the superior court of that county, but if not removed, but continued to the next term of this court, she can be present at that term.

When the action was called for trial in Northampton county, the defendant, through her counsel, filed the following motion: "The defendant, Ella E. Grant, appears specially and through her attorneys, Winborne & Winborne and J. H. Kerr, alone to move and do hereby move to dismiss this action for the following reasons: (1) Because the summons has not been legally served, and this court has not acquired jurisdiction of the defendant. (2) That the court has not jurisdiction of this action." The motion was denied, and the defendant excepted.

The motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction is based upon the alleged failure to verify the complaint, as required by Rev. § 1563.

The verification is as follows: "Claude

Grant maketh oath that he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled cause, and that the foregoing complaint is true of his own knowledge, except as to those matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to them he believes it to be true, that the said complaint is not made out of levity or by collusion between plaintiff and his wife, nor for the mere purpose of being freed and separated from each other, but in sincerity and truth for the causes mentioned in the complaint; that the facts set forth in the complaint as grounds for divorce have existed to his knowledge at least six months prior to the bringing of this action and filing this complaint, and he has been a resident of the state of North Carolina for more than two years next immediately preceding the filing of this complaint and bringing of this action. Claude Grant. Sworn to and subscribed before me this November 16, 1911. W. L. Lyon, Clerk Superior Court."

After the denial of the motion, the defendant entered a general appearance and moved for a continuance. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Winborne & Winborne, for appellant.
Peebles & Harris and Winston & Matthews, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The effect of special and general appearances is fully considered in the learned opinion of Justice Walker in Scott v. Life Association, 137 N. C. 518, 50 S. E. 222, in which it is held that a special appearance cannot be entered except for the purpose of moving to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and that, if the motion affects the merits, the appearance is general, and it is there said: "The test for determining the character of an appearance is the relief asked, the law looking to its substance rather than to its form. If the appearance is in effect general, the fact that the party styles it a special appearance will not change its real character. 3 Cyc. pp. 502, 508. The question always is what a party has done, and not what he intended to do. If the relief prayed affects the merits or the motion involves the merits, and a motion to vacate a judgment is such a motion, then the appearance is in law a general one." It follows from this statement of the law that the appearance in Bertle for the purpose of making a motion to remove the action to Northampton county was general, although styled special, and, if so, it cured any defects in the process, and gave the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.

[2] If, however, there was any doubt upon this question, it appears in the record that the defendant afterwards formally entered a general appearance in Northampton and moved for a continuance, which made a service of the summons unnecessary.

[3] The other ground for the motion to dismiss is on account of alleged defects in the verification of the complaint. It is true, as contended by the defendant, that an objection to the verification of a complaint in an action for divorce is jurisdictional (Hopkins v. Hopkins, 132 N. C. 23, 43 S. E. 508; Johnson v. Johnson, 142 N. C. 462, 55 S. E. 341), but in our opinion the verification in this case substantially complies with the statute, and particularly as the complaint alleges no facts on information and belief, but, if it did not, the judge states that the plaintiff is allowed to amend the affidavit of verification by adding "that the facts set forth in the complaint are true to the best of affiant's knowledge and belief," which conforms to the words of the statute. This disposes of both appeals. There is no error.

RICKS et al. v. WOODARD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 18, 1912.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 87*)—COMPETENCY—GENERAL REPUTATION AS TO BOUNDARIES—RE-MOTENESS OF ORIGIN.

Persons who had known land for 40 or 45 years, and who knew the general reputation in the community as to the location of a boundary line, could testify as to the location of such line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-87; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 35*)—GENERAL REPUTATION—BOUNDARIES—LOCATION WITH RESPECT TO NATURAL OBJECT.

And, as such evidence must attach itself to some monument of boundary or natural object, their location of the boundary according to general reputation with reference to a fence and a particular pine tree was competent evidence.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 231*)—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—NECESSITY OF SPECIFIC OBJECTION.

A reviewing court cannot reverse for the admission of objectionable evidence, where the only objection was made to a general statement of a witness which included competent testimony.

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 35*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

While evidence of the general reputation as to the location of a boundary at a time 20 years before the action is inadmissible for its lack of remoteness, it was properly admitted to support and corroborate testimony tending to establish the existence of an earlier reputation which was sufficiently remote and already before the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-159, 163, 165, 177-183; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Cline, Judge.

Action by W. S. Ricks and others against W. T. Woodard. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed. No error.

Winborne & Winborne, for appellant. Mason, Worrell & Long and D. C. Barnes, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1, 2] The suit involved the correct location of a divisional line between two adjoining tracts of land in said county—the Barnes tract and the Tyner tract. Under a charge, to which no exceptions were taken, the jury established the line as contended for by the plaintiff, and we find no exceptions on the record which may be allowed for reversible error. In the progress of the trial evidence was admitted from several witnesses tending to establish a general reputation that the true dividing line was located as claimed by plaintiff. The reception of this evidence was urged for error; the objection being chiefly that it was too vague and indefinite, but the record in our opinion will not sustain the position. Speaking in this character of evidence, in Hemphill v. Hemphill, 138 N. C. 506, 51 S. E. 43, the court said: "Such evidence has been uniformly received in this state, and the restrictions put upon it by our decisions seem to be that the reputation, whether by parol or otherwise, should have its origin at a time comparatively remote, and always ante litem motam; second, that it should attach itself to some monument of boundary or natural object, or be fortified and supported by evidence of occupation and acquiescence tending to give the land in question some fixed or definite location"—citing Tate v. Southard, 8 N. C. 45; Mendennall v. Cassells, 20 N. C. 43; Dobson v. Finley, 53 N. C. 496; Shaffer v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 15, 23 S. E. 154; Westfelt v. Adams, 131 N. C. 379-384, 42 S. E. 823—a statement quoted with approval in Lamb v. Copeland, 158 N. C. 136, 73 S. E. 797.

In the present case the great bulk of this testimony, and the only portion to which exception was properly taken, was to the effect that so long as 40 and 50 years ago there was a general reputation that the dividing line between these two tracts of land was as claimed by plaintiff; one witness, E. S. Vick, saying in this connection: "There was a general reputation when I first knew these matters of the dividing line between the Tyner and Barnes land. I knew that reputation. It was a cross-fence on the south and east side of the Mary Cook field and the northwest side of a field on the Tyner land, known as the Vick field." Another, Lee Davis: "There was a general reputation of location of the dividing line between the Barnes and Tyner lands; that by that reputation the line tree was just behind the stable on the Jack field, and went to the upper corner of the Jack field fence to a large pine, which was a line tree. This ran along the southeast side of the Jack field." And another, Britt Morgan: "That he is 76 years old; that there was a general reputation 45 years ago as to the dividing line between the Barnes and Tyner land; was the fence along the Jack field, and there used to be a footpath on a part of this line. The fore and aft tree stood right behind the stable on the Jack field. It was a spruce pine tree, and the line went on down putting the Jack field on the west and the Tyner land on the east side; went to three corn shuckings in the Jack field for Henry Barnes forty years or more ago," etc. This testimony fully meets the requirements of the principle. It was sufficiently remote, and did attach itself to physical objects "tending to give the land in question a fixed and definite location."

[3, 4] True, one witness spoke of this reputation as existing to his knowledge 20 years ago, and this, under our decisions, could not properly be considered as coming within the rule heretofore stated. See Lamb v. Copeland, supra. But this, in our opinion, cannot be held for reversible error: (1) Because the objection was made to a more general statement of the witness, in which was included much testimony that was undoubtedly competent. State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 714, 45 S. E. 944. (2) It was permissible in support and corroboration of the testimony tending to establish the existence of an earlier reputation, which, as we have seen, had been properly received in evidence and as before the jury for consideration on the issue. There is no error, and the judgment in plaintiff's favor is affirmed.

No error.

PATTERSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. HOMICIDE (§ 216*)—DYING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

To lay a foundation for the admission of a dying declaration, the commonwealth called a witness, who testified that decedent, when assisted, declared, "lay me down and let me die," and called another witness, who testified that decedent said he felt poorly, and he did not reckon taking medicine would do any good, but that he would take it, and that decedent made no arrangements about dying, but talked about wanting to go to a hospital. The attending physician testified that decedent said that if nothing was done to relieve his pain he would die; that the physician relieved his pain; and that decedent said he rested easier. The wound inflicted on decedent consisted of a shot, which took effect in his right leg between the knee and body. He died in the evening of the day he was shot. Held not to show that decedent believed he was going to die; and declarations made by him were inadmissible as dying declarations.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 214*)—DYING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Dying declarations are only admissible as to the circumstances of the transaction itself which results in the death of declarant; and any self-serving statements must be excluded.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 214*)—DYING DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

A declaration by decedent, not confined to the transaction resulting in his death, but containing self-serving declarations as to his attitude toward accused and the daughters of accused prior to the date of the killing, is inadmissible.

4. HOMICIDE (§ 214*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the court erroneously admitted the declarations of decedent as to his conduct towards the daughters of accused, it was error to refuse to permit accused to contradict such declarations.

5. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where there was evidence of decedent's misbehavior towards accused and his two daughters, and that he had attempted an assault on one of the daughters, and that accused had been informed thereof before the killing, a charge that the jury might consider the evidence of the state of feeling between decedent and accused, preceding the killing, as throwing light on the situation and occurrences, was correct; and a charge that, though decedent had used insulting language to accused and his daughters, the same could not be considered, unless decedent was the aggressor, and that accused acted in self-defense, was erroneous.

Keith, P., dissenting in part.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockbridge County.

R. V. Patterson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Greenlee D. Letcher, for plaintiff in error
Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

CARDWELL, J. At the September term of the circuit court of Rockbridge county, 1911, plaintiff in error was indicted for the murder of S. H. Campbell on June 30, 1911, and at that term of the court he was put upon trial; but the jury failed to agree upon a verdict. The case was again tried at the November term of the court, 1911, when the jury found a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, and fixed the accused's punishment at six years in the penitentiary, which verdict the court refused to set aside.

The assignments of error in the petition, upon which this writ of error was awarded the prisoner, relate (1) to the admission of improper evidence, (2) exclusion of evidence offered by the defense, (3) instructions given on behalf of the commonwealth and the rejection of instructions asked for by the defense, (4) refusal to set aside the verdict and award a new trial because of after-discovered evidence, and (5) refusal to set aside the verdict because contrary to the law and the evidence.

The deceased, it appears, moved to the house where he died about Christmas preceding the occurrence resulting in the wound inflicted by plaintiff in error upon him, which was followed by his death, and, according to evidence in the record unobjected to, from the time he went there he began to behave very badly towards plaintiff in error and his two daughters, who lived near him, growing out of the refusal of plaintiff in error to allow hunting on his lands. Plaintiff in error lived upon his own land with his two daughters, aged 16 and 17 years, respectively, whose mother died when they were about 12 years younger, since which time he had had the entire care of these girls, carrying them about with him until they became large enough for one to remain at home while the other went with him to work when he went to the fields. Deceased on numerous occasions, and whenever opportunity was afforded, not only used abusive language to plaintiff in error in the presence of his daughters, but behaved in the presence of the latter, when alone and unprotected, in the most indecent and shocking manner, using language too vile and indecent to be here repeated. There was evidence tending to show that on the morning of the day of the homicide plaintiff in error left his home accompanied by one of his daughters, each riding a horse, to go to his mountain land, one mile up South river, where he and his daughter had seen a ground hog the day before, and for the purpose of killing it carried his double-barrel gun loaded with large shot; that when they reached the turn of the road at which the deceased's house, situated several hundred yards off, could be seen they observed him standing in the door, where he remained until they got opposite his house, when he came down to the railroad and disappeared behind a sycamore and other trees in foliage at the time, after which plaintiff in error and his daughter neither thought nor saw anything more of the deceased until about 100 yards further on, when they turned back at an acute angle into plaintiff in error's right of way leading across the railroad up to his mountain land, at which time they saw the deceased, looking mad, step off the railroad down towards them, muttering something which could not be understood because of the roar of the river, and thereupon plaintiff in error told the deceased to go away and not give him any trouble; that deceased then cursed plaintiff in error and told him "he had to take it, that he had it in for him," and threw a rock which came close to plaintiff in error's head, and came on, quickly throwing another rock, which also nearly struck him, which rocks deceased took from his pockets or from under his overall flap, and then came to the gate, which was about 13 steps from the railroad, and picked up another large rock and started to rise, with his left hand extended towards the latch of the gate, saying, "Damn you, I will come through and kill you this morning;" whereupon plaintiff in error lowered his gun and shot one barrel of it through the gate at deceased's legs, the shot taking effect in his right leg between the knee and the body. Plaintiff in error fired but one barrel of his gun, and the deceased, after standing a moment, dropped the rock from his hand and walked back towards his home, and, when about 75 yards or about half the distance to his house, laid down by the railroad track, from which point he was later carried to his home, where he died about 7 o'clock that evening.

The court is of opinion that the dying declarations of the deceased, allowed to go to the jury at the trial over the objection of plaintiff in error, were improperly admitted in evidence, (1) because it was not clearly shown that the deceased believed he was going to die when these declarations were made; and, (2) even if the deceased had believed he was going to die at the time he made the declarations narrated by the witness Painter, some of the statements said to have been made by the deceased were not a part of the res gestæ; nor did they relate to the transaction itself which resulted in the declarant's death.

[1] The commonwealth introduced one B. D. Armstrong as a witness, who testified, over objection by plaintiff in error, that he was a brakeman on the train of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company which came along about 7:25 o'clock a. m. on the morning that deceased was shot, and saw him by the railroad, his wife and children and one Gerald being with him, and he asked witness to help him up, and upon witness doing so (presumably) deceased said, "Lay me down and let me die." This was nothing more than a simple exclamation on the part of the deceased, actuated doubtless by the sensation of pain and suffering at the time in his wounded leg, but in no wise proves that he thought he was going to die, and threw no light whatever, as we shall presently see, on his frame of mind five or six hours after, when the so-called "dying declarations" under consideration were made.

The witness Painter, a brother-in-law of deceased, alone testifies as to the dying declarations of the deceased admitted in evidence, and as far as pertinent his statement is: "After I got my dinner, I went back to Campbell's and stayed there until about 2 o'clock, when I went to Vesuvius, and when I got back later in the evening Campbell was dying. When I got back to Campbell's (about 2 o'clock) after arresting Patterson, I told him what Patterson said about him throwing the rocks, and Campbell said that there had been no trouble between him and Patterson, and he asked me whether Patterson said that he had thrown any rocks. Says he, 'Did he say that?' and Campbell then said that he had been telling him [Painter] all day that he was going to die, and that he never had any trouble with Patterson only at the spring on the mountain, and that Patterson said that he had eight feet of his land and must put the fence back, and that Patterson ripped out an oath and refused to speak to him. Campbell said there had been no trouble between them, and that Patterson shot and killed him for nothing; that Patterson said, 'God damn you, don't come through my gate, or I will blow your brains out!' And Campbell said that he hoped he would die that minute if he threw a rock; that whether Patterson's nerve failed him or not he did not know, but that he dropped the gun from his head and shot him in the leg. When I went back after the arrest, he was resting, not suffering much, but said, 'I am poorly;' that he never had mistreated Patterson's daughters—respected them as his own." On cross-examination the witness said that when Campbell made the above statement to him he took a glass of water without assistance, and in drinking it choked; that he then assisted him to take some medicine that the doctor had left there, and with witness' help Campbell took the medicine and did not choke, and took it easily and without trouble; that when witness asked him about taking the medicine Campbell said that "he did not reckon it would do him any good," but that he would take it, and he did take it; that Campbell made no arrangements about dying, either about his worldly affairs or about his soul; that he asked nobody to have prayers or read the Bible, and did not ask for the preacher; that he heard Campbell talking about not wanting to go to the Buena Vista hospital, but wanted to go to Roanoke, but he did not say for what reason; that Campbell told nobody good-bye; and that witness, shortly after hearing the above conversation, went up to Vesuvius, and when he got back later in the evening had no further conversation with Campbell, and Campbell said nothing to any one and died about 7 o'clock.

The attending physician, upon reaching the deceased, found him suffering from great loss of blood, and he (deceased) said that if something was not done to relieve his pain he would die. This physician further testified that "the bleeding had stopped when I reached Campbell. I relieved his pain. He said he was easier." It further appears from the testimony of this witness that when he left deceased shortly before his alleged conversation with the witness Painter, not only was the hope of life held out, but without any suggestion of death he suggested to deceased that he would take him to the Buena Vista hospital; but the deceased said that he wanted to go to the hospital at Roanoke. The physician never told deceased or any one else that he (deceased) was going to die, but did say to some that his chances were poor or not good. True he says also that when he reached the deceased he knew that if something was not done to relieve his pain he would die; but he says also, as we have just stated, that when he reached deceased the bleeding had stopped, and he relieved his pain and talked with him about going to the hospital, and he stated that he wanted to go to Roanoke, and not to Buena Vista.

Another significant fact appearing in the record going to show the absence of thought on the part of the deceased or those around him that he was under a sense of impending death and without any expectation or hope of recovery is that his wife, knowing little or nothing about the matter, went to the preliminary hearing given the plaintiff in error by a justice several miles from their home on the day deceased was shot, and was gone several hours.

It is very true that in ascertaining consciousness of approaching death recourse should naturally be had to all the attending circumstances, such as the nature of the injury, etc.; but in this case neither the nature of the injury nor the circumstances shown clearly warranted the conclusion that the deceased was conscious of approaching death when he made the statements introduced as his dying declarations. It will not do to say that because death did actually occur a few hours after the declarations were made the conclusion must be reached that the declarant was conscious of approaching death when they were made.

In Jackson's Case, 60 Va. 667, the deceased appeared impressed with the belief that he would soon die, and generally so expressed himself, and in the preparation for death made his will, yet after waking up from a nap of sleep he said, "Who knows but that I may get well;" and this was held to imply the existence in his mind of a possibility of his recovery, and evidence offered as to dying declarations made by him were not admissible. See, also, Bull's Case, 55 Va. 620; Swisher's Case, 67 Va. 964, 21 Am. Dec. 330; O'Boyle's Case, 100 Va. 785, 40 S. E. 121; Bowles' Case, 103 Va. 815, 48 S. E. 527.

In the case of Tip v. State, 14 Lea (Tenn.) 502, the facts and circumstances relied on as a sufficient foundation for the introduction in evidence of certain alleged dying declarations of the deceased were strikingly similar to the facts and circumstances relied on in this case; but the court, in an opinion reviewing the authorities at some length, held that there was not sufficient proof that the deceased was without any hope of recovery, and therefore the evidence as to his dying declaration had to be rejected. The opinion quotes from Lord Coleridge in Rex v. Spillbury, 7 C. & P. L. 87, as follows: "It is an extremely painful matter for me to decide upon; but when I consider that this species of proof is an anomaly and contrary to all the rules of evidence, and that if received it would have the greatest weight with the jury, I think I ought not to receive the evidence, unless I feel fully convinced that the deceased was in such state as to render the evidence clearly admissible. It appears from the evidence that the deceased said he thought he should not recover, as he was very ill. Now, people often make use of expressions of that kind who have no conviction that their death is near approaching. If the deceased in this case had felt that his end was drawing very near, and that he had no hope of recovering, I should expect him to be saying something of his affairs, and of who was to have his property, or giving some directions as to his funeral, or as to where he would be buried, or that he would have used expressions to his widow purporting that they were soon to be separated by death, or that he would have taken leave of his friends and relations in a way that showed he was convinced that his death was at hand. As nothing of this sort appears, I think there was no sufficient proof that he was without any hope of recovery, and that I therefore ought to reject the evidence."

"It follows from the general principle that the belief must be, not merely of the possibility of death, nor even of its probability, but of its certainly. A less stringent rule might with safety have been adopted, but this is the accepted one. The tests have been variously phrased; there must be 'no hope of recovery;' 'a settled expectation of death;' 'an undoubting belief.' Their general effect is the same. The essential idea is that the belief should be a positive and absolute one, not limited by doubts or reserve, so that no room is left for the operation of worldly motives." 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1440.

Among the authorities cited in support of the text is the case of Peak v. State, 50 N. J. Law, 222, 12 Atl. 701, in which the opinion by Beasley, C. J., says: "(The declarant) shall have a complete conviction that death is at hand. * * * Death shortly to ensue must be an absolute certainty, so far as the consciousness of the person making the declaration is concerned." The syllabus of that case, so far as pertinent, is: "In order to make dying declarations admissible, the state must make it plainly apparent that the declarant had given up all hope of life and believed that death was impending." "Where the surgeon told the patient she might die at any moment, and that there was but one chance, from a contemplated operation, and the patient said she did not expect to recover, but would like to, and the conditions of the situation did not control such expressions, held, that the statements of the patient then made were not admissible, on the ground that it was not shown that such declarant had given up all hope of life."

See, also, 4 Va. & W. Va. Enc. Digest, p. 848, where, under the head "Foundation for the Admission of the Evidence," it is said that the rule (as stated in the authorities above cited) is a well-settled rule, and all the decisions of this court relating to the subject are cited.

[2] Dying declarations are only admissible in evidence as to the circumstances of the transaction itself which results in the death of the declarant. Clark's Crim. Proc. 525; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 679; O'Boyle's Case, supra. The absence of any self-serving purpose to be furthered on the part of the declarant is an essential element of the circumstantial guaranty of the trustworthiness of dying declarations. 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1443.

[3] The so-called "dying declarations" of the deceased admitted in evidence in this case are obnoxious to the established rules governing the admissibility of such evidence, not only because they were not confined to the transaction itself which resulted in the death of the deceased, but contained self-serving declarations as to his attitude toward plaintiff in error and his daughters prior to the date of the transaction, notably that he (deceased) "had never mistreated Patterson's daughters—respected them as his own."

[4] At the trial of the case, after the said declarations had been admitted in evidence, and after one of the daughters of plaintiff in error had been allowed to testify as to deceased's conduct toward her, her father, and her sister, and had given an account of his solicitations and attempted assault upon her "in the mountain field," which fact she straightway communicated to her father, counsel for the defense offered to prove by one Aud. Davis that the deceased, prior to the occurrence, had in vile language declared his purpose to do just what the daughter of the deceased testified he had attempted to do, but the witness Davis was not allowed to testify, to which ruling plaintiff in error excepted and assigns error.

As before stated, the declarations of the deceased as to his conduct towards the daughters of the accused were not admissible and ought to have been excluded; but, the trial court having admitted them, the accused ought to have been permitted to contradict the said declarations of the accused. In the view we take of the case, neither the said declarations of the deceased, nor the statements which the deceased made to Davis, were admissible, and upon the next trial neither should go to the jury.

We shall not attempt to consider at length the assignment of error relating to the instructions given for the commonwealth and the refusal of instructions asked for the defense; in fact, it is not necessary.

[5] The instructions to the jury given for the commonwealth were embraced in one very lengthy and detailed statement of the principles of law applicable to cases of homicide in general, and to the evidence in this case in particular, and then contain the following paragraph: "And you are further instructed that, even though you may believe from the evidence that the deceased, Sam'l Campbell, had used insulting and threatening language to the accused, and had used improper and indecent language to and about the daughters of the accused, in their presence and in his presence, yet, unless you further believe from the evidence and all the immediate circumstances surrounding the killing of deceased that he was the aggressor, and that said accused acted in self-defense, with the real or apparent necessity of saving himself from death or great bodily injury, you cannot consider such evidence at all in arriving at your verdict."

The contention of counsel for plaintiff in error is that, not only were the instructions given for the commonwealth confusing to the jury and misleading, but that the language of the instructions just quoted was not a correct statement of the law, as applied to the facts which the evidence in the case tended to prove, and was in conflict with an instruction given for the defense, in which the court rightly instructed the jury that, in considering the question as to whether Campbell made an attack upon Patterson which led to the shooting, they might consider the evidence of the state of feeling between Campbell and Patterson, preceding same, as throwing light upon the situation and occurrences.

We are of opinion that the principle of law propounded in the instruction for the defense, which told the jury that they might consider the evidence of the state of feeling between Campbell and Patterson, preceding the shooting, as throwing light upon the situation and occurrences, was a correct one, and therefore the language embraced in the instructions given for the commonwealth, quoted above, was in conflict therewith, and should not have been given.

As the other questions raised with respect to the instructions are not likely to arise upon another trial of the case, they need not be considered here, and for the same reason it is not necessary to consider the assignment of error relating to the refusal of the court to grant the accused a new trial because of after-discovered evidence.

The remaining assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict of the jury, because contrary to the law and the evidence; and as the case has to be remanded for a new trial we deem it inexpedient to review the evidence certified in the record.

It follows that the judgment of the circuit court has to be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

KEITH, P. (concurring). I think the dying declaration which appears in the record was too broad, and that so much of it as related to facts not directly connected with the homicide should have been excluded, but that, subject to proper correction, the declaration should have been admitted.

Whether or not a dying declaration is admissible depends largely upon the mental condition of the declarant. If a man who has received a wound believes that wound to be mortal, and that he will shortly die of it, his declaration is admissible; and I know of no way in which his mental attitude can be ascertained, except by what the declarant may say and do.

In the case under consideration, Campbell stated that he was going to die; and when offered the medicine said that he "did not reckon it would do any good," but that he would take it. There was no word which emanated from him between the time he received the wound and the moment of his death which cast the slightest doubt upon his sincerity, or upon his belief that he was within the shadow of impending death. It is true that when the physician spoke to him about sending him to a hospital he said that he preferred to go to the hospital at Roanoke, rather than that at Buena Vista; but there was nothing that indicated that he entertained the slightest hope of recovery, and, as a matter of fact, he died on the afternoon of the day he received the wound.

I think the dying declaration was admissible, but should have been confined to the facts connected with the homicide; and for these reasons I concur in the judgment of reversal, but not in the opinion of the court.

HONAKER v. STARKS.

1. WILLS (§ 449*)—CONSTRUCTION—PROPERTY DISPOSED OF.

Where testatrix, owning five shares of stock in a bank, disposed of her estate, real and personal, to a number of devisees and legatees, and her will, containing no residuary clause, gave to a beneficiary named "my stock (one share)" in a bank, the gift of the stock included all the shares of stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 965; Dec. Dig. § 449.*]

2. WILLS (§ 463*)—CONSTRUCTION—PROPERTY DISPOSED OF.

Where the subject of a gift in a will is sufficiently and clearly ascertained, effect will be given to the gift, notwithstanding any added particulars of description, which are found to be false or mistaken.

3. WILLS (§ 449*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTESTACY.

Where a will is subject to two constructions, the construction which will prevent total or partial intestacy will be preferred.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bland County.

Suit between J. D. Honaker, administrator of Rebecca J. Hicks, deceased, and C. J. M. Starks. From a decree for the latter, the former appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Williams, for appellant. A. R. Porterfield and W. J. Henson, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. [1] The last will and testament of Rebecca J. Hicks was duly probated in Bland county on the 10th day of March, 1909. The testatrix disposes of her estate, real and personal, to a number of devisees and legatees, there being no residuary clause in the will.

The seventh clause of the will is as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath to C. M. Starks my stock (one share) in the Bank of Bland County, located at Bland, Virginia."

The record shows that the testatrix owned five shares of stock in the bank mentioned, and it is contended by the appellant that under the seventh clause the appellee took only one share of stock, and that the testatrix died intestate as to the remaining four shares.

We are of opinion that the devise of "my stock" carried with it the five shares of stock owned by the testatrix in the Bank of Bland, and that such devise was not limited or in any way diminished by the subsequent parenthetical words "(one share)." This was merely an attempted, but mistaken, description of the stock owned by the testatrix in the Bank of Bland, which had previously been disposed of by the use of the broad term "my stock," which was five shares.

[2] Statements of quantity are seldom given much weight, because the amount is not often exactly known, and is easily mistaken. Where the subject is sufficiently and clearly ascertained, as it is in the case before us, by the use of the words "my stock," though there be added particulars of description, which are found to be false or mistaken, effect will be given to the devise notwithstanding, and the false or mistaken description will be rejected. Wootton v. Redd's Ex'r, 53 Va. 196; Savings Bank v. Stewart, 93 Va. 447, 25 S. E. 543. If this view needed any support, it is strengthened by the fact that the construction insisted upon by the appellant would create a partial intestacy, which should be avoided, if possible.

[3] When a man makes a will, the presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is that he intended thereby to dispose of his whole estate. Accordingly, where two modes of interpretation are possible, that is preferred which will prevent either total or partial intestacy. Michie's Digest (Va.) 787, and cases there cited.

In the case under consideration, it is obvious from the will, taken as a whole, that the testatrix did not intend to die intestate as to any part of her estate, and that she did intend to give to the appellee the five shares of stock owned by her in the Bank of Bland county. This conclusion was reached by the circuit court, and its decree must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SMITH v. STANLEY.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 171*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED IN TRIAL COURT.

Where a trial in ejectment proceeded on the theory that it was a case of common source of title, and defendant, in a requested instruction, conceded that if plaintiff traced his title back to a grantor and showed a present right of possession he established a prima facie case, defendant, on plaintiff's writ of error to review a judgment of dismissal, could not raise the question that the parties did not derive title from a common source.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 472*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary, a surveyor of the lands claimed by plaintiff, who had made a plat thereof which was in evidence, could not testify, after stating how he had located a part of the disputed line, if there was any other rule of surveying in locating a line than that adopted by him, since the question whether the line was properly located was for the jury.

3. WITNESSES (§ 269*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—EXTENT.

A party cross-examining a witness as to matters other than those stated in the examination in chief should make the witness his own witness, calling him as such in the progress of the cause.

4. TRIAL (§ 84*)—EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

A general objection to a question asked a witness on cross-examination is not sufficient to raise the objection that the question calls for matters not stated in the examination in chief; but, where the objection is based on that fact, it should specifically so state.

5. WITNESSES (§ 226*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 971*)—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The manner of examining witnesses is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed in the absence of an abuse of discretion.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 274*)—DECLARATIONS AS TO RIGHTS IN REAL ESTATE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A statement of what a person had said as to where a boundary line was located is not admissible in a controversy between strangers to the title, in the absence of anything to show that the person was a surveyor or chain carrier at the making of the original survey, or that he was the owner of the land or of any adjoining land calling for the same boundary, or that he had been engaged as a processioner of the land, or that his situation was such as to render it his duty or interest to make diligent inquiry and obtain information as to the facts, or that he claimed any title.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 519*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Where, in ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary, there was evidence that a former owner had said that when he had his claim surveyed he did not survey all of it, but only had the heads of the bottoms run out, as he did not wish to pay taxes on more land than he could farm, a witness, testifying that the land was hilly and rocky, could not testify as to whether it was such land as a man running out the heads of bottoms for a farm, who did not want to pay taxes on more land than he could farm, would include in his survey, since the matter was not the subject of expert testimony.

8. EVIDENCE (§ 274*)—TITLE TO LAND—DECLARATIONS.

In ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary line, a witness was properly permitted to testify as to an admission by a former owner, through whom a party claimed, to the effect that the former owner did not claim the lines as claimed by such party.

9. EVIDENCE (§ 474½*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

The court in ejectment may properly refuse to permit a witness to give his opinion as to whether a former owner, under whom a party claimed, would or would not have sold land in dispute.

10. BOUNDARIES (§ 35*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary, evidence that a prior owner, under whom a party claimed, had exercised acts of ownership to a line with the knowledge of and without objection from a former owner, under whom the adverse party claimed, was competent to show that both the former owners regarded the line between them as a correct line and as showing adversary possession of the parties and those claiming under them.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—EXAMINATION—LEADING QUESTIONS.

Ordinarily, the permitting of a leading question asked a witness is not ground for reversal, especially where the witness has stated the facts to which the leading question relates.

12. EVIDENCE (§ 230*)—ADMISSIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary line, a party may prove the admission of a former owner, under whom the adverse party claimed, as to the location of the line, as against the objection that the admission of the former owner was made under a mistake, since the question of mistake was for the jury and not for the court.

13. BOUNDARIES (§ 36*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary, there was evidence that a former owner, under whom a party claimed, had recognized the southern boundary line of his land as correctly described in a deed, and that such line had been treated by the former owner as the true dividing line, the deed was properly received in evidence.

14. EVIDENCE (§ 370*)—INDORSEMENTS ON DEEDS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where an indorsement on a deed was signed by the grantor by his mark and was witnessed by a subscribing witness, who was dead, and three persons testified to the handwriting of such subscribing witness and stated that they were familiar with his handwriting, and that the name of the subscribing witness was in his own handwriting, and two of them thought that the name of the grantor and the words "his mark" were also in the handwriting of the subscribing witness, there was sufficient proof of the execution of the indorsement to authorize its admission in evidence.

15. EVIDENCE (§ 357*)—INSTRUMENTS ADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE—LETTERS.

Where letters were not written by or to a party nor by or to any one under whom he claimed in ejectment, the letters were properly excluded when offered by the adverse party, and their contents, if relied on by the adverse party, must be proved orally or by deposition.

16. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where the instructions, when considered as a whole, as they must be, fairly submitted the case, the refusal to give other instructions embodying correct propositions of the law applicable to the facts was not erroneous.

17. TRIAL (§ 314*)—COERCING VERDICT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the third jury, after two mistrials because of inability of the jurors to agree, were given the case on Saturday, and, on being unable to agree, they were adjourned over until Monday, the action of the court in charging the jury, before they retired on Monday to consider the verdict, that it was their duty to agree if they could, and that a juror should not hold out against other jurors on controverted questions unless convinced that he was right, but the jurors should make concessions and try to agree if they could do so without violating their oaths or consciences, was not objectionable as coercing a verdict.

18. TRIAL (§ 312*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in ejectment involving the location of a disputed boundary, the jury returned to the courtroom, and one of them asked the court "what possession would be sufficient for the jury to believe or find that the defendant was entitled to the land," the statement by the court that if a man lived on his land or any part thereof and claimed to the extent of his boundary, and no part of it was in the possession of anyone else, his possession extended to the boundaries called for in his deed, and if there was an express agreement between former owners, under whom the parties claimed, and the parties exercised acts of ownership up to the agreed line, it was sufficient to establish the line, was in reply to the juror's question and correctly stated the law.

Error to Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Ejectment by M. T. Smith against H. E. Stanley. There was a judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Skeen & Skeen and Sutherland & Sutherland, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Rouse and Vicars & Peery, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error to recover a small parcel of land.

The rights of the parties depend upon the location of a disputed boundary line. Both parties claim under conveyances from George A. Warder. In February, 1888, Warder conveyed to Rainwater Ramsey a tract of land containing, as stated in the deed, about 250 acres, known as the "Wm. Hale" land, and upon which Ramsey had resided since about the year 1868. The defendant acquired Ramsey's interest in the land sued for. In April, 1888, Warder conveyed two contiguous parcels of land to Wm. Green, one known as the "Elias Green tract," and the other known as the "Aaron Wright tract." Along the controverted lines the deed to Wm. Green calls for corners and lines on the Wm. Hale (Ramsey) land theretofore conveyed. The plaintiff claims under William Green.

There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant in the trial court, and to that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The plaintiff took 18 bills of exception to the action of the court upon the admission and rejection of evidence; and offered 27 instructions, 2 of which were given as offered, 4 amended and as amended given, and the others refused. The plaintiff excepted to the action of the court in refusing and amending his instructions, and also to its action in giving 7 instructions asked for by the defendant, to 1 given orally by the court in answer to a question asked by one of the jurors, and to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict.

The record is voluminous, much of the evidence parol and more or less conflicting. If the case was properly submitted to the jury, it is clear that the court did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict.

[1] The plaintiff did not trace title to the commonwealth, and the defendant insists that, unless it appears that both parties derived title from a common source, it will be unnecessary to consider any other question in the case. It is conceded that both parties claim under a common grantor, George A. Warder; but the defendant denies that the conveyance of two distinct parcels of land, one to one grantee and the other to another grantee, although the deed to the junior grantee calls for the lines of the senior grantee, shows that the parties derived title from a "common source" within the meaning of that term.

Whatever may be the merits of that contention, we do not think it can be raised in this court. In the trial court both parties proceeded upon the theory that it was a case of common source of title. By the defendant's instruction No. 2 it is conceded that, if the plaintiff traced his title back to Warder and showed a present right of possession to the land sued for, he had made out a prima facie case. This, of course, could not be true unless Warder was regarded as the common source of title.

[2] Thacker, a surveyor, who has surveyed the lands claimed by the plaintiff and made a plat thereof which was in evidence, after testifying how he had located a part of the disputed line, was asked if there was any other rule of surveying in locating such a line than that adopted by him. The witness was not permitted to answer the question, and this action of the court is assigned as error.

Whether or not the line in question was properly located was a question for the jury upon all the evidence in the case. Upon the facts stated in the bill of exceptions (No. 3), the ruling of the court was proper.

[3-5] The same witness, John Green, Brownlow Green, and Samuel Green were asked certain questions upon cross-examination by the defendant's counsel as to matters not connected, it is claimed, with their examination in chief. The action of the court in permitting such questions to be asked at that time is assigned as error.

The bills of exceptions upon which this assignment of error is based show that the said questions were objected to generally, but do not show upon what ground. The general rule unquestionably is that, if the party cross-examining wishes to examine a witness as to matters other than those stated in his examination in chief, he should do so by making the witness his own and calling him as such in the progress of the cause. 1 Greenleaf, § 445. But where the objection to the evidence is as to the time it is offered, the objection should so state. But even if that be done, the manner of examining witnesses is so largely in the discretion of the trial court that its action will not be reversed unless it has abused its discretion. 1 Greenleaf on Ev. §§ 431, 447; 2 Elliott on Ev. § 927.

[6] The refusal of the court to permit A. W. Hale, a son of Wm. Hale, to testify as to what the witness had heard his brother say with reference to where the line in controversy was located is assigned as error.

It does not appear that the person whose statement was sought to be proved was either a surveyor or chain carrier at the making of the original survey, or that he was the owner of the tract or of any adjoining tract calling for the same boundaries. It does not appear that he had been engaged as a processioner of the land, or that his situation was such in reference to the land as to render it his duty or his interest to make diligent inquiry and obtain accurate information as to the facts. It appears that he was living on the land at the time, but in what character is not stated. It is not stated that he was there as the tenant of Wm. Hale, or as a claimant for himself under any title; certainly it does not appear that he had that peculiar means of knowing the facts which would impress upon his unsworn statement the character of evidence in a subsequent controversy between others to whom he was entirely a stranger, about the title to the land. His statement under our decisions was properly rejected. Harri-man v. Brown, 35 Va. 697, 712-713; Clements v. Kyles, 54 Va. 468, 478; Fry v. Stowers, 92 Va. 13, 14, 22 S. E. 500.

[7] There was evidence tending to prove that Wm. Hale, a former owner, had said that when he had his claim surveyed he did not survey all of it, but only had the "heads of the bottoms run out," as he did not wish to pay taxes on more land than he could farm. E. D. Sutherland, after stating that the land was hilly and rocky, was not permitted to answer whether it was "such land as a man running out the heads of bottoms for him a farm—a man who did not want to pay taxes on more land than he could farm—would include in his survey." This action of the court is assigned as error.

The answer sought was the opinion of the witness upon a matter which was clearly not the subject of expert evidence.

The action of the court in permitting certain questions to be answered by Mrs. Margaret Hale, as set out in bill of exceptions numbered 9, is assigned as error. When that bill of exceptions is considered in connection with bill of exceptions numbered 1, we do not think the court erred in permitting the evidence objected to, which it is true was somewhat indefinite, to go to the jury for what it was worth.

The court, as appears from bill of exceptions No. 10, refused to permit a surveyor named Raines, on cross-examination, to answer certain questions therein set out. The answers called for by the questions were the opinions of the witness. In passing upon the objection to that evidence and upon the motion of the defendant to exclude other evidence of like kind which had gone to the jury, the court sustained the objection and excluded all the opinion evidence of the surveyors who had testified in the cause, except their opinions as to the age of the marks on timber. The ruling of the court in excluding said evidence and the language in which its ruling was made is assigned as error.

While the language of the court is somewhat involved, it is clear, we think, that the jury must have understood from it that all the opinion evidence of the surveyors, except as to the age of the marks on timber, was excluded and must not be considered by them in arriving at their verdict. Neither do we think that the court erred in excluding the evidence objected to and asked to be excluded.

[8.] The action of the court in permitting E. T. Sutherland to testify as to an admission made by Wm. Green (through whom the plaintiff claims) as set out in bill of exceptions No. 11, and the refusal of the court to permit the same witness, upon cross-examination, to answer a question as to the habits of Wm. Green, as appears from the same bill of exceptions, are assigned as errors.

The question which the witness was permitted to answer tended to show that Wm. Green did not claim the lines in controversy where the defendant, his vendee, now claims them. The question which the court declined to permit the witness to answer sought the opinion of the witness as to whether Wm. Green would or would not have sold land in dispute. The ruling of the court upon each question was clearly proper.

[10] The court, as will appear from bills of exceptions numbered 12, 13, 14, 16, and 19, refused to exclude evidence tending to show that Rainwater Ramsey claimed the land now in controversy, and that he and those who claim under him exercised acts of ownership over the same, or portions thereof, by cutting, using, and selling timber from it, clearing and cultivating portions of it, with the knowledge of and without objection on the part of Wm. Green.

This evidence was clearly competent as tending to show where both Ramsey and Green regarded the line between them, and also as tending to show adversary possession on the part of Ramsey and those who claim under him—even if the acts mentioned were not sufficient, as claimed by the plaintiff, to show title by adversary possession.

[11] The court permitted Reedy, a witness who had testified to a conversation between himself and Wm. Green (bill of exceptions No. 15), to be asked the following question: "He (Green) was then talking about the division line between him and Ramsey?" and his reply was, "Yes, sir." This question was objected to because leading, and because the statement of Green was made under a mistake.

[12] Ordinarily, permitting a leading question to be asked furnishes no ground for reversal—certainly not in this case, for it appears from what the witness had already stated that Green was talking about the division line. Whether his admission as to the location of that line was made under a mistake was a question for the jury, not for the court.

[13] The assignment of error based upon bill of exceptions No. 17 is to the action of the court in permitting the defendant to introduce in evidence a deed from Wm. Green to Willard, trustee. The deed shows upon its face that the land embraced in it is a portion of the two tracts of land owned by Wm. Green, as hereinbefore stated. There was evidence in the case tending to show that Wm. Green recognized and treated the southern boundary line of his land as correctly described in the Willard deed, and that the said southern boundary line was the Hale line, or a line treated by him (Green) and Ramsey as the true division line between them. If the line called for in the Willard deed was the boundary line between the lands of Ramsey and Green, then the land in controversy belonged to the Ramsey tract and the plaintiff could not recover it. The Willard deed, in this view of the case, was material evidence, and the court did not err in admitting it.

[14] The defendant was permitted to introduce in evidence a notation or indorsement on the margin of the deed from Warder to Wm. Green. The objection made to the introduction of said indorsement, as stated in substance in bill of exceptions No. 18, was that it was not proved to have been the act of Wm. Green. It was signed his

"Wm. X Green," and witnessed by J. F.
mark

Gilliam. J. F. Gilliam was dead. Three witnesses were placed upon the stand to testify to his handwriting, with which they stated they were familiar. All of them were of opinion that the name of the subscribing witness was in his own handwriting, and two of them thought that the words

his
"Wm. X Green" were also in his hand-

writing. This was sufficient proof of the execution of the indorsement to render it admissible.

[15] Under the facts disclosed by bill of exceptions No. 20, we do not think that the court erred in refusing to permit the papers therein set out to go to the jury. The letters excluded were not written by or to the defendant, nor by or to any one under whom he claimed. Their contents, if relied on to show that the plaintiff was not withholding from the jury the title bond to the Green land, ought to have been proved orally or by deposition.

The court gave the following instructions:

Defendant's Instructions.

"(1) The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff can recover in this action only on the strength of his own title; that it does not matter whether the title of the defendants is defective or not, the question is not whether the defendants have title to the land in this suit mentioned, but whether the plaintiff has title thereto.

"(2) The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff must show the Warder title in himself and a present right of possession at the time of the commencement of this action before the defendants are called upon to show anything, and the party in possession is presumed to be the owner until the contrary is proved.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that the burden is on the plaintiff in this case to prove that the deed from George A. Warder to Rainwater Ramsey offered in evidence by the plaintiff in this case does not include the land in controversy; and, unless they do believe by a preponderance of the evidence in this case that the land in controversy is not included in said deed from George A. Warder to Rainwater Ramsey, they must find for the defendant.

"(4) The court instructs the jury that as a matter of law the use and occupancy of contiguous property by the respective owners thereof without disturbance for a sufficient length of time to show that the owners thereof knew their boundary lines will be sufficient evidence of an agreement between the parties to establish such line as the true boundary line between the parties, and if they take and hold possession up to that line the requisite statutory period, for at least 10 years, the possession thereof will ripen into title and will preclude the parties and those holding under them from thereafter disputing the same.

"(5) The court further instructs the jury that in an action of ejectment a defendant, who is in the peaceable possession of land sought to be recovered, is entitled to hold the same against all the world except the true owner thereof.

"(6) The court instructs the jury that, where the boundaries are doubtful, actual occupation for a number of years up to the line whence the party supposed his land to extend, without objection from the adjoining proprietor, is strong presumptive evidence of the true place of the line.

"(7) The court instructs the jury that if in this case they believe that Rainwater Ramsey and those claiming under him were in possession for a number of years up to the northern line of the land in controversy to which they supposed their land to extend, without objection from William Green and those claiming under him, then that is strong presumptive evidence of the true location of the division line between the lands of Ramsey and Green."

Plaintiff's Instructions.

"(3, as amended) Where corner trees are called for, but not found, nor the place at which they stood located, then the lines running to and from such corner should be determined by the courses and distances called for in the deed, provided such courses and distances will run to the next located corner.

"(4) If such course and distance will not run to the next located corner, then distance must give way to course or course to distance according to the manifest intent of the parties and the circumstances of the case."

"(4) The court further instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Warder, the common grantor, under which both complainant and defendant claims, conveyed to Rainwater Ramsey by deed the lands on the south side of the Billy Hale line, and that he subsequently conveyed to William Green the adjacent lands on the northern side of said Hale line, then, in order to determine in whom the title to the land in controversy is now vested, it is necessary for you to determine by a preponderance of the evidence the true location of the original William Hale line called for in the title papers of both complainant and defendant, and if you believe by a preponderance of the evidence that the land in controversy is located on the north side of the William Hale line, and that same was conveyed to Green by Warders and not previously conveyed by Warders to Ramsey, then you should find for the plaintiff."

Amendment to 4: "Unless you believe by a preponderance of the evidence that, after a dispute or controversy arose between Ramsey and Green, the adjacent owners, as to the true location of the Hale line, they mutually agreed upon a location of the Hale line, and that in pursuance of said agreement each of the said adjacent owners, namely, Green and Ramsey, took possession, used, and occupied said land up to said agreed line for the statutory period of 10 years."

"(5) The court further tells the jury that if they believe from the evidence that William Green did not know during his lifetime where the Billy Hale line was located, but that he continued to claim title up to the said Billy Hale line, then he and those claiming under him are not estopped from now showing the true location of the said Billy Hale line and may claim up to said line wherever it may be actually located."

Amendment to 5: "Unless you further believe the parties did agree upon another line and each held possession up to said agreed line for a period of 10 years prior to the bringing of this suit."

"(7) The court further tells the jury that cutting timber is not sufficient act of ownership to amount to a disseisin or dispossession of the rightful owner; neither is a disclaimer of title by the true owner sufficient to divest himself of the legal title or defeat this action."

"(10) The court tells the jury that the law is that a disclaimer sufficient to divest an owner of title to lands can only be made by deed or in a court of record. In the case of disputed boundaries, the parties may agree upon a line, by way of compromise, and if they take and hold possession up to that line for the requisite statutory period, the mere possession will in time ripen to title."

"(11) The court tells the jury that fixed monuments, natural boundaries, and the topography of the country control over course and distance in locating the boundary of a deed."

The action of the court in giving these instructions except No. 7 and No. 11, offered by the plaintiff, is assigned as error, as is also the action of the court in refusing to give 25 other instructions as offered by the plaintiff.

[16] Without attempting any detailed discussion of the numerous objections to the instructions given and to the action of the court in refusing to give those which were rejected, it is sufficient to say that, while some of the instructions given are not as full and as clear as it is desirable that instructions should be, yet when considered as a whole, as they must be, we think they fairly submitted the case to the jury. This being so, the court did not err in refusing to give the other instructions offered, even if they had stated, as many of them fail to do, correct propositions of law as applied to the facts of this case.

[17] The case was submitted to the jury on Saturday, and, being unable to agree upon a verdict, they were adjourned over until Monday.

Before retiring to their room on Monday to consider of their verdict, the court said to the jury: "Gentlemen: The court had thought he would sum up the evidence in this case, but after deliberation I have decided not to do so, but I will say that it is the duty of juries to agree if they can, that it is the duty of a juror or jurors not to hold out and be positive against the other jurors on controverted questions, unless he is convinced that he is right. But such juror or jurors should make concessions and try to agree with the others if he can possibly do so without violating his oath or his conscience."

This action of the court is assigned as error.

Not only was there no error in the court's direction to the jury as to their duty as jurors, but such direction was especially appropriate in this case, in which there had already been two mistrials because of the inability of the jurors to agree.

[18] Before agreeing upon their verdict, the jury returned to the courtroom, when one of them asked the court: "What possession would be sufficient for the jury to believe or find that the defendant was entitled to the land?" The court orally replied: "That if a man living upon his lands, or any part thereof, and claiming to the extent of his boundary and no part of it in the possession of any one else, his possession extended to the boundaries called for in his deed, and in this case if you believe from the evidence there was an express agreement between Ramsey and Green and the parties exercised acts of ownership up to this agreed line for a considerable period of time, this is sufficient to establish the line between the parties. If you believe there was an agreed line established by the parties as claimed by the defendant, and if you further believe there was no express agreement between the parties and neither party knew the exact location of the division line, yet if the parties, Ramsey and Green, claimed up to a certain line on each side and exercised ownership, cut the timber up to that line, and sold their lands up to that line, you have a right to come to the conclusion that there was a line established by the parties."

This action of the court is assigned as error, first, because the court's statement was not a reply to the juror's question, and, second, because it does not state the law correctly.

The court is of opinion that the statement of the court was an answer to the juror's question, and as applied to the facts of this case was substantially a correct statement of law.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

ELY et al. v. JOHNSON et al.

1. EQUITY (§ 39*)—JURISDICTION—COMPLETE RELIEF—RESTRAINING TRESPASS ON REAL ESTATE.

Where the primary object of a suit is to enjoin trespasses on real estate involving irreparable injury, and the quieting of title and removal of clouds are merely incidental, the court may grant complete relief, though plaintiff does not allege and prove that he has both the legal title and possession which is essential to a decree quieting title as primary relief, since equity when acquiring jurisdiction of a case on equitable grounds, will grant complete relief.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 35*)—RESTRAINING TRESPASSES ON REAL ESTATE—TITLE.

A plaintiff suing to restrain a trespass on real estate involving irreparable injury need only show a prima facie title, and he need not allege that his title is undisputed, or has been adjudicated.

3. INJUNCTION (§ 46*)—RESTRAINING TRESPASS ON REAL ESTATE—TITLE.

One suing to restrain a trespass on his land consisting of the cutting and removing of the timber therefrom must show that the injury complained of is irreparable, or that his remedy at law is inadequate, and that the timber constitutes the land's chief value, or that it is essential to the enjoyment of the land, or how its removal will injure the inheritance.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 118*)—RESTRAINING TRESPASS ON REAL ESTATE—TITLE.

A bill to restrain a trespass on land which shows a prima facie title in plaintiff, and which alleges that a few months before defendants went on the land and cut and are now cutting timber, tan bark, and other materials and removing the same from the land, claiming the land as their own, that the injuries are irreparable, that the land is mainly valuable for the timber growing thereon, and that the destruction of the timber is equal to the destruction of the entire property, and that there can be no adequate compensation in damages, states a cause of action for equitable relief as against a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-242; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

Where the grantee in a deed was in the actual possession of a part of the land which was cleared and cultivated, and a cabin erected thereon, and fenced along a dividing line for a part of the distance in the direction of a corner marked, and the line of the fence was visible for several years and the grantee for years exercised the right of cutting, using, and selling the timber from the land and pointed out to purchasers of timber from him the dividing line, a subsequent purchaser was put on inquiry as to the title of the grantee, and he was not a bona fide purchaser without notice, and he could not claim the land, especially where he acknowledged the grantee's title and the boundary lines.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lee County.

Suit by Byrd L. Johnson and others against M. T. Ely and others. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Noel and B. H. Sewell, for appellants. Pennington Bros. and Duncan & Cridlin, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. The property involved in this litigation is 20.9 acres of forest land situated in Poor Valley, in Lee county, Va., and comprises the northern portion of a tract of 78 acres, patented to Moses McAfee (the common source of title of the plaintiffs and defendants) June 30, 1849.

[1] Considering the original and amended bills of the appellees as a whole, they show a prima facie title to the land in question, and, among others, contain the allegations: "That a few months ago the said Marion T. Ely (one of the defendants) and his father, Robert B. Ely, have gone upon said tract of land, * * * and have cut, and are now cutting, considerable timber and trees, tan bark, and other material, and removing the same from said land, claiming the said land as their own and refusing to acknowledge the title of your orators in said property. Your orators allege that the said injuries are irreparable, that the said tract of land is mainly valuable for the timber that is growing thereon, and that the destruction of the said timber is equal to the destruction of the entire property, and they cannot be adequately compensated in damages for said injuries."

These allegations are followed by a prayer that the defendants be enjoined from trespassing upon the land, and from cutting and removing the timber and other materials therefrom. The bills also contain incidental prayers that the plaintiffs may be quieted in their title, and that the clouds may be removed therefrom. But the primary object of the suit is to enjoin trespasses involving irreparable injury to the very substance of the land itself. The quieting of the title and removal of clouds are incidental merely to the controlling ground for equitable jurisdiction and relief. If these subsidiary matters had been made the burden of the complaint, as the law was when this suit was brought, it would have been indispensable to allege and prove that the plaintiffs held both the legal title and possession of the land. But see Acts of Assembly 1912, p. 76.

Upon familiar principles, where a court of equity acquires jurisdiction of a case on equitable grounds, it will proceed to grant complete relief, even through such redress may include the establishment of purely legal rights and the enforcement of legal remedies otherwise beyond its scope. This doctrine has been uniformly recognized by the decisions of this court.

[2] Upon the main question it was held in Bledsoe v. Robinett, 105 Va. 723, 54 S. E. 861, that a plaintiff in a suit to restrain a trespass need not allege that his title is undisputed or has been adjudicated. He must, however, show a prima facie title. "When he claims under a paper title, he should generally exhibit his title papers, * * * or such of them at least as will make out a prima facie case of title; if he relies on possession, he should state the facts upon which he bases his claim of possession, so that in either case the court can see from the title papers filed or the facts stated that he has a prima facie title."

[3] He must also allege such facts "as will show that the injury is irreparable or that the remedy at law is inadequate, that the timber on the land constitutes its chief value, or that it is essential to the enjoyment of the land, or how its removal would injure the inheritance." Collins v. Sutton, 94 Va. 127, 26 S. E. 415; Miller v. Wills, 95 Va. 337, 28 S. E. 337; Callaway v. Webster, 98 Va. 790, 37 S. E. 276; Woolfolk v. Graves, 113 Va. —, 69 S. E. 1039, 73 S. E. 721.

[4] Measured by the principles announced by these authorities, the bills set out a case for equitable jurisdiction and relief, and the demurrers were properly overruled.

[5] Upon the issues of fact submitted by the pleadings, the case may be thus summarized: In the year 1854 negotiations for the sale of the property were commenced by a letter from McAfee to Johnson Gibson, which culminated November 18, 1854, in a deed conveying the same to the three Gibsons from whom the plaintiffs derive their title. The original deed was found among the papers of Johnson Gibson in September, 1908, after his death, and on September 17, 1908, was admitted to record. The deed characterizes the transaction as a "swap or exchange," but the letter plainly shows that it was in legal effect an ordinary deed of bargain and sale. McAfee owed Johnson Gibson $45, and the discharge of that indebtedness was the consideration for the deed.

The defendants claim title to the land mediately through the daughters of Moses McAfee, to whom, by deed of gift dated June 17, 1860, he conveys "all of my lands that I own in Lee county, lying on both sides of the main road, adjoining the lands of Thompson, Ely, Bates, and Edds, it being the same lands that China McAfee and William McAfee now lives on. No. of acres not known." On March 24, 1877, the grantees in the foregoing deed and China McAfee, widow of Moses McAfee, undertook, as the defendants assert, to include the 20.9 acres of land in a deed to Robert B. Ely. If it be conceded that the general descriptions contained in the last named deed are sufficient to embrace the land in dispute, nevertheless, the plaintiffs admittedly have the older title. The controversy, therefore, in its essence, narrows itself down to the single proposition whether or not Robert B. Ely was an innocent purchaser for value and without notice of the prior title of the plaintiffs.

The defendants M. M. Ely and Marion T. Ely, the wife and son of the grantor, Robert B. Ely, are not purchasers for value, but are volunteers, and therefore must rely upon his title to maintain their contention.

We shall not attempt to rehearse the voluminous evidence or to reconcile the discrepancies in the testimony of witnesses. It is sufficient to give our conclusions.

The evidence sustains the allegation that the timber on the land constitutes its principal value, and that the defendants had cut and removed a considerable quantity of timber, tan bark, and other materials from the land during the year 1908. The fact that they were not actually engaged in cutting timber at the time suit was instituted loses its significance in view of the attitude of the defendants with respect to the litigation. There is no avowal on their part of a purpose to desist from further depredation, and their entire defense rests upon a denial of the plaintiffs' rights, and the claim of absolute ownership of the property on their part, with the consequent right to use it as they please.

The evidence also shows that, before Robert B. Ely became a complete purchaser of the land (if he ever became such purchaser), the circumstances were sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the Gibson title, as the law then was (1874), under the doctrine of Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846. The rule laid down in that case continued to be the law until it was changed by a proviso added to the Code (section 2465) by Acts 1895-96, p. 842. By Acts 1897-98, p. 833, the proviso was omitted; but it was again restored by Acts 1899-1900, p. 89. See notes to Va. Code, 1904, § 2465.

The Gibsons had long been in actual possession of part of the land and had cleared and cultivated it and erected a cabin thereon, which remained in the occupancy of their tenants until it was finally pulled down and rebuilt on a different site. They also made a fence from the black oak corner, along the dividing line between the 20.9-acre tract and the southern end of the 78-acre survey, for part of the distance (but not extending all the way) in the direction of the corner marked by two white oaks, a dogwood, and a sourwood. This fence was partially destroyed by forest fires, but the remains of it, marking the old fence line, were visible for several years after the close of the Civil War. In addition to these indicia of ownership, the Gibsons for years exercised the right of cutting, using and selling locust posts, board trees, barn logs, and other timber from the land. They also pointed out to purchasers of timber from them the dividing line from the black oak to the corner at the two white oaks, the dogwood, and the sourwood.

But the evidence, moreover, shows actual knowledge on the part of Robert B. Ely of these transactions, and his recognition of and acquiescence in the dividing line as claimed by the Gibsons. He showed this line to purchasers of timber on the 20.9-acre tract of land from the Gibsons, and also to purchasers of timber on the land south of the dividing line from himself; and in each instance notified the parties that they must confine their cutting to their respective boundaries. It was furthermore shown that the defendant Marion T. Ely had given similar instructions to purchasers of timber on the land south of the dividing line from him.

Upon these considerations we are of opinion to affirm the decree of the circuit court.

OSBORNE'S ADMR.

1. PLEADING (§§ 192, 317*)—DEMURRER—BILL OF PARTICULARS.

Where a declaration states a cause of action, the remedy of defendant desiring a more particular statement of the grounds of complaint is not by demurrer, but by motion for bill of particulars under Code 1904, § 3249.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 291*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Modifying defendant's instruction, in an action against a master for death of a servant, by changing it from one that verdict should be for defendant if deceased was negligent, and such negligence "contributed to" the injury, to one to so find if he was negligent, and such negligence was the "proximate cause of" the injury, was erroneous, as leaving out of view that the master is not liable where the servant's want of care was either wholly or partially the efficient cause of the injury, or if the accident was due to the mutual and concurrent negligence of both.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 296*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

A master sued for injury to a servant is not entitled to an instruction that there can be no recovery if the servant was guilty of negligence which contributed "in the slightest degree" to the accident; this being calculated to mislead, and prevent recovery, though the servant's shortcoming was so trivial as to have been without appreciable effect.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by J. B. Kiser, administrator of C. W. Osborne, deceased, against the Clinchfield Coal Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Bond & Bruce, E. M. & E. H. Fulton, and Phlegar, Powell, Price & Shelton, for plaintiff in error. Vicars & Peery, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. At the time of the accident out of which this litigation grows, C. W. Osborne was working as the hired servant of the defendant coal corporation in one of its coal mines, and was killed, while in the discharge of his duties as a miner, by falling slate, stone, etc., from the roof of the mine. This suit was brought in the name of J. B. Kiser, administrator of C. W. Osborne, deceased, to recover of the defendant coal corporation damages for the death of his intestate, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The trial in the circuit court resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, to which judgment the present writ of error was awarded.

[1] There was a demurrer to the declaration, which we think was properly overruled. The declaration, read as a whole, states a good cause of action and sufficiently informs the defendant of the case it has to meet. If the defendant desired a more particular statement of the grounds of complaint, its remedy was not by demurrer, but by a motion for a bill of particulars under section 3249 of the Code. Interstate R. Co. v. Tyree, 110 Va. 38, 65 S. E. 500.

We are of opinion that the objection of the defendant to the court's modification of its instructions 4 and 7 is well taken, and should have been sustained.

[2] Instruction No. 4, as asked for, told the jury that if they believed the deceased was negligent, and that such negligence contributed to the injury, then they must find for the defendant. The court struck out the words "contributed to," and substituted the words "proximate cause of," making the instruction read, "and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury," then they must find for the defendant. Instruction No. 4, as asked, was addressed to the defendant's claim that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence in putting off, as he did, the shot which immediately preceded his death, and in going under the slate after the shot was fired, before its effect on the slate, which he had said was unsafe, was ascertained. The instruction correctly stated that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that his intestate's death was due to some negligence of the defendant which was the proximate cause thereof, and further correctly stated that, if the jury believed the deceased was guilty of negligence and that such negligence contributed to the injury, they must find for the defendant.

Numerous decisions of this court show that it is the general, if not the universal, rule that, if the plaintiff in an action for negligent injuries has been guilty of contributory negligence, he cannot recover.

In Richmond Traction Co. v. Martin, 102 Va. 209, 213, 45 S. E. 886, 887, it is said: "The well-known rule in this class of cases is that a plaintiff seeking to recover damages for an injury caused by the negligence of the defendant must himself be free from negligence, and, if it appears that his negligence has contributed as an efficient cause to the injury of which he complains, the court will not undertake to balance the negligence of the respective parties for the purpose of determining which was most at fault. The law recognizes no gradations of fault in such case, and where both parties have been guilty of negligence, as a general rule, there can be no recovery."

As amended, the instruction left out of view the settled doctrine that the servant is not entitled to recover where his own want of care was either wholly or partially the efficient cause of the injury, and also ignored the established rule that the plaintiff cannot recover if the accident was due to the mutual and concurring negligence of the plaintiff and the defendant.

The amendment to instruction No. 7 was practically the same as that to No. 4. The instruction as offered told the jury that if the evidence showed that it was the duty of plaintiff's intestate to put props under the slate which fell, and also the duty of the company to put props under it, that both failed in their duty, and that failure of plaintiff's intestate contributed to the injury, they should find for the defendant. The court refused this, and amended the instruction by striking out "contributed to" and inserting "was the proximate cause," thus making it essential that the defendant show, not simply a contributing or concurring negligent cause, but that the intestate's negligence was the "proximate cause." This was error, as already seen in considering the amendment to instruction No. 4.

[3, 4] Objection is taken to the action of the court in refusing instruction No. 13, asked for by the defendant. This instruction was directed to the doctrine of contributory negligence, and told the jury that if they believed that the plaintiff was negligent, and that such negligence contributed in the slightest degree to the accident, etc., there could be no recovery.

The language, "slightest degree," is a departure from that heretofore employed and approved by this court, and should not have been used. It was calculated to mislead and to visit upon the person injured all the consequences of the defendant's negligence, although the shortcoming of the plaintiff may have been so trivial as to have really been without appreciable effect. Further, the jury had already been sufficiently instructed as to the plaintiff's contributory negligence, and the instruction in question was properly rejected for that reason.

We deem it unnecessary to consider in detail the numerous objections taken in the examination of witnesses to questions asked and answers permitted. It is sufficient to say that after carefully considering these objections, which may not arise on another trial, we are unable to see that the court has abused its discretion in the matter, or that its action has been prejudicial to the defendant.

[5] It appears that after the trial had, upon the defendant's plea of not guilty, proceeded regularly to a verdict for the plaintiff, it was discovered for the first time that as the result of some mistake or inadvertence no order had been entered by the clerk, upon the motion before him, made prior to the institution of the suit, for the estate of the decedent to be committed to the sheriff of Wise county for administration. Upon this discovery the defendant filed its motion in writing, asking for a new trial upon the ground, among others, that the plaintiff J. B. Kiser had failed to prove his representative capacity, and was not in fact, at the time of the institution of the suit, the administrator of the estate of C. W. Osborne, deceased, and was not authorized to sue for said estate in any representative capacity. Thereupon the plaintiff filed his motion in writing, in which J. T. Osborne, the father and sole distributee of the deceased, united, asking that the estate of the decedent be committed to J. B. Kiser, sheriff of Wise county, as administrator. Upon the hearing of these motions the circuit court committed the estate to J. B. Kiser, sheriff of Wise county, as administrator, overruled the motion for a new trial, and entered judgment upon the verdict of the jury.

This action of the court is assigned as error, it being insisted that no judgment could be entered until the administrator had been made a party to the suit, and that the plaintiff was never the administrator until after the verdict; that he did not profess to sue as a sheriff, to whom the estate was committed, but as a private person who was an administrator. It is contended that under these circumstances the suit should have been dismissed.

To turn the plaintiff out of court under the circumstances here disclosed would be to defeat, rather than further, the ends of justice. In 91 Fed. 845, 34 C. C. A. 103, is reported the case of Hodges v. Kimball, decided by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. In disposing of this case numerous authorities are cited in support of the proposition, which seems to be well settled, that, if pending the action ancillary letters of administration are taken out, they relate back to the institution of the action for the purpose of preserving the plaintiff's right of action, and that the pleadings may be so amended as to show the facts as well at law as in equity.

Among other authorities cited is the case of Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 49, 11 Am. Dec. 389, in which Chancellor Kent says: "If the party sues as executor or administrator, without probate or taking out letters of administration, the taking them out at any time before the hearing will cure the defect and relate back so as to make the bill good from the beginning. In a light so merely formal is that omission viewed."

In this connection it may be said that generally a subsequent grant of letters testamentary or of administration relates back and renders valid all acts which come within the scope of a rightful executor's or administrator's authority, and which were in their nature beneficial to the estate, or at least such as the parties in interest had no reason to complain of. 7 Ency. L. (1st Ed.) pp. 193, 194.

In the case at bar, the plaintiff, who was supposed to be the duly appointed administrator of the deceased, was acting not only in the interest of, but at the instance of, the party who was alone interested in the estate.

As the judgment complained of must be reversed upon other grounds, it is unnecessary to consider the propriety of the court's action in entering the same at the time and under the circumstances that it did. When the case goes back, the plaintiff can, before another trial, amend his declaration so as to have the suit proceed in the name of J. B. Kiser, sheriff of Wise county, and as such administrator of C. W. Osborne, deceased.

For the errors pointed out in the instructions, the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Reversed.

RAVEN RED ASH COAL CO., Inc., v. HER- RON.

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 105*)—CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—POWERS.

One acting as secretary, treasurer, and superintendent of a coal mining corporation, who is in charge of the mining of the coal without having his powers and duties defined, has only the right to enter into such contracts as are usual and necessary to carry on the business according to the general custom of the coal mining business in that territory, and the delegation of authority carries with it the full power to do the things which are necessary, proper, and usual, in the absence of an express limitation on such authority, and a contract made by him within the scope of his power is binding on the corporation.

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 105*)—CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—POWERS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether one acting as secretary and treasurer of a mining corporation and employed by the month as superintendent of its coal mines has authority to let a contract to a contractor for a year for the mining and delivery of coal on the tipple at a specified price per ton held, under the evidence, for the jury.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 241*)—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT—ADMISSIBILITY.

Declarations of an agent are admissible against his principal when they are within the scope of his authority and made in the course of the negotiation to which they refer, or in the discharge of his duty, but declarations made in casual conversations not involving any business of the agency, and which are mere narratives of past acts, are inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 887-892; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 428*)—NOTICE TO OFFICERS—NOTICE TO CORPORATION.

Notice to two of seven directors of a corporation that its secretary, treasurer, and superintendent had made a contract is not notice to the corporation where the information was not communicated to the board of directors or to the other directors.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—CONTRACTS—ACQUIESCENCE.

Evidence held not to justify a finding that a corporation acquiesced in a contract made by an officer without authority to make the contract.

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 150*)—ACTS OF AGENT—SCOPE OF AUTHORITY—NOTICE TO PRINCIPAL.

In the absence of circumstances putting a reasonably prudent man on inquiry, a principal need not make any effort to discover whether his agent is doing unauthorized acts in his name, but he may assume that the agent will only act within the scope of his authority, and notice will not be imputed to a principal by the mere fact that he had reasonable opportunity to acquire knowledge of the acts of his agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 556-563; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

7. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 109*) — CONTRACTS FOR MINING—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract employing for one year a contractor to mine coal and deliver the same on the tippie for a specified price per ton on a tonnage not exceeding a specified amount per month, and a specified sum in excess of that quantity, etc., does not make the amount which the contractor may mine and deliver dependent on the getting of sufficient cars to transport the coal mined or in finding a market for it, though the corporation is selling on the general market.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 22*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

A party to a contract is entitled to recover for a breach thereof by the other party all such damages as are the natural and proximate results of the breach, but one may not recover profits unless loss of profits is a natural and proximate result of the breach, and the extent of the loss is satisfactorily proved.

9. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 110*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where a coal mining corporation employing a contractor for a year to mine coal and deliver the same on the tippie for a specified compensation, including the free use of a house, coal for his family, and goods out of a store for his family at a specified sum below the sale price, breached its contract and prevented performance by the contractor, the latter could recover the difference between what he would receive for delivering the coal and the cost of doing it, together with the value of the free use of the house and other benefits given by the contract, less any sum earned in work elsewhere.

Error to Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Action by H. J. Herron against the Raven Red Ash Coal Company, Incorporated. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Harman & Pobst, for plaintiff in error. Bond & Bruce, W. H. Werth, S. D. May, and R. O. Crockett, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. H. J. Herron brought his action of assumpsit against the Raven Red Ash Coal Company, a corporation, to recover damages for breach of a contract which the plaintiff alleged existed between him and the defendant corporation. Upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The grounds relied on for a reversal of the judgment are that McCorkle, who made the contract on the part of the defendant, had no authority to make it, either as the secretary and treasurer of the defendant company, or as superintendent of its mines; that the contract was of such a character that it could only have been made by the express authority of the board of directors; that no such authority was given to McCorkle, nor was his act ratified by the company; that, if the contract were binding upon the company, the damages sued for were not recoverable because of their uncertain and speculative character; and that, even if the plaintiff were entitled to recover any damages, the verdict of the jury could not be upheld because of errors of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence and in the giving and refusing of instructions.

It appears that McCorkle had been the secretary and treasurer of the company, and the superintendent of its mines, from its organization in the early part of the year 1906 down to the 1st of October, 1908, when the contract in question was executed. His duties in neither of the capacities named were defined by any by-law of the company, or by any resolution of its board of directors, but he had charge of mines during that period, hiring its employes, mine foreman, and power house men by the month, motor-men, track hands, blacksmiths and their helpers, bratticemen, and slatemen by the day; coal cutters in different ways—by the ton, by the man, by the room, and by the day, and coal miners by the ton. McCorkle, as superintendent, was employed by the month, and no one employed by him until the contract sued on was made was employed for longer periods than one month. The plaintiff, who had been in the service of the company for about one year as an electrician, was at first employed by the day and afterwards by the month, and knew the manner in which the work in the mine was being conducted when the contract sued on was entered into, which is in the following words:

"This agreement made and entered into this first day of October, 1908, by and between H. J. Herron, of Red Ash, Va., hereinafter called the Contractor, and the Raven Red Ash Coal Co., Inc., of Red Ash, Va., hereinafter called the Company, witnesseth:

"Whereas, the said Company has this day let to contract all the day labor connected with the mining of its coal at Mine No. 1, at Red Ash, Va., viz.:—Haulage of coal, cutting of coal, blacksmith and helpers, trackmen, bratticemen, slatemen on haulage ways and all other day labor incident to mining the coal, except as follows: Power house and tippie labor. Therefore, for and in consideration of the sum of thirty (30) cents per ton on a tonnage not to exceed 4,000 tons per month, and twenty-seven and one-half (27½c) cents per ton on 500 tons in excess of 4,000 tons, twenty-seven and one-half (27½c) cents per ton on a tonnage not to exceed 4,500 per month and twenty-five (25c) cents on 500 tons in excess of 4,500 tons per month and twenty-five cents per ton on 5,000 tons per month and over, based on the present equipment, and should said Company put in more equipment then the price paid said Contractor is to be reduced in proportion to increase of tonnage in excess of 6,000 tons. Said Contractor is to remove only such slate as may fall on haulage ways.

"Said Contractor is to look after the mines in general, looking after the safety of the miners so far as furnishing the necessary timbers and supplies is concerned, is to work the mines in accordance with plans and specifications furnished by said Company.

"Said Company is to furnish all necessary supplies including ties, props, and etc., but said Contractor (is to) keep up necessary repairs and to take props and ties into the mines when required.

"Said Contractor is to give special attention to all entries and to advance them as fast as possible. Said Company agrees to keep the time of said Contractor, time to be turned in every night and to make payment to his men on regular pay day.

"Said Company is to put in repair all the mine cars which are now torn up, but any cars damaged or torn up by said Contractor is to be repaired by him.

"Said Company is to allow said Contractor $50.00 in which to catch up with the track and trolley wire and other work which is now behind.

"Said Contractor is to use his judgment as to the necessary props required in a working place, but must furnish sufficient props to protect (protect) the top.

"Said Contractor is to deliver the coal on the tippie at the above-named price per ton, and is to receive payment for same on the first Saturday after the 20th of each month after deducting amount of labor chargeable against him on pay roll and store.

"Said Contractor is to receive goods for his family use at 10 per cent. off of selling price and is to have house rent and coal free, also, such furniture as he now has in the house belonging to the company, said furniture to be turned back to said Company at expiration of this contract.

"Said Contractor is to have full benefit of the present machinery now in use and any other machinery which the Company may purchase hereafter while this contract is in force.

"Said Contractor is not to dig, shoot or load any coal or take any yardage under this agreement. Prices for shooting, loading or digging coal and yardage under this agreement, is to be subject to the approval of the Company.

"This agreement is to be in effect for one year from date, unless otherwise canceled by mutual agreement.

"Witness the following signatures this the day and year first above written:

"H. J. Herron.

"Raven Red Ash Coal Co., Inc.,

"M. R. McCorkle, Sec'y and Treas."

Prior to the making of the contract the defendant had employed its own hands and had the work done itself under its own supervision.

The plaintiff proceeded to perform the contract on his part, and did so for the months of October and November, 1908, when he stopped working, because, as he alleges, McCorkle refused to permit him to continue, or because, as McCorkle claims, the contract was canceled by mutual agreement. The damages sought to be recovered are the net profits which the plaintiff claims he would have made during the remaining ten months of the year, if he had been permitted to keep and perform the contract as he was ready and willing to do.

It does not appear that McCorkle was specifically authorized by the board of directors to make the contract; neither does it appear that the contract, after it was entered into, was ratified at any meeting of the board. The contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant is bound by the contract because it was within the authority or apparent scope of authority of McCorkle as general manager or superintendent of the defendant's mines; or, if not, that the contract became binding upon the defendant by its subsequent ratification or acquiescence in and receiving benefits under the contract.

Upon the question whether the contract was within the authority or apparent scope of authority of McCorkle as general manager or superintendent of the defendant's mines the evidence was conflicting. That question was submitted to the jury by three instructions, two offered by the plaintiff and the other by the defendant.

[1] Instruction No. 1, given upon motion of the plaintiff, told the jury, among other things, that if they believed that McCorkle was secretary and treasurer of the defendant company, and as such had charge and management of its mining operations, such as mining coal and hauling it to the tippie, the employment and discharge of men to do and perform the work in and about the defendant's mines, and that McCorkle was, in the making of the contract in question, acting within the general scope of his authority, then it was the contract of the parties. By the plaintiff's instruction No. 5 the jury were told "that every delegation of authority or creation of an agency, unless the extent of such authority or agency be expressly limited, carries with it the power to do all those things which are necessary, proper, and usual to be done in order to perpetuate the purpose of the agency, and embraces all the appropriate means necessary to accomplish the desired ends."

Instruction No. 1, given at the request of the defendant, told the jury, among other things, that if they believed from the evidence that McCorkle, as secretary and treasurer, or as superintendent of the defendant, had been placed in charge of the mining of the coal at the company's plant by its board of directors, without having his powers and duties defined, then he only had the right as such officer or agent to enter into such contracts as were usual and necessary to carry on the said business according to general custom and usage of the coal mining business in that territory; and that, if they believed that the contract was a special and unusual one, then McCorkle as such officer or agent had no right to make the contract on behalf of the defendant.

[2] It cannot be said as a matter of law that McCorkle, as manager and superintendent of the defendant's mines, did not have the authority to make for his company the contract sued on. Whether he did or not was for the jury upon the evidence. The said instructions given by the court upon that question fairly submitted that question to the jury.

The court, upon motion of the plaintiff, gave the following instructions to the jury:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the writing offered in evidence, signed with the name of the plaintiff and defendant, the latter by M. R. McCorkle, secretary and treasurer, was in fact so executed, that said M. R. McCorkle was in fact the secretary and treasurer of said defendant company, and was also superintendent of such company, and as such had charge of the mine of said company, with full power and authority to have the coal mined and hauled to the tipples, to employ and discharge men, that it was not within the scope of the authority of said M. R. McCorkle to enter into such writing on behalf of said company and thereby bind said company, still, if the jury should believe from the evidence that said company by acquiescing in and allowing him to so manage and control said mine, held out that said M. R. McCorkle had the right to bind said company by the writing filed in evidence, that the said plaintiff had the right to believe and did believe in good faith, from such holding out, that said McCorkle had the right to enter into said writing and bind the company, then you are instructed that said company is bound by said writing, and is liable as a party thereto.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that M. R. McCorkle was the secretary and treasurer of the defendant company on October 1, 1908, the date of the contract offered in evidence, and as such secretary and treasurer executed said contract for said defendant company, and assumed to act as agent of said defendant company without legal authority and in excess of his proper authority, and that said company knowingly received the profits and benefits from such contract and made payments to said plaintiff under said contract, then so securing said profits and benefits, and so making payments, or either of them, was a ratification of the contract, and renders the defendant corporation liable as a party to it.

"(4) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, H. J. Herron, entered into the contract in the declaration mentioned in good faith, that he was unaware of any defect of authority or irregularity on the part of M. R. McCorkle, who acted for the defendant as its secretary and treasurer, and that there was nothing to excite suspicion of such defect or irregularity, and that the plaintiff in good faith entered upon the performance of said contract with the acquiescence of said company, and that said company received or accepted benefits from said contract, then the defendant is bound by such contract, although you should believe such defect or irregularity in fact existed."

Each of these instructions is objected to because there was no evidence upon which to base them.

Five of the seven members of the board of directors testified that they generally attended the meetings of the board of directors; that this contract was never brought to the board's attention or discussed by it before or after its execution so far as they knew; that they had never seen the contract until after this action was brought, and three of them stated that they had never heard of it until after the controversy over it arose, and two of them, to whom McCorkle, the superintendent, testified that he had mentioned the contract after it was entered into, stated they had no recollection of the superintendent's ever mentioning it to them, or that they had ever heard of it until long after it was entered into. The minutes of the board of directors do not show that it was ever brought to the board's attention or considered by it. The only evidence tending to show that the board had ever considered it was the testimony of the plaintiff and Drake, a mine foreman, that McCorkle had said to each of them, after the contract had been made and work was being done under it, that the board of directors had approved or ratified it. The evidence of these witnesses as to what McCorkle said the board of directors had done was excepted to by the defendant, and its admission is assigned as error.

As one of the objections to the instructions under consideration is that there was no evidence upon which to base them, it will be necessary at this time to consider the admissibility of McCorkle's statement to these witnesses.

[3] The general rule is that relevant declarations of an agent are admissible against his principal, provided they are within the scope of his authority and made in the course of the negotiation to which they refer, or in the discharge of his duty. Va. & Tenn. R. R. Co. v. Sayers, 67 Va. 328, 350; Reusch v. Roanoke Storage Co., 91 Va. 534, 537, 22 S. E. 358; Traction Co. v. Booker, 103 Va. 594, 50 S. E. 148; 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 113; 1 Elliott on Ev. § 252; 16 Cyc. 1003.

Tested by this rule, the declarations of McCorkle were clearly inadmissible. They were not made when the contract in question was entered into, nor in the discharge of any duty, but seem to have been made in casual conversations not involving any business of the agency, and were mere narratives of what the board of directors had done.

The case of Lynchburg Traction Co. v. Booker, 103 Va. 594, 604-605, 50 S. E. 148, is relied on to sustain the ruling of the trial court, but manifestly it does not do so. In that case it appeared that shortly after the accident the president of the lighting company went to a point at or near the scene of the accident, where was also the manager of the telephone company. "These men," said the president of the court in delivering its opinion, "were upon the scene of the accident in the discharge of duties which devolved upon them as the officers of their respective companies; and the answer given to the question" (that the wire which did the injury was the wire of his company) "was, we think, admissible, not as a part of the res gestæ, but because made by an officer in the performance of his duty."

[4, 5] There was evidence tending to show that two of the directors, shortly after the contract was entered into, were informed of its existence and did not object to it. The information of these two directors, not communicated to the board of directors or to the other directors, as the evidence shows it was not, was not notice to the defendant of the existence of the contract. Nor does the evidence show that the defendant, with knowledge, acquiesced in what was done under the contract, or knowingly received any profit and benefit, or made any payments under it. All that was done under the contract in carrying out what it bound the defendant to do was done by McCorkle without the actual knowledge of the defendant so far as the record shows. Nor does it appear that there was any such change in the manner in which the work was being done in the mines after the contract was made as to give the defendant constructive notice of the contract. In operating the mine before the contract was made, the defendant, through McCorkle, employed its own hands and controlled its own machinery. After the contract was made, the plaintiff was the employer of a large number of the hands and controlled a large part of the machinery, but there was little, if anything, in the work itself to show that it was being done during the months of October and November under a management other than that by which it had theretofore been carried on.

[8] In the absence of facts or circumstances sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry, no duty rests upon the principal to make any effort to discover whether another is doing unauthorized acts in his name, and he has the right to assume, until otherwise advised, that his agent will act within the scope of his authority. Notice is not to be imputed to a principal by reason of the mere fact that he had reasonable opportunity to acquire knowledge. See 31 Cyc. 1256, and cases cited.

It is clear, we think, that there was not sufficient evidence in the case to justify or sustain a verdict upon the respective hypotheses of the said second, third, and fourth instructions, and those instructions for that reason, even if otherwise correct, should not have been given.

[7] The action of the court in holding that the damages sued for, although profits, might be recovered, is assigned as error. The several grounds upon which the defendant insists that damages were not recoverable, even if the contract sued on bound the defendant, are that they were uncertain, speculative, and contingent. Two specific grounds are relied on to show that the profits sought to be recovered were speculative and contingent, because the amount of coal that the defendant had the right to deliver at the tippie under the contract depended (1) upon getting sufficient cars to transport the coal, and (2) in finding a market for it, as the company was selling on the general market.

The trial court held that the amount of coal which the plaintiff had the right to deliver was not, under the terms of the contract, dependent upon either of the contingencies named, and refused to permit evidence to be introduced upon those points.

[8] This construction of the contract, we think, was correct, and, since those matters could not be considered by the jury, the evidence offered as to them, was, of course, properly rejected. The general rule in awarding damages is to give compensation for the pecuniary loss—to make amends or reparation for the injury inflicted. The plaintiff is entitled to recover all such damages as are the natural and proximate results of the wrongful act complained of. Ordinarily a plaintiff will not be entitled to recover profits or expected gains, for they are generally conjectural and too remote. But if it be shown that the loss of profits or gains was the natural and proximate result of the wrongful act, and their extent is satisfactorily proved, they may be recovered. Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 416, 26 S. E. 875, and authorities cited; Alleghany Iron Co. v. Teaford, 96 Va. 372, 31 S. E. 525; Grubb v. Burford, 98 Va. 553, 559-560, 37 S. E. 4.

[9] In this case the damages done the plaintiff by the defendant, if it was bound by the contract, was the difference between what the plaintiff was to receive for delivering the coal to the tippie as provided by the contract and the cost of doing it, and they were the natural and proximate result of the defendant's act. The compensation he was to receive was so many cents per ton on the coal delivered by the month in the quantities named, the free use of the house in which he was living and the furniture then in it, coal for his family, and goods out of the store for his family at 10 per cent. off the selling price. There was evidence showing, or tending strongly to show, how much coal the plaintiff had delivered at the tippie during the two months he worked under the contract and the cost of putting it there. It also appeared that about one month after he ceased working under the contract he obtained work elsewhere at $100 a month. This item was, of course, to be considered in ascertaining his damages, since it is clear from the contract that he was to give the work under the contract his personal attention. The contract fixed the amount per ton he was to receive for delivering the coal at the tippie. There was evidence showing the rental value per month of the dwelling house he was entitled to occupy during the year the contract was to continue. There was also evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's profits during the unexpired ten months would have been greater than they were during the two months he was permitted to work under it. Whether this was true or not, or whether the plaintiff had satisfactorily shown what his profits would have been if he had been permitted to keep and perform his contract, were questions for the jury under proper instructions by the court.

At the conclusion of its petition for a writ of error the defendant assigns as error the action of the court in overruling its demurrer to the declaration. This assignment of error does not seem to be much relied on, and, if it were, the demurrer was properly overruled.

As the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, the assignment of error based upon the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence will not be considered, as the evidence will be different at the next trial.

Reversed.

GROUNDS—OBJECTIONS TO RELIEF—CHANGED CONDITIONS.

Complainant corporation was organized to purchase and sell mineral lands, etc., all of the original stockholders, including defendants, having paid for their stock in land, and in 1888 defendants subscribed for a number of shares, intending to give therefor the whole of a certain tract, containing 1,980 acres, which the subscription recited should be taken at $2.50 an acre, and provided that it should be surveyed, if required by either party, and paid for in stock according to the number of acres. The surveyor by mistake omitted a portion of the land, and made a report showing only 1,572 acres. The mistake was discovered by complainant in 1906, and it sued to correct the mistake and recover the omitted part. At the time the suit was brought the outstanding capital stock equaled the authorized capital of the corporation, and only 3,500 of the 23,000 acres originally conveyed to complainant remained undisposed of, and defendants' land, including the omitted part, had advanced in value to $40 an acre. More than 142 per cent. dividends had been paid on the original stock, and the stock tendered to defendants in 1909 for the omitted land pursuant to the original subscription agreement will not pay over 50 or 60 cents on the dollar; its value having greatly depreciated. Held that, in view of the changed conditions, it would be inequitable to now correct the mutual mistake, and relief will be denied.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 32*)—
DEFENSES—LACHES.

In 1888 defendants subscribed to stock in a corporation organized to sell mineral lands, agreeing to convey in payment therefor a tract of land, supposed to contain 1,980 acres; but, owing to a mistake in the survey, a portion of the land was omitted. In 1906 the corporation first discovered facts arousing its suspicion that all the tract was not conveyed, and a committee, consisting of M. and G., one of the grantors, was appointed to have the land surveyed, and another of such grantors, upon being told the facts by M., replied that he would look into the matter, without stating that he had already learned that the whole tract had not been conveyed and was trying to procure a deed for the omitted part for the benefit of the grantors individually. In 1908 the grantors placed a tenant on the omitted tract, of which the corporation learned in the spring of 1908, when it proceeded to have its right to the land investigated, and in June, 1909, it demanded a conveyance thereof from the subscribers, and on their refusal sued on July 31, 1909, to correct the original mistake and to compel a conveyance of the omitted part. Held, that the corporation was not guilty of laches.

3. EQUITY (§ 6*)—JURISDICTION—MISTAKE.

A favorite subject of equity jurisdiction is the award of relief against mutual mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 25*)—
GROUNDS—FAIRNESS.

The award of reformation of a contract on the ground of mutual mistake must be fair and just to both parties without working special hardship to either.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 16*) — OBJECTIONS TO RELIEF—INJUSTICE.

Specific performance, as well as reformation of an instrument, for mutual mistake, will be refused, where the granting of the relief would work a hardship or injustice through change of circumstances not contemplated when the contract was made.

6. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 23*) — RELIEF—ESTOPPEL.

That stockholders of a corporation, who paid for their shares in land and were officers and directors of the corporation when the subscription contract was made, occupied a fiduciary relation to the corporation, would not estop them from claiming that the corporation was not entitled to have a mistake as to the land conveyed to it for their stock corrected because of changed conditions, making such relief inequitable.

7. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 119*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is upon one seeking specific performance of a contract to show that he is entitled to such relief.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Suit by the Tazewell Coal & Iron Company against Joseph S. Gillespie and others. Judgment for defendants, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry & Graham and Phlegar, Powell, Price & Shelton, for appellant. Chapman & Gillespie, Henson & Bowen, and A. S. Higginbotham, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. The appellant corporation was chartered by an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, approved April 28, 1887 (Acts Extra Session 1887, p. 122), and duly organized as a corporation May 31, 1887. Among the privileges granted the corporation by its charter was the right from time to time to purchase, lease, hold, and control in any manner, grant, bargain, sell and convey iron ore, mineral, and other lands and other rights and interests in lands situate in the counties of Tazewell, Wise, Dickinson, Buchanan, and Russell, and to receive real or personal property suitable to the business of the company in payment of subscriptions to its capital stock, the purpose of the incorporation being to take over, hold, and sell to the best advantage such lands as it might acquire in payment of subscriptions to its capital stock; and no stock seems to have been issued except for such lands or mineral rights. At the organization of the company, on May 31, 1887, A. J. May, S. D. May, J. V. Kelley, J. G.

Watts, Frank Huger, George W. Gillespie and J. S. Gillespie were made and constituted a board of directors, and the proceedings of this meeting were duly recorded in a book provided by the company for the purpose. Among the subscriptions made to the capital stock of the company by various persons at said meeting, in lands in fee and coal and mineral rights, was one made by J. S. Gillespie, A. P. Gillespie, and Henry Bowen, in these words: "Ben Johnson, Dismal, 1,980 acres at $2.50 per acre, $4,950"—the legal title to which at the time was vested in J. S. Gillespie for the benefit of himself and A. P. Gillespie and Henry Bowen, all of whom signed, along with all other subscribers to the stock, a paper setting forth a tabulated statement of the individual subscriptions spread in extenso on the record made and kept of the proceedings of the meeting.

The subscriptions of the lands for stock being in writing, signed by the parties, and accepted on the minute books by the stockholders and board of directors of the company, it commenced its operations, and all of the defendants to this suit, J. S. and A. P. Gillespie and Henry Bowen, appellees here, were directors of the company from its organization until in the year 1909, and for several years one of them was its president. It appears, however, that the subscription proposals and the resolutions accepting them, adopted by the directors and by the stockholders, provided that "the said lands should be surveyed, if required by either party hereto or the persons from whom said lands were purchased, and when surveyed the lands to be paid for, according to said survey, in stock at par to be issued by the said company, at the price per acre as herein set forth"; that the "Ben Johnson tract" subscribed by appellees was supposed to contain and had been theretofore treated as a 1,500-tract, but Peter Poston, from whom appellees purchased, and shortly before the subscription of the land to the stock of the appellant company, had caused a survey to be made of it, which showed 1,980 acres; that appellees, after the subscription, had a re-survey made by one P. H. Williams, who either fraudulently because of interest in lands adjacent, or from mistake, reported only 1,572 acres and 92 poles in the tract, by which survey Poston described the land in a second deed to J. S. Gillespie, dated November 25, 1887; and appellees, by deed dated December 20, 1888, but not delivered until November 19, 1891, conveyed the land to the appellant by the same description as that given in Poston's deed. It further appears that the land was the northeast corner of a 10,000-acre patent, owned by George Warder and others, the eastern and northern lines of the tract being parts of the corresponding lines of the patent, their courses being N. 23° W. and S. 67° W.; that the draftsman of the deed under which Poston claimed, dated January 12, 1859, made one line of the course of the eastern boundary and the distance of the northern boundary, writing it N. 23° W. 270 poles to two spruce pines on Harry's Branch, and omitted the northern, or back line altogether, when the calls should have been N. 23° W. 252 poles, and S. 67° W. 670 poles, which error made the deed inclose nothing, as appears from exhibits filed with the deposition of S. D. May in this cause.

Both parties to this controversy agree that Poston acquired all of the land to both of said boundaries of the patent, and by his first deed of March 14, 1887, he conveyed all to J. S. Gillespie for himself and his associates, A. P. Gillespie and Henry Bowen, and at the same time he and J. S. Gillespie entered into a contract to the effect that if on a resurvey there was more land than 1,500 acres, Gillespie would pay for the excess at $1 per acre, and Poston would convey the land to him.

It was, as we have seen, by the Williams survey that Poston made his second deed, dated November 25, 1887, to J. S. Gillespie, conveying the Ben Johnson tract as containing 1,572 acres, and when appellant took its deed from appellees, dated December, 1888, the land was described as appeared in the Williams survey; but appellant knew nothing at that time nor for many years after, of the errors committed by Surveyor Williams, by which a triangular parcel of land was cut out of the Ben Johnson tract, containing 450.79 acres, which is the land here in dispute. Nor did appellant know when it took the conveyance of the Ben Johnson tract from appellees as containing only 1,572 acres, nor for many years thereafter, of the agreement between Poston and J. S. Gillespie, entered into the same date of the first deed made by Poston to Gillespie conveying the Ben Johnson tract as containing 1,500 acres.

It further clearly appears that appellees intended to subscribe the entire Ben Johnson tract for stock of the appellant company; that they intended to convey to the company the entire tract, and thought they had done so until one S. M. Graham, who had surveyed the Warder tract and other lands in that vicinity, showed them by a diagram and explanations that a part of said tract had been omitted from the Williams survey.

In the year 1905 for the first time, as it would seem clear, appellant had its suspicion aroused that the deed made to it by appellees December 20, 1888, did not convey all of the Ben Johnson land; such suspicion being aroused by information that Surveyor P. H. Williams and his associates were claiming land next to the Warder back line which the appellant company supposed was covered by its deed from appellees. Acting on this information, the board of directors of the company, at a meeting held June 8, 1905, appointed S. D. May and J. S. Gillespie (one of appellees) to have the land surveyed. May obtained all needed title papers prior in date to the deed to appellant, and after some examination of them discovered the omission of a part of the land intended to be conveyed, and at once disclosed his information to one of the appellees, who, instead of telling May that they had learned the facts from Surveyor Graham and were trying to get a deed from Poston, only replied with a promise to "look into the matter."

It further appears that at that time appellees had already begun efforts to obtain another deed from Poston for the omitted lands, claiming that he was bound to make such a conveyance by his contract of March 14, 1887; but these facts were never divulged to any one connected with the appellant company until J. S. Gillespie testified in this cause, and the deed from Poston to J. S. Gillespie dated April 1, 1908, conveying to the latter the disputed land by metes and bounds, for the consideration expressed in the contract of March 14, 1887, was not filed for record till April 19, 1909. The appellees had, however in the meantime and in the early part of 1908, claiming under their first deed, placed a tenant on the disputed land and had the timber thereon counted, which facts came to the knowledge of appellant in the spring of 1908, whereupon it proceeded to have its right to the land investigated and reported on by its attorney.

Upon consideration of the attorney's report by the stockholders and board of directors at meetings held June 7, 1909, a committee was appointed to confer with appellees and procure a conveyance of the title to the disputed land, which committee was authorized to settle with appellees by paying stock of the company at $2.50 per acre of the disputed land and such sums as would have been paid as dividends on the stock had it been issued at the organization of the company, with interest on such dividends. This proposition was submitted to and rejected by appellees. Whereupon, the bill in this cause was filed July 31, 1909, and the said stock offered to appellees tendered with the bill; the object of the bill being to secure a conveyance from appellees of the 450.79 acres of land, part of the Ben Johnson tract, which at the time of the contract between appellant and appellees sought to be enforced was supposed to contain 1,980 acres, but which by subsequent survey was found to contain 2,023.365 acres, and which appellees sold and attempted to convey to appellant, though in fact they conveyed but 1,572 acres.

The bill sets out at length the facts stated above, and the further facts that the authorized capital of the complaining company was $2,000,000, its actual capital $194,233.63, but that the board of directors at a meeting of which appellees were three of five present on the 8th day of June, 1905, began proceedings which resulted in amending the charter so as to reduce the authorized capital to the amount of the outstanding capital stock; and that, in order to tender to appellees the stock owing for the omitted 450.79 acres of land, the company had purchased of S. D. May the necessary shares.

The bill does not charge specifically intentional fraud on the part of appellees, but reliance for the relief it asks is upon the ground of mutual mistake as to the number of acres in the Ben Johnson or Poston tract of land and the true boundaries thereof.

Appellees filed a demurrer (which is not insisted on) and an answer to the bill. The answer takes issue with a number of the statements of fact contained in the bill, denies concealment of facts which appellant was entitled to know, and sets out the following as facts justifying them in refusing to correct the mutual mistake charged in the bill, to wit:

"The transaction as to the Ben Johnson tract was closed in good faith by the parties in the year 1891, but under what now appears to have been a mutual mistake, and the parties then stood and have since remained in statu quo; that is, the defendants had conveyed the 1,572 acres and received stock for that amount of land, and the company has never paid any part of the consideration for the omitted land.

"The business of the plaintiff has been the holding, selling, and disposing of the 23,488 acres of land conveyed to the company by the promoters for the original stock. In the period between the stock subscription agreement and the discovery of the omitted land, the plaintiff had sold, conveyed, and disposed of its lands and timber to the extent of over 20,000 acres, and had reduced its holdings to about 3,500 acres. The original holdings were valued at $202,000, for which that amount of the original stock of the company was to be issued at par on the fair valuation of the lands in 1887; the Ben Johnson tract being valued at $2.50 per acre at that time. When the mistake was discovered and suit brought, the holdings of the company were about 3,500 acres, worth not over $110,000, and the outstanding capital stock amounted to $194,233.63, making the value of the stock tendered about 55 cents on the dollar. The omitted land is now worth about $40 per acre. The plaintiff has disbursed, out of the proceeds from sales of its lands and timber, over $275,000 in dividends upon the original stock subscribed for and issued to the promoters. This original stock has already received 142 per cent. and will receive in all, when the balance of the holdings are disposed of enough to make about $2 for one of the par value of the stock. The 1909 stock tendered with the bill cannot pay over 50 or 60 cents on the dollar. The potential and actual value of the stock subscribed for by the defendants has greatly depreciated. The land has increased in value 16 to 1.

"When the mistake was discovered and the company claimed the land, it had issued and had outstanding the full amount of its stock which under the law it was authorized to issue. By its charter, its maximum capital was fixed at $2,000,000, but in 1905, desiring to avoid taxation on that amount, it had its charter amended and its maximum capital reduced and fixed at the exact amount of its outstanding capital stock on that date, which was $194,233.63. For this reason, when the company decided to sue for the land, it was not in a position to issue any stock and had no power to do so. The company's attorneys and officers, knowing and recognizing this, devised a plan to obviate the difficulty, and to enable, as they conceived, the plaintiff to issue and tender stock. The plan was for S. D. May to turn over to the company 15 shares of his stock, the company agreeing to pay him any and all dividends which might thereafter accrue on that amount of capital stock; and the company, having canceled this stock turned over by Mr. May, undertook to issue and tender stock to the defendants."

Upon the hearing of the cause on the bill and answer and exhibits filed therewith and depositions taken on behalf of the respective parties, the circuit court denied the relief asked in the bill and dismissed the cause.

Were it charged and proven that appellees by intentional fraud prevented appellant from obtaining title to the whole of the Ben Johnson tract of land under its subscription by appellees to the capital stock of the company, and while the company's condition was such that it could perform its part of the contract, the case would be very different from that made by the record, viz., that the failure of appellant to obtain title to the whole of the land grew out of a mutual mistake not discovered by either party until conditions had so changed as to make it questionable, at least, whether or not a court of equity should undertake to correct the mistake. The facts set up in appellees' answer as to the changed conditions of the appellant quoted above are not seriously controverted.

[1] Whether the bill of appellant be treated as a bill for the specific enforcement of the contract of subscription by the appellees of the Ben Johnson land to the capital stock of the company, or as a bill seeking the reformation of the contract, on the ground of mutual mistake, the crucial question for determination is whether or not, under the facts and circumstances proven and going to show the condition of the contracting parties with respect to their ability to perform the contract according to its intent and purpose, or to correct the mutual mistake of which the appellant complains, it is in a condition to perform the contract on its part. In other words, can the contract be specifically enforced or reformed so as to correct the mutual mistake and thereby place the respective parties in the position they agreed to occupy by their contract with respect to the Ben Johnson tract of land?

[2] We do not think that laches, on the part of appellant, can, under the circumstances, disentitle it to the relief sought, and, if this relief has to be denied, it must be upon the ground that the appellant has not offered and is unable to offer to perform the contract so that appellees can receive substantially what they contracted for. Certainly, a court of equity could not rightly compel appellees to convey the omitted land to appellant unless the latter was in a position to substantially comply with the terms of the contract with respect to the consideration for the conveyance to which the former would be entitled.

The changed condition of appellant, with respect to its ability to carry out this contract, cannot be, under the facts and circumstances already stated, imputed to the appellees any more than to appellant, acting as a corporate body. All of the parties, doubtless, acted in the matters which brought the affairs of the company to the status they occupied when this suit was brought in good faith, for up to certainly 1905, and over 17 years after the company was organized, and after its authorized capital was reduced to the amount of the outstanding or actual capital stock, all parties concerned were ignorant of the fact that a part of the Ben Johnson land had been omitted from the conveyance by appellees, delivered to and accepted by the company in 1891. Had the sale of this tract of land to the company been as a whole, and not by the acre as it was, and the company had paid the whole purchase money, then the authorities cited for appellant in the argument for the proposition that courts of equity have jurisdiction to and in a great number of cases have, reformed instruments on the ground of mistake, would apply to this case. But that is not this case. Here the appellant has not performed as to the omitted land, and, by reason of changed conditions, for which appellees are not censurable, it cannot perform and pay for the land according to the original spirit and intent of the agreement.

In no view that we have been able to take of the case could the relief sought by appellant be granted without giving the company more and appellees less than the spirit and intent of their contract would justify. Appellant would get land that has appreciated greatly in value since the contract was entered into, while appellees would be compelled to take stock therefor that has materially decreased, and cannot, by reason of the changed conditions surrounding the situation of the appellant, appreciably increase in value. Such a result would not be justified in view of the facts already stated; but, in an effort to correct what was a mutual innocent mistake on the part of both contracting parties, a hardship would be imposed on one of them.

[3, 4] Authority is abundant for the proposition that one of the highest prerogatives, and one of the favorite subjects of equity jurisprudence, is to give relief against the consequences of mistake and accident; but not only must the evidence be sufficiently cogent to satisfy the mind of the court to justify reformation of a contract on the ground of mutual mistake, but the relief afforded must be fair and just to both parties litigant—especially so in the absence of fraud or other inequitable conduct on the part of the party against whom the relief is sought. We have been cited to no case, and none has been found by us, where a court of equity has decreed the relief sought in this case where the facts were substantially as they are here.

"Courts of equity will not exercise jurisdiction in specific performance where it would impose hardship on people not censurable in conduct, and where the circumstances and conditions of things have been so changed as to work loss and hardship to them." Dyer v. Duffy, 39 W. Va. 159, 19 S. E. 544, 24 L. R. A. 339.

[5] Where specific performance is asked, as well as where reformation of an instrument is sought on the ground of mutual mistake, and where the element of hardship and injustice comes into the case through a change in circumstances not contemplated by the parties when the contract was entered into, the relief will not be granted. Quick v. Stuyvesant, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 84; Fitzpatrick v. Dorland, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 291; Hale v. Wilkinson, 62 Va. 90; Garnett v. Macon, 10 Va. 308, Fed. Cas. No. 5,245. This rule is fully sustained in Newberry v. French, 98 Va. 479, 36 S. E. 519.

In the case of Garnett v. Macon, supra, the opinion by Marshall, C. J., says: "A court of equity compels the specific performance of contracts because it is the intention of the parties that they should be performed. But the person who demands it must be in a capacity to do, substantially, all that he has promised, before he can entitle himself to the aid of this court."

The same subject is dealt with at page 617, 36 Cyc., and a number of cases cited. See, also, Pom. Eq. § 1407; Cox et al. v. Cox, 67 Va. 309.

"While, therefore, no positive rule can be laid down by which the action of the court can be determined in all cases, it may be stated, as a general rule, that specific relief will be usually granted when it is apparent from a view of all the circumstances of the particular case that it will subserve the ends of justice; and that it will be withheld where, from a like view, it appears that it will produce hardship or injustice to either of the parties." Michie's Dig. vol. 12, p. 570, and cases cited.

Leaving out of view the plan by which appellant obtained the requisite stock from one of its stockholders to tender to appellees in payment for the omitted Ben Johnson or Poston land, we have stated enough of the facts to show that the changed conditions of the company are such that the relief asked in its bill, in view of the principles of equity to which we have adverted, could not be decreed without imposing an unwarranted hardship upon appellees.

[6] We are further of opinion that the authorities cited for appellant for the proposition that appellees' relations to the company, were of a fiduciary character, and for that reason they are estopped to deny the right of appellant to the relief it seeks against them, have no controlling influence as applied to the facts of this case.

The decree of the circuit court complained of has to be affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

HARRISON, J. This cause is before us solely for the purpose of having further argument upon the question whether or not the appellees can now be placed in substantially the same position they would have occupied if there had not been a mutual mistake, and the contract had been fully performed in March, 1889.

The facts of the case are fully and accurately stated in the opinion handed down in January last, and need not be repeated here. The conclusion then reached was that in no view of the case could the mutual innocent mistake of the parties be corrected and appellants granted specific performance of the contract alleged to have been made in 1889, without imposing an unwarranted hardship upon the appellees by giving, as a result of changed conditions, the appellants more and the appellees less than the spirit and intent of their contract entitled them to.

[7] The burden is upon the appellant company to show itself entitled to a decree for the specific performance of the contract it seeks to enforce. The circuit court held that it had not sustained this burden, and we are by no means satisfied, as we must be, that there was error in that conclusion. It is now more than 20 years since the innocent mutual mistake sought to be corrected was made. Many material changes have in the meantime taken place in the situation of the parties and in the subject-matter of the contract, so that the original intention of the parties cannot, at this late day, be enforced without grave danger of doing great injustice to the appellees.

We have carefully considered the arguments submitted upon the petition to rehear, and are of opinion that the appellees cannot now be placed in substantially the same position they would have occupied if there had not been an innocent mutual mistake, and the contract had been fully performed in March, 1889; and therefore the decree pronounced by this court on the 18th of January, 1912, must, for the reasons then given, be adhered to.

KILGORE v. BARR.

BANKRUPTCY (§ 228*)—PREFERENCES—JURISDICTION BY CONSENT.

The bankruptcy court had jurisdiction by consent, so that its determination was conclusive, where at a meeting before the referee in bankruptcy of the creditors of D., the question of whether C.'s note to D. passed to R. by D.'s assignment, was raised, and to such proceeding C. and R. were made parties on their own motion, and after a hearing, the referee held it was a voidable preference, and did not pass, and C. and R. appealed to the district court on the merits only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Cent. Dig. § 387; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by E. L. Barr, trustee in bankruptcy, against Charles T. Kilgore. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. M. & E. H. Fulton, for plaintiff in error. Vicars & Peery, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This writ of error was awarded to a judgment in behalf of E. L. Barr, trustee in bankruptcy of D. A. Ramey, bankrupt, against Charles T. Kilgore, on his note to Ramey for $373.21. The note was assigned by the payee to R. L. Kilgore for the benefit of the Wise County Bank, and two days after the assignment Ramey filed his petition in bankruptcy.

At a meeting of creditors before the referee for the purpose of examining the bankrupt, the question was raised as to whether or not Charles T. Kilgore's note passed by the assignment to R. L. Kilgore, or constituted an asset of the bankrupt's estate. To that proceeding the Kilgores were made parties on their own motion. They were represented by counsel, and, along with other witnesses, were fully examined in support of their contention. They undertook to sustain the validity of the assignment by proving an alleged parol agreement between themselves and Ramey, made more than four months before the filing of his petition in bankruptcy, by which a store account due by Charles T. Kilgore to Ramey was to be applied as a credit on a note to the Wise County Bank made by Ramey as principal and indorsed by the Kilgores, and that in pursuance of that agreement and for the purpose of carrying it into effect the note in controversy was made by Charles T. Kilgore, and assigned by Ramey to R. L. Kilgore, to be collected by him and applied in part payment of the bank debt.

The referee, on consideration of the controversy upon the merits, overruled the pretension of the Kilgores, and held that the assignment was a voidable preference, and that the note did not pass thereby, but belonged to the bankrupt's estate. It was accordingly surrendered by the assignee to the trustee in bankruptcy, who was directed to collect it as an asset of the estate. Thereupon Charles T. Kilgore and R. L. Kilgore filed an exception in writing to the ruling of the referee, and presented a petition to the District Court to review and reverse his order; but the finding of the referee was approved and confirmed.

The sole question for our consideration is whether the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to determine the issue thus voluntarily submitted to it for adjudication. If it had, it is clear that its judgment was a complete determination of the matter in controversy, establishing the title of the trustee to the note and the liability of the maker thereon.

In discussing the subject of jurisdiction of referees in bankruptcy, Professor Staples, in his excellent work, "A Suit in Bankruptcy," observes (page 102): "In general, referees are judicial officers, and their orders, made in the course of bankruptcy, including adjudications upon allowance and rejection of claims of creditors, are entitled in all courts, state and federal, to the respect and credit due to officers who act judicially. Clendenin v. Red River Bank, 11 Am. Bankr. Rep. 245 [12 N. D. 51, 94 N. W. 901]. Except when otherwise provided in the statute, the word 'court' may include 'referee,' and, subject to such limitation, the jurisdiction of the referee is commensurate with that of the court by which he is appointed. In re Hudleston, 1 Am. Bankr. Rep. 572.

Id. pp. 103, 104: "The power of the bankruptcy courts to take possession of or release the bankrupt's property has already been considered. (Pages 93, 97.) That power may be exercised by the referee before adjudication in only one case, and that is on 'the issuance by the clerk of a certificate showing the absence of a judge from the judicial district, or his sickness or inability to act. Act 1898, § 38, subd. 3. In re Florcken (D. C.) 107 Fed. 241, 5 Am. Bankr. Rep. 802. After adjudication he can act with reference to said property under the provisions of section 38, subd. 4. * * * With the exceptions of questions arising out of applications of bankrupts for compositions or discharges, it is believed that the court has no power over the bankruptcy proceedings that it may not, by reference, delegate to the referee, and his power would seem to be limited only by the terms of the reference. * * * Generally the District Courts have formulated and adopted a rule by which the referees are empowered 'to do all acts and take all proceedings, make all orders and decrees, and perform all duties,' without specific delegation, which the courts are authorized to delegate by the act or the rules of the Supreme Court to empower the referees to perform."

Page 105: "The orders of the referee upon all questions are subject to review by the court." Section 38.

Let it be conceded as a general proposition that, where the judgment of a court of limited powers is relied on, its jurisdiction must be shown. Nevertheless, we do not admit the pertinency of that principle to courts of bankruptcy, which are not courts of limited, but of general, jurisdiction in respect to matters in bankruptcy. But whether the mere failure of the record to show the clerk's certificate, or an order of reference, general or special, to a referee in bankruptcy, in relation to a subject over which he has jurisdiction, renders his judgments amenable to collateral attack, need not be here determined. The circumstance that the plaintiff in error raised no objection to the jurisdiction of the referee, but invoked and submitted himself to that jurisdiction, and afterwards sought to review and reverse the decision on the merits on appeal, might perhaps be regarded a tacit admission that the matter was properly pending before that officer for adjudication. But it is not necessary in this instance to resort to inference merely on that subject. In the petition for appeal from the order of the referee to the district court, it was expressly conceded that the controversy arose in a proceeding in bankruptcy pending before D. F. Bailey, Esq., the referee in charge thereof, at a meeting of creditors and examination of the bankrupt and other witnesses. And the error assigned was, not that the matter had not been referred to the referee, or that he had no jurisdiction of the controversy, but that his ruling thereon upon the merits, or the law and the evidence, was erroneous, for which error (to which exception was specifically taken) the court was asked to review and modify the order of the referee, but not to dismiss the proceeding for want of jurisdiction. A similar admission was made in open court at the trial in the circuit court. These admissions are inconsistent with the contention, now made for the first time in this court, that the matter out of which the controversy arose does not appear to have been referred to the referee. If any such question had been suggested in the trial court, proof of the authority of the referee to act in the premises would no doubt have been promptly supplied.

The case of In re Steuer (D. C.) 104 Fed. 976, is strongly in point in support of the referee's jurisdiction. In that case it is said: "Evidence was taken and one or more hearings were had before the referee, at which counsel for the respondents argued their case without making any question of the referee's jurisdiction. On January 12, 1900, the referee rendered a decree declaring that the transfer of the brick was a voidable preference, 'and that the trustees recover said property * * * as a part of said estate.' Upon appeal the court held the acts of the defendant amounted to consent to the jurisdiction in contemplation of section 23b of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3431]), and affirmed the order of the referee.

So, also, in Re Connolly (D. C.) 100 Fed. 620, it was held that the conduct of the parties amounted to consent to the jurisdiction; that though, as a general rule, consent cannot give jurisdiction, that principle has no application to cases arising under section 23b, which plainly implies that jurisdiction of a certain class of controversies may be given by consent. Otherwise, it is said, the statute would have no effect. 1 Remington on Bankruptcy, § 1696; J. B. McFarlan Carriage Co. v. Solanas, 106 Fed. 145, 45 C. C. A. 253, 5 Am. Bankr. Rep. 442; 5 Cyc. 253.

There can be no doubt that, if the decision of the referee, affirmed by the District Court, in the instant case, had been in favor of the plaintiff in error, it would have been conclusive upon the rights of the trustee. And, the plaintiff in error having elected to take chances, in a forum of his own selection with general jurisdiction of the subject, and lost, he cannot now be heard to complain, but must abide the result.

The judgment of the circuit court is without error, and must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roanoke County.

Bill by Sidney M. Muse and others against G. G. Gish. Decree dissolving a preliminary injunction and dismissing the bill, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Kime & Fox, for appellants. W. W. Ballard, J. E. Gish, and Jackson & Henson, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. This is an appeal from a decree dissolving a preliminary injunction and dismissing the bill in a suit brought by the appellants to enjoin the appellee from obstructing the plaintiffs in the use and enjoyment of a private roadway affording them means of outlet from their respective properties, which are entirely surrounded by the lands of private parties, through lot No. 1, the land of the defendant, to the "Vinton public road."

The obstructions complained of were occasioned by the defendant plowing up a portion of the private roadway and locking the gates opening into the same and into the public highway. The property affected consisted originally of 405 acres of land, situated in Roanoke county, near Vinton, and belonged to John B. McClung, who died testate in the year 1901. Shortly after the death of testator the land was partitioned amongst his devisees. Lot No. 1, containing 67 acres, was allotted to his granddaughter, a Mrs. Jones, and was afterwards purchased by the appellee, G. G. Gish.

For many years during the lifetime of John B. McClung there was a private roadway, known as the "old road," leading from the mansion house to the "Vinton public road" at the present outlet. The route of the old road was from the mansion house, passing a white oak at station 16 (on a map filed with the record) to Berkeley's corner, thence in part over and along Berkeley's line to station 15, and thence off through what is now lot No. 1, by station B, to station A, on the public highway. Several years prior to McClung's death a dispute arose between himself and Berkeley touching the correct location of the dividing line between them from station 16 to station 15, the latter claiming to the center of the road. The line was eventually surveyed, and Berkeley erected a line fence in the middle of the roadway from 16 to 15. Thereupon McClung discontinued the old road between those points, and from 15 to B, and established what is now known as the "new road," a straight road from 16 to B, thus providing a continuous road over his own land from the mansion house to the public road at station A. The portion of the old road from 16 by 15 to B, on McClung's side, was wholly discontinued and plowed up, and since that time has been under cultivation as other parts of the farm.

We have not undertaken to discuss the evidence in detail, but merely to give our conclusions therefrom. The foregoing summary is sustained by the preponderance of the testimony, and is an accurate presentation of the situation at the death of McClung, at the time the commissioners partitioned the land amongst his devisees, and at the date of appellee's purchase of lot No. 1.

When appellee bought lot No. 1, the new road had been established for several years, and was apparent and necessary, and in continuous and uninterrupted use by the appellants. Moreover, the defenses relied on by the appellee show that he purchased lot No. 1 with actual knowledge of the existence of the new road. Thus, he proved by T. B. Jones, the husband of his vendor, that McClung discussed with him a purpose on his part to discontinue the new road and to open in place of it another road along the route of the old road. But, however that may have been, McClung did no act in furtherance of such intention, but continued to use the new road as long as he lived.

Gish also attempted to prove by Jones a parol agreement between them, which he says was acquiesced in by "the heirs," to change the location of the new road to its original position. Yet, if any such agreement was made, it was inchoate, and was never attempted to be consummated.

The remaining ground of defense involves the contention that appellants had another outlet to a public road by a private way over the land of W. G. Wood. But this allegation is wholly disproved and seems to have been abandoned.

The roadway in question having been established by John B. McClung during his ownership of the entire boundary of 405 acres of land, it will, if reasonably convenient and necessary, be continued for the use and benefit of his devisees (and those claiming under them) upon a division of the land under the provisions of testator's will. The rules of law governing ways of necessity apply to the facts of this case; and the decisions of this court abundantly sustain the rights of appellants to the unobstructed use of the roadway established by John B. McClung from the mansion house to the point of connection with the "Vinton public road" at station A. Hardy v. McCullough, 64 Va. 259; Deacon v. Doyle, 75 Va. 258; Sanderlin v. Baxter, 76 Va. 299, 44 Am. Rep. 165; French v. Williams, 82 Va. 462, 4 S. E. 591; Bond v. Willis, 84 Va. 796, 6 S. E. 136; Scott v. Moore, 98 Va. 668, 37 S. E. 342, 81 Am. St. Rep. 749.

For these reasons, the decree of the circuit court must be reversed, and this court will make such decree as the trial court ought to have made, perpetuating the injunction, with costs.

CLINCHFIELD COAL CO. et al. v. SUTHERLAND.

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 17*)—RIGHT TO COMPEL CONVEYANCE.

After a husband sold his undivided interest in land under provision for deferred payments, alimony was decreed against him, with provision that, upon the wife executing a deed releasing her contingent right of dower to the land, the purchaser should pay her the amount fixed as alimony. The wife was not a party to her husband's contract to convey, nor to the deed, and refused to convey her dower right. Held, that an assignee of the claim for the fees of the wife's counsel in a suit in which the alimony was decreed is not entitled, though he has reduced the claim to judgment, to maintain suit against the husband and wife and the purchaser of the land to compel a conveyance by the wife to the purchaser of her contingent right of dower, and to compel the purchaser to pay the amount of the judgment to such assignee; it being optional with the wife to accept or reject the alimony on the terms prescribed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dickinson County.

Bill by S. H. Sutherland against the Clinchfield Coal Company and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Vicars & Peery, W. H. Rouse, and E. M. & E. H. Fulton, for appellants. Sutherland & Sutherland, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. [1] This litigation had its origin in a suit for divorce instituted by A. J. Kiser against his wife Anna Kiser. Pending the trial of that case the court made an allowance of $150 to the wife for temporary alimony, and upon final hearing held that neither party was entitled to a divorce, but awarded a gross sum of $500 (inclusive of the sum of $150 previously allowed as temporary alimony) as permanent alimony to the defendant.

It appeared that A. J. Kiser had sold his undivided interest, amounting to 210 acres, in a certain tract of land, to the Clinchfield Coal Company for $1,680, $420 of which was paid on the execution of the deed, and the residue of the purchase money was to be paid in three credit installments, of $420 each. With respect to this transaction the court decreed as follows: "And it further appearing to the court that the complainant has sold the farm upon which they have lived, and the defendant has refused to sign said deed of conveyance, and that complainant has refused to provide for defendant, but has squandered a part of the money, the court doth adjudge, order, and decree that, upon the defendant executing a deed releasing her contingent right of dower to the farm which has been sold to the Clinchfield Coal Company, the said company do pay to the said defendant, Anna Kiser, * * * the sum of $500, which sum shall be her permanent alimony, and is to include the sum of $150, heretofore decreed by this court to the defendant."

From this decree A. J. Kiser appealed, and the decree was affirmed. Kiser v. Kiser, 108 Va. 730, 62 S. E. 936.

S. H. Sutherland, the appellee, became the owner by assignment of the fees of counsel for Anna Kiser in the divorce suit, amounting to $350, and, having reduced the same to judgment, instituted this suit against A. J. Kiser, Anna Kiser, and the Clinchfield Coal Company to collect the same. The bill, after setting out the foregoing facts and others not material to be stated, prays: "That a commissioner be appointed to execute a deed conveying the contingent right of dower of the said Anna Kiser in said tract of land conveyed by her husband to the Clinchfield Coal Company, in case she refuses to execute the same, and that upon the execution of said deed said Clinchfield Coal Company be required to pay your orator the amount of his judgment against said Anna Kiser and the costs of this suit." There was a further prayer that the divorce suit be reinstated and reopened, and that the bill be treated as a petition therein.

On final hearing the circuit court entered the decree under review, directing that Anna Kiser should within 30 days convey all her interest in the land sold by her husband, either actual or contingent, to the Clinchfield Coal Company, and, if she should fail to execute and deliver such deed within the time prescribed, a special commissioner was appointed to make the conveyance. The decree, moreover, provided that, upon the execution of the conveyance, either by Anna Kiser or the commissioner, the Clinchfield Coal Company should pay to S. H. Sutherland the amount of his judgment, to go as a credit on the $500 decreed against the company.

[2] It is apparent that this suit and the decree complained of are founded upon a misconception of the contractual relations of the parties with respect to the sale of the land from A. J. Kiser to the Clinchfield Coal Company, as well as of the force and effect of the decree for alimony in the divorce suit. Anna Kiser was not a party to either the contract for the sale of her husband's land to the Clinchfield Coal Company or to the deed executed by him in consummation thereof; hence her dower rights in the land were in no wise affected by that transaction. The deed, it is true, contains a stipulation that the last installment of purchase money should fall due 24 months from the date of the deed, "or so soon thereafter as the dower right, contingent or actual, of Anna Kiser * * * is released." But, not being a party to the instrument, the wife was not bound by the stipulation, and it affirmatively appears that she has steadfastly refused to consent to it. So, also, with regard to the decree in the divorce suit. The court did not undertake the impossible task of requiring the wife to specifically execute a contract of sale to which she was not a party. To the contrary, the decree in terms recites that the sale was made by the husband, and that the wife "has refused to sign said deed of conveyance, and that complainant has refused to provide for defendant." Predicated upon that state of facts, the decree proceeds to declare that, upon Anna Kiser executing a deed releasing her contingent right of dower, the Clinchfield Coal Company shall pay to her the sum of $500 for permanent alimony, thus leaving it optional with the wife to accept or reject permanent alimony on the terms prescribed, and the record shows that she has always refused to release her dower rights and accept the provisional allowance made for her in lieu thereof.

In these circumstances, the court exceeded its powers in attempting to compel the appellant, at the suit of a judgment creditor, to accept for his benefit the terms of a sale of her property which she never made, and to which she never assented. Such a suit cannot be maintained.

For these reasons, the decree must be reversed, and the bill dismissed. But this dismissal is without prejudice to the right of the appellee to resort to any remedy to which he may be entitled for the collection of his judgment against Anna Kiser, or to any right that A. J. Kiser may have against the Clinchfield Coal Company with respect to unpaid installments of purchase money on the land sold by him to that company.

Code 1904, § 1294-h (6), which prescribes a penalty for delay in delivering a telegram, does not authorize imposition of the penalty for neglect to deliver within the state a telegram sent from a telegraph office within the state to an office just outside the state, though the company customarily delivered messages from the latter office to the adjoining town within the state in which the addressee resided.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Bristol.

Action by one Davis against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and dismissed.

George H. Fearons, Donald T. Stant, and Phlegar, Powell, Price & Shelton, for appellant. N. P. Oglesby and George M. Warren, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. [1] This is an action under Va. Code, 1904, § 1294-h (6) to recover the penalty of $100 prescribed for delay in delivery of a telegram.

The message was delivered to the company at 9:40 p. m. at its office in Glade Spring, Va., addressed to J. L. Davis, care of Susong Building, Bristol, Tenn., and was received at that office at 9:46 p. m. of the same day, but was not delivered to the addressee, who lived in Bristol, Va., until 3:05 p. m. of the following day. The company maintained an office in Bristol, Tenn., but had no office of any kind in the adjoining city of Bristol, Va. It is true that, both by regulation and custom, the company's habit was to deliver messages from the Tennessee office to addressees in Bristol, Va.; but, of course, no extraterritorial force can be imparted to the delivery statute by agreement of parties.

[2] Upon these undisputed facts, the sole question for our determination is whether or not the company can be penalized by authority of the Virginia statute for neglect of duty with respect to the delivery in this state of a message from its office in another state.

The case is readily distinguishable from Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 459, 41 S. E. 856, 98 Am. St. Rep. 971, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Hughes, 104 Va. 240, and Western Union Tel. Co. v. White, 113 Va. —, 74 S. E. 174. Those were all transmission cases under section 1294-h (5), where the duty rested upon the company promptly to transmit the messages from one Virginia office to another office in the same state; and for negligent failure to discharge that duty the company was subjected to the statutory penalty, though the line, in part, passed through the territory of another state. Those cases fall within the influence of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. 934, 40 L. Ed. 1105, and Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Commercial Milling Co., 218 U. S. 406, 31 Sup. Ct. 59, 54 L. Ed. 1088, 21 Ann. Cas. 815, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 220. The controlling principle of that line of cases is clearly stated in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. White, supra, 113 Va. —, 74 S. E. 174, as follows: "It is not sought in this case to give effect to our statute outside of the limits of this state, as was held could not be done in the Chiles Case, 214 U. S. 274, 29 Sup. Ct. 613, 53 L. Ed. 994; but the object of the suit is to give effect to the statute and to impose the penalty for the company's failure to transmit the message to Fredericksburg. If the message had never been transmitted at all from Staunton, it is clear, under the case of Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Crovo, 221 U. S. 364, 31 Sup. Ct. 399, 55 L. Ed. 498, the company would have been liable. If the point of delivery had been in Washington city, and the message had been duly transmitted to that place and never delivered, then there could be no recovery, as decided in the Chiles Case, supra. If the message had been duly relayed and transmitted from Washington city to Fredericksburg, and the only default had occurred there in failing to deliver the message to the sendee, it is clear that an action would lie to recover the penalty under the decision in the James Case."

To uphold the recovery in this case would give to the Virginia statute an extraterritorial effect, to which it is not entitled. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 7 Sup. Ct. 1126, 30 L. Ed. 1187; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Chiles, 214 U. S. 274, 29 Sup. Ct. 613, 53 L. Ed. 994.

For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed, and the case dismissed.

Error to Circuit Court, Carroll County

Proceeding by the Town of Pulaski to condemn for its purposes land and water rights connected therewith. There was a judgment of condemnation, and one Miller, trustee, and others bring error. Affirmed.

M. M. Caldwell, for plaintiffs in error.
John S. Draper and Robert E. Scott, of Richmond, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court for Carroll county, rendered in a proceeding instituted by the town of Pulaski to condemn for its purposes as a municipal corporation a parcel of land and water rights connected therewith, situated in Carroll county and owned by the plaintiffs in error.

[1] The first, second, and third assignments of error are as to the right or power of the town to condemn the defendants' property. It is insisted that it did not possess that right at common law, under its charter, or under any general statute. It is not claimed by the town that it had the right, either at common law or under its charter (see Miller, Trustee, etc., v. Town of Pulaski, 109 Va. 137, 63 S. E. 890, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 552), but that it did have such power under section 1038 of the Code as amended by an act approved March 14, 1908 (Acts 1908, c. 349, p. 623).

By that section as amended, which applies to towns generally, it is provided, among other things, that, in addition to the powers conferred by general statutes, the council of any city and town shall have power to acquire or establish, maintain, and operate waterworks, gasworks, electric plants, and other public utilities within or without the limits of the city or town; "to acquire within or without the limits of the city or town, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, whatever land may be necessary for acquiring, locating, establishing, maintaining, operating, extending, or enlarging, said waterworks, gasworks, electric plants and other public utilities, and the rights of way, rails, pipes, poles, conduits, or wires, connected therewith, or any of the fixtures or appurtenances thereof; provided that no city or town shall have the right to acquire by condemnation the steam and electric plants, gas and water works, or water power, and the fixtures and appurtenances or any part thereof, owned and operated in whole or in part on the eighteenth day of February, nineteen hundred and eight, by any manufacturing corporation or public service corporation for the purpose of acquiring, establishing, maintaining, operating or enlarging its electric plant or waterworks; * * * provided that no property shall be condemned for the purposes specified in this section unless the necessity therefor shall be shown to exist to the satisfaction of the court having jurisdiction of the case."

It is clear, we think, that under the provisions of section 1038 of the Code, as amended, the town had the right, if the necessity for it existed, to condemn the land and water rights described in the record. The fact that "water power" is not in terms named in the "affirmative clause" of the statute, but only in the "proviso," does not show that the Legislature did not intend to give a city or town the right to condemn a water power—a right or interest annexed to land and parcel thereof. The right or power to condemn the whole, if owned by one person, would seem necessarily to give the right or power to condemn the parts that made up the whole, if owned by different persons, if necessary for the purposes of the municipality and done in the manner prescribed by statute.

[2] The next error assigned is that, even if section 1038, as amended, did give such right, no necessity for its exercise existed in this case.

That section provides that no property shall be condemned for the purposes specified in the section, unless the necessity therefor be shown to exist to the satisfaction of the court having jurisdiction of the case. The trial court, after investigation, held that the necessity for the condemnation of the said water power did exist. The plaintiffs in error, as we understand them, insist that the "necessity" for the taking contemplated by the statute does not mean that the property sought to be condemned must be reasonably necessary only, but must be absolutely or indispensably necessary for the uses and purposes for which it is to be taken.

The term "necessary," says Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) p. 1058, "when applied to a public road, is used in the statutes and judicial decisions, not in the sense of being absolutely indispensable to communications between two points, but with relation to the purposes for which public highways are established, namely, the reasonable accommodation of the traveling public. This same observation would doubtless apply to any public improvement or work."

Again, on page 1062, he says: "When the law says that private property may be taken for public uses only when it is necessary for such use, it means a reasonable, not an absolute, necessity."

In 15 Cyc. p. 636, in discussing this question, it is said: "Nevertheless, necessity, within the meaning of this rule, does not mean an absolute, but only a reasonable, necessity, such as would combine the greatest benefit to the public with the least inconvenience and expense to the condemning party and property owner consistent with such benefit, although it does not include the taking of land which may merely render the improvement more convenient or less expensive, or for a necessity which is merely colorable."

These text-writers seem to be sustained in their statement of what is meant by the terms "necessity" or "necessary," as used in the eminent domain statutes, by the great weight of authority and the better reason. See cases cited in notes; also cases cited in note to Wheeling, etc., Co. v. Toledo, etc., 2 Ann. Cas. 941, 946-948.

Applying this test, the evidence in this case sustains the conclusion reached by the court, even if the discretion vested in the trial court to determine that question could be controlled by this court (as to which we express no opinion), except in a case where there had been a clear abuse of the discretion vested in the court.

[3] It is also assigned as error that the water power condemned was much greater than was necessary for the purposes of the town.

Conceding that the property condemned will furnish more power than the town needs now, or will need for years to come, it does not appear that less than the whole could have been condemned; and the evidence tends to show that if there was any taking at all the whole property must be condemned.

[4] The remaining assignment of error to be considered is that the trial court "held, contrary to the preponderance of evidence, that $475 was a fair compensation" for the property taken.

Conceding that the evidence taken by the commissioners was before the court when it passed upon the exceptions to their report (though this is denied by the defendant in error), this court could not disturb the finding of the commissioners. That evidence is conflicting, and there is nothing to show that the damages allowed, if inadequate at all, are so inadequate as to show prejudice or corruption, and without this the settled rule of this court, and of courts generally, is not to disturb the finding of the commissioners. See Barnes v. Tidewater Ry. Co., 107 Va. 263, 266, 267, 58 S. E. 594, and cases cited.

Upon the case presented by the record, we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BUCKEYE NAT. BANK OF FINDLAY, OHIO, v. HUFF & COOK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 9, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 58*)—TRANSFER OF BILL OF LADING—CREDITORS OF SHIPPER—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO ATTACHMENT.

Where a bank takes by indorsement a bill of lading and pays the draft of the shipper for value of the goods, no attachable interest remains in the shipper.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 235*)—DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

A drawer of a draft with bill of lading attached cannot prejudice the rights of his assignee by subsequent admission or conduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 873-875; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES NOT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

In an action by a bank for damages resulting from attachment by defendant of grain, title to which had passed to the bank from the attachment defendant, it was error to submit an issue as to whether the transfer of the bill of lading to the bank was a mere colorable transaction, where there was no evidence of lack of good faith on the bank's part.

4. ATTACHMENT (§ 374*)—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden was on defendants to prove fraud in the transfer of the bill of lading.

5. ATTACHMENT (§ 375*)—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

If defendants wrongfully attached an entire car load of oats as belonging to a firm, whereas the property had passed to plaintiff bank as bona fide assignee of the bill of lading covering the shipment, they are liable to the bank for at least the amount of the draft to which the bill of lading was attached, and not merely for the amount of the oats actually sold under the attachment.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Roanoke.

Action by the Buckeye National Bank of Findlay, Ohio, against Huff & Cook. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William S. Snook, for appellant. Hall & Woods, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. It appears that at the time of the transaction out of which this litigation arose, and prior thereto, W. E. Loomis and T. C. Linger were partners in the business of buying, selling, and shipping hay and grain at Wellsboro, Ind., under the firm name of the Ohio Hay & Grain Company. T. C. Linger was also a member of a firm composed of himself and his father, P. F. Linger, engaged in the same business at Findlay, Ohio, doing business under the same firm name—Ohio Hay & Grain Company—T. C. Linger being the manager of the business at Findlay. For convenience these two firms will, in the statement of facts, be spoken of respectively as the "Wellsboro firm" and the "Findlay firm."

On or about September 11, 1908, the Wellsboro firm shipped, for account of the Findlay firm, a car load of oats in a Baltimore & Ohio Railroad car to Cambill & Davis, of Roanoke, Va., to whom the same had been sold by A. W. Howard, a merchandise broker at Roanoke. The car contained 1,675½ bushels of oats, and the Wellsboro firm attached a bill of lading to a draft on the Findlay firm for the purchase price of the oats, which draft was taken up by the drawees at Findlay, Ohio, and a new draft for the $820.75 was drawn by that firm on said Gambill & Davis at Roanoke, Va., to which was attached the original bill of lading. On September 14, 1908, this new draft, with bill of lading attached, was presented by the Findlay firm to the Buckeye National Bank of Findlay, Ohio, and, upon the bill of lading being assigned by the Findlay firm to the bank, the amount of the draft was placed in full to the credit of said firm, and by the firm later checked against. The bank sent the draft forward on September 18, 1908, to a bank at Roanoke, Va., for collection, and on the 23d day of the same month the Findlay firm advised the freight agent of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company at Roanoke of the shipment of the said oats, and requested the delivery of the oats to Gambill & Davis upon presentation of a bill of lading, or in the event of the arrival of the car before the bill of lading, upon a certified check being deposited with the railway company for the amount of the draft.

Upon the arrival of the car load of oats at Roanoke, about the 25th of September, 1908, the delivering railroad (Norfolk & Western) placed it on the delivery track of Gambill & Davis, and on October 1, 1908, the firm of Huff & Cook, of Roanoke, who claimed to have an account due them from the Findlay firm, amounting to $75, sued out before a justice of the peace for the city of Roanoke an attachment against the Findlay firm (Ohio Hay & Grain Company of Findlay, Ohio), under which attachment a constable, in whose hands the attachment was placed, levied the same upon said car load of oats and made a return of the attachment to the corporation court of the city of Roanoke, showing that the car load of oats then upon the delivery track of Gambill & Davis had been attached by him, and service thereof made only upon the Norfolk & Western Railway Company.

On the return day of the attachment—October 15, 1908—the corporation court entered its judgment thereon in favor of Huff & Cook for $75, and directed the constable, upon the bond required by law being given by Huff & Cook, to proceed to sell so much of the car load of oats in the hands of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company as would be sufficient to satisfy the debt of Huff & Cook, with interest thereon, the costs of the attachment proceedings, the costs of keeping the property, and the costs of sale. On November 11, 1908, the constable proceeded to sell 480½ bushels of the oats at 50 cents per bushel, amounting to $240.25, and the proceeds of the sale were disbursed by the payment to Huff & Cook of $91.20, being the amount of their alleged debt, interest, and costs; to the Norfolk & Western Railway Company $133.29 for freight and demurrage charges on the car; and by the payment of $15.72, the amount of court costs and the constable's fees. The Norfolk & Western Railway Company then, desiring to unload the car and get the use of its equipment, stored the balance of the oats in the warehouse of Huff & Cook, having failed to get storage room for them elsewhere. Upon the oats being stored, the railway company took from Huff & Cook the usual bond in such cases, and subsequently gave an order on Huff & Cook for the oats, and they were sold at public auction; but what disposition was made of the proceeds does not appear in the record.

In June, 1910, this action of trespass on the case was instituted by the Buckeye National Bank against Huff & Cook, the declaration filed setting forth the facts above mentioned, and alleging that it had been damaged by reason thereof in the sum of $1,000. Later an amended declaration was filed, setting out more in detail the grounds upon which the plaintiff relied for the recovery against the defendants sought, and upon a trial of the cause on the issues joined therein a verdict was rendered by the jury for the plaintiff in the sum of $215.96, with interest on $185.96, part thereof, from November 11, 1908, until paid, upon which verdict the trial court entered judgment, and the plaintiff brings error.

The grounds upon which this court is asked to review and reverse said judgment are: First, because of the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions asked by the plaintiff; second, because two other instructions for the defendant were given by the court over the objection of the plaintiff; and, third, because the damages awarded by the jury were inadequate.

The trial court, in giving plaintiff's instructions 1, 2, and 5, recognized the well-settled principles of law sanctioned in the case of Greensburg Nat. Bank v. Syer & Co., 113 Va. —, 73 S. E. 438, and in fact those principles are not controverted by the defendants in this case; so that the question for our determination, arising upon the rulings of the trial court in refusing plaintiff's instructions Nos. 6 to 11, inclusive, and in giving defendants' instructions numbered 3 and 4, is as to the effect of the levy of the attachment upon that portion of the car load of oats which was not sold in the attachment proceedings.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the defendants, Huff & Cook, by suing out the attachment and having the same levied on the car load of oats, serving a copy thereof only on the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, wrongfully converted the entire car load of oats to their use, and took them from the possession and control of the plaintiff, and that by reason of this wrongful action the defendants became liable to the plaintiff for the value of the entire car load of oats, or for at least the amount of the draft which was drawn upon its value and credited to the drawers of the draft as cash, viz., $820.25, notwithstanding the fact that only a portion of the oats were sold in the attachment proceedings. On the other hand, the defendants, though practically conceding that the plaintiff had not only title to the draft in question, but by the indorsement of the bill of lading acquired title also to the car load of oats, for the value of which the draft was drawn, contend that they are liable only in this action to the extent of the value of the oats actually sold in the attachment proceedings instituted by them; in other words, the defendants do not controvert the proposition that if the entire car load of oats had been sold in their attachment proceedings and the proceeds thereof, after paying their alleged debt against the Ohio Hay & Grain Co. of Findlay, Ohio, and the costs incurred, had not been turned over to the plaintiff bank, its theory as to the measure of recovery in this action, would be correct.

In the view we take of the case, the error assigned with respect to the court's ruling refusing to give as asked plaintiff's instructions 6 to 11, inclusive, need not be specially considered.

[1] The principle of law controlling in this case is analogous to that applied in a long line of decisions with respect to warehouse receipts issued for property stored in a warehouse, viz.: "The indorsement and transfer to a bona fide holder for value of a warehouse receipt for goods to be delivered upon the order of the depositor, or upon surrender of the receipt, operates to transfer to the holder the legal title to such goods and the possession thereof as effectually as if there were a physical delivery of the goods to a purchaser." Millhiser Mfg. Co. v. Gallego Mills Co., 101 Va. 579, 44 S. E. 760, and authorities cited. And where a bank takes by indorsement a bill of lading and pays the draft of the shipper for value of the goods, no attachable interest remains in the shipper. Walsh Bowles & Co. v. National Bank, 228 Ill. 446, 81 N. E. 1067.

[2] It is equally as well settled that, after the drawer of a draft has parted with the title thereto to his bank, no subsequent admission or conduct of his can prejudice the bank's rights. Greensburg Nat. Bank v. Syer & Co., supra; Cent. Dig. §§ 873-875.

[3, 4] There was some evidence offered in this case going to show that the plaintiff, as well as T. C. Linger, had notice of the attachment of the car of oats by the defendants upon its arrival at Roanoke, and that Linger conducted a correspondence having in view a sale of the balance of the oats after a sufficient portion of them had been sold in the attachment proceedings to satisfy the debt asserted therein, costs, etc.; but it is conclusively shown in the evidence that these efforts on the part of Linger were not made as the agent of the bank, but by reason of the fact that his firm was the indorser of the draft cashed by the bank and would have to make good the amount paid for the draft in the event it was not collected of the drawees.

Upon this state of the evidence it was error to give defendants' instruction No. 3, telling the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the transfer of the draft and bill of lading in question to the bank was a mere colorable transaction, and that it was mutually understood between the bank and the drawers of the draft that the property and money arising from the sale of the property was still the property of the drawers of the draft, or that the purpose of the transaction was to prevent creditors of the Ohio Hay & Grain Company, including the defendants, from taking legal steps to make their debts out of the property, and that the plaintiff was aware of such purpose, then the alleged transfer was void as to the defendants' debt, and the jury should find for the defendants. A finding by the jury for the defendants, under instruction No. 3, could only have been founded upon conjecture or suspicion, for there is no evidence whatever of knowledge on the part of the plaintiff of the fraudulent purpose suggested in the instruction. The burden was upon the defendants to prove fraud, if any, in the transaction by which the plaintiff bank acquired title to the draft in question, and no such proof is adduced. It will not do to say, in these circumstances, that the giving of instruction No. 3 was harmless error.

[5] There was some correspondence between T. C. Linger and certain parties in Roanoke, Va., about disposing of the balance of the car load of oats remaining after a part thereof had been sold under the attachment; but the uncontradicted statement of the cashier of the plaintiff bank, when examined as a witness in this cause, is to the effect that whatever Linger did or endeavored to do with respect to the balance of the oats was without any authority from the bank, and was done because he (Linger) was the indorser of the draft and would have to make good to the bank in the event it was unable to collect from the drawees.

Yet the court, by defendants' instruction No. 4, told the jury that, "if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff bank was the bona fide owner of the draft in question, then they should find a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $185.96, with interest, etc., and $1 per day for storage on the oats," etc.; in other words, that if the jury believed the plaintiff bank to be the bona fide owner of the draft, the measure of the damages which it could recover in this action was the value of the oats sold in the attachment proceedings and the costs incident to the sale.

It is very true that there was an addendum to the instruction setting forth that the amount named therein, $185.96, was the correct amount due under the theory of the case adopted by the court in the other instructions, to the effect that defendants were liable for the oats sold under the attachment with damages for the detention of the residue; but this concession on the part of the plaintiff was evidently intended only to facilitate the trial and could not rightly be construed as a waiver of the plaintiff's right to make proper objections to "the theory of the case adopted by the court." In fact, the bill of exceptions so states.

The court had, by the three instructions—1, 2, and 5—given for the plaintiff, correctly told the jury that when a bill of lading is transferred to a bank, and the bank discounts the draft attached to the bill of lading, the bank becomes the owner of the goods covered by the bill of lading until the draft is paid, and this is true although the transaction be not to give the permanent ownership, but to furnish security for advances of money or discounted commercial paper upon faith of it; that the law presumes that the transfer of a bill of lading, with draft attached, is for valuable consideration, and the burden of proof that such was not the case devolves upon the defendant; and that the Ohio Hay & Grain Company being indorser of the bill of lading in question, and ultimately liable to the plaintiff bank for the payment of the draft, had a right to do what was reasonably necessary to protect the property covered by the bill of lading and preserve its value. If therefore the jury found that the plaintiff bank was the bona fide owner of the draft and, by assignment, the bill of lading attached thereto, the attachment of the entire car load of oats by the defendants was plainly illegal, and they thereby became answerable in damages to the plaintiff for at least the amount of the draft which was drawn upon the value of the property covered by the bill of lading, and the court was not justified in limiting the assessment of the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover to practically one-fourth of the value of the shipment.

"One is liable in an action of trespass for causing an attachment against a debtor to be levied on a consignment of goods in the custody of a common carrier, the title to which was in a third person to whom the bill of lading covering the shipment had previously been duly assigned by such shipper." Farmers', etc., Bank v. Allen-Holmes & Co., 122 Ga. 87, 49 S. E. 816.

In that case the levy of an attachment was upon a shipment of corn under similar conditions obtaining when the levy of the attachment complained of in this case was made at the instance of the defendants, and in its opinion the court said: "This unlawful invasion of the plaintiff's right gave it a cause of action, and if, as alleged, the property was wholly lost by reason of the illegal levy and sale, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover at least the actual value of the corn. This was alleged to be the price which the defendant agreed to pay Heile & Sons on delivery at destination."

The question in this class of cases is not whether the plaintiff was divested of all or part of his property, but whether the wrongful seizure thereof amounted to a conversion of the property. Where such is the case, the owner of the property has several remedies, among which are an action for damages resulting from the wrongful seizure, and the action of trover, in each of which actions the measure of recovery would be practically the same, viz., the value of the property converted with interest, etc.

"Where the conversion has taken place, the owner is not bound to receive back the property if tendered, either before or after suit, and if he does take it back this does not bar his suit, but goes in mitigation of damages. Where the conversion is complete, the injury suffered, of course, is the value of what is converted." 2 Cooley on Torts, p. 878. See, also, note to same authority, p. 879.

"A plaintiff in execution procuring a levy to be made on a stranger's goods is guilty of conversion, whether he takes possession or not. Conversion is any wrongful exercise or assumption of authority, personally or by procurement, over another's goods, depriving him of their possession." Hale v. Ames, 2 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 143, 15 Am. Dec. 150; St. George v. O'Connell, 110 Mass. 475; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 691 et seq.

In McPheters v. Page, 83 Me. 234, 22 Atl. 101, 23 Am. St. Rep. 772, the opinion says: "Any act of dominion wrongfully exerted over property in denial of the owner's right, or inconsistent with it, amounts to a conversion."

In the case in judgment, the defendants procured the levy of an attachment on the entire car load of oats, removed and sold a part and abandoned the residue, thereby not only interfering with, but wrongfully depriving the plaintiff bank of the possession of the property, and prevented a consummation of its sale and delivery to purchasers and consignees thereof.

The contentions of defendants: First, that their acts were not wrongful and did not amount in law to a conversion of the property attached; and, second, that because certain parties other than the plaintiff bank, i. e., T. C. Linger and A. W. Howard, and Poindexter & Hopwood at Linger's instance, made efforts to sell the residue of the oats, the bank is to be held as unqualifiedly recognizing its ownership of the residue of the oats, and therefore responsible for whatever loss has resulted from delay in disposing of the oats, or from the manner in which they were disposed of—are wholly without merit.

"After the drawer of a draft has parted with the title thereto to his bank, no subsequent admissions of his can prejudice the bank's right." Greensburg Nat. Bank v. Syer & Co., supra.

The instructions asked by the plaintiff at the trial, Nos. 6 to 11, inclusive, which were refused, as well as instructions Nos. 1, 2, and 5 given, expounded the law applicable to the facts which the evidence tended to prove, and in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, therefore, the court erred in refusing instructions Nos. 6 to 11, inclusive.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the corporation court of the city of Roanoke is reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Bristol.

Bill by W. H. Buchanan, executor, and others, against Elizabeth A. Miller and others. From the decree, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

White, Penn & Penn, for appellants. B. F. Buchanan and John P. Buchanan, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. This suit involves a construction of the last will and testament of Nancy H. Buchanan. The learned judge of the corporation court of the city of Bristol, to whose docket the cause was transferred from the circuit court of Smyth county, has filed as part of the record a written opinion, which so fully and clearly discusses the law and facts, and so satisfactorily presents the views entertained by this court as to the proper construction of the will in question, that we cannot do better than adopt the same as an entirely sufficient disposition of the present controversy:

"On the 22d day of July, 1908, Mrs. Nancy H. Buchanan made her will, in which she directed the disposition of all her real and personal estate. The provisions of the will affecting the personality are as follows:

"6. I devise and bequeath to James C. and Thomas W. Buchanan the balance due me, as shown by settlement made between us by F. Grundy Buchanan, and stated in an account book in my possession.

"7. I give and devise to Rees H. Buchanan all the notes and debts due by him to Thomas W. Buchanan and which have recently been assigned to me by said Thomas W. Buchanan.

"8. All the rest and residue of my said estate, which I shall not dispose of by gift, during my life, and I expect to dispose of most of my household furniture in this way, I direct shall be taken into custody by my executor and out of same shall pay first to Thomas Raymond Buchanan and Nancy Buchanan, children of Thos. W. Buchanan, five hundred dollars each, and the balance shall go equally to all my nephews and nieces, share and share alike."

"On the 12th day of August, 1909, Mrs. Buchanan executed the following codicil:

"I, Nancy Buchanan, on this the 12th day of August, 1909, do hereby direct that my administrator appointed in my will, made about one year ago, make the following disposition of my personal property, not disposed of by my will above mentioned, and my household effects as follows:

"1. I direct that any and all money and notes that I may have at my death, and also my household property, be turned over to my nephew, W. B. Clark, to whom I give the same forever, except the following items, which I direct him and my administrator to convey to the following persons:

"1 bureau to my niece, Nannie B. Clark; 1 sideboard with glass top to W. H. Buchanan; 1 yellow pitcher and one bureau to J. D. Buchanan; one candle stand and large dish to B. F. Buchanan.

"Remembering a promise made when R. W. Buchanan was born, and who was named for my father, I direct that the sum of fifty dollars be given him for the colt I promised to give him.

"Witness my name and signature this the 12 day of Aug., 1909.

"[Signed] Nancy H. Buchanan."

"We, the undersigned, have in the presence of the testator, Nancy H. Buchanan, on this day, Aug. 12, 1909, witnessed the above signature, which she has declared to us to be the disposition of her personal and household property.

"[Signed] J. B. Bittinger,

"Mary E. Painter."

"It appears, from an agreement of facts filed with the record, that when the codicil was written the testatrix did not have before her the original will, and that the money, notes, household, and other property referred to in the codicil were worth at least $10,000, and constituted the whole of the personal property of the testatrix.

[1] "The executor brought this suit for a construction of the will as affected by the codicil, and the real contest in the case arises between the nephews and nieces, mentioned in the residuary clause, and W. B. Clark, the chief beneficiary named in the codicil. This contest raises a question of construction of more than ordinary interest, and the respective claims of these contestants have been presented with marked force and clearness by counsel, both orally and in the briefs. If, however, we bear in mind that the object of the interpretation of a will is to arrive, if possible, at the intention of the maker, and that technical rules of construction must always be treated as subservient and subordinate to this object, I do not think the question here presented will be found very difficult of solution.

[2, 3] "Under the will as originally written, the specific personal estate mentioned in clauses 6 and 7 would have gone to James C. and Thomas W. Buchanan, and to Rees H. Buchanan, respectively. Then, under clause 8, $500 each would have first been paid to Thomas Raymond Buchanan and Nancy Buchanan, and the residue of the personalty would have gone to all the nephews and nieces, share and share alike. The residuum thus to be divided would have consisted, as appears from the agreed facts, of money, notes, and household property—the same estate which is enumerated and the disposition of which is directed in the codicil. There is no room to doubt that Mrs. Buchanan intended to give this estate to her nephews and nieces when the will was written; but it is equally free from doubt that she intended to give it to W. B. Clark when the codicil was written. The language, 'I direct that any and all money and notes that I may have at my death, and also my household property, be turned over to my nephew, W. B. Clark, to whom I give the same forever,' is emphatic and significant. These words, when taken with the exceptions mentioned in the codicil, clearly indicate that the testatrix intended to give to W. B. Clark a very substantial interest in the personal estate. This, I think, in view of the admitted value and character of the personal estate, is the first and natural impression to be obtained from a reading of the will and codicil, and this impression is intensified on closer consideration. The clear result is an irreconcilable conflict between the residuary clause and the codicil, and the provisions of the codicil must prevail. 3 Min. Inst. 549; Bosley v. Bosley, 14 How. 390, 14 L. Ed. 468; Gordon v. Whitlock, 92 Va. 729, 24 S. E. 342.

"Nor do I think the conclusion here reached is affected by the words, 'not disposed of in my will,' which appear in the introduction to the codicil. The two instruments must be read and construed together in their entirety, and so as to give effect, as far as possible, to both. 'Ut res magis valeat quam pereat.' 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) p. 1057; 30 A. & E. Enc. 663-665.

"The words above quoted from the codicil, taken literally, sustain the contention of the residuary legatees, for the will undoubtedly disposed of the very same property which W. B. Clark now claims under the codicil; but this literal interpretation leads to results which cannot be reconciled with the apparent intent of the testatrix. It leads, also, to the entire nullification of the codicil. Both of these results are at variance with elementary rules of construction.

[4] "'As a general thing, a codicil will be construed as operative upon some portion of the estate, even where its terms, literally interpreted, would be found to have no operation; but, as we have before said, the codicil will be construed as being consistent with the will, where the discrepancy claimed is not obviously intended by the testator.' 1 Redfield on Wills, p. 360.

"Applying the rule quoted from Redfield above, which is abundantly supported by the authorities, and which seems to me to embody in succinct form the rules of construction applicable to this case, I am of opinion that, under a correct interpretation of this will and codicil, the executor should follow in his administration of the estate the directions in clauses 6 and 7 of the will, should next pay to Thomas Raymond Buchanan and Nancy Buchanan $500 each, and then, after disposing of the specific articles of household use mentioned in the exceptions in the codicil, and paying to R. W. Buchanan the sum of $50 as therein directed, he should account to W. B. Clark for the balance of any notes and money and household property belonging to the testatrix at her death. In other words, the codicil should be construed so as not to interfere with any specific bequests and directions of the testatrix mentioned in the will, but should only affect the general residuum. This construction avoids, on the one hand, a too literal interpretation of the words, 'not disposed of by my will,' which, as we have seen, would lead to a wholly inconsistent conclusion, and one that varies with the manifest general intent of the testatrix at the time the codicil was written. It would also, on the other hand, give effect to the specific bequests and directions in the will, which are always to be favored as against the taker of the residue. Waring v. Bosher, 91 Va. 291, 21 S. E. 464.

"I do not overlook the rule of construction, which is earnestly invoked on behalf of the residuary legatees under the original will, 'that a clear gift is not to be cut down by any subsequent provision, unless the latter is equally clear,' and that, where a gift has been clearly made in a will, the provision making the gift will not be revoked by a codicil, where there is any doubt as to the intention to revoke it. The case at bar, I think, does not fall within the influence of this rule, but is governed by the converse of it. The rule does not apply far enough to cover the specific bequests in the sixth, seventh, and eighth clauses, because the language of the codicil is not sufficient to clearly give to W. B. Clark, as the residuary general legatee, the personal estate previously directed in the will to be applied to these specific bequests (Waring v. Bosher, supra); and by giving effect to these specific bequests in the will we have something for the words, 'not disposed of,' to operate upon, and we also give some effect to the codicil. But as to the general residuum, while there was a manifest general intent on the part of the testatrix, at the time of making the original will, to give it to the nephews and nieces, there was also, at the time of the making of the codicil, an equally manifest general intent to give it to W. B. Clark. There is no way by which to reconcile these two general intents, and the later one, therefore, must prevail. Dawson v. Dawson, 37 Va. 635, and authorities cited supra.

"I have purposely omitted up to this point any reference to the case of Earl of Hardwicke v. Douglas, 7 Clark & Finnelly, 795, in which the majority opinion supports the construction which I have adopted in the case at bar. It is only the decision to which I have been referred, and the only one which I have found, dealing directly with a conflict similar to the one involved here between the will and the codicil. It is not necessary to rest the decision in this case upon the authority of the decision just mentioned, but I think it nevertheless is strong authority for the conclusion here reached. Counsel for the residuary legatees under the original will seeks to distinguish the decision in question from the case at bar, for the reason that the testator in the former case, unlike the testatrix in the latter, had the original will before him at the time the codicil was prepared. This distinction is worthy of consideration; but I do not think it is entitled to as much weight as is claimed for it by counsel. The agreed facts show that the estate mentioned in the codicil was very valuable. The will had been written only about a year before the codicil was prepared. It hardly seems reasonable to conclude that the testatrix would have forgotten in so short a time the disposition previously made of so large a personal estate.

"The agreement of facts is not entirely clear as to the value of this estate. It might be construed to refer to the value of the entire personal estate, including the specific bequests. Inasmuch, however, as counsel for the nephews and nieces stated in argument that the purpose of fixing the value was to show the jurisdictional amount necessary on appeal, I assume that the third paragraph in the agreement refers to the general residuum. But in any event, regardless of the question of value, the fact that the testatrix enumerates in the codicil the same property which she had formerly directed to be differently applied raises, as we have already seen, a plain and irreconcilable conflict between the codicil and the residuary clause in the will. In the face of this conflict, there is no other legal course open than to give the general residuum of the estate to W. B. Clark."

The decree complained of, which carries into effect the conclusion reached in the foregoing opinion, must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

COLONIAL COAL & COKE CO. v. GASS.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 185*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—EFFECT OF RULE.

A rule of a coal mining company requiring miners to examine the condition of their working places and to report any unsafe condition, ceasing work until the place is made safe, merely requires each employé to take precautions for his own safety, and does not constitute one miner a vice principal, as affecting liability for death of a fellow miner caused by slate falling from the roof of the mine room.

2. DEATH (§ 86*)—WRONGFUL DEATH—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

In an action by a mother for negligent death of her 18 year old son, she is entitled to recover the amount of his probable earnings during what would have probably been his lifetime, and not merely during her probable lifetime, though, having a husband, she was not dependent upon her son for support.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 112-114, 119; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by Pearl Gass, administratrix, against Colonial Coal & Coke Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Vicary & Peery and Bullitt & Chalkley, for plaintiff in error. William H. Werth and E. M. & H. E. Fulton, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. Paul Burnett, the plaintiff's intestate, a boy 18 years of age, was killed in the coal mine of the defendant company by a fall of slate from the roof of room No. 36, while engaged in the discharge of his duties as a mule driver. His death is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company, and this suit was brought to recover the damages resulting from such negligent killing. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, which is brought under review by the present writ of error awarded the defendant company.

[1] The plaintiff's third instruction, which is objected to, tells the jury that, "if they believe from the evidence that the defendant put upon Eugene Austin and Roy Shoemaker the duty of exercising ordinary care in providing and maintaining a reasonably safe roof at the place in question, then said Austin and Shoemaker were not fellow servants of Paul Burnett, with reference to this duty, but were the representatives of the defendant as to that duty, and the failure of either of them in the performance of this duty (if such failure there was) would be the personal failure of the defendant itself."

The record shows that Eugene Austin and Paul Shoemaker were ordinary laborers in the defendant's mine; the former operating a machine for cutting the coal, and the latter a coal digger. Independent of the company's rule No. 13, which is relied on by the plaintiff, there is no evidence tending to show that either of these parties was a vice principal of the defendant company.

Rule No. 13 is relied on as showing that it was Austin's duty to look after the roof at the place of the accident. So far as the rule concerns the roof of the mine, or imposes any duty upon Austin, it provides that the machine man "shall also examine the condition of his working place, and, if found unsafe, report the same to the mine boss, and cease work at such place until the same is made safe." This language does not, and was manifestly not intended to, impose upon Austin the duty of providing and maintaining a reasonably safe roof. The whole duty put upon him was to examine the roof when he went to work thereunder, and, if found unsafe, to report the same to the mine boss and cease work until the same was made safe. In other words, so far as reporting a defect was concerned, or staying out of the place until the defect was cured, he was under no higher or further duty than any other employé would have been to report any discovered defect in the roof. Rule 13, so far as applicable to machine operators, meant that they should look out for the purpose of securing their own safety and guarding the machine against danger. It did not mean that they should be charged with the duty of discovering and remedying defects which might result in injury to others. This duty of inspection and having defects remedied rested upon the mine boss, who was the vice principal of the company. It is unquestionably to the interest of all engaged in the dangerous work of mining coal that the company should make it the duty of as many persons as possible to look out for defects and dangers and report the same to the mine boss as soon as discovered. It would, however, place upon the company a burden it could not well bear to hold that every miner was a vice principal of the company, whose duty it was to keep a lookout for defects and report them, when discovered, to the mine boss. The miner, who, for his own protection, is charged with the duty of looking out for defects and reporting them, is not the vice principal of the company, but is a fellow servant of all other employés.

We are of opinion that the instruction under consideration, being without evidence to support it, was erroneous, and should have been rejected.

Instruction No. 4, given for the plaintiff, is subject to the same objection that was urged to No. 3. It tells the jury that it was the duty of Austin and Shoemaker, as well as Draughn, the mine boss, to look after and discover defects in the roof, as mentioned in instruction No. 3, and that, if they failed in the performance of such duty the company was liable. For the reasons already given, this instruction should also have been refused.

Objection is taken to the action of the court in refusing to give for the defendant the following instruction: "The court further instructs the jury that under the rules of the defendant company, which were read in evidence to the jury, with reference to the duties of coal diggers and machine men, in looking after and making safe the roof of the mine in their respective working places. the intent and meaning of the said rules was that said machine men and said coal diggers should look after the roof of the mine in their said places, and make the same safe in so far as it was necessary to protect themselves, respectively, from danger, but that the rules of the company, read in evidence as aforesaid, were not intended to mean, and did not mean, that the said machine men and coal diggers should be charged with the duty of making their respective working places safe for others to work in; that so far as other persons were concerned, that is, persons other than the said machine men and coal diggers, the duty rested upon the mine boss to use ordinary care to see that the said places were safe, and if the company, through its mine boss, did use ordinary care to see that the roof which caused the accident in this case was safe, then the company cannot be held liable for any negligence on the part of the said machine men, or coal diggers, if such there was, in failing to use ordinary care to see that such place was safe."

This instruction should have been given. It is supported by the evidence, properly interprets the rules of the company, and correctly states the law applicable to this phase of the case. Falling slate from the roof is one of the greatest dangers in mining, and one which requires constant watchfulness and care to guard against. The working place of the miner is constantly changing as he drives into the face of the coal, and what may be entirely safe at one hour may not be the next. Hence the rules of the company properly provide that not only the mine boss, its vice principal, shall make regular inspections, but that the machine cutter shall, as he proceeds with his work, for the protection of himself and the machine, look after the condition of the roof, and also that the miner should look after the roof in his own working place, and do what at the time might appear necessary to protect himself, or, if he were unable to remedy any defect he might discover, to go out of the mine and report the trouble to the mine boss, and remain out until the defect was repaired. These rules were never intended to make each miner the alter ego of the company. The law of self-preservation would demand of the miner as much care for himself as is required of him by the rules in question.

[2] The action of the court in giving for the plaintiff instruction No. 7, on the measure of damages, is assigned as error. Two objections are urged to this instruction: (1) That it allows the plaintiff to recover as damages the probable earnings of the intestate during what would have been his probable lifetime, whereas it is contended that the court should have limited the recovery to the probable lifetime of the beneficiary, who was the decedent's mother; and (2) that the mother, having a husband, had no right to recover on account of the wages her son might have earned during his lifetime.

In support of these propositions numerous authorities from other jurisdictions are cited; but, whatever may be the law in other states, it has long been settled by the decisions of this court that both contentions are untenable. B. & O. R. Co. v. Wightman, 70 Va. 431, 26 Am. Rep. 384; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Phillips, 100 Va. 362, 41 S. E. 726; Pocahontas C. Co. v. Rukas, 104 Va. 278, 51 S. E. 449.

In Wightman's Case, supra, it is said that "under the Virginia statute the damages, it is true, are given first to the husband or wife, parent or child; but, if neither of these is alive, the action then may be maintained and the damages will be assets to be disposed of according to law. In this respect the Virginia statute differs from that of all the other states."

In other words, the recovery with us is for the wrongful death, and not merely because there are dependent relatives, and therefore the right of recovery is not affected by the absence of relatives, or by the fact that surviving beneficiaries are wealthy or poor.

In Wightman's Case, in discussing the elements of damage recoverable, Judge Staples says they may be ascertained, first, "by fixing the same at such sum as would be equal to the probable earnings of the deceased, taking into consideration the age, business capacity, experience, and habits, health, energy, and perseverance, of the deceased during what would probably have been his lifetime, if he had not been killed."

The instruction under consideration appears to be practically a reproduction of instruction No. 3 in the Rukas Case, supra, which provides that the damages should be fixed at such sum as would be equal to the probable earnings of the deceased during what would probably have been his lifetime, had he not been killed, and no mention is made of the lifetime of the surviving beneficiary. That instruction was excepted to, and the giving of it assigned as error. In disposing of the exception this court says: "With regard to the instruction as to what constitute proper elements of damage in this class of cases, it is conceded that the instruction conforms to the decisions of this court; but a different rule is invoked as being, it is alleged, more in harmony with the weight of authority in other states. It is sufficient to say that this court has recently had occasion to consider that question, and no sufficient reason is perceived to justify a departure from our own precedents."

We do not deem it necessary to prolong this opinion with a detailed discussion of the remaining assignments of error. It is sufficient to say that each of them has received due consideration, and that no error is thereby disclosed prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

For the errors herein pointed out, the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Reversed.

KEYS PLANING MILL CO. v. KIRKBRIDE.

1. EQUITY (§§ 119, 392*)—CROSS-ACTION—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN.

A general contractor, made a party to a suit by a subcontractor to enforce a lien, and duly served with summons, is bound by a decree against him; but where he was not served with summons to answer a petition filed by another subcontractor to enforce his lien on the balance due from the owner, he is not bound by the decree against him, and is entitled to file a petition for rehearing, as authorized by Code 1904, § 3233.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 222*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—JURISDICTION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where a subcontractor filing a petition in a suit by another subcontractor to enforce a lien, and obtaining a decree without service of summons on the general contractor to answer, did not raise any question in the trial court as to the jurisdiction of the court to permit the general contractor to file a petition for rehearing under Code 1904, § 3233, but sought to set up facts by answer which would avoid the claim relied on by the general contractor in his petition for a rehearing, and all the defenses that the subcontractor professed he could make were made, and nothing remained to be done except to enter a decree, the subcontractor could not raise, on appeal, any question as to the jurisdiction of the trial court.

3. EQUITY (§ 249*)—PLEADING—EXCEPTIONS—EFFECT.

An exception to the sufficiency of an answer in a suit in equity is equivalent to an averment that the answer, if true, constitutes no defense.

4. EQUITY (§ 392*)—ELECTION OF REMEDIES (§ 6*)—ENFORCEMENT—RIGHT OF GENERAL CONTRACTOR TO REHEARING.

A general contractor, made a party to a suit by a subcontractor to enforce a lien, was not served with summons to answer a third person's petition in the suit to enforce his lien. The court entered a decree enforcing the liens. The general contractor conveyed real estate to the third person; but the deed did not set out the real consideration therefor. The third person, through his manager, executed, pursuant to a settlement, a release of an indebtedness specified due from the general contractor. The manager had no personal knowledge of the terms of the settlement. Held, that the release did not, as a matter of law, constitute a release of the decree obtained by the third person; and the court must require the contractor to elect whether he would prosecute his action at law against the third person for the recovery of money paid pursuant to the decree, or prosecute his right to the money in a proceeding for a rehearing of the cause, as authorized by Code 1904, § 3233; and, where the general contractor elected to prosecute by petition for rehearing, the court must determine the issues on the pleadings and proof.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Petition by T. W. Kirkbride for a rehearing of the cause of action of the Keys Planing Mill Company against him and for the recovery from the company of a sum paid by a receiver pursuant to the decree. From a decree granting the relief prayed for, the Keys Planing Mill Company appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Henry & Graham, for appellant. Henson & Bowen, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. T. W. Kirkbride, a general contractor, engaged in the construction of buildings of various designs, undertook the construction of a bank and office building in the town of Graham, Tazewell county, Va., for the Bank of Graham, a corporation, which building Kirkbride completed in February, 1908. During the progress of the work, Kirkbride employed the McClamrock Mantel Company, a corporation, to furnish certain material for and to do certain work upon the building, all of which material was furnished and the necessary work in placing the same was done by that company in accordance with its employment, and for which it was to receive from Kirkbride, on or before December 12, 1907, the sum of $308.15; but the same was not paid, and thereupon the McClamrock Mantel Company filed its mechanic's lien, pursuant to the statute in such cases made and provided, against the bank and its said building, for the purpose of securing itself for the debt owing by Kirkbride as general contractor.

To the first May rules, 1908, the McClamrock Mantel Company filed its bill in the circuit court of Tazewell county, the object of which was to subject the balance then due and owing by the bank to Kirkbride to the payment of the amount claimed to be due from Kirkbride to the complainant. Process was issued upon the bill, served on the bank, and accepted by Kirkbride on the 4th day of May, 1908. Various other creditors of Kirkbride, who had secured liens under the statute for materials furnished and work done for Kirkbride in the construction of the bank building, filed petitions in said cause, for the purpose of enforcing their respective liens upon the balance due and owing by the bank to Kirkbride, among said petitioners being the Keys Planing Mill Company, a corporation, filing its petition by leave of court in an order entered in its chancery order book May 4, 1908, and upon its petition summons was at once issued and served upon the bank, but was never served upon Kirkbride, although required by statute and ordered by the court to be served upon him.

On the 29th day of May, 1908, the McClamrock chancery cause coming on to be heard upon the bill and exhibits filed therewith, taken for confessed as to the defendants T. W. Kirkbride and the Bank of Graham, upon the petition of the Keys Planing Mill Company and others was by decree then entered referred to Commissioner J. H. Stuart to take an account and make report of the enforceable liens against the property of the bank, and also to ascertain what was due from the bank to Kirkbride, the general contractor, for the construction of the bank's building, etc., at the time of the filing of the various liens thereon.

Pursuant to this decree, and after notice of the taking of the accounts ordered, by publication, Commissioner Stuart, on August 9, 1908, made his report, showing the balance due from the bank to Kirkbride to be $1,613.60; and, among other items, he reported the debt and lien of the Keys Planing Mill Company to be $3,124.85, including interest to the date of the report, September 21, 1908. The McClamrock cause came on to be heard on the report of Commissioner Stuart, and the report was confirmed and George W. St. Clair appointed to collect and disburse the said balance due from the bank; the distribution to be made pro rata among the reported debts against Kirkbride. On October 3, 1908, Receiver St. Clair filed his report, showing that in the disbursements made by him he paid to the attorneys for the Keys Planing Mill Company the sum of $900, its pro rata share of the fund distributed; and at the November term, 1908, of the court the report of the receiver was confirmed, and the cause "ordered to be left from the docket."

It will be observed that service of summons to answer the bill filed by the McClamrock Mantel Company against Kirkbride and the Bank of Graham was accepted by Kirkbride, but that the summons to answer the petition filed by the Keys Planing Mill Company in that case, while served upon the bank, was never served upon Kirkbride, and that the notice of the taking of the account by Commissioner Stuart was by publication only.

Section 3233 of Va. Code 1904 provides: "Any unknown party, or other defendant, who was not served with process, and did not appear in the case before the date of such judgment, decree or order, or the representative of any such, may, within three years from that date, if he be not served with a copy of such judgment, decree, or order, more than a year before the said three years, and if he be so served, then within one year from the time of such service, petition to have the case reheard, and may plead or answer, and have any injustice in the proceedings corrected."

At the August term, 1910, of the circuit court of Tazewell county, Kirkbride, by leave of court, filed his petition, the object of which was to have the decrees entered upon the petition of the Keys Planing Mill Company against him in the McClamrock cause reheard, and to recover from the Keys Planing Mill Company the said sum of $900 paid to it by St. Clair, receiver, as above stated; and the Keys Planing Mill Company, by its attorneys, entered its appearance in answer to the petition, with leave to make such defense thereto as it might be advised.

There was some confusion of statement as to the style of the chancery cause in which the petition of Kirkbride was intended to be filed; but if this had been of any importance it was later made clear that the petition was intended to be filed, and was in fact filed and proceeded upon, in the cause of McClamrock Mantel Co. v. Kirkbride et al.

Kirkbride based his right to file his petition in said chancery cause upon section 3233 of the Code, supra; and the general grounds upon which he relied for a recovery of the $900 from the Keys Planing Mill Company, paid to the latter by Receiver St. Clair, were that the decrees under which the said sum of money was received by the Keys Planing Mill Company were in a proceeding upon a petition filed in the McClamrock cause, of which he had no notice, and that, prior to the date of the decree under which the Keys Planing Mill Company became entitled to recover said sum of money, and before the same was paid to it by Receiver St. Clair, he (Kirkbride) had paid off in full his indebtedness to the Keys Planing Mill Company. In other words, Kirkbride's petition sets forth that as general contractor for the construction of the building, etc., for the Bank of Graham, he became indebted to the Keys Planing Mill Company in the sum of $13,327.52, upon which sum he had paid $5,050.23, and on the 25th day of August, 1908, six days after the filing of Commissioner Stuart's report in the McClamrock cause and before decree thereon, he, by conveyance of certain lots in Norfolk county, Va., paid the Keys Planing Mill Company the full amount of the balance due from him to it, which balance included the sum of $2,993.16, decreed to the Keys Planing Mill Company upon the report of Commissioner Stuart, and upon account of which the company received from Receiver St. Clair the $900 in question; that the Keys

Planing Mill Company, after having received in full the indebtedness of the petitioner to it, with fraudulent intent to collect further and additional sums upon the said debt, did not notify its counsel, who, ignorant of the fact that said debt had been paid off in full, procured the decree allowing said debt in full, and directing its pro rata share of the fund under the control of the court to be paid to it, and actually received the same through its counsel of record.

With this petition, as Exhibit No. 1, Kirkbride vouches the following release:

"In consideration of the execution and delivery by T. W. Kirkbride and wife of a certain deed, dated August 25th, 1908, conveying to the undersigned an undivided two-thirds interest in certain twelve lots of land in Coleman Place, Tanners Creek district, Norfolk county, Virginia, the undersigned doth hereby release and cancel the indebtedness now due by the said T. W. Kirkbride to it, the said debt being for the sum of $13,327.52, upon which there is a credit of $5,050.23, and for which a decree was obtained by the undersigned in the circuit court of the county of Mercer, state of West Virginia, on Tuesday, the 26th day of May, 1908.

"Witness the following signature this 25th day of August, 1908.

"Keys Planing Mill Company,
"By C. W. Pierce, Mgr."

Pursuant to a decree entered in the cause on December 8, 1910, the Keys Planing Mill Company filed its answer to Kirkbride's petition, to which Kirkbride replied generally, but later, and after amending his petition, by leave of court, he withdrew his replication to the answer of the Keys Planing Mill Company and filed exceptions thereto in writing.

The Keys Planing Mill Company's answer admits as true many of the statements of fact contained in the petition of Kirkbride, but in effect takes the ground that, even if the release (called a "receipt") relied on by Kirkbride does apparently cover the debt due from him to respondent, and upon which the $900 was paid to respondent under decrees in the Tazewell county suit some time after the receipt was executed, it was a mistake, as the receipt was not intended to have that effect, and in fact had no reference to said litigation; that when the agent of respondent, one C. W. Pierce, who conducted the transaction by which the Norfolk county lots were taken over to respondent, and who really prepared the receipt in question, executed the same without advice of counsel he never thought about the debt of respondent involved in the proceedings in Tazewell circuit court, but only had in view a decree in Mercer county, W. Va., in favor of respondent against petitioner, Kirkbride; that said agent knew of the suit pending in Tazewell county, but his signing a receipt covering a debt already decreed to respondent in that suit was a plain mistake and wholly unintentional on his part, and that to construe this debt and decree in Tazewell county as covered by said receipts would cause respondent to lose at least $6,000 owing to it by Kirkbride; that as Kirkbride accepted process in person to answer the chancery cause of the McClamrock Mantel Company, and also accepted personally other summonses issued on some of the petitions filed in said cause, he had no right to complain that the proceedings upon the petition filed in said suit by respondent was upon publication of notice only; that Kirkbride knew all about the proceedings against him in Tazewell county and about the decree against him there, but never said anything about it at the time the receipt in question was executed, and never mentioned it to respondent until about the time he instituted an action of debt against respondent to recover the $900 received by it from Receiver St. Clair, which was but a short time before he filed his petition in this cause.

The debt asserted by the Keys Planing Mill Company against Kirkbride in the McClamrock cause pending in Tazewell circuit court was evidenced by a decree rendered in the circuit court of Mercer county, W. Va.; and the balance due on said decree is the debt reported by Commissioner Stuart as owing by Kirkbride to the Keys Planing Mill Company, as above stated.

Exceptions filed by Kirkbride to said answer were sustained; but leave was given the Keys Planing Mill Company to amend its answer at the next term of the court, and accordingly, at the May, 1911, term, the respondent filed its amended answer, reiterating the statements contained in its original answer and relying thereon, except in so far as the same were explained or modified, to which amended answer Kirkbride again filed exceptions, which were sustained by decree entered June 7, 1911; and it was thereby adjudged and ordered that Kirkbride recover of the Keys Planing Mill Company the sum of $900, with interest thereon from September 29, 1908, until paid and costs, from which decree and that entered in December, 1910, this appeal was allowed.

[1, 2] The first assignment of error presents the question whether or not the circuit court had jurisdiction to allow appellee's petition to be filed in the McClamrock cause.

We think this assignment is without merit. While appellee was a party to the McClamrock cause, and was bound by the decrees or orders entered therein which related to matters put in issue upon the bill of complaint, of which appellee is to be held as having had due notice, but, not having been served with process to answer the petition of appellant in said cause, he was not bound by the decrees against him upon said petition, and was clearly in a position to avail himself of the benefits of the provision made for parties so situated by section 3233 of the Code, supra. Not only is this true, but appellant did not raise any question in the court below as to the jurisdiction of the court to permit the filing of appellee's petition, and sought by answer to make defense against the matters and things set up in the petition upon the merits of its defense, adding the request that the matters set up in the answer be treated as if set up as grounds of demurrer to the petition. In other words, there was no defense set up against the jurisdiction of the court to receive and consider the petition, but an attempt was made to set up facts by answer which would avoid the release pleaded by the petitioner. All the defense that appellant professed it could make was made by its answer to appellee's petition; and, if the court's views as to the answer were correct, nothing remained to be done, except to decree that appellant refund the money it had improperly collected of appellee in the McClamrock cause.

The vital and controlling issue made by the petition of appellee in the McClamrock cause, the answers of appellant thereto and appellee's exceptions to the answers, is whether or not the parties, by the transaction of August 25, 1908, intended that appellee was to be released from its entire indebtedness to appellant, including the debt the latter was then asserting against the former in the McClamrock cause pending in Tazewell circuit court, or was intended as a release only of the indebtedness of appellee to appellant, other than the latter's debt being asserted in said cause.

Appellee in his petition in the McClamrock cause, among others, makes these allegations: That he was a general contractor engaged in the construction of many houses, and as such bought large quantities of building material from various manufacturers, and that he became indebted to the Keys Planing Mill Company in the sum of $13,327.16, which included the said sum of $2,993.16, being the sum that said Keys Planing Mill Company was proceeding upon against him in the circuit court of Tazewell county in the McClamrock Mantel Company case; that upon this whole sum of his indebtedness to the Keys Planing Mill Company he paid $5,050.23, and on the 25th day of August, 1908, by his conveyance of certain lots in Norfolk county, paid the Keys Planing Mill Company the balance of its said debt, which included $2,993.16 being asserted by it in the Tazewell circuit court; and that he obtained from the Keys Planing Mill Company a receipt to this effect, which is filed as part of his petition.

The original answer of appellant to the petition attempts a full history of the transaction and the circumstances under which C. W. Pierce, appellant's manager, signed the receipt in question, and then says that its answer was framed wholly from information furnished by Pierce, which information, as to the facts and circumstances under which the receipt was signed, when stated in the answer, are not materially different from the facts as stated in the petition; but it is insisted in the answer that if the receipt executed by Pierce was intended to cover the $900 decree of appellant in Tazewell county, it was a mistake, etc. The amended answer makes the statement that one T. N. Fannin, vice president of the company, alone made and concluded the transaction between the company and Kirkbride, and that when the original answer was prepared Fannin was in a distant Western state, and could not be communicated with in respect to the transaction. The amended answer states other facts and circumstances going to show that the minds of the parties never met upon the proposition that the receipt in question was to operate as a release of appellant's right to receive its pro rata share of the fund under the control of the circuit court of Tazewell county in the McClamrock cause; that after the understanding between Fannin and Kirkbride as to the terms of settlement Fannin told Pierce to close it up, and Pierce, without any further conversation with Kirkbride with reference to the terms of the settlement, signed the receipt in question, which had already been prepared by some one. It further appeared from appellant's answer that appellee, Kirkbride, had instituted and was carrying on an action at law in the circuit court of Tazewell county for the recovery of the sum of money involved in this controversy from the appellant, and the court was asked to make him elect in which forum he would proceed, which request was denied. It is further stated in the answer that there was a plain mistake made by the parties in the execution of the receipt in question; it not having been intended that the decree in favor of appellant in the McClamrock cause was to be included in the receipt, if in fact the receipt can be so construed.

The case stated by the answer of the appellant was not predicated upon the idea that parol evidence was admissible to contradict or vary the terms of the deed of appellee to appellant, conveying the Norfolk county lots, but upon the theory that the true consideration for the conveyance did not include the decree in the McClamrock cause in favor of appellant; that the so-called "release" was but a receipt, which could be explained; and that, as the conveyance of the Norfolk county lots had for its consideration one dollar "and other good and valuable consideration," either party to the transaction had the right to show the true consideration for that conveyance.

[3] "An exception to the sufficiency of an answer is tantamount to an averment that the answer, if true, constitutes no defense to the complainant's demand." In other words, if the averments of the answer are sustained by proof, they constitute no defense to the plaintiff's demand. Kelly v. Hamblen, 98 Va. 383, 36 S. E. 491.

[4] The deed conveying the Norfolk county lots did not pretend to set out the real consideration for the conveyance, and for that reason, doubtless, the receipt or release in question was prepared and signed by Pierce for the appellant company, Pierce, as appellant's answer states, having no personal knowledge as to what were the real terms of the settlement agreed on between Kirkbride and Fannin, vice president of appellant; and it does not seem to us that the receipt or release in question is sufficiently clear in its terms to have warranted the circuit court in construing it as a release, upon its face, of the money which had been decreed to appellant in the McClamrock case. Therefore we are of opinion that the circuit court should have required the appellee, first, to elect whether he would prosecute his action at law pending in that court for the recovery from appellant of the sum of money involved, or litigate his rights thereto in this chancery proceeding; and, second, if appellee elected to prosecute his alleged right to the money in this proceeding, the court should have overruled his exceptions to appellant's amended answer and allowed the case to be determined upon the pleadings and the proof adduced.

It follows that the decrees complained of on this appeal have to be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings therein not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

VIRGINIA COAL & IRON CO. v. ISONN et al.

1. EJECTMENT (§ 15*)—COMMON SOURCE OF TITLE.

Where, in ejectment, both parties claimed under a common source of title, neither party need trace his title beyond the common source, though he was not their immediate grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 59-62; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 41*)—CALLS IN DEEDS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in ejectment, the issue involved the location of a line pursuant to an ambiguous call in a deed, and the evidence failed to show any natural object or well-defined lines called for in the title papers tending to show the true location of the disputed line, but the line called for might be run in different places, a charge that, if the call in the deed could be located from the evidence, the jury must do so and uphold the deed, etc., was erroneous and misleading, necessitating the setting aside of a verdict sustainable only on the hypothesis that the evidence proved natural objects or well-defined lines called for in the deed.

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 9*)—DEEDS—CALLS.

While the call for quantity in a deed will not control where monuments or courses and distances are called for by which the land can be identified, yet where no known or established boundaries are named as describing the land, and the deed contains no other description sufficiently certain to define the land, the quantity may be used to ascertain the premises.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 508*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT WITNESSES.

A surveyor may testify as an expert on matters with which he is peculiarly acquainted; but he cannot testify as to conclusions of fact or of law.

5. WITNESSES (§ 379*)—IMPEACHMENT—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

In ejectment involving the location of a boundary line, a witness for plaintiff was properly impeached by requiring him to testify if, in a conversation with a third person, he had not stated that defendant was entitled to the property sued for.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by the Virginia Coal & Iron Company against one Isonn and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

R. A. Ayers, E. M. & E. H. Fulton, and Bulitt & Chalkley, for plaintiff in error. Vicars & Peery, for defendants in error.

BUCHANAN, J. [1] The plaintiff in error instituted its action of ejectment in the circuit court of Wise county to recover the coal and certain others minerals in and under a tract of land, the title to the surface of which and possession thereof were in the defendants in error. Both parties claim under a common source of title, and neither party was required or attempted to trace title beyond Arch Hunsucker, their common, though not immediate, grantor. The plaintiff derived its title to the mineral interest claimed by deed from Arch Hunsucker to Price and Steinman, dated December 9, 1874, by deed from Steinman to Price dated December 31, 1874, and by deed from Price to the plaintiff, dated January 1, 1908. The defendants derived their title to the interest in the land claimed by them by deed from Arch Hunsucker to John M. Robinett, dated November 12, 1878, and by deed from Robinett to John F. Isonn, dated February 19, 1886.

It is conceded by the defendants in error, in the brief of their counsel, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the coal and other minerals sued for in and on the land embraced in the deed of John Hunsucker to Archibald Hunsucker. There is no difficulty in identifying the boundary lines of the tract of land described by that deed, and which are indicated upon a rough diagram below, beginning at the figure 1, and running by the figures 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and so on until the call from the figure 11 is reached.

From the corner at the point marked "11," which is established, the call is "thence S. 72 W. 94 poles to a stake; thence a southeast direction, crossing two ridges, to a laurel branch; thence down said branch to the river; thence down the river to the beginning." The controversy in the case is over the location of the corner in the call S. 72 W. 94 poles to a stake, and the line from that corner to the laurel branch.

The contention of the defendants is that said corner and line should be located in accordance with the seventh and eighth calls in the 100-acre grant, the boundaries of which are indicated on the diagram by the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 12, and 1, as claimed by them. The plaintiff, on the other hand, insists chiefly that the line from 6 does not end at 12, but at 13, and that the next call, whether it runs from 12 or 13, should be so run in a southeast direction to the laurel branch as that the whole area in the tract conveyed will be 230 acres, as called for by the deed.

The jury found in accordance with the defendants' contention, which limited the plaintiff's recovery to about 146 acres, instead of 230 as claimed by it.

The plaintiff insists that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and that the finding of the jury was brought about by the erroneous action of the court in giving and refusing instructions.

[2] One of the instructions given, and that to which the plaintiff objects most, was in the following language:

"(3) The court further instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence in this case that the line called for in the deed from Arch Hunsucker to J. D. Price and A. J. Steinman, from a stake 'thence in a southeast direction, crossing two ridges, to a laurel branch,' may be run in a number of ways, either of which will conform to the above said description in said deed, and for that reason said call is indefinite, but if said call can be located from the evidence in this case it is the duty of the jury to locate said call and uphold said deed. And, in locating said call, if the evidence does not show that there are natural objects or well-defined lines called for in the title papers in evidence in this case which would place the line at some other place, you will establish said line by commencing at the 'beech and cucumber standing near the mouth of a branch' (corner to the 30-acre patent) corner in said deed; thence running the bearing and distance called for in said deed, with the proper variation, and from the end of said distance; thence running in a southeast direction, crossing two ridges, to a point on Laurel branch, so as to make said deed from Arch Hunsucker and Steinman contain 230 acres."

The objection made to it is that "the jury could not under it settle the open line so as to include in the boundary 230 acres of land, if the evidence showed there were 'natural objects or well-defined lines called for in the title papers which would place the line at some other place;' whereas there was not even a scintilla of evidence (certainly none of any probative force) of any natural objects or well-defined lines called for in the title papers which could by any process of reasoning be construed as the line intended by the call, 'from thence a southeast direction to a laurel branch,' in the deed from John Hunsucker to Arch and subsequent deeds."

A careful examination of the evidence fails to show any natural object or well-defined line or lines called for in the title papers which tend to show the true location of the disputed line. The call, "thence a southeast direction, crossing two ridges, to a laurel branch," is the same in the deed from John Hunsucker to Arch Hunsucker, from the latter to Price and Steinman, under whom the plaintiff claims, and in the deed from Arch Hunsucker to Robinett, under which the defendants claim. These deeds not only fail to show definitely where the disputed line was to reach the laurel branch, but they tend to show that such point was not where the closing line of the 100-acre grant crossed it. The boundary line in all these deeds, from the beginning corner at 1 to 6, clearly appears from the courses and distances, or corners called for, or from both, to be the same as the boundary line of the 100-acre grant to Rogers and of his deed to John Hunsucker. From the corner at 6, the call in the 100-acre grant is with the line of the 30-acre grant S. 72 W. 114 poles, crossing Powell's river to a stake on a spur of Rogers' ridge. The difference in the distances called for in the Rogers grant (114 poles) and in said deeds (94 poles) is explained by the fact that those deeds from the point 6 run around the 30-acre grant to 11, and from 11 in the next call do not, of course, include the distance between 6 and 11 (20 poles), the length of the line of the 30-acre grant between 6 and 11. The termination of the line in the call, S. 72 W. 114 poles (the call of the 100-acre grant), or S. 72 W. 94 poles (the call of the said deeds), whether it be at 12, as contended by the defendants, or at 13, as insisted by the plaintiff, fixes the point from which the line in controversy must be run to the laurel branch. The call in the deed from John Hunsucker to Arch Hunsucker from that point is "thence a southeast direction, crossing two ridges, to a laurel branch." As stated by the surveyors, that line might be run in accordance with that ambiguous or indefinite call, so as to reach the creek called for at any point between 15 and 18 on the diagram. There is nothing in that deed showing that it should be run by the closing line of the 100-acre grant. That call of the grant is "S. 42 E. 270 poles to the beginning." As before shown, all the calls from the beginning at 1 to the end of the 94-pole line, whether it be at 12 or at 13, showing that the boundary line of the land conveyed by John Hunsucker to Arch Hunsucker was located in accordance with the calls in the 100-acre and the 30-acre grants, and that those grants or copies of the calls in them must have been before the draftsman of that deed when it was written. If it had been intended that the line in controversy should be run with the closing line of the 100-acre grant, the reasonable presumption is that it would have called for that line or its course as given in the grant. Not only does that deed fail to do this, or to indicate with any certainty where the line is to be run, but, if the tract conveyed contains the quantity of land called for, the line in question could not be run with the closing line of the 100-acre grant to the laurel branch; for if it were so run the tract conveyed, instead of containing 230 acres, as called for, would contain less than 150 acres.

[3] While the call for quantity is the least certain element of description, and will not control where monuments or courses and distance are called for by which the land conveyed can be identified, yet when no known and established boundaries are named as describing the land, and the deed contains no other description sufficiently certain to define the land intended to be conveyed, the quantity of land mentioned may be used for the purpose of ascertaining the granted premises, and in such a case may have a controlling force. 2 Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) § 1045; 5 Cyc. 923, 929; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 789-791; and cases cited in the notes of those works.

There can be no question that the land embraced in the deed from Arch Hunsucker, conveying the coal and other mineral interests therein to Price and Steinman, and the tract described as 230 acres in the deed from Arch Hunsucker to John M. Robinett, was the same land described in the deed from John Hunsucker to Arch Hunsucker. It further appears from the uncontradicted evidence of John M. Robinett that the 230-acre tract of land purchased by him from Arch Hunsucker embraced, outside of the Rogers 30-acre and 100-acre grants, and west thereof, other lands, estimated to be about 100 acres.

Without further discussing in detail the evidence, it is sufficient to say that the court is of opinion that the court's instruction No. 3, quoted above, is erroneous in the respect complained of, because there was no sufficient evidence upon which to base it, and that it must have misled the jury into finding a verdict which could not be sustained upon any other hypothesis than that the evidence proved there "are natural objects or well-defined lines called for in the title papers in evidence" which showed that the controverted line ran with the closing line of the 100-acre grant to the laurel branch.

Other errors are assigned to the action of the court in giving and refusing instructions; but they do not seem to be much relied on, as it is not pointed out in the briefs or oral argument in what respect the instructions given were erroneous, or why those rejected should have been given. We do not see that the court erred in refusing instructions offered or in giving instructions, other than No. 3.

The action of the court as to the admission and rejection of evidence is also assigned as erroneous.

[4] Mr. Wolfe, a surveyor introduced as a witness by the plaintiff, after stating that the boundary lines called for in the deed from John Hunsucker to Arch Hunsucker were the same as those called for in the deed from Arch Hunsucker to John M. Robinett, was asked, "Where do you understand this [the latter] deed was intended to come to Laurel branch?" Upon objection, the court refused to permit the witness to answer the question.

The ruling of the court was proper. While surveyors may be asked, as expert witnesses, questions upon matters with which they are peculiarly acquainted, and which cannot be made known to the jury without such testimony, yet they cannot testify as to conclusions of fact or conclusions of law, since such matters are for the determination of the jury or the court, as the case may be. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Caples' Adm'r, 110 Va. 514, 519, 520, 66 S. E. 855, and cases cited; 5 Cyc. 968.

[8] The court permitted the defendants to ask John M. Robinett, a witness introduced by the plaintiff, if he had not had a conversation with one Adams, in which he in substance stated that the defendants were entitled to the mineral interests sued for, and could hold them if they would contend for them. The object of the evidence in question was to show that the witness had made statements inconsistent with the testimony he had given in the case. While the evidence may not have been entitled to much weight, yet it was admissible, we think, for the purpose for which it was offered.

[8] The remaining assignment of error is based upon bill of exceptions No. 4, which, omitting formal parts, is as follows:

"Q. You have heretofore testified, I believe, that the boundary described in the declaration and the deed from Archibald Hunsucker to Price and Steinman runs with these lines from chestnut and pine to the point shown as a white oak fallen on the map? A. Yes, sir.

"Thereupon plaintiff, by counsel, propounded to the witness the following questions, to which the witness made the following answers:

"Q. Mr. Wolfe, I show you a map marked 'Virginia Coal & Iron Company's Map No. 107,' and will ask you what it purports to be a map of, and if you made it.

"A. It is a map of the William Robinett, Sr., land. I made this map.

"Q. Did you do the surveying?

"A. Yes, sir.

"To which said questions and answers thereto defendants, by counsel, objected, on the ground that, if admissible at all, they were matter in chief, and thereupon counsel for plaintiff stated to the court that the purpose of the introduction of the said map was to show the location of the west line of the Hunsucker tract; and thereupon the court sustained the objection of the defendants, and refused to allow the said answers to the said questions to go to the jury, and refused to allow the said map to be introduced in evidence. * * *

Even if the evidence were offered at the proper time, the court did not err in not permitting the map to be introduced as evidence, or in excluding the answers of the witness. While a private survey may be admitted as evidence of boundary between those who were parties to it, or who claim under them, it is not admissible as independent evidence against strangers, as were the defendants in this case. Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Va. 276; 5 Cyc. 965-967. The exclusion of the answers of the witness could not have prejudiced the plaintiff, since they did nothing more than show that the map offered was based upon a survey of the Wm. Robinett land, and that the witness had made the survey.

For the action of the court in giving instruction No. 3, its judgment must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

NEWBERRY et al. v. DUTTON.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 217*) — FINAL JUDGMENT — SUFFICIENCY.

Entry by the court, in its regular order book, under the style of the suit in ejectment, of the fact of the jury returning a verdict for defendants, followed by the words, "It is therefore considered by the court that the defendants recover of plaintiff their costs in this behalf," is a sufficient final judgment for defendants as to the lands described and involved in the case, to be determined by consultation of the pleadings.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 461*) — SUIT FOR CORRECTION — CONTRADICTING RECORD.

Aside from the question of one having negligently failed to avail himself of his remedy in the action in which the judgment was rendered against him, barring him of right to maintain a suit in equity for its correction on the ground of mistake therein, he does not show mistake, but contradicts the record, which he may not do, by attempting to show that the issue in the action in which the judgment was rendered was different from what the record thereof shows it was.

3. EQUITY (§ 427*) — CONFORMITY TO PLEADING.

There being no pleading asking for such relief, the decree, in a suit for correction of the judgment for defendants in ejectment, for all the land involved therein, is erroneous in awarding defendant affirmative relief by awarding him a writ of possession for the land.

4. COSTS (§ 234*)—COSTS OF APPEAL—REVERSAL IN PART.

The decree being erroneous in part, for correction of which appeal was necessary, appellants will be awarded costs, though otherwise the decree is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Suit by Cora Newberry and others against George W. Dutton. From the decree for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Chase & Daugherty and Sutherland & Sutherland, for appellants. Vicars & Peery and Columbus Phipps, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The record shows that in September, 1903, Thomas Stone conveyed to Ross Self, by deed duly recorded, a tract of land described by metes and bounds as containing 160 acres. It further appears that afterwards, in September, 1904, Ross Self, the grantee in the deed mentioned, instituted an action of ejectment against George W. Dutton and others to recover from them the fee simple of the same tract of land that the deed from Stone purported to convey to him. The declaration in ejectment describes the land as it is described in the deed from Stone to Self, and as containing 160 acres.

The declaration was duly served upon the defendants, who pleaded not guilty, and filed, as required, their grounds of defense, in which they allege that the plaintiff never did have title to the premises in the declaration mentioned, that the legal title to the said premises was vested in others at the time of the institution of the action of ejectment, and that the defendants had acquired a perfect and indefeasible title to the lands described in the declaration by parol gift from George Reed, deceased, in his lifetime, and by adversary possession.

Upon the issue thus raised, after hearing all of the evidence, the jury found a verdict for the defendants, and the court entered judgment thereon and awarded costs to the defendants.

Ross Self, the plaintiff in the action of ejectment, made no motion for a new trial, and took no appeal from the judgment rendered therein.

The present suit in equity was brought by Cora Newberry and others, claiming to be the owners of a portion of the land involved in the ejectment suit under a deed from Thomas Stone, to whom the land was re-conveyed by Ross Self after the ejectment suit was decided. In their original bill they allege that of the 160 acres sought to be recovered in the ejectment suit the defendants did not claim 26½ acres, and that only the residue of the 160 acres, after deducting the 26½ acres, was claimed by them, and that through an oversight and mistake of the clerk and the jury the judgment was entered in favor of the defendants for the premises in the declaration mentioned. The prayer of this bill was that the court direct an order correcting the verdict and judgment in the action of ejectment, so as not to include therein any part of the said 26½ acres. In their amended bill the complainants allege that, of the 160 acres sought to be recovered in the ejectment suit, the defendants only claimed 78 acres, that the plaintiff was entitled to the remaining 82 acres, and that the judgment of the court in favor of the defendants was a mistake in so far as it included the 82 acres. The prayer of the amended bill was that, if necessary to do justice, the ejectment suit of Self v. Dutton et al. be restored to the docket, and that an order be entered adjudicating that the title to the 82 acres belonged to Ross Self and his successors, and that the defendants therein be restrained from setting up as a bar, or res judicata, the judgment in the action of ejectment to any portion of the 82 acres claimed by them, and that they be granted a writ restoring to them the possession of such land.

There was a demurrer to each of these bills, and upon the hearing the demurrers were sustained and the bills dismissed, with costs to the defendants, and a writ of possession was awarded, requiring the sheriff of Dickenson county to put the defendants in possession of that portion of the land described in the original and amended bills as belonging to the complainants, which was included in the tract of 160 acres described in the ejectment suit. From that decree this appeal has been taken.

[1] It is contended by the appellants that there was no valid and final judgment in the suit in ejectment. This position cannot be sustained. After the verdict of the jury the court entered, under the style of the suit in ejectment, in its regular order book, the following: "This day came again the parties by their attorneys, and the jury adjourned over on yesterday appeared in court pursuant to their adjournment, and, after hearing the conclusion of the evidence of witnesses and argument of counsel, retired to consider of their verdict, and after some time returned into court with the following verdict: 'We, the jury, find for the defendants.' It is therefore considered by the court that the defendants recover of the plaintiff their costs in this behalf expended, and that execution may issue."

It is true this order does not follow the old English form of judgment; but it is enough to show that there was a final adjudication of the controversy between the parties, upon the issue joined, in favor of the defendants, which is all that was necessary.

In 1 Black on Judgments, § 115, after discussing the form of a judgment, the author says: "It may, therefore, be stated as the modern rule that the form of the judgment is not material, provided that in substance it shows distinctly, and not inferentially, that the matter had been determined in favor of one of the litigants, or that the rights of the parties in litigation had been adjudicated. In other words, the sufficiency of the writing claimed to be a judgment should always be tested by its substance, rather than its form."

The order in the ejectment case is, of itself, sufficient to constitute a final and binding judgment in favor of the defendants as to the land described and involved in that case. In determining the force and effect of that judgment, the pleadings must be consulted, to see what the matter in controversy was. The record of the ejectment case is made part of the original and amended bills, and the plaintiff's declaration, together with his bill of particulars, shows that he sought to recover the whole of the 160 acres, describing the same by metes and bounds. The defendants' plea of the general issue denied the whole of the plaintiff's claim, and the defendants' grounds of defense deny title in the plaintiff to any part of the land mentioned and described in the declaration. Upon the issue joined by these pleadings, the evidence was submitted to and passed upon by the jury, and their verdict was rendered finding for the defendants, which was followed by the judgment of the court awarding costs against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendants. It is clear from the record of the ejectment suit that the whole of the 160 acres of land described in the declaration was in controversy, and that upon the issue joined the jury rendered their verdict for the defendants, upon which a valid, final, and binding judgment was entered by the court in favor of the defendants.

[2] It is further contended by the appellants that, notwithstanding the validity and finality of the judgment in the ejectment suit, they were entitled to have corrected the alleged mistake in the verdict and in the judgment entered thereon.

The original bill alleges that the verdict of the jury should have been for the land in the declaration mentioned, exclusive of 26½ acres, and that the verdict and judgment was an oversight and mistake of the jury and the clerk, which should be corrected. The amended bill alleges that the verdict should have been for the land in dispute, exclusive of 82 acres, and that both the verdict and the judgment was a mistake, concurred in by all parties. In the petition for appeal it is claimed that the judgment was entered under such circumstances of accident and surprise as to call for relief in equity from the consequences thereof. There is no allegation of fraud, or that the verdict and judgment as rendered was not known to the plaintiff in the ejectment suit at the time the verdict was found and the judgment entered.

If the verdict and judgment were, as alleged, inequitable, and an accident and surprise when rendered, the plaintiff could have moved the court to set the verdict aside, and, failing in that, could have applied for a writ of error to the judgment. This the plaintiff negligently failed to do, and now, after the lapse of more than four years, his successors in title come into a court of equity asking for the same relief that was open to him in the ejectment suit.

In Gentry v. Allen, 73 Va. 254, Judge Staples, speaking for this court, says: "No rule of law is better settled than that a court of equity will not relieve against a judgment, on the ground of its being contrary to equity, unless the defendant was ignorant of the ground of defense, or was prevented from availing himself of it by fraud or accident, unmixed with fault or negligence on his part."

The evidence in the case at bar does not explain or tend to explain the judgment, or the alleged mistake therein. Its only effect is to contradict the record, by attempting to make it appear that the issue was other than what the record shows it to have been.

In 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 275, it is said: "It is important that the evidence offered to explain a record should not contradict it; for it cannot be shown in opposition to the record that a question which appears by it to have been settled was not in fact decided, nor that, while a special cause of action was in issue, a different matter was in truth litigated. In other words, where it appears by the record that a particular issue was determined, all question of fact is excluded, and the court must, as a matter of law, declare such determination to exist and to be conclusive."

In State v. Vest, 21 W. Va. 796, Judge Green says: "It is certainly a rule, invariably recognized by the courts, that a record imports such absolute verity that no person against whom it is pronounced will be permitted to aver or prove anything against it."

In the case at bar the record shows that the title to the 160 acres of land was clearly in issue, and that such title was the only issue before the jury. The verdict and the judgment thereon settled and adjudicated that issue in favor of the defendants, and the record thus established cannot now be contradicted.

In view of the facts and circumstances of this case, and in the light of the authorities cited, we are of opinion that the appellants were conclusively bound by the record in the ejectment suit, and that there was no error in sustaining the demurrers, and dismissing the bills filed by them.

[3] It is properly conceded that it was error for the decree complained of to grant the defendant affirmative relief, by awarding him a writ of possession to any part of the 160 acres involved in the ejectment suit. There was no pleading asking for any such relief, which was alone sufficient ground for denying it.

[4] The decree appealed from must be reversed, in so far as it grants the appellee a writ of possession to part of the 160 acres of land involved in the ejectment suit, and affirmed in all other respects, with costs in favor of the appellants, as their appeal was necessary to correct the error for which the decree complained of is in part reversed.

Reversed in part.

GAMBLE v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO.

1. INSURANCE (§ 291*)—LIFE INSURANCE—APPLICATION—MISREPRESENTATIONS—WANT OF KNOWLEDGE—ESTOPPEL.

Though the answer in an action on a life policy charges misrepresentation in the application by insured alone, and not by plaintiff, the beneficiary, yet he, having known of her fatal malady and concealed it while participating in procuring the insurance for his own benefit, may not say she was ignorant of the imposition or that he did not inform her, when common honesty and his duty to the company required him to inform her of her condition, that she might speak the truth in her application.

2. INSURANCE (§ 668*) — LIFE INSURANCE—APPLICATION — MISREPRESENTATIONS—AGENCY.

Where the husband of insured, her beneficiary, became a participant in obtaining the insurance by signing the application, paying the premium and taking a receipt for it, it is open to the jury to infer that he was her agent in the transaction, so that on that ground his knowledge of her fatal malady should be imputed to her, when she stated in her application that she was in sound health.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by James M. Gamble against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Elliott & Herbert, of Columbia, for appellant. Dunlap & Dunlap, of Rockhill, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant company issued an insurance policy of $500 on February 10, 1910, for the benefit of the plaintiff on the life of Maggie Gamble, his wife, who died June 14, 1910. The answer in this suit on the policy sets up the defense that the policy was obtained by representations in the application which were false in several material particulars.

The plaintiff as beneficiary signed the application for insurance with his wife, and in the application the following declaration and agreement appears: "And it is further declared and agreed that the foregoing statements and answers, and also the statements and answers on the next page hereof in answer to the medical examiner, are correct and wholly true, that they shall form the basis of the contract of insurance if one be issued, and that, if they are not thus correct and wholly true, the policy shall be null and void." On the trial the specific untrue representations relied on were the statements made in the application for the policy that the insured was in sound health, and that the last medical attendance was in 1908 for miscarriage, whereas the evidence of her attending physician was that he attended her in November, 1909, that she was suffering not only from miscarriage, but an enlarged heart and Bright's disease. Dr. Kirkpatrick, the physician, further testified that he told the plaintiff at the time of the nature of his wife's disease, but refrained from telling her at her husband's request. The plaintiff testified that the physician did not inform him that his wife had heart disease or Bright's disease until some time after the policy was taken out. The circuit judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, holding that the answer alleged fraud on the part of the insured and not the beneficiary, and therefore the fraud of the husband could not avail the defendant, and that there was no proof that the insured knew of any disease at the time she represented herself to be in sound health. If the answer be liberally construed, as all pleadings should be, to meet the justice of the case, we think the answer should be held to admit of proof of fraud, not only against Mrs. Gamble, but against the plaintiff also.

[1] But even if the answer be strictly construed as charging misrepresentation against Mrs. Gamble, and not against the plaintiff, and if it be conceded that Mrs. Gamble was not aware of the fatal disease from which she was suffering and was in fact innocent of intentional wrong, yet there is a deeper question which the plaintiff must meet. If he knew of his wife's fatal malady, and concealed it while participating in procuring the insurance for his own benefit, can he be allowed to say that his wife was ignorant of the imposition, when common honesty required him to inform her of her condition, if he wished to insure her life, so that she could speak the truth in her application? His request to the physician not to tell Mrs. Gamble of her condition was natural and commendable as a means of saving her from suffering, but it is not permissible that the plaintiff should pervert that sentiment by using it as a means of allowing his innocent wife to impose on an insurance company for his benefit. The plaintiff is now seeking his own interests, and he cannot have the benefit of his wife's lack of knowledge of her malady when it was known to him. He cannot be allowed to willfully conceal, and then have the benefit of the concealment and the imposition innocently practiced by another because of his concealment. If he wished her life insured for his benefit, it was his imperative duty to inform her so that she could speak the truth. The law will not allow him to deny that his wife knew that which common honesty required him to tell her before procuring insurance. As between the plaintiff and the insurance company, the law imposed upon him the duty of informing his wife of her condition to the end that she should not impose upon the insurance company in his behalf, and it will not allow him to say, in enforcing his claim, that he did not perform the duty.

[2] In addition there was ground for the jury to infer that the plaintiff was the agent of his wife in the transaction, and on that ground his knowledge should be imputed to her. Mrs. Gamble was a very ill woman, the plaintiff became a participant in the insurance transaction by signing the application, paying the premium, and taking a receipt for it; and it is common knowledge that married women very rarely enter into such transactions except through the agency of their husbands. Under these principles, there was abundant evidence to go to the jury on the issue of false representations set up in the answer. The plaintiff testified that Dr. Kirkpatrick did not inform him that his wife had organic heart disease and Bright's disease until after the policy had been issued. Dr. Kirkpatrick, on the contrary, testified that he gave him the information in November or December, 1909. In addition to this, the physician testified that he attended Mrs. Gamble for this illness in November and December, 1909, whereas Mrs. Gamble stated in her application that she had not been attended by any physician since November, 1908.

For these reasons, the case should have been submitted to the jury.

Reversed.

GARY, C. J., and HYDRICK, J., concur. WATTS, J., disqualified.

FRASER, J. I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court in this case. I know it is not always necessary to allege fraud in order to prove it, but when fraud is alleged, it ought to be proved as alleged. It seems to me that the fraud alleged here is the fraud of the insured, and the proof abundantly shows that Mrs. Gamble knew nothing of the two fatal diseases with which she was suffering. I see no proof, so easy to have been made by the defendant, if true, that the plaintiff procured the insurance, whatever the probabilities may be.

HILLER v. BANK OF COLUMBIA.

1. PLEADING (§ 362*)—ACTIONS FOR DEPOSITS—ISSUES.

Where, under the undisputed evidence, the sole issue was whether a deposit had been drawn out by the depositor or her duly authorized agent, except a trifling amount, the striking out of allegations in the answer of the bank, charging that the depositor, as administratrix, had mingled funds of the estate with her own in her bank account, and had drawn them out from time to time, was not erroneous.

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 138*)—DEPOSITS—WITHDRAWALS.

Where a depositor in a bank made two accounts, under an agreement that a third person should, as her agent have the right to draw on one of them, the bank could not charge checks drawn by the third person on the other account.

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 134*)—DEPOSITS—WITHDRAWALS.

Where a depositor in a bank having two accounts in his own right, kept separate merely for his own convenience, drew on one of them beyond the amount to his credit, without any arrangement with the bank that he should do so, the bank could charge the overdrafts on the other account; and, where the bank was sued for the balance due on the latter account, it could show that overdrafts on the former account were issued by the depositor's authority.

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 134*)—DEPOSITS—WITHDRAWALS—SET-OFF.

Where a depositor has not assigned his deposit by check or otherwise, his right to demand the balance is subject to the right of the bank to set off against it any debt due by the depositor to the bank; and this right extends to a demand of the bank for money paid on the depositor's debts without his authority, provided the depositor subsequently ratifies the payment by adopting it for his own benefit.

5. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 134*)—DEPOSITS—SET-OFF—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A bank, seeking to set off against the balance due a depositor money paid on the depositor's debts without his authority, must plead and prove that the depositor ratifies such payment by adopting it for his own benefit.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; T. H. Spain, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Nannie E. Hiller against the Bank of Columbia. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. W. Robinson, of Columbia, for appellant. Tompkins & Lee, of Columbia, for respondent.

WOODS, J. [1] The complaint in this action alleges that the plaintiff deposited with the defendant bank $200 on April 19, 1909, which the defendant refused to pay on demand. The answer admitted the deposit, but alleged that the deposit was drawn out by the plaintiff before the commencement of the action. The answer also contained a number of allegations charging that the plaintiff, as administratrix of her husband's estate or executrix of his will, had mingled funds of that estate with her own in her bank account, and had drawn them out from time to time. Most of these latter allegations were ruled out by Judge Spain. There was no reversible error in granting this order; for it clearly appears from the undisputed evidence adduced on both sides that the sole issue in the case was whether all the funds, except 13 cents, had been drawn out by the plaintiff or her duly authorized agent; and that issue was made by the single allegation of the answer that they had been so drawn.

All the money deposited by the plaintiff belonged to her individually; but she chose, for convenience, to keep two accounts, one in her individual name and the other in the name of "Nannie E. Hiller, Adm'x," although she was not administratrix. The latter account was used in the conduct of a mercantile business, owned by the plaintiff and conducted by her and her brother-in-law, John Hiller. On this account John Hiller was authorized to check, signing the checks "Nannie E. Hiller, Adm'x." Both John Hiller and the plaintiff issued checks against this account, which were paid and charged against it, until several checks were presented which would have overdrawn the account. Instead of refusing payment, the bank, by the direction of John Hiller, charged this overdraft to the account kept in the name of Nannie E. Hiller. No evidence was offered that John Hiller was authorized to use or control the latter account. In this state of the evidence, the circuit judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $158.54, the balance of the Nannie E. Hiller account after deducting a check for $55.20, which the plaintiff admitted she had signed without the suffix "Adm'x."

[2] The court refused to allow the defendant to prove that the checks, which went to make up the overdraft transferred or charged to the Nannie E. Hiller account, were signed by the plaintiff herself. There is no escape from the conclusion that this was error. When Mrs. Hiller made two accounts with the bank, under an agreement that

John Hiller should have the right to draw, as her agent, on one of them, the bank had no right to charge checks drawn by John Hiller to the other account. Mrs. Hiller had the right to hold the funds deposited on the other account subject to her own control; and that right could not be defeated by the unauthorized action of John Hiller and the bank. This right of a depositor to separate and control his accounts is established in this state. Fogarties & Stillman v. State Bank, 12 Rich. 518, 78 Am. Dec. 468; Simmons v. Bank, 41 S. C. 177, 19 S. E. 502, 44 Am. St. Rep. 700; Callaham v. Bank, 69 S. C. 374, 48 S. E. 293, 2 Ann. Cas. 203; Bank v. Mahon, 78 S. C. 408, 59 S. E. 31.

[3] But when a depositor having two accounts in his own right, kept separate merely for his own convenience, draws on one of them beyond the amount to his credit, without any arrangement with the bank that he should do so, the bank is justified in the inference that he intends the check to be protected by the other account. Certainly it would be most unreasonable that the bank should be required, under such conditions, to pay to the depositor the credit on one account without deducting the debit on the other. There is nothing in the cases above cited opposed to this view. Under this principle the defendant had a right to prove that the plaintiff herself issued the checks, signed "Nannie E. Hiller, Adm'x," which made up the overdraft on that account charged to the account of Nannie E. Hiller, or that such checks were issued by her authority when she knew of the overdraft. For the error of the circuit court in excluding evidence on this point, there must be a new trial.

[4, 5] To avoid misunderstanding, we refer to another point not properly made by the appeal. When the depositor has not assigned his demand against the bank by check or otherwise, the right of the depositor to demand his balance is subject to the right of the bank to set off against the balance any debt due by him to the bank; and this right of the bank extends to a demand of the bank for money paid out on the depositor's debts without his authority, if the depositor subsequently ratifies the payment by adopting it for his own benefit. Lowrance v. Robertson, 10 S. C. 8; 27 Cyc. 838; Crumlish's Adm'r v. Central Imp. Co. et al., 38 W. Va. 390, 18 S. E. 456, 23 L. R. A. 120 (note), 45 Am. St. Rep. 872. But the burden would be on the bank of properly pleading and proving such a defense. This subject is referred to in the exceptions, but the defense was not alleged in the answer; nor was evidence on the point offered.

Judgment reversed.

Action by James S. Kuhn and another against the Electric Manufacturing & Power Company and two other corporations and R. M. McCown, Secretary of State, for injunction. Petition dismissed.

Chester B. Masslich, of New York City, and Joe Berry Lyles, of Columbia, for petitioners. J. Wright Nash, of Spartanburg, for respondents.

WOODS, J. On the 30th day of August, 1912, Hon. T. H. Sease, circuit judge, made an order enjoining the defendants "from taking any action looking to the amendment of the charter of either of the defendant corporations in the particulars shown by the resolutions and petitions of each defendant filed with the Secretary of State on the 23d of August and set forth in the record at this hearing." Pending their appeal from this order, the defendants have presented their petition to me, after due notice to the plaintiffs, asking for an order superseding the order of injunction and for a writ of mandamus requiring the Secretary of State to sign and issue certificates of the proposed amendments to the charter of the corporation.

[1] I express no opinion whatever as to the merits of the cause, which involves difficult questions of law, but refuse to supersede the order of injunction on the ground that petitioners have not clearly shown that, pending the appeal, it will result in irreparable injury or the miscarriage of justice. *Andrews v. Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Edgefield County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Mandamus by Matthew Banks, as Dispensary Detective, against W. G. Wells, County Supervisor, and others, County Commissioners, composing the County Board of Commissioners for the County of Edgefield, and another, County Treasurer, to require defendants to issue a warrant for petitioner. From a judgment of dismissal, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the circuit court:

"This is an application for mandamus, heard by me, to require the respondents the county commissioners to issue their warrant for $182, the amount claimed to be due petitioner for services rendered by him as dispensary detective, and to require the county treasurer, James T. Mims, to pay same out of the ordinary county funds.

"The substance of the petition and the whole record I have before me is: That on the 28th of February, 1911, Banks, the petitioner, was appointed by the Governor a detective of South Carolina, under the Cary-Cothran Act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 463). That he qualified and entered upon his duties thereunder. That his commission fixed his salary at $2 per day and actual traveling expenses when away from his headquarters all to be paid out of the ordinary county funds in those counties where there is no dispensary. That there is no dispensary in this county. Under the terms of his commission he must file an itemized account of his expenses sworn to with the chairman of the board of county commissioners and be paid as provided by said act. The said petitioner was sent by the Governor to render services in and to the above county on March 1st, 1911. That he filed his account for the month of April, 1911, for services and traveling expenses. That said account was passed upon by said board and they refused to pay same, from which judgment or refusal an appeal was taken and is now pending, then he filed his itemized statement and account for the month of May, 1911, and the board duly notified him or his attorneys that they would pass upon it after hearing evidence as to its correctness, and would give him notice of the hearing, that he might be present and offer evidence in support of same or to do whatever in his judgment he might deem proper. That no hearing has ever been had on said claim and account, and same is still pending, and that the board is now and has been ready and willing to have and grant the hearing whenever it suited the petitioner to have same. Very much has been injected in this proceeding which has no bearing upon the question involved, which is: Will a mandamus issue for the purpose prayed in the petition upon the facts stated above, either for the payment of petitioner's salary per diem of $2 or his traveling expenses for services rendered the above county out of the ordinary county funds?

[1] There can be no doubt as to the right and power of the Governor to make the appointment, and this right cannot be questioned in so far as the necessity for such appointment is concerned; in other words, whenever the Governor makes such appointment, the necessity conclusively exists, and no one has the right to question or to inquire into the necessity for it.

[2] "But the act of 1907, and under which the appointment was made, does not fix any salary or per diem or other pay for a detective appointed by the Governor, and I know of no law or authority allowing the Governor to fix the same as was done in the commission issued to the petitioner herein by him, unless it be the Act of 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 19) § 1, which reads: "The chief state constable with the advice of the Governor, may appoint, one or more state constables at a salary of not more than two dollars per day and such expenses as the chief state constable may deem proper when on duty and also one or more detectives at reasonable compensation. All accounts for per diem and expenses allowed by the chief state constable shall be approved by the Governor before payment." The Act of 1907, § 47, repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith. In my opinion section 1 of Act 1903 is repealed by the act of 1907.

[3] "But suppose it is not, the act of 1903 certainly makes it the duty of the chief state constable to pass upon the accounts and per diem for all those appointed by him with the advice of the Governor, and even after he had so passed upon them they could not be paid until approved by the Governor. Who is to pass upon this kind of claims now? Either they must be approved by the Governor before payment, or the county board must pass upon them. The record does not show that petitioner's claim was ever approved by the Governor. This of itself is sufficient to base a refusal of the writ upon.

[4] "But again the petitioner elected to submit his claim itemized and sworn to the board of commissioners, a quasi court, and they passed upon it and rendered judgment adversely to him, and he appealed therefrom, which appeal is still pending. This is sufficient upon which to base a refusal of writ of mandamus.

[5] "Then again the board of the county commissioners have under the law the control and disbursement of the ordinary county fund and are liable and accountable to the people of the county for properly disbursing and paying out same, and it seems to me they have a perfect right to investigate the claim of any person including such claim as petitioner sets out for service and traveling expenses rendered the county in order to ascertain whether or not said services have been rendered and the claim and expenses a just and true one before paying same. It was certainly contemplated, and in fact so stated in the act of 1903, that no claim of this kind should be paid until investigated by chief state constable and approved by the Governor. If that act is not repealed, the petitioner has not complied with it.

"If it is repealed, then why submit an itemized sworn to account to board of county commissioners unless for the purpose of having them pass upon it. In my judgment the board would be guilty of a breach of duty did it fail to investigate and pass upon an account and claim like the one involved here, before paying it, and especially so when said account had not been approved by the Governor.

"For the reasons herein stated, it is ordered that the application for the writ of mandamus be and the same is hereby refused, and the petition herein be and the same is hereby dismissed."

S. McG. Simkins and P. B. Mayson, both of Edgefield, for petitioner. B. E. Nicholson, of Edgefield, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed for the reasons therein stated.

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL—CHARGES ON FACTS.

In an action against a railroad company for injury to a pedestrian who was struck at a street crossing by a hand car, an instruction that there is no rule or law which relieves a person from looking out for trains and lever cars in crossing tracks, and that a railroad company need not slacken the speed of a car upon seeing a pedestrian unless the circumstances indicate that he does not or cannot see or hear the car, was properly refused as constituting a charge on the facts.

5. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—INJURY TO PEDESTRIAN AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a railway company for injury to a pedestrian who was struck by a hand car at a street crossing, it was not error to refuse to instruct that if the persons in charge of the car saw plaintiff on or near the track, and she appeared to be in possession of her senses, they had the right to assume that she would get out of the way in time to avoid injury.

GARY, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Amanda Irby against the Southern Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

E. M. Thomson, of Columbia, for appellants. W. Boyd Evans and Hunter A. Gibbes, both of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This was an action for damages brought by the plaintiff-respondent against the defendants-appellants for personal injuries received by the plaintiff at a public street crossing in the city of Columbia. It seems that at the place of the injury several railroad tracks cross the street quite near each other. Some of these tracks belong to the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad and some to the defendant company. When the plaintiff arrived, she found the street blocked by a passing train on the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens road having crossed the track of the defendant company. She waited for the passing train to go by. While standing between the tracks, she saw some acquaintances on the train, and waved to them. Her attention was engrossed with her greetings, and as she waved she went backwards upon the track of the defendant company, and did not see a lever car that was approaching the crossing on the track of the defendant company in charge of its codefendant, Davis. The defendant Davis and those on the lever car with him saw the plaintiff while the lever car was some distance away, and saw her backing towards the track before she was struck. Those on the lever car called out to the plaintiff, but she did not hear or heed the warning. One of the employees on the lever car pushed her away from in front of the car, but in some way she was struck by the side of the car, or the back wheel caught her clothing, and she was thrown down and injured.

Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for $200, and the defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

[1] 1. "(1) Because the court erred in permitting the witness James Rutherford to testify as follows: 'Q. How wide was the opening here? A. About 20 feet. Q. And blocked up on both sides? A. Yes, sir. Q. It was blocked up that afternoon? A. Yes, sir. Q. What about the cars? A. The Shand lumber yard runs here, is a line fence running along here, passed that line fence in the corner here one box car a few links over into the street. Q. How much opening was here? A. About 20 feet. Q. Twenty feet wide? A. Yes, sir; 20 feet wide.' The error being that there was no allegation in the complaint charging the defendants or either of them with blocking the crossings in question, nor with negligence, recklessness, or willfulness in so blocking the street, and the testimony, therefore, referred to no issue involved, and was irrelevant and incompetent.

"(2) Because the court erred in allowing this witness and other witnesses to testify as to the crossing in question being blocked by cars placed by the defendants when there was no allegation in the complaint charging negligence in this regard, and no such issue was made by the pleadings. Hence the testimony was irrelevant and incompetent."

Those exceptions cannot be sustained. The jury were entitled to know the surroundings in order to ascertain whether a given rate of speed was negligent or not. One may with due care travel at a rate in an open country where the view is unobstructed, and yet, if he should pass an obstruction or go round a curve in the road at the same speed, he might endanger himself and others and be guilty of negligence.

[2, 3] 2. (3) Because the court erred in admitting in evidence sections 516 and 518 of the Ordinances of the City of Columbia with respect to blocking street crossings, as follows:

"Sec. 516. It shall be unlawful for any railroad train, engine, car or part of a railroad train, to be stopped at the crossing of any street in the city of Columbia, or to be permitted to remain stopped at any crossing of any street of the city, under a penalty of not less than ten dollars nor more than forty dollars for each and every offense, to be recovered before the recorder, evidence being given that this section is violated. Provided, a summons is served on the agent, president, secretary or treasurer of said company so violating.

"Sec. 518. It shall be unlawful for any railroad train, engine, or any portion of a railroad train, to pass any street crossing in the city at a rate of speed greater than four miles an hour, and before and during the passage of such crossing they shall ring the engine bell as notice to those approaching the crossing that a train is approaching. On failing to comply with the conditions of this section, the railroad company so offending shall be fined not less than ten dollars nor more than fifty dollars for each and every offense, on conviction before the recorder: Provided, that a summons is served on any of the officers of said company, as provided in section 516."

"The errors being: (a) That the said ordinances had no application whatever to the case at bar, since it was concerned with a lever or hand car, and not a railroad train or any part thereof. (b) Because there was no allegation in the complaint charging the company with negligence in blocking the crossing in question, and hence there was no issue to which the ordinance as to blocking the streets was applicable, and hence as testimony they were irrelevant and incompetent. (c) Because such ordinances were not proved as provided by law, neither the original being offered in evidence, nor was the copy thereof certified under the hand of the officer having custody of the records of the city of Columbia and under its corporate seal offered on 10 days' notice given defendants or their attorney."

This exception is sustained. His honor, the presiding judge, seems to have allowed the introduction of the city ordinance under the impression that the complaint alleged a violation of the city ordinance. He so stated both in his ruling and in his charge to the jury. We do not find such allegation in the complaint as printed in the case, and we are bound by the case. Besides both ordinances were read in the hearing of the jury. The case does not show that copies were offered, and we can make no finding on the production of copies.

[4] 3. "(4) Because the court erred in failing to charge defendants' fourth request as follows: 'There is no rule of law which relieves a person from looking out for trains and lever cars when he goes upon or to cross railroad tracks. I charge you that a railroad company is not bound to slacken speed of a lever car upon seeing one on or near its track, unless the circumstances indicate that such person does not or cannot see or hear such lever car.' The error being that the request stated a sound proposition of law applicable to the issues involved in the case, and defendants were entitled to have it charged in its entirety." Exception 4 cannot be sustained. This would have been a charge on the facts. This exception is overruled.

[5] 4. "(5) Because the court erred in refusing to charge defendants' fifth request to charge as follows: 'If the section foreman or persons in charge of said lever car saw plaintiff upon or near the railroad track and she appeared to be in possession of her senses, such person or persons had a right to assume that plaintiff would get out of the way of the approaching lever car in time to prevent injury.' The error being that the request stated a sound proposition of law applicable to the issues involved in the case, and defendants were entitled to have the same charged.

"(6) Because the court erred in refusing to charge, upon defendants' request, that there was no evidence in the case which would warrant a verdict for punitive damages, the error being that there was absolutely no testimony tending to show reckless, wanton, or willful acts on the part of defendants or its or their employes, and hence no ground on which a verdict for punitive damages could be based."

These exceptions must be overruled. It would not be proper to discuss these exceptions, as the case must go back for a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from is reversed for the reasons above set forth and remanded for a new trial.

WOODS and WATTS, JJ., concur. GARY, C. J., dissents. HYDRICK, J., concurs in the result.

MILLER v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1912.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—NON-DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—LIABILITY.

Where a telegraph company, delivering a message to the residence of the sendee, "Woodie M.," agreed, at the request of the sendee's wife, to forward it to the sendee at another town, but failed to deliver the same within a reasonable time, and made no effort to deliver nor to send a service message, nor any inquiry for the sendee at the latter town, it was liable for failure to promptly deliver the message to the sendee, though the address was changed to "Wood C. M.," probably by phonetic mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Chowan County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by T. W. Miller against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed Bond & Bond, for appellant. Pruden & Pruden and S. Brown Shepherd, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action for failure to deliver promptly a telegram. It was in evidence that at 4 p. m., Saturday, November 19, 1910, a telegram from Norfolk, Va., addressed to "Woodie Miller, Edenton, N. C.," was delivered at his residence in that place, announcing the sudden death of his brother in Norfolk, and asking plaintiff to "come at once." His wife at once requested the company to forward it to her husband, "care Everett's Hotel, Jacksonville, Fla.," and guaranteed the charges. The defendant accepted the message, but did not deliver it. His wife sent a night letter that night to her husband, asking if he had received the message. He received this the next day about 10 o'clock a. m. He thereupon went to the telegraph office in Jacksonville and was handed the undelivered telegram, which was directed to "Wood C. Miller, care Everett's Hotel." The plaintiff testified that, if he had received the telegram at any time before 8 p. m. November 19th (which was four hours after the message was handed in to the office in Edenton), he could and would have reached Norfolk Sunday at 5:30 p. m. in time to have attended the funeral; that he left on the first train after he had actually received the message, but arrived in Norfolk too late to attend the funeral. The plaintiff further testified that the clerk at the Everett Hotel had known him a long time as T. W. Miller, or Woodie Miller, that he had been at the hotel on this occasion for several days, and was registered as T. W. Miller. The defendant offered no evidence.

It was error to grant the motion for a nonsuit. There is an unbroken line of cases, from Hendricks v. Telegraph Co., 126 N. C. 304, 35 S. E. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658, and Cogdell v. Telegraph Co., 135 N. C. 431, 47 S. E. 490, down to the present, that on proof of the delivery of a message to a telegraph company and payment of the charges, or the acceptance of the message without such payment, and of failure to deliver to the sendee in reasonable time, there is prima facie proof of negligence, and the burden is upon the company to prove that it made all reasonable effort to deliver the message, and that upon failure to find the sendee it wired back a service message for a better address. Here the company showed no effort to deliver, nor any attempt to send a service message, nor any inquiry for sendee at Everett's Hotel, nor, indeed, any attempt to deliver, even when, through the night letter from the plaintiff's wife, it had notice that the sendee was at the hotel in Jacksonville. Though this last was directed to T. W. Miller, it was notice that a message of importance, which had been sent from Edenton, N. C., to a man named Miller, "care Everett's Hotel," had not been delivered. It seems probable that the message was changed from "Woodie Miller" to "Wood C. Miller" by a phonetic mistake, as in Cogdell v. Telegraph Co., supra. But, however that may be, the defendant has not met the burden of proof cast on it by reason of its failure to deliver the message in apt time.

The judgment of nonsuit must be reversed.

1. DRAINS (§ 66*)—ASSESSMENTS FOR MAINTENANCE—"CANAL."

Under Revisal 1905, § 4026, which provides for proceedings to assess among persons benefited, the cost of maintenance of a drainage canal, dug along any natural depression or waterway and maintained for seven years, an artificial drain of from two to five feet in width is a "canal," though, in the proceeding to assess the cost of maintenance, the evidence refers to it both as a "ditch" and a "canal."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 947, 948.]

2. DRAINS (§ 76*)—ASSESSMENT FOR MAINTENANCE—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

Under Revisal 1905, § 4026, which provides for proceedings to assess the cost of maintenance of a drainage canal which has been in existence for seven years, and directs the clerk of the superior court to appoint commissioners therefor upon the application of "any landowner who contributed to digging and is interested in maintaining" the canal, all of the petitioners need not have been contributors to the original construction, and the petition is sufficient where one of them is within the requirement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-83; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

3. DRAINS (§ 70*)—ASSESSMENT FOR MAINTENANCE—PARTIES WHO MAY BE ASSESSED.

Under Revisal 1905, § 4026, which provides for the appointment of commissioners to examine lands drained or intended to be drained by a drainage canal, and hear testimony as to "advantages and disadvantages to be shared by the parties to the action," in order to assess the cost of maintaining such canal among such parties, a railroad, which was a party and whose right of way was drained, was properly assessed a portion of the cost of maintenance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Foushee, Judge.

Proceedings by Ange & Forest and others against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and others to compel contribution to the maintenance of a drainage ditch. From a judgment for petitioners, defendants appeal. No error.

This is a proceeding, under section 4026 of the Revisal, to compel contribution to the maintenance of a certain artificial drain, sometimes referred to in the evidence as a ditch and at others as a canal. The drain is in some places from three to five feet wide and from two to five feet deep, and in other places not so large. The town of Winterville and A. G. Cox are among the petitioners, and B. W. Tucker, W. L. House, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company are the defendants. The defendants filed a demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and the defendants excepted. The defendants then filed answers, and upon issues raised the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the ditch described in the complaint constructed along a natural depression or waterway, and was it constructed seven years prior to the beginning of this action? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Who constructed said ditch? Answer: A. G. Cox.

"(3) Did either of the plaintiffs or the defendants contribute anything to construct or maintain said ditch, except A. G. Cox? Answer: No.

"(4) Are the plaintiffs the owners of the land described in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(5) Do the defendants claim under A. G. Cox? Answer: Yes.

"(6) Does the defendant the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company own any land on said ditch (except its right of way), inside the town of Winterville? Answer: No.

"(7) Is any of the right of way of the defendant the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, outside of the corporate limits of the town of Winterville, drained by said ditch? Answer: Yes; 600 or 700 yards.

"(8) Is the land of the defendant B. W. Tucker, outside of the corporate limits of the town of Winterville, drained by said ditch? Answer: Yes.

"(9) Is the land of the defendant W. L. House, outside of the town of Winterville, drained by said ditch? Answer: Yes.

"(10) Is said ditch necessary to drain the streets of the town of Winterville? Answer: Yes.

"(11) Has the plaintiff A. G. Cox contributed anything to the maintenance of this ditch since its construction? Answer: No."

Judgment was rendered upon the verdict in favor of the petitioners, and the defendants excepted and appealed.

All of the defendants join in the contentions: (1) That section 4026 of the Revisal refers to canals and that the drain described in the petition is a ditch. (2) That said statute does not purport to confer a remedy, except in favor of those who contributed to the construction of the canal.

The defendants House and Tucker contend, further, that they ought not to contribute to maintain the drain because: (1) They acquired their land after its construction. (2) A part of their land is in the town of Winterville, and they are required to pay taxes on such part to maintain the drainage of the town.

The defendant railroad company contends, further, that it owns no land which is drained, and that it is not liable to contribute on account of the fact that a part of its right of way may be benefited.

Harry Skinner, for appellants. S. J. Everett, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The statute under which this proceeding is instituted is necessary for the cultivation and improvement of low lands, and should be construed to carry into effect its beneficent purposes, if practicable. It provides: "After a canal has been dug along any natural depression or waterway and maintained for seven years, it shall be prima facie evidence of its necessity, and upon application to the clerk of the superior court of any landowner who contributed to digging and is interested in maintaining the same, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the superior court to appoint and cause to be summoned three disinterested and discreet freeholders, who, after being duly sworn, shall go upon the lands drained or intended to be drained by said canal, and after carefully examining the same and hearing such testimony as may be introduced touching the question of cost of the canal, the amount paid and the advantages and disadvantages to be shared by each of the parties to the action, shall make their report in writing to the clerk of the superior court, stating the facts and apportioning the cost of maintaining said canal among the parties to the action, and the cost of the action shall be divided in the same ratio; and their report when approved shall be properly registered by the clerk. The collection of cost and proportion of work on the canal shall be as prescribed in this chapter."

[1] The statute is found in a chapter of the Revisal providing for drainage, and by reference to its various sections it will be seen that the term "ditch" and "canal" is used indiscriminately to designate an artificial drain. In the ordinary acceptance of the terms, both indicate a channel constructed for the purpose of conveying water, the only difference being that the word "canal" suggests a channel of larger dimensions than does the word "ditch," but as defined by the authorities a ditch may be natural or artificial (Black, L. Dic. 381; Cyc. vol. 14, p. 552; Goldthwait v. Bridgewater, 5 Gray [Mass.] 64), while a canal is an artificial trench for confining water to a defined channel (Black, L. Dic. 166), or a trench or excavation in the earth for conducting water and confining it to narrow limits (Cyc. vol. 14, p. 268; Bishop v. Seeley, 18 Conn. 394). Tested in either way, by the ordinary use of words or by legal definitions, the drain described in the petition, not being natural and being of considerable dimensions, is a canal, although called a ditch.

[2] Nor does the statute require that all of the petitioners should have contributed to the original construction of the canal, and the reason for omitting this requirement is obvious. If such a provision had been inserted in the statute, its usefulness would have been largely destroyed, as a change in the ownership of the land, after the construction of a canal at great expense, would render it difficult, if not impossible, to maintain it. It directs the clerk, in plain language, to make the order appointing the commissioners, upon the application of "any landowner who contributed to digging and is interested in maintaining" the canal, and the verdict establishes the fact that at least one of the petitioners "contributed" and is "interested" in maintenance.

What has been said disposes of the first contention made separately by the defendants Tucker and House, and their second contention affects only the amount of the assessment, for which they may be liable, which is not before us on this appeal. The separate contention of the defendant railroad is also untenable.

[3] The statute requires the assessments to be made according to advantages and disadvantages, and the verdict finds that the railroad is benefited by the drainage of its right of way, and it is reasonable and just that it should contribute in proportion to its benefits. Nothing is more important to the maintenance of its roadbed than proper drainage, and it should not expect this to be maintained at the expense of others. If, however, the statute in express terms said that only owners of land should contribute to the maintenance of the canal, this would not necessarily relieve this defendant, as the term "owner of land" may not only include those who have an absolute ownership in fee, but those who have the proprietorship and control of the land. Cyc. vol. 29, p. 1549.

Upon an examination of the whole record, we find no error.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Justice, Judge.

Petition for dower by Florence Eason against Joseph C. Eason. From a judgment for petitioner, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Geo. M. Lindsay and J. Paul Frizzelle, for appellant. W. F. Evans and L. I. Moore, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff is the second wife of Nathan Eason, and as such claims dower in the whole of a certain tract of land described in a deed dated December 30, 1904, executed by Thomas Lassiter to Nathan Eason and his first wife, Carrie.

It is contended by the plaintiff that the deed in question conveys the land to Nathan Eason and his said wife Carrie jointly, and that the doctrine of survivorship, as between husband and wife, applies, inasmuch as Nathan Eason survived his first wife. Ray v. Long, 132 N. C. 895, 44 S. E. 852. The premises of the deed are as follows: "This deed, made this the 30th day of December, A. D. 1904, by Thomas U. Lassiter and his wife, Alice Lassiter, of Greene county and state of North Carolina, of the first part, to Nathan Eason and wife, Carrie G. Eason, each one-half interest, of Greene county and state of North Carolina, of the second part." It is unnecessary to set out the remainder of the deed. The habendum, as well as the tenendum, conveys the property to said Nathan and Carrie G. Eason and their heirs and assigns.

[1] We are of opinion that in construing the deed in question the language used in the premises, to wit, "to Nathan Eason and wife, Carrie G. Eason, each one-half interest," should be taken into consideration in construing the deed. We have said repeatedly in recent decisions that a deed will be construed so as to effectuate the intent as gathered from the entire instrument, when it can be done by any reasonable interpretation. Acker v. Pridgen, 158 N. C. 338, 74 S. E. 335; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514; Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 513, 54 S. E. 386.

[2] Giving the language quoted its ordinary significance, we are of opinion the deed created a tenancy in common, and that the plaintiff is entitled to dower in only one-half of the land described in the petition. The language used is too plain to admit of discussion as to its meaning. The evident purpose of the draftsmen was to convey one undivided half of the land to the husband and the other undivided half to the wife. This question is very fully discussed by Mr. Justice Hoke in Highsmith v. Page, 158 N. C. 226, 73 S. E. 998, which we think is a case very much in point. See, also, Stalcup v. Stalcup, 137 N. C. 305, 49 S. E. 210; Hodges v. Fleetwood, 102 N. C. 122, 9 S. E. 640; 13 Cyc. 666.

The cause is remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in accordance with this opinion.

Reversed.

BRIDGERS v. BEAMAN et al.

RAILROADS (§ 72*)—CONSTRUCTION—"ON."

The location of a depot at a point within 300 feet of the northern boundary of a town, 100 feet of its eastern boundary, and 1,450 feet from its southern boundary at the nearest point, is not a location "on" the southern limits of the town within the terms of a deed delivered in escrow and conveying land in consideration of such location.

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Justice, Judge.

Action by Henry Clark Bridgers against J. I. Beaman and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, having under consideration the building of a railroad from Farmville to Snow Hill or Hookerton, was offered inducements by parties at both places. Among them was J. I. Beaman, who offered and subscribed to pay $1,100 in consideration that the road was constructed to Hookerton and a depot constructed on the southern limits of the town of Hookerton by March 29, 1908; that, in consideration of the inducements offered by the said Beaman and others, it was decided to build the road to Hookerton, and the subscriptions of the said Beaman and others were so accepted by the plaintiff, and, in consideration of the subscriptions of the said Beaman and others, the construction of the said railroad to Hookerton was undertaken and begun; that the said Beaman concluded to pay a part of his subscription in money and a part in land, and executed the deed set out in the pleadings, of date April 11, 1906, conveying land to plaintiff; that said deed was deposited with a committee, the defendants, to be delivered to plaintiff when he had constructed the railroad and established the depot he had agreed to. The grantor Beaman, to more fully protect himself and to insure the construction of the depot on the southern limits of Hookerton, put the following clause in said deed: "To be null and void if said Henry Clark Bridgers (the plaintiff) fails to construct a depot on southern town limits of Hookerton, and build a railroad from Farmville to the depot in Hookerton by the 29th day of March, 1908." The said Beaman owned land on the southern limits of Hookerton. Under the foregoing circumstances the deed was executed and placed in the hands of the committee for future delivery, as events should determine. The plaintiff constructed a depot in Hookerton and built a railroad from Farmville to the depot in Hookerton before the 29th day of March, 1908, and demanded of the committee, the defendants, the possession of said deed. They refused to give plaintiff possession of said deed, and the plaintiff brings this action against them to compel them to do so.

The town of Hookerton has had two charters, one granted in 1867, and the other in 1907. According to the charter of 1867, the depot is located within 300 feet of the northern boundary of Hookerton, within 100 feet of its eastern boundary, about 1,450 feet of the southern boundary at the nearest point, and the surveyor, who was introduced as a witness by the plaintiff, testified that the depot was not on the southern limits at all according to the charter of 1867. The defendant paid the part of the subscription which was to be paid in money, but resisted the delivery of the deed, upon the ground that the plaintiff had not constructed the depot on the southern limits of Hookerton. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, his honor sustained a motion for judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

J. L. Bridgers, for appellant. Jarvis & Blow, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The plaintiff and the defendant have made the location of the depot on the southern limits of Hookerton material, because they have stipulated that the deed shall be void if it is not so located, and the reason the defendant insisted on this provision is apparent. The defendant owned land on the southern limits of Hookerton, which was a small town, and, as it was anticipated that its population and wealth would increase after the construction of the railroad, he was desirous of having the depot located on his side of the town, so that business might be attracted in his direction instead of away from him. The deed was delivered in escrow in 1906, and we agree with his honor that the southern limits of Hookerton, then in existence under the charter of 1867, are those referred to; but if it was otherwise, in our opinion, based upon the map, the southern limits under the charter of 1907 are, in so far as they affect the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant, substantially the same as under the charter of 1867. The determination of the question presented to us depends, therefore, on the location of the depot and whether it can be said to be on the southern limits.

The word "on" has various meanings, dependent upon the purposes for which it is used. Webster says: "The general significance of 'on' is situation, motion, or condition with respect to contact or support beneath; as: At or in contact with the surface or upper part of a thing and supported by it. To or against the surface of. At or near; adjacent to—indicating situation, place or position." And the Century: "In a position above and in contact with; used before a word of place indicating a thing upon which another thing rests or is made to rest. In a position so as to cover, overlie, or overspread. In a position at, near, or adjacent to; indicating situation or position, without implying contact or support. In or into a position in contact with and supported by the top or upper part of something." Adopting the definition most favorable to the plaintiff, "near to," we are of opinion, when all the circumstances are considered, that the plaintiff has not located the depot "on" the southern limits. The only witness introduced by the plaintiff, and who surveyed all the lines under an order of court, says that the depot is not on the southern limits as contained in the charter of 1867, and while, if distance alone controls, the depot may be said to be near those limits, it would not convey this impression when the size of the town and the location of the other limits are considered. The town of Hookerton is a small town, and the distance from the northern to the southern boundary is only about 1,750 feet. The depot is within 100 feet of the eastern boundary, within 300 feet of the northern boundary, and 1,450 feet from the southern boundary, which would seem to locate it in the northeastern part of Hookerton and not on its southern limits.

We conclude that the plaintiff, upon his own evidence, has failed to comply with the condition in the deed, and is not entitled to recover. No question is raised by either party as to the legality of the contract.

Affirmed.

1. COURTS (§ 65*)—EXPIRATION OF "TERM OF COURT."

A "term of court" expired when the court left the bench, after sitting an extra day to sign judgments on the conclusion of all jury trials.

Where, by consent, a party was allowed 30 days in which to serve the case on appeal, service 32 days after the close of the term was too late and a nullity.

Action by Henry Hardee and others against H. A. Timberlake and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Evans, for appellants. F. G. James & Son, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. This is a motion to dismiss because the "case on appeal" was not served on time. The facts found by his honor are that "on Friday, May 24, 1912, all jury trials being concluded, the court discharged the jury, but announced that he would come to the courtroom Saturday morning, May 25th, to sign judgments, which he did at that time, and then went to his home, which was in the same town. The case on appeal was served June 26th, 1912. By agreement, the appellant was allowed 30 days in which to serve case on appeal."

[1, 2] The term of the court expired Saturday morning, May 25th, when the court left the bench for the term. Delafield v. Construction Co., 115 N. C. 21, 20 S. E. 167, where the subject is fully discussed. May having 31 days, the time allowed by consent (30 days) in which to serve case on appeal expired June 24th; and therefore service on June 26th was too late and a nullity. Guano Co. v. Hicks, 120 N. C. 29, 26 S. E. 650, and cases there cited.

There being no error upon the face of the record proper, and there being no case on appeal, the judgment below must be affirmed.

WESTON et al. v. J. L. ROPER LUMBER CO.

1. DEEDS (§ 84*)—RECORDING—NECESSITY.

Generally, a deed must, as provided by Revisal 1905, § 980, be recorded in the county where the land conveyed is situated; the registration taking the place of livery of seisin, attornment, or other ceremony formerly required to pass title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by C. P. Weston and another against the J. L. Roper Lumber Company.

From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and new trial granted.

This is an action to recover a tract of land in Pasquotank county. The only question now presented is whether a deed from Enoch and Fred B. Sawyer to Cary Weston and Joseph Seguline, dated February 3, 1820, and offered in evidence by the plaintiff, was properly excluded by the court. The deed was proven in the court of pleas and quarter sessions of Camden county, and recorded on April 3, 1821, in the office of the register of deeds of that county. A duly certified copy of the registry of this deed was on January 29, 1910, ordered to registration by the clerk of the superior court of Pasquotank county and recorded by the register of deeds in said county April 21, 1910. This deed was a necessary link in the plaintiff's chain of title. The court having excluded the deed from the evidence and having held there was no sufficient proof of the original, the plaintiff excepted to the ruling, submitted to a nonsuit, and appealed.

Winston & Biggs, Ward & Thompson, and Meekins & Tillitt, for appellants. W. B. Rodman, W. M. Bond, and A. D. MacLean, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The general rule undoubtedly is that a deed must be registered in the county where the land it conveys is situated, registration taking the place of livery of seisin, attornment, or other ceremony which the law formerly required to pass title. Rev. St. c. 37, § 1; Rev. Code, c. 37, § 1; Revisal 1905, § 980. But as probates were sometimes taken by officers who had mistaken their powers, or who, having the power, had exercised it in the wrong way, and because deeds, owing to the uncertainty as to the boundary lines of counties, and perhaps for other reasons, had, in many instances, been registered in the wrong counties, the Legislature, with its usual wisdom, deemed it proper to validate such void or defective probates and registrations by a series of enactments, many of which will be found in the Revisal of 1905. Laws 1858-59, c. 18, as well as the Rev. Code, c. 37, § 29, had provided for just such a case as we have before us, but the defendant's counsel contend that as they were omitted from the Code of 1883 and the Revisal of 1905, and as the plaintiffs had not caused the registration in Pasquotank county of a certified copy of the registry in Camden county until 1910, they lost their right, under those acts, to have the deed registered in the former county, where the land lies, the Code, by section 3867, and the Revisal, by section 5453, repealing all public and general statutes not contained therein; but by section 3868 of the Code, and section 5454, such repeal does not "affect any act done, or any right accruing, or accrued or established, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any case before the time when such repeal shall take effect," and it may, perhaps, admit of doubt, under those sections, though we do not decide the question or intimate any preferential opinion in regard to it, whether it was intended that the Code and Revisal should operate as a repeal of the act of 1858-59 and the previous enactment in chapter 37, § 29, of the Revised Code.

[2] It is sufficient for our present purpose that we consider Revisal 1905, § 1009, which provides that "wherever the judges of the Supreme or the superior courts, or the clerks or deputy clerks of the superior courts, or courts of pleas and quarter sessions, mistaking their powers, have essayed previously to the 1st day of January, 1889, to take probate of deeds or any instrument required or allowed by law to be registered, and have ordered said deeds registered, and the same have been registered, all such probates and registrations so taken and had are validated." It must be conceded that our case is embraced by the words or terms of this statute; and, being within the letter, is it also within the spirit of the law? It is evident from the general scope of all the legislation upon this important subject that it was intended to ratify and validate what had erroneously been done by officials having general or special powers of probate and registration, so that the essence of what was done should not be sacrificed to the form of doing it, and to save rights of property where no substantial departure from legal requirements appeared, but merely an irregularity which could be cured without injury to the rights of others. The object of probate and registration in the county where the land lies was intended to give notice to creditors and purchasers for value, or others whose rights might otherwise be seriously and unjustly impaired by the deed, and this idea is emphasized in the act of 1885, c. 147, Revisal, § 980, which differs somewhat in phraseology from prior enactments relating to the same subject, viz., act of 1715, c. 7, Rev. Statutes, and Rev. Code, c. 37, § 1.

[3] A deed is good and valid between the parties thereto without registration, and may be proved on the trial as at common law. Warren v. Willeford, 148 N. O. 474, 62 S. E. 697; Pells Rev. 980, and note.

In view of these settled principles, we may the more easily construe section 1009 of the Revisal, with reference to the registration of a deed in the wrong county, upon a probate taken according to law, or which, though originally void, has been validated by the Legislature, but, before doing so, one position of the defendant requires attention. It is argued by counsel that section 1009, which was taken from the Laws of 1871-72, c. 200, as amended by Acts of 1889, c. 252, and Acts of 1891, c. 484, does not refer to probates taken by the county courts, but to those of the clerks of said courts, but in our opinion the probates of the county courts were intended to be validated. The phraseology and punctuation, as well as the grammatical construction, of the statute, lead us to that conclusion. 36 Cyc. 1117. If the other meaning had been intended, the preposition "of" would have been inserted before the words "courts of pleas and quarter sessions." The section also validates registrations made upon such probates.

[4] It is provided by Revisal, § 988, that "a duly certified copy of any deed or writing, required or allowed to be registered, may be registered in any county; and the registry or duly certified copy of any deed or writing when registered in the county where the land is situate may be given in evidence in any court of the state." This section is taken from Acts of 1858-59, c. 18, and while its meaning, as it appears in the Revisal, is not very clear, when we refer to the original act and consider its context, we find no serious difficulty in construing it. The act of 1858-59 recites that wills, deeds, and other written instruments had been recorded in the wrong counties, and the act was passed to remedy the mischief by allowing certified copies of wills, deeds, and other writings thus erroneously registered to be recorded in the proper counties. This is expressly provided as to wills by the original act, and by clear implication the same rule is extended to deeds.

[5] But the Rev. Code. c. 37, § 29, provided that any deed for land made prior to the year 1830 and registered in any county where any part of the land is situated, or in any adjoining county, or a copy of such deed duly certified by the register of deeds of the county wherein it was recorded, may be registered in the proper county. This section is not in the Code of 1883 or the Revisal of 1906, and counsel of defendant contend that it is, therefore, repealed by section 3867 of the Code and section 5453 of the Revisal, but section 3868 of the Code and section 5454 of the Revisal provide that the repealing clauses shall not "affect any act done, or any right accruing, accrued or established," and we think that the Rev. Code, c. 37, § 29, and the act of 1858-59 c. 18, so far validated the registration of this deed in Camden county as to bring it within the protection of the saving clauses of the Code (section 3868) and Revisal (section 5454), and, even if the right to have the deed or a certified copy registered in Pasquotank county was lost by a repeal of that part of the Rev. Code, yet it may be registered in like manner under section 1599 of the Revisal. The validation of the registry in Camden, to the extent stated was "an act done or accomplished or a right accrued," and the machinery for transferring the registration to the proper county is found in the Revisal, § 1599, if otherwise it had been lost.

[6] A review of the legislation upon this matter satisfies us that it was intended to correct and remedy errors of registration as well as those of probate. They go hand in hand, and the one without the other would be of little or no avail. The statutes are highly remedial, and should be liberally construed, so as to embrace all cases fairly within their scope. It is constructive legislation. We are saving titles, and not destroying them. It has been said that "such acts are of a remedial character, and are the peculiar subjects of legislation. They are not liable to the imputation of being assumptions of judicial power." McFaddin v. Evans Co., 185 U. S. 505, 22 Sup. Ct. 758, 46 L. Ed. 1012. It was further held that to validate defective probates and registrations is a proper exercise of legislative power and favored by the courts. Speaking to this question the court in Webb v. Den, 17 How. 576, 15 L. Ed. 35, said: "In the early settlement of most of our states, the forms of conveyances of land were very simple; and they were usually drawn either by the parties themselves, or by persons equally ignorant of the proper forms of certificates of acknowledgment required by law. In some states the statutes concerning acknowledgments and registry were stringent, while the practice was loose and careless, and in some the courts, by unnecessary strictness in their construction of the statutes, added to the insecurity of titles in a country where too many have acted on the supposition that every one who can write is fit for a conveyancer. The great evils likely to arise from a strict construction applied to the bona fide conveyances of an age so careless of form have compelled Legislatures to quiet titles by confirmatory acts in order to prevent the most gross injustice. The act in question is one of these. It is a wise and just act. It governs this case, and justifies the court in admitting this deed in evidence. * * * The registration being thus validated, copies of such deeds stand on the same footing with other legally registered deeds, of which copies are made evidence by the law." See, also, 6 A. & E. 939; Barrett v. Barrett, 120 N. C. 131, 26 S. E. 691, 36 L. R. A. 226; Gordon v. Collett, 107 N. C. 364, 12 S. E. 332; Vanderbilt v. Johnson, 141 N. C. 370, 54 S. E. 298.

The county of Camden adjoins the county of Pasquotank, and the copy of the deed duly certified by the register of the former county was properly registered in the latter county, and the certified copy of this final registry should have been admitted in evidence. What the legal effect of the deed will be in its bearing upon the facts of the case as they are disclosed by the evidence we cannot now decide. There was error in refusing to admit the deed.

Defendant's counsel contend that the nonsuit was taken in deference to the judge's decision that sufficient evidence of the loss of the original deed had not been introduced to let in parol evidence of its execution and contents, but it appears to us that the reason for the nonsuit should not be confined within such narrow limits, but extended to the entire adverse ruling. The exclusion of the deed was the real question involved, as it was a necessary link in the plaintiff's chain of title.

New trial.

Action by R. T. Dickerson against E. E. Dail. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. C. Harding and Harry Skinner, for appellant. W. F. Evans, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The exceptions set out in the record relate to rulings upon the evidence, and all belong to one of two classes. In the first class the questions are set out, but there is no statement as to the answer of the witness when the question was admitted, nor as to the evidence sought to be elicited when it was excluded; and, as we cannot see that the defendant has been prejudiced, the exceptions cannot be sustained. State v. Leak, 156 N. C. 643, 72 S. E. 567. If, however, the evidence was of the character indicated on the argument, we are of opinion that there was no error in the rulings of the court.

[2] The other exceptions relate to the exclusion of evidence as to facts in mitigation of damages, which are not alleged in the answer, and it is settled that such evidence is not admissible. Upchurch v. Robertson, 127 N. C. 127, 37 S. E. 157. We find no error. Affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Foushee, Judge.

Action by Sherman Pritchard and others against I. H. Smith. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. No error.

This is a civil action brought by the plaintiffs, heirs at law of Benjamin Pritchard, deceased, to recover the sum of $1,000 for the fraudulent purchase and subsequent sale of land, and for the cancellation of deeds alleged to have been fraudulently procured by the defendant from plaintiff's ancestor.

Benjamin Pritchard was an old and ignorant negro, who could not read or write. He had frequent dealings with the defendant in 1889 and in 1903; their relations in each instance being that of mortgagor and mortgagee. The defendant, as appears from his own testimony, is a money lender, and a man of intelligence and shrewdness, being far superior, in that respect, to Benjamin Pritchard. Benjamin Pritchard's land was advertised to be sold under a mortgage for $90 to J. W. Stewart on April 22, 1903. On April 10, 1903, he executed a mortgage to Smith covering the same land. On the same day, after the execution of the mortgage, Benjamin Pritchard made a deed to defendant Smith for the same land. On April the 22d the land was sold under the Stewart mortgage and bought by Stewart's wife. On April 24th, two days later, Smith obtained from Stewart and wife a deed for the same land. On October 24, 1904, Benjamin Pritchard and wife executed to Smith a deed for 25 acres of land, which recited a consideration of $100, which Smith said he paid for the dower right of the wife. This was a portion of the land covered by the deed from Stewart to Smith and by the mortgage and deed from Pritchard to Smith. Later, November 21, 1904, Benjamin Pritchard executed a mortgage to Mark Dissoway, covering this same land and containing a warranty against incumbrances. This mortgage was witnessed by S. F. Faison, Smith's confidential clerk, who had witnessed the mortgage of Pritchard to Smith on April 10, 1903, and the deed between the same parties on the same day. The note secured by the mortgage to Dissoway was indorsed by Smith, who afterwards paid it for Pritchard. Benjamin Pritchard died June 17, 1905, being about 70 years of age.

The mortgage from Pritchard to Smith, dated April 10, 1903, was probated on the evidence of the witness Faison, before the clerk of the court, on April 11, 1903; but it was not recorded until January 13, 1906, two years and nine months after its execution and nearly seven months after Pritchard's death. The deed executed the same day, covering the same land, was also probated April 11, 1903, before the clerk, on the evidence of the same witness. This deed was not recorded until January 15, 1909, five years after its execution and three years and six months after Pritchard's death. The defendant, in 1906, advertised the land for sale, under the power in the mortgage of April 10, 1903; but the sale was stopped by the attorney of one of the plaintiffs. Defendant conveyed the land to Lon M. Gilbert April 19, 1909, who was a purchaser for value and without notice. The letters written by the defendant to the widow of Benjamin Pritchard, and other evidence, tended to show that the defendant claimed to hold the land as security for his debt. He demanded payment of the debt that she might save her land, and alluded to the other mortgage on the land, held by Dissoway. The letters to Pritchard and wife were written prior to the time that the land was advertised for sale by the defendant under his mortgage of April 10, 1903.

There was evidence by the defendant's witness that on April 10, 1903, after the mortgage of Pritchard to Smith was executed, Smith discovered that Stewart held a mortgage on the land and had advertised the land for sale, and thereupon requested Pritchard to cancel the mortgage and restore the money which he had received, which Pritchard declined to do, and it was then agreed that Pritchard should make an absolute deed for the land to Smith, which was done on that day, and the notes and mortgages given by Pritchard to Smith were then canceled; the consideration of this transaction being the surrender by Smith to Pritchard of certain personal property conveyed by the mortgage. There was evidence as to the amount advanced by Smith to Pritchard, from time to time, in the various transactions between them, covered by the notes, deeds, and mortgage, and also evidence that Smith had received payments from Pritchard by the collection of the latter's pension warrants. At the close of the evidence, the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff. Motion denied, and defendant excepted. The court submitted to the jury an issue as to whether the deed for the land had been procured by the fraud of Smith, and as to the damages. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on both issues, and assessed the damages at $170. The court charged the jury fully upon the question of fraud, and upon the issues as to the damages, but instructed them to ascertain how much had been advanced by the defendant to Benjamin Pritchard, and how much the defendant had received from him, and further to ascertain the value of the land and to deduct therefrom the amount, if any, due by Pritchard to Smith, and also the value of the interest of one of the heirs, which Smith had purchased, and other items mentioned in the charge, and strike the balance. Judgment was entered upon a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed.

R. W. Williamson, for appellant. H. C. Whitehurst and R. E. Whitehurst, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The plaintiffs have elected, in this case, to sue for the value of the land or of their equity of redemption therein, instead of canceling the entire transactions which culminated in the fraudulent acquisition of the title to the several tracts of land belonging to the ancestor, Benjamin Pritchard; but the settlement between the parties has been conducted, under the perfectly fair and benign charge of the learned judge, upon principles obtaining in chancery, where the jurisdiction exercised is more flexible and tolerant than it would be strictly at law. Clements v. Nicholson, 73 U. S. 299, 18 L. Ed. 786. Plaintiffs have acquiesced in this adjustment, and defendant certainly has no right of objection to it. It has the clear merit of being favorable and just to him and an exemplification of the advantage in the new procedure, under which the legal and equitable rights of litigants are more carefully guarded and enforced than under the former system. A close examination of the testimony in the case satisfies us that Benjamin Pritchard, at the time the deeds were executed, was enfeebled by old age and physical infirmities to such an extent that his mental faculties were greatly impaired, and he was not able to take care of his interests in any dealing with the defendant, and that the latter took advantage of his weakness and imbecility to effect an advantageous bargain for himself. He was evidently the master of the situation and held the will of his victim in complete subjection to his own. It further appears that the consideration for the deeds was not fair or adequate; the real value of the land far exceeding the outlay by Smith.

[2] It must be noted, also, that he held a mortgage with power of sale, executed by Pritchard to him, and stood therefore in a confidential relation toward Pritchard. By their verdict, the jury have found these facts, and others disclosed by the evidence, which show weakness and dependence on the one side, and shrewdness and unfettered domination on the other. "It is an established doctrine, founded on a great principle of public policy, that a conveyance obtained by one whose position gave him power and influence over the grantor, without proof of actual fraud, shall not stand at all, if without consideration, and that, where there has been a partial or inadequate consideration, it shall stand only as a security for the sum paid or advanced." Bellamy v. Andrews, 151 N. C. 256, 65 S. E. 963, citing the following cases: Huguenin v. Basely, 14 Vesey, Jr., 273; Harvey v. Mount, 8 Beavan, 487; Dent v. Burnett, 4 Myl. & Cr. 269; Buffalow v. Buffalow, 22 N. C. 241; Mullins v. McCandless, 57 N. C. 425; Futrill v. Futrill, 58 N. C. 64; Id., 59 N. C. 337; Franklin v. Ridenhour, 58 N. C. 421. It has been said that a deed will be set aside on the ground of undue influence, which is a species of legal and moral fraud, only where the influence is such that the grantor has no free will, but stands in vinculis. Conley v. Nailor, 118 U. S. 127, 6 Sup. Ct. 1001, 80 L. Ed. 112. And this rule, if applied to the facts of the case, would equally condemn the transactions assailed by the plaintiffs. But the defendant was mortgagee, with a power of sale, which added much to the power he held over his weak adversary. Approving what is stated in Bigelow on Fraud, p. 160, the court (by Justice Ruffin) said, in McLeod v. Bullard, 84 N. C. 516, that there are certain relations, termed relations of confidence, from the existence of which the law raises a presumption of fraud in any dealings that may take place between the parties, because of the undue advantage which the situation itself gives to one over the other. Of these "relations of confidence" he enumerates eight in number and in the following order: Attorney and client; principal and agent; partners; trustees and cestuis que trustent; guardian and ward; executors and administrators; mortgagor and mortgagee; parent and child. Thus he places the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee with the other well-defined and universally acknowledged fiduciary relations. Upon principle this should be so. It is due to good faith and common honesty that such a presumption should arise in every case where confidence is reposed and the property and interests of one person are committed to another. To every such person his trust should be a sacred charge, not to be regarded with a covetous eye. The court, in that case, adopted as a correct statement of the law the following language of Chief Justice Pearson in Whitehurst v. Hellen, 76 N. C. 99; "Courts of equity look with jealousy upon all dealings between trustees and cestuis que trustent; and, if the mortgagor had by deed released his equity of redemption to his mortgagee, we should have required the purchaser to take the burden of proof and satisfy us that the man whom he had in his power, manacled and fettered, had without undue influence and for a fair consideration released his right to redeem." The same principle was announced in Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 76. The cases, therefore, have established this rule as to the fiduciary relation: "Where a mortgagee buys the equity of redemption of his mortgagor, the law presumes fraud, and the burden of proof is upon the mortgagee to show the bona fides of the transaction." Jones v. Pullen, 115 N. C. 465, 20 S. E. 624. It follows that when the defendant took a deed absolute for the property, on which, at the same time, he held a mortgage, there arose a presumption of fraud against him, which was evidence for the jury to consider in connection with the other circumstances, and the jury have found that the presumption has not been met by the defendant and the bona fides of the transaction shown, but that the very truth of the matter is in accordance with the presumption.

mortgage, does not help his case to the extent, as he contends, of vesting an unimpeachable title in him. It was held in Taylor v. Heggie, 83 N. C. 244, that a second mortgagee has no right to buy the estate of his mortgagor at a sale to satisfy a prior incumbrance, but he has a clear equity to be reimbursed for any expenditure, to relieve the estate of any incumbrances, and the property in his hands is charged therewith in preference to the trusts expressed in the mortgage deed. When defendant bought from the Stewarts, he only increased the indebtedness of Pritchard, the mortgagor, to him, by the amount of his payment to them for their interest, and acquired a lien upon the land for the additional amount so advanced. We find a felicitous statement of this doctrine in Taylor v. Heggie, supra, approving what is said by Judge Gaston in Boyd v. Hawkins, 37 N. C. 304: "We hold it to be clear," said Gaston, J., "that the defendant cannot take to himself the benefit of the purchase from Robards. A trustee, without the unequivocal assent of the cestui que trust, cannot act for his own benefit in a contract on the subject of the trust. It is established upon the soundest principles that, if he should so contract expressly for himself, he shall not be suffered to turn the speculation to his own advantage." While, then, the trustee is disabled from acquiring a paramount title in another to the trust estate for his personal advantage, and in disregard of the equitable interests of those represented by him, he has a clear right to reimbursement of the moneys expended in making the purchase or removing the incumbrance, and the estate in his hands is charged therewith in preference to the trusts expressed in the deed."

These principles fit into this case, when we recall the facts. Defendant took a mortgage on the land, subject to Stewart's prior mortgage. The same day he took an absolute deed for the property, upon the same consideration as expressed in his mortgage, with knowledge of the prior mortgage of Stewart and the fact that the latter had advertised the land for sale. He afterwards buys from the Stewarts and withholds all the deeds from registration until some time after Pritchard's death. He then buys other land from Pritchard and takes deeds therefor; there being evidence that the consideration for the several deeds was inadequate and for much less than the real value of the land. He offered the evidence of his confidential clerk to prove that the deed of April 10, 1903, to him was given with the understanding that he should surrender certain personal property belonging to Pritchard, upon which he had a lien, and cancel the mortgage of the same date, and yet in 1906 he has the mortgage registered and advertises the land for sale under it, and in other ways he indicated by his conduct that he regarded the mortgage as still on foot and the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee as still subsisting. It is impossible to scan the evidence and not conclude from these facts, virtually uncontroverted, either that the defendant had practiced a fraud upon Pritchard by which he procured title to his land, or that he must be considered as still a mortgagee by his own words and conduct. Either view leads to substantially the same result and sustains the verdict and judgment, as to the cause of action.

[4] We have indicated that plaintiff could select to sue for damages at law, or proceed in equity to have the deed canceled. But it appears that the land had passed to a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of the fraud, and in such a case it is clear that, as the plaintiff cannot recover the land in specie, he can have a money judgment for the loss caused by the defendant's fraud. Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 163, 52 S. E. 666, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827. It was there said: "Wellborn having sold the land to a bona fide purchaser, and thereby deprived his vendor of the land itself, and having received the price, he must, by reason of his fraudulent disposition of property, which he is considered to have held in trust, and of its conversion into money, be held responsible for the amount of the consideration paid to him. The money in his hands stands for the land. Wait, Fraud. Conv. (3d Ed.) § 178; Holland v. Anderson, 38 Mo. 55; Lawrence v. Bank, 35 N. Y. 320; Dilworth v. Carts, 139 Ill. 508, 29 N. E. 861; Hazen v. Bank, 70 Vt. 543, 41 Atl. 1046, 67 Am. St. Rep. 680. But the administration of this relief is eminently proper under the reformed procedure, where the rights of parties are settled and determined in one action; the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity having been abolished. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 242." The actual loss to plaintiff was ascertained upon equitable principles, all pertinent items having been brought into the account, leaving, therefore, no ground for complaint to the defendant.

[5, 6] The evidence as to the fraudulent character of the deeds, other than the mortgage, was clearly competent, as they were all but parts of one and the same series of acts to effect a common object. It was proper to consider all of them in order to arrive at the intent of the defendant and to determine the true nature of the transaction. Gilmer v. Hanks, 84 N. C. 317. The value of the lands was relevant evidence upon the question of fraud. There was no error in refusing the plaintiff's motion to nonsuit. This is a clear deduction from what we have already said in regard to the general question involved in this case.

No error.

CITY OF NEW BERN v. ATLANTIC & N. C. RY. CO.

RAILROADS (§ 75*)—MAINTENANCE OF CITY STREETS—CONTRACT OF FRANCHISE—"GOOD ORDER AND CONDITION."

A franchise by which a railway company obtained a right of way through a city street provided that such railroad would "keep and preserve in good order for the use of the citizens of the town" that particular street. Held, the obligation of the railroad will not be measured by the size and condition of the city at the time the contract was entered into, but by the new and improved methods of paving demanded by its growth and changing conditions, which must have been within the purview of the parties at the time of making the contract, so that the railroad must provide a permanent pavement, where it was necessary to provide the public with the same accommodations as were afforded by similar streets of the city (citing 4 Words & Phrases, 8125).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 183-191; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Whedbee, Judge.

Injunction by the City of New Bern against the Atlantic & North Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

The purpose of the action is to secure a mandatory injunction commanding the defendant to pave Hancock street in accordance with the terms of a written contract, entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 12th day of April, 1856.

Moore & Dunn, for appellant. W. D. McIver and R. A. Nunn, for appellee.

BROWN, J. It appears in the statement of facts that, at the time this road was constructed, it was granted the franchise by the municipal authorities of New Bern, whereby it obtained the right of way for its railroad through Hancock street, with a right to construct its roadbed and run its cars thereon. The consideration of the franchise is expressed in the written contract entered into between the defendant and the municipal authorities as follows: "Said railroad company shall, under the supervision of the town authorities and their engineers or agents, grade said Hancock street and keep and preserve the same in good order for the use of the citizens of the town, except the sidewalks, and shall provide ample and convenient crossings of said railroad where the same may intersect any of the streets of the town, and build and construct all necessary aqueducts for the draining of said streets." It seems to be admitted that the decision of this case depends entirely upon the construction of this contract, and the determination as to what obligation the defendant assumed.

sideration of the use of Hancock street as a right of way, granted to it by the city authorities, the defendant assumed and promised to perform in respect to said street, except the sidewalks, the obligations which the municipality owed to its citizens in respect to the keeping up of the street. This obligation is not to be measured by the size and condition of the city at the time when the contract was entered into. The increase of population and the consequent growth of the city must necessarily have been within the purview of the parties at the time the contract was made.

In a case very similar to the one at bar, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania says: "The proposition that, because cobblestone was the kind of pavement ordinarily in use when defendant company was chartered, it is in no event bound to repave with any other and more expensive kind of material, etc., is wholly untenable. It cannot be entertained for a moment. It was never contemplated that the railway company would continue to exist and perform its corporate functions in a cobblestone age. It was called into being with the view of progress. The duties specified in its charter were imposed, with reference to the changes and improved methods of street paving, which experience might sanction as superior to and more economical than old methods. In other words, the company is bound to keep pace with the progress of the age in which it continues to exercise its corporate functions."

The phrase "keep and preserve in good order for the use of the citizens of the town" is to be construed with reference to the purpose to be accomplished, and to the character of the object to which the words apply. As has been said: "To keep the street in repair is to have it in such state as that the ordinary and expected travel of the locality may pass with reasonable ease and safety." McMahon v. Railroad Company, 75 N. Y. 236.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in construing language very similar to that in the contract under consideration, says: "A provision in a charter of a toll bridge corporation that the bridge should at all times be kept in good, safe and passable repair, meant in such condition as befitted a public highway, and safe and convenient for all kinds of travel at all seasons and at all times, by day and night." Commonwealth v. Central Bridge Corporation, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 242, 244; 4 Words & Phrases, 3125.

The Supreme Court of Georgia, in City of Atlanta v. Buchanan, 76 Ga. 589, says: "'To keep,' applied to streets, sidewalks and bridges, might very reasonably include the idea expressed by the words 'to construct, to make,' especially when coupled with the words 'in a reasonably safe condition for travel.' To keep a street in such safe condition means to have it so, to make and remake it so, to construct that sort of bridge, and reconstruct it when rotten or out of repair."

But the defendant contends that, although it is obligated to preserve and keep Hancock street in good order, such obligation does not go to the extent of requiring it to pave the street, and the defendant cites a number of authorities in support of this contention. The defendant is confronted, however, in respect to this contention with an admission in the case agreed as follows: "It is further admitted that by reason of the increased travel over said Hancock street, and by reason of the growth of the city and increase of the traffic through its streets, it is impossible to keep and maintain the said Hancock street in good order as a dirt street, it being at the time of the execution of said contract a dirt street, and it has so remained up to this date; that, in order to insure the public a reasonable use of the same, it has become necessary that the same should be paved with some permanent material. It is also agreed that it has remained and been used as a dirt street from date of contract to this time."

In construing the language of an ordinance granting a franchise similar to this, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania says: "That the franchise to occupy and the obligation to keep in repair are coextensive, and that whatever the duty of a municipality would have been in respect to the streets where the tracks are laid is now the duty of the railway company laying and using the tracks." Philadelphia v. Railway Company, 169 Pa. 270, 33 Atl. 126; City of Atlanta v. Buchanan, supra.

In a case somewhat similar, the Supreme Court of Minnesota says that this duty is a continuing one and has reference to future exigencies, and requires the railroad company from time to time to put the street in such condition as changed circumstances may render necessary for its proper enjoyment and use by the public. Minneapolis v. Railway Company, 35 Minn. 131, 28 N. W. 3, 59 Am. Rep. 313. In the opinion the learned Judge Mitchell goes on to say: "The condition of the street might be entirely adequate for the accommodation of the public under one condition of things, and entirely inadequate under another; and consequently a provision which at one juncture would be a discharge of this statutory duty would at another amount to its violation."

The learned counsel for the defendant has cited a number of authorities which apparently sustain his proposition that the defendant cannot be compelled to pave this street, but that its obligation is confined to keeping it in repair as a dirt street. While the cases appear on first view to be somewhat conflicting, yet all of the cases cited by the defendant seem to be founded upon the leading case of Chicago v. Sheldon, 9 Wall. 50, 19 L. Ed. 594. An examination of that case discloses that the ordinance in question, by which the city of Chicago granted to the railway company the right to construct a railway, set out with minute particularity the duties which the railway company was to perform, and specified those duties as relating to the "grading, paving, macadamizing, filling, or planking of the streets or parts of the streets upon which they shall construct their railways."

The Supreme Court of the United States held that under the language of this ordinance the company could not be held liable for curbing, grading, and paving the streets with entirely new pavement, and that the obligation of the company extended to repairs only. We do not think the case is similar to the one under consideration. In our case the defendant has assumed an obligation to keep and preserve the street in good order for the use of the citizens of the town, except the sidewalks, and it is admitted in the case agreed that this obligation can only be kept in order to insure the public a reasonable use of Hancock street by paving it with some permanent material.

It is admitted that all the other streets of the city, with the exception of one, are paved with modern paving material, and that that street is not a very important street, and is paved with oyster shells. The public have the right to use Hancock street, and it is admitted that there is much passing and hauling upon it. Inasmuch as the defendant cannot keep it and preserve it in good order and condition as a dirt street so that the public may use it, we think its obligation can only be met by paving it with some substantial material.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

ELKS v. NORTH STATE LIFE INS. CO.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 15*)—MEETING OF MINDS.

To create a valid contract, the minds of the parties must meet on a definite proposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-66; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 26*)—CONVERSATIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

Where an alleged contract is made by conversations and correspondence, the whole must be considered, and though parts, taken alone, appear to constitute a contract, yet if the whole shows that there were other terms contemplated by both parties as essential to the contract, on which they fail to agree, there is no contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 119, 120; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 32*)—REQUISITES—REDUCTION TO WRITING.

Where the minds of the parties meet on a proposition which is sufficiently definite to be enforced, the contract is complete, though the parties contemplate it shall be reduced to writing; but where the parties are merely negotiating, and the writing is to be the contract, there is no contract until the writing is executed.

4. CONTRACTS (§ 16*)—OFFER—ACCEPTANCE.

Where an offer and acceptance are relied on to make a contract, the offer must be one which is intended of itself to create legal relations on acceptance; and the offer intended to create legal relations must be so complete that, on acceptance, an agreement containing all the necessary terms is formed.

5. CONTRACTS (§ 9*)—REQUISITES—DEFINITENESS.

Where the minds of the parties have met, and the terms have been agreed on, a contract, to be enforceable, must be definite and certain, or capable of being made so.

6. CONTRACTS (§ 9*)—REQUISITES—DEFINITENESS.

Plaintiff applied to an insurance company for a loan, to be evidenced by a note secured by a real estate mortgage. The finance committee of the company approved the application, and the attorney of the company, passing on the title, found it good. The terms of the loan were not agreed on. Held, that a contract to make a loan was not made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 10-20; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Foushee, Judge.

Action by J. L. Elks against the North State Life Insurance Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This action is to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract to lend the plaintiff $1,000. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that he held a life policy in the defendant company, and that in 1910 he applied to the defendant to lend him $1,000; that he told J. F. Stokes, an agent of the defendant, who had authority to solicit insurance and to collect premiums, but no authority to make loans or to take applications therefor, that he wanted some money, and that Stokes said he could get some; that most of the correspondence in reference to the loans was between the said Stokes and the defendant; that the security named for the loan by the plaintiff was a mortgage on real estate; that, before loans were made by the defendant, it was required by its by-laws that the title to the property offered as security should be passed on by its attorney, and the loan approved by its finance committee; that, prior to a written application for the money, the general manager of the defendant said to Stokes, in reference to the loan to the plaintiff, "Go, take his application, and get up his papers, and, if his security is all right, we will lend it to him right away;" that in a few days thereafter a written application for the money and an abstract of the title to the real estate offered as security were forwarded to the defendant; that soon thereafter the said Stokes went to the home office of the defendant, and had a conversation with the president and general counsel of the defendant, whose duty it was to pass on the title, and asked him about the loan to the plaintiff, and he replied that he thought the loan was made; that the papers and everything left his office several days prior to that time, and all had been approved, and that the loan had been approved; that the said Stokes told the plaintiff of his conversation with the general manager and the president, but he was not directed to do so by either; that the plaintiff told the said Stokes that he wanted to pay some debts to rebuild his mill and to aid in cultivating his farm with the money, and that Stokes communicated this to the general manager; that by reason of his failure to get the money he was not able to pay his debts, and his credit was impaired, that his mill washed out, and the yield of his crops was decreased.

The application was not introduced in evidence, and there is nothing to indicate the terms of the loan, or the time when it was to be payable; nor is there any evidence that the plaintiff was not able to borrow the money elsewhere on the same security. There was much correspondence between the parties, and, soon after it closed, the plaintiff borrowed $1,200 on the security offered to the defendant. The defendant, through its general manager, wrote the said Stokes the following letters in regard to the loan, the contents of which were communicated to the plaintiff; the parts of the letters not bearing on this controversy being omitted:

"Kinston, N. C., February 14, 1910.

"I have your favor of the 10th inst., inclosing abstracts of the Elks property, and write to say that I will push this through as rapidly as possible. Will turn it over to our finance committee to-day. If the security is all right—that is to say, satisfactory to them—I think we ought to be able to get it through within a week or ten days."

"Kinston, N. C., March 2, 1910.

"Replying to your favor of the 1st inst., concerning the Elks loan, I beg to say that the investigation and examination of title and preparation of papers, etc., has been about completed, I think. The fact is that I have been away from the home office so much that I have been unable to give it personal attention; and the further fact is that I have to leave to-night to attend Gaston court. I will not be able to return until the last of this week, and during the first two days of next week will be quite busy with the directors' meeting and the stockholders' meeting. Immediately after that I will endeavor to get this matter closed up quickly, and think I can safely promise to do so."

"Kinston, N. C., June 24, 1910.

"Our executive committee has decided to grant Mr. Corey an extension to the 1st of December. This extension, and the extension of a much larger loan, which was to have been repaid, has made it out of the question for us to effect any new loans at the present time. However, I will say to you that we are endeavoring to be in shape to take care of the Elks matter in the not far distant future. It is impossible for me to tell you at just what time this can be done, but I assure you that it shall be done at the earliest possible moment. Regretting very much that there should ever have been any delay or misunderstanding about this matter, and with kindest regards and best wishes, I remain."

"Kinston, N. C., June 27, 1910.

"Now, as to your position with reference to the Elks matter, I beg to say that, while the income is exceedingly slim during the summer months, I shall watch it every day, and at the very first possible opportunity I shall see that the Elks matter is closed up and the money sent to him."

"Kinston, N. C., September 9, 1910.

"Replying to your favor of the 7th inst., in which you make inquiry as to whether or not we will be able to handle the Elks loan by October 1st, I beg to advise that it now appears impossible for us to do this by October 1st. Collections have been very dull during the summer, and so has business generally, while our outgo has been considerably larger than usual in every direction. As you say, collections are looking up very sharply now; but I have no idea they will be sufficient to justify me in promising to handle the Elks loan by October 1st. I wish I could do so. You can rest assured that both the Elks and the May loans will be taken up at the very first available opportunity—that is, so far as I am at liberty to make a promise in the matter."

"Kinston, N. C., November 2, 1910.

"Replying to your favor of 2d inst., in re loan to Mr. Elks, I am very sorry that I failed to write you promptly to the effect that our committee would not take any except regular action in this matter. You will recall that I promised you that, in so far as I could control the matter, the loan to Mr. Elks should be the first one made. That is as far as I can go now, except to express the hope that this matter will not have to 'hang fire' very much longer."

"Kinston, N. C., December 3, 1910.

"Replying to your favor of the 30th ult., in which you inclose abstract of title of lands of Mr. Z. T. Evans, I beg to say that I have submitted this and the Elks and May loan also, and am directed to say to you that the company will be compelled to decline making these loans, because of expenditures that have been decided upon in connection with the extension of the company's business, and the Intermediate Department particularly."

At the conclusion of the evidence, his honor, being of opinion that the plaintiff had failed to prove a contract, entered a judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Julius Brown and S. J. Everett, both of Greenville, for appellant. Rouse & Land, of Kinston, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. This appeal presents one question for our decision, and that is whether the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, construed most favorably for him, establishes a contract between him and the defendant. Before considering the evidence, it is well to have in mind some of the elements that enter into a valid contract, so that we may see if the plaintiff has met the requirements of the law.

[1] It is elementary that it is necessary that the minds of the parties meet upon a definite proposition. "There is no contract unless the parties thereto assent, and they must assent to the same thing, in the same sense. A contract requires the assent of the parties to an agreement, and this agreement must be obligatory, and, as we have seen, the obligation must, in general, be mutual." 1 Pars. Cont. 475.

[2] If the alleged contract is made by conversations and correspondence, the whole must be considered; and although certain parts, taken alone, appear to constitute a binding agreement, if the whole correspondence and negotiations show that there were other terms contemplated by both parties as essential to the proposed contract, on which they fail to agree, there is no contract. Hussey v. Horne-Payne, 4 App. Cas. 312. The leading opinion in this case was written by Lord Cairns, and Lord Selborne, concurring, sums up the conclusion of the court as follows: "The observation has often been made that a contract established by letters may sometimes bind parties who, when they wrote those letters, did not imagine that they were finally settling the terms of the agreement by which they were to be bound; and it appears to me that no such contract ought to be held established, even by letters which would otherwise be sufficient for the purpose, if it is clear, upon the facts, that there were other conditions of the intended contract, beyond and besides those expressed in the letters, which were still in a state of negotiation only, and without the settlement of which the parties had no idea of concluding any agreement."

[3] If the minds of the parties meet upon a proposition, which is sufficiently definite to be enforced, the contract is complete, although it is in the contemplation of the parties that it shall be reduced to writing as a memorial or evidence of the contract; but if it appears that the parties are merely negotiating to see if they can agree upon terms, and that the writing is to be the contract, then there is no contract until the writing is executed. Winn v. Bull, 7 Ch. D. 31; Pratt v. Railroad, 21 N. Y. 308; Miss. Steam. Co. v. Swift, 86 Me. 248, 29 Atl. 1063, 41 Am. St. Rep. 545; Rankin v. Mitchem, 141 N. C. 280, 53 S. E. 854. In the case from Maine, the authorities, English and American, are reviewed, and the court says: "From these expressions of courts and jurists, it is quite clear that after all the question is mainly one of intention. If the party sought to be charged intended to close a contract prior to the formal signing of a written draft, he will be bound by the contract actually made, though the signing of the written draft be omitted. If, on the other hand, such party neither had nor signified such an intention to close the contract until it was fully expressed in a written instrument and attested by signatures, then he will not be bound until the signatures are affixed. The expression of the idea may be attempted in other words; if the written draft is viewed by the parties merely as a convenient memorial or record of their previous contract, its absence does not affect the binding force of the contract; if, however, it is viewed as the consummation of the negotiation, there is no contract until the written draft is finally signed. In determining which view is entertained in any particular case, several circumstances may be helpful, as whether the contract is of that class which are usually found to be in writing, whether it is of such nature as to need a formal writing for its full expression, whether it has few or many details, whether the amount involved is large or small, whether it is a common or unusual contract, whether the negotiations themselves indicate that a written draft is contemplated as a final conclusion of the negotiations. If a written draft is proposed, suggested, or referred to, during the negotiations, it is some evidence that the parties intended it to be the final closing of the contract."

[4] Contracts are usually made by an offer by one party and an acceptance by the other, and it is in this way, the plaintiff contends, a contract was completed between him and the defendant. When an offer and acceptance are relied on to make a contract, "the offer must be one which is intended of itself to create legal relations on acceptance. It must not be an offer intended merely to open negotiations, which will ultimately result in a contract, or intended to call forth an offer in legal form from the party to whom it is addressed." 1 Page on Contracts, § 26. "The offer, even if intended to create legal relations, must be so complete that, upon acceptance, an agreement is formed which contains all the terms necessary to determine whether the contract has been performed or not. An offer in which the price is not fixed, and yet is so specified that it is evidence that the parties did not intend merely whatever should be a reasonable compensation, is not definite enough." 1 Page on Contracts, § 27. "The offer must not merely be complete in terms, but the terms must be sufficiently definite to enable the court to determine ultimately whether the contract has been performed or not. If no breach of the contract could be assigned, which could be measured by any test of damages from the contract, it has been said to be too indefinite to be enforceable, and this vice is usually due to the form of the offer." 1 Page on Contracts, § 28. The same principle is declared in Tanning Co. v. Telegraph Co., 143 N. C. 378, 55 S. E. 777, in which Justice Brown, speaking for the court, says: "The offer must be distinct as such, and not merely an invitation to enter into negotiations upon a certain basis. Wire Works v. Sorrell, 142 Mass. 442 [8 N. E. 332]; Beaupre v. Telegraph Co., 21 Minn. 155; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. 1029, and cases cited. Again, the offer must specify the specific quantity to be furnished, as a mere acceptance of an indefinite offer will not create a binding contract. McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder, 115 Ga. 408 [41 S. E. 664]; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. 1030, note 1, and cases cited. 'The offer must be one which is intended of itself to create legal relations on acceptance. It must not be an offer merely to open negotiations, which will ultimately result in a contract.' 1 Page on Contracts, § 26, and cases cited; Clark on Contracts, § 29."

[5] If the minds of the parties have met, and the terms have been agreed to, it does not always follow that a contract is complete, and such a one as can be enforced, although not illegal, as the law demands that the terms shall be definite and certain, or capable of being made so. Silverthorn v. Fowle, 49 N. C. 363; Spragins v. White, 108 N. C. 453, 13 Pac. 171; Thomas v. Shooting Club, 123 N. C. 287, 31 S. E. 654; Price v. Price, 133 N. C. 515, 45 S. E. 855. In the first of these cases it was held that a contract to tow a raft of timber was void on account of indefiniteness, which provided that the raft was "to be ready when corn was done"; and in the last the court says: "That an agreement may be valid, it is necessary that the parties use language sufficiently clear for it to be understood with reasonable certainty what they mean; and if an agreement is so vague that it is not possible to gather from it the intention of the parties, it is void, for neither the court nor the jury can make an agreement for the parties." Having determined the elements entering into a completed contract under conditions existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, let us see if the plaintiff has met the requirements of the law.

[8] We are of opinion he has not. (1) When all the evidence is considered, including the correspondence, it amounts to no more than negotiations for a contract, and the conduct of the plaintiff shows that he so understood it. He claims now that the finance committee of the defendant approved his application, and that this made the contract complete; but he made no such claim when the contents of the letters set out in the evidence were communicated to him. (2) No promise on the part of the defendant, express or implied, to lend the plaintiff $1,000, is proven. The approval by the finance committee, if made, was not such. It is merely a safeguard adopted by the defendant as preliminary to a loan. The attorney passes upon the title, and the committee examines the security and the condition of the finances, and, if the reports of both are favorable, the defendant makes the loan. (3) The agreement, as contended for by the plaintiff, shows that the transaction was not completed, and that other terms were to be agreed to, or it is so indefinite that it cannot be enforced.

The plaintiff says he offered to borrow $1,000 of the defendant, and that the defendant accepted his offer. It is agreed that a note and mortgage were to be executed by the plaintiff to consummate the contract; but he tendered neither to the defendant. The reason he did not is obvious. He did not know how to write the note and mortgage, and no lawyer could have prepared them, because stipulations necessary to a complete contract had not been discussed or agreed to, to wit, the time the loan was to run. It is certain the plaintiff did not intend to borrow $1,000 payable one day after date, because he says he needed the money to use in payment of debts, in repairing a mill, and in cultivating crops, and, if not payable one day after date, when was it to be due? Suppose the defendant had said, "Prepare your note and mortgage, and I will lend you the money payable in two months," or three months, or six months, is it not certain that the plaintiff had the right to say, "I do not want the money on such short time, and have not promised to take it," and if the plaintiff had said the note must become due one year or two years from date, that the defendant could have declined to lend on such terms, because it had not promised to do so? If so, terms which were necessary to complete the contract had not been agreed to.

The right of action on contracts to lend money is considered in Coles v. L. Co., 150 N. C. 188, 63 S. E. 736; but the discussion there is not material in this case, as the court was then dealing with the measure of damages, and not with the question whether a contract had been made. We are of opinion that no contract has been established, and that the judgment of nonsuit was properly entered.

Affirmed.

WHITEHURST v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 25, 1912.)

1. DEATH (§ 11*)—DEATH OF SERVANT—RIGHT OF PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE TO SUE.

Where an employé died during the pendency of his action for injuries from his employer's negligence, his personal representative could sue for wrongful death from such injuries.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—DEATH OF SERVANT—VIOLATION OF MASTER'S RULES.

That a servant was violating a rule of his employer, forbidding its station agents to ride on freight trains, at the time he was injured, would not prevent his personal representative from recovering for his death, where the rule was repeatedly broken by other station agents, with the knowledge of the defendant's conductors and trainmasters, as such rule will be considered abrogated and waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 682, 759-775; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Foushee, Judge.

Action by J. R. Whitehurst, administrator, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Julius Brown, of Greenville, and Ward, Grimes & Pierce, of Washington D. C., for appellant. Harry Skinner, of Greenville, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The plaintiff's intestate began an action for injuries sustained by the negligence of the defendant. He died before the termination of that action, and, the complaint avers, as a result of said injuries. It was competent for his personal representative to bring this action for wrongful death. Bolick v. R. R., 138 N. C. 372, 50 S. E. 689.

[2] There was evidence tending to show that the intestate was injured by the negligence of the defendant, in that the car was dangerous and antiquated, that the train was running at an unusually high rate of speed, and that the track was not in good condition. The defendant in its answer alleged that the plaintiff's intestate was riding on a freight train in violation of rules of the defendant. There was evidence that the plaintiff's intestate was assistant agent at Pactolus. The plaintiff offered evidence to show that other agents were repeatedly seen riding on the train, with the knowledge of the conductor or trainmaster, notwithstanding the allegation in the answer that it was contrary to the rules of the company to permit any one to ride on such trains. This evidence was rejected by the court. In this there was error. In Biles v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 532, 52 S. E. 131, it is said: "When a rule has been violated so frequently and so openly and for such a length of time that the employers could, with the exercise of ordinary care, have observed its nonobservance, the rule is considered as waived and abrogated."

The nonsuit, we apprehend, was granted upon the ground that the plaintiffs' instigate was wrongfully on the train; but the above evidence, if admitted, would have tended to show that he was rightfully on the train, either as an employé or by permission of the conductor, and that it was the custom for conductors on said road to allow agents, assistant agents, and others to ride on freight trains. Indeed, this evidence was not contradicted, and, even if it had been against the rules of the company, there was no evidence of the fact, for the rule book was not introduced in evidence.

The judgment of nonsuit must be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Carter, Judge.

Action by M. C. Braswell and others against the Pamlico Insurance & Banking Company and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bunn & Spruill and Jacob Battle, all of Rocky Mount, for appellants. G. M. T. Fountain & Son and M. C. Staton, all of Tarboro, for appellees.

BROWN, J. Complaint in this case embodies several alleged causes of action, and asks for quite a variety of relief, and might strictly be regarded as multifarious. As the plaintiffs, however, have abandoned all their causes of action but one, it is not necessary that we should consider the character of the complaint, especially as no such point is made by the defendant. We merely advert to it, in order that it may not be regarded as a precedent.

[1] The cause of action upon which the plaintiffs now rely is founded in tort, and is based upon the allegation that the defendants Staton, Zoeller, and Cobb, officers and directors of the defendant bank, were guilty of fraud and negligence in the conduct of the business of the bank. It is settled that an action can be brought by a creditor or stockholder against the officers, including directors, of a corporation, for losses resulting from their fraud or negligence, without having first applied to the corporation to bring such action. Soloman v. Bates, 118 N. C. 311, 24 S. E. 478, 54 Am. St. Rep. 725; White v. Kincaid, 149 N. C. 415, 63 S. E. 109, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1177, 128 Am. St. Rep. 663.

[2] In furtherance of this allegation, the plaintiffs offer to submit these issues: (1) Did the defendant corporation, under the control of the individual defendants, purchase, or continue to hold, the 175 shares of Tarboro Cotton Factory stock for their own personal ends and to the prejudice of the corporation? (2) If so, what damage has the corporation sustained? We are of opinion, upon a review of the evidence, that his honor properly sustained the motion to nonsuit. It appears that the defendants were stockholders in the Tarboro Cotton Factory, owning 150 shares together, and that the defendant bank owned 175 shares, which had been hypothecated by one Nash as collateral security for a debt of $12,000, upon which he had made default in payment. It also appears that the bank had acquired this stock in consideration of said debt, and that at the stockholders' meeting of the Cotton Factory this stock was generally voted by Mr. Cobb as cashier of the bank, who voted uniformly with the Statons, and they could not control the policy of the Factory without voting the shares of the bank. It appears, furthermore, that the Tarboro Cotton Factory owed the bank $35,000.

It is contended that the defendants refused to sell these shares to H. C. Bridgers, because they desired to retain them in order to protect their individual interests in the Cotton Factory, and that in so doing they were guilty of a fraud. We are unable to see anything in the evidence to support such contention. Bridgers was endeavoring to get sole control of the Cotton Factory. He testifies that he approached Cobb with a view to buying the bank's shares, and asked him to name a figure at which they would sell their holdings, and that Cobb replied that he would not name a figure, unless Bridgers would agree to take the holdings of all the Statons in addition. Bridgers does not say that he made Cobb any offer, but only asked him to name a figure. He states, however, that he was willing to pay par for the stock at that time. There is no evidence that Bridgers ever made a definite proposition to the board of directors to purchase the stock, and there is nothing to warrant the assumption that the directors were actuated by any sinister purpose.

[3] Inasmuch as the Cotton Factory owed the bank $35,000, the directors may have thought that it was the part of wisdom to retain control of the management of the Factory, and not to put it absolutely in the hands of Bridgers. We see nothing in this which suggests a fraudulent purpose or a negligent disregard of the interests of the bank. Assuming that the sequel showed that the directors made a mistake, they are not infallible, and are not held liable for honest mistakes made in the exercise of their authority. 2 Cook on Corporations, pp. 2071, 2072. Directors of corporations are not guarantors that they will make no mistakes in the management of the corporate business. They do not insure the corporation against loss arising either from their own honest mistakes, or from the mistakes of subordinate officers. They are required to exercise reasonable care and business judgment, but nothing further than this. They generally serve without pay, and usually by reason of their interest in the company have a direct concern in its welfare. The law requires them to do no more than exercise ordinary diligence, intelligence, and judgment in the management of the corporate business. Briggs v. Spaulding, 141 U. S. 132, 11 Sup. Ct. 924, 35 L. Ed. 662; 3 Cook on Corporations, § 703; Soloman v. Bates, supra.

MACINTYRE v. MASSEY. (No. 4,172.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 17, 1912.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§§ 236, 239, 241*)—DISSOLUTION—LIABILITY OF RETIRING PARTNER.

After dissolution of a partnership by the retirement of one of the partners, the continuing partner has no power to bind the retiring partner by a new agreement, or, as to him, renew or continue a liability of the firm. In such case the retiring partner becomes a surety to his copartner as to the debts of the partnership before dissolution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 479½, 480, 484-488, 495-499; Dec. Dig. §§ 236, 239, 241.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 239*)—DISSOLUTION—LIABILITY OF RETIRING PARTNER—RELEASE.

A creditor of a partnership, with notice of its dissolution, and with notice of an agreement by the continuing partner to assume the debts of the partnership, is bound thereafter to accord to the retiring partner all the rights of a surety. If, without the knowledge or consent of the retiring partner, the creditor of the partnership, upon a sufficient consideration, extends the time of payment of the firm indebtedness, the retiring partner is released from the indebtedness, and the creditor must thereafter look only to the firm assets and to the individual assets of the continuing partner. The receipt from the continuing partner by the holder of the partnership note of any part of the principal of the note, or of any part of the interest in advance of the time when due, without the knowledge or consent of the retiring partner, as a consideration for an extension of the time of payment of the note would amount in law to a release of the latter's liability on the note.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Mrs. S. A. Massey against W. I. MacIntyre and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant MacIntyre brings error. Reversed.

Massey brought suit against Montgomery & MacIntyre, a firm composed of J. S. Montgomery, Jr., and W. I. MacIntyre, on a promissory note made in the firm name. Neither the copartnership nor Montgomery made any defense. MacIntyre filed a plea, in which he admitted the existence of the partnership prior to and up to January 15, 1910, but alleged that since that date there had been no such partnership, and that J. S. Montgomery, Jr., since that date had no authority to represent or bind him with reference to the said promissory note, and he denied that he was indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever. He alleged that he had never seen the note sued upon, but was informed that some such note was executed by J. S. Montgomery, Jr., in the manner described in the petition. He admitted the allegation as to notice with regard to the collection of attorney's fees. For further plea and answer he alleged that on January 15, 1910, the firm of Montgomery & MacIntyre was dissolved and the business sold to the Montgomery Drug Company, a corporation, which received the assets and assumed the liabilities of the copartnership; that the plaintiff knew of the sale and of the dissolution of the copartnership; that after the dissolution the plaintiff continued the said note unto J. S. Montgomery, Jr., or unto the Montgomery Drug Company, J. S. Montgomery, Jr., being president and managing officer, and the plaintiff collected payments on the note from J. S. Montgomery, Jr., or the Montgomery Drug Company, without the knowledge or consent of MacIntyre; that plaintiff renewed the note and extended the time of payment thereof, unto the said Montgomery or the Montgomery Drug Company, without the knowledge or consent of MacIntyre, thereby relieving MacIntyre from any liability on the note; and that neither MacIntyre nor any one for him has ever made any payment on the note or acknowledged any liability thereon. This plea was amended by alleging that "the Montgomery Drug Company undertook to perform its contract in the premises, and, through its president and manager, did pay interest in advance on said note, did place credits on the back of said note in writing, all of which was accepted by the plaintiff." A general demurrer to the plea as amended was sustained, and judgment was entered against the defendants for the amount sued for, and MacIntyre excepted.

W. C. Snodgrass, of Thomasville, for plaintiff in error. Fondren Mitchell, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The only question raised by the record is as to whether or not the plea as amended set out a good defense. Section 3188 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that, "after dissolution, a partner has no power to bind the firm by a new contract, or to revive one already for any cause extinct, nor to renew or continue an existing liability, nor change its dignity or its nature." In the case of Preston v. Garrard, 120 Ga. 689, 48 S. E. 118, 102 Am. St. Rep. 124, 1 Ann. Cas. 724, it is held: "Where a partnership is dissolved by the retirement of one of the partners, and the continuing partner agrees to assume the debts of the firm, the retiring partner becomes a surety for his copartner."

[2] "A creditor of the partnership, who has notice of the dissolution and of the agreement by the continuing partner to assume the debts, is bound thereafter to accord to the retiring partner all the rights of a surety. Hence if, without his knowledge or consent, the creditor, upon a sufficient consideration, extends the time of payment of the firm indebtedness, the retiring partner is released from the indebtedness, and the creditor must thereafter look only to the firm assets and to the individual assets of the continuing partner." Do the allegations of the plea as amended in the present case fall within the rule of law thus announced by the Supreme Court? There was no special demurrer filed to the allegations of the original plea, or the plea as amended, and in the absence of such special demurrer the general allegations contained in the plea and the amendments filed thereto must be accepted as sufficient. These allegations in substance are that, after the dissolution of the copartnership and the sale of its assets, the plaintiff, who was the payee and holder of the note sued upon, had continued the note unto J. S. Montgomery, Jr., or the Montgomery Drug Company, and had collected from Montgomery payments of interest on the note in advance, and renewed and extended the time of payment of the note in consideration of the said payments, and that this was all done without the knowledge, authority, acquiescence, or consent of the defendant MacIntyre. It seems to us that these allegations are sufficient to bring the case within the principle of the decision above cited, as well as within the spirit of the Code section cited. The receipt of interest in advance, and the extension of the time of payment of the note, in consideration of such advance, would, if this was done without the knowledge of the retiring partner, relieve him from further liability on the note, and would relegate the payee, for further payment, to the partnership assets and the partner to whom the extension had been granted.

It is insisted by counsel representing the defendant in error that credits on the note, a copy of which is attached to the petition, show that only the interest due on the notes had been paid on the due dates. The dates when the credits were apparently entered upon the note would not be conclusive on that subject, and the defendant MacIntyre would be entitled to show that, notwithstanding these dates, the interest was nevertheless advanced. And, besides, he alleged that the time for payment of the principal of the note had been extended by the plaintiffs to the continuing partner, or to the successor of the partnership, without his knowledge or authority. If, on the trial, it appeared that the only payments that had been made on the note were simply the interest, and that this interest had only been paid when due, and that there was no agreement for any extension of time on account of the payment of interest, the defense on this ground would fail. But these were questions of fact, which were sufficiently put in issue by the plea, and should have been submitted to the jury, and we therefore think that the trial judge erred in striking the plea as amended.

Judgment reversed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—
QUESTIONS OF FACT.

There is evidence as to the identity of the accused which authorizes the conclusion reached by the jury, and this court is without jurisdiction to disturb their finding upon disputed issues of fact. None of the special assignments of error are of sufficient merit to warrant a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial. It is not made to appear that any one of the matters of which complaint is made could have prejudiced the accused, or have contributed to the verdict against him. It is plain that the case depended entirely upon the identification of an assailant who was unknown to the prosecuting witness. The requests to charge, so far as appropriate, were sufficiently covered in the general charge, and, though the competency of some of the evidence admitted was prima facie doubtful, a review of the evidence as a whole shows that the statements to which objection were made can properly be considered as part of the res gestae of the transaction.

SALES (§ 129*)—ENTIRE CONTRACT—RESCISION IN PART.

It appearing that the contract which was the basis of this suit was an entire contract, it devolved upon the defendant to either accept the contract as a whole or rescind it as a whole. He could not affirm the contract by accepting a part of the goods purchased, and rescind it in part by rejecting another portion. For this reason, the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was demanded by the evidence.

2. SALES (§ 23*)—REQUISITES OF CONTRACT—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

Where, upon receipt of a written order for a soda fountain, with an agreement by the purchaser to pay all setting-up, expenses stricken out, the seller wrote a letter accepting the order as per copy inclosed, though the copy did not have the agreement referred to stricken out, there was a completed contract; the seller having made no claim on the purchaser for setting-up expenses.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—SALES.

In an action for the price of a soda fountain sold upon written order, there was no error in refusing evidence of a parol agreement made by the seller's agent to take an old fountain as part payment.

5. EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—SALES.

In an action for the price of a soda fountain sold upon written order, there was no error in excluding testimony that plaintiff had agreed to furnish an "iceless" soda fountain, and that the one furnished was not of that character; the written order having no such specification.

Error from City Court of Camilla; H. C. Dasher, Judge.

Action by the American Soda Fountain Company against the Spence Drug Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The American Soda Fountain Company brought trover against the Spence Drug Company, of Camilla, Ga., to recover a certain "Innovation soda water apparatus," and on the trial elected to take a verdict for the proved value of the apparatus, and a verdict was accordingly directed in its favor. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. Besides the general grounds, the motion contains specific assignments of error as to the direction of the verdict and as to the admission and rejection of testimony. The defense originally relied upon was that the plaintiff had failed to carry out its contract, in that it had agreed to sell or take, as part of the purchase price for the new soda fountain apparatus, an old soda fountain of the defendant. The case went to trial on this defense alone, but by an amendment allowed at the trial the further defense of partial failure of consideration was set up.

The evidence for the plaintiff made in substance the following case: The Drug Company signed a written order, directed to the American Soda Fountain Company, for the purchase of one "special Innovation soda water apparatus" as therein described, specifying the price and terms. Across the face of the order was the following printed stipulation: "Price f. o. b. Boston. Freight to be paid by customer. This order is taken subject to the approval of the American Soda Fountain Company, Boston, Mass., and cannot be countermanded by the shipper[?]. There are no conditions or agreements with your salesman, except those herein stated, and no claim will be made by me for anything not specified herein. Plumbing cannot be either ordered or paid for by the American Soda Fountain Company." On December 23, 1909, the American Soda Fountain Company, referring to a letter of its agent inclosing this order, addressed the following letter to the Spence Drug Company: "Your contract for Innovation apparatus, as per copy inclosed, has been submitted by our salesman, Mr. George T. Smith, and the same is hereby accepted upon the terms and conditions specified." The copy referred to in the letter contained the following: "I agree to pay . . . all setting-up expenses and to insure said apparatus." But in the original contract, sued on and introduced in evidence, the words "all setting-up expenses" were stricken out. On February 10, 1910, the Soda Fountain Company wrote to the Drug Company as follows: "As per previous shipping notice, we are pleased to advise you that shipment of your Innovation outfit went forward on the 4th inst. Bill of lading covering shipment is being forwarded to you under separate cover." The soda fountain arrived at Camilla, Ga., on or about February 10th, and the Drug Company notified the agents of the Soda Fountain Company of its reception. These agents immediately notified the Drug Company that they would send a mechanic to Camilla to install the fountain by the last of the week; and the mechanic did subsequently go to Camilla, and installed the fountain in the place pointed out by the Drug Company.

Previous to the arrival of the soda fountain at Camilla the Drug Company wrote the Soda Fountain Company that it wanted to cancel the contract, and stated in this letter that it would refuse to allow the soda fountain to be installed, unless the Soda Fountain Company would pay the freight bill of $85.14, and deduct this amount from the "last series of notes" given to cover the deferred payments on the soda fountain, and added that settlement of the balance would be made according to contract. The Soda Fountain Company refused to permit the cancellation of the contract and insisted upon its performance according to its terms, one of which was that the order could not be countermanded. The salesman of the Soda Fountain Company, when notified of the refusal of the Drug Company to accept the fountain unless the freight was paid, agreed with the Drug Company that he would himself pay the freight bill. Then the Drug Company refused to accept the fountain unless the Soda Fountain Company would guarantee the sale of the old fountain. This refusal was made in a telegram sent to George T. Smith, the salesman of the Soda Fountain Company, who replied by telegram as follows: "This guaranty sale is a personal matter. No mention made in your contract to company." After receiving this reply, the Drug Company paid the freight and demurrage on the fountain and permitted its installation in its store by the agent of the Soda Fountain Company, who had been sent for that purpose by the seller. After the installation of the soda fountain, Smith, the salesman, endeavored to have the Drug Company comply with the stipulation of the contract as to payment of purchase price, to wit, 15 per cent. of the purchase price cash, and notes for the balance. The Drug Company refused to pay according to the terms of the contract, and thereupon Smith, in behalf of the Soda Fountain Company, demanded a return of the fountain; there being in the contract a reservation of title in the seller until payment of the purchase money. This demand was refused, and the Soda Fountain Company instituted the trover proceedings. The Drug Company refused to return the fountain. The evidence relating to the plea of partial failure of consideration will be referred to in the opinion, so far as material.

Pope & Bennet, of Albany, and E. M. Davis, of Camilla, for plaintiff in error. E. E. Cox, of Camilla, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] 1. The Spence Drug Company in the first place, insisted that there was no completed contract, that the original order was a mere offer to contract, and that this offer had not been accepted as made, in that the American Soda Fountain Company had not accepted it with the words "all setting-up expenses" stricken out, and, therefore, that, the Spence Drug Company had the right to countermand the order before delivery of the soda fountain apparatus. Under the evidence we think the contract was completed. The copy of the order, attached to the letter, was simply a memorandum of the contract. No reference was made to any change, but the order as received was expressly accepted. The original contract, with the words "all setting-up expenses" stricken out, was the one sued upon and introduced in evidence. Besides, no claim was made upon the Spence Drug Company for any of the expenses connected with the installation of the fountain. The agent of the American Soda Fountain Company testified that these words were stricken out of the contract for the purpose of making it clear that the Spence Drug Company would not be called upon to pay the expenses of setting up the fountain. Performance by the plaintiff and the payment by it of the setting-up expenses prove clearly that the offer to buy was accepted as made. It follows, therefore, that the countermand was in direct conflict with the express stipulations of the contract, and could not avail. Even after the attempted countermand, the soda fountain was shipped to Camilla to the Spence Drug Company and was accepted by it. The shipping and installation of the fountain by the American Soda Fountain Company amounted to an acceptance of the order, and its acceptance of the fountain completed the contract and made the Drug Company liable for the price of the fountain as stipulated therein. Harris v. Amoskeag Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519; Sheffield v. Whitfield, 6 Ga. App. 765, 65 S. E. 807.

[3] 2. There was no error in refusing to allow the defendant to show by parol an agreement to take the old fountain as part payment. It is not contended that this proposition was made by the Soda Fountain Company, but it is claimed to have been made by its salesman. Not only was this an effort to vary the terms of the written contract, which expressly stipulated that the purchase price was so much cash and the balance in deferred payments, to be evidenced by notes, but it was also an effort to prove an agreement made with the agent of the Soda Fountain Company at variance with the terms of that contract, wherein it was expressly stipulated that no agreement made by the agent, except as stated in the written contract, should be binding upon the Soda Fountain Company. Thus the contract put the Drug Company upon notice that the salesman did not have the right to bind the Soda Fountain Company by any promise in reference to the old fountain. But to show how groundless this defense is, the evidence does show that the salesman who made this promise had in fact complied with it, and had sold the old fountain for the Drug Company according to his agreement.

[4] 3. The defense of partial failure of consideration was not proved, except to the extent of $25, which was allowed as a set-off in favor of the defendant. The witnesses introduced by the defendant for the purpose of supporting the plea of partial failure of consideration did state in general terms that there were certain defects in the installation of the fountain; but their testimony was not definite as to these defects, and they did not give any basis for a reduction of the purchase price on account of these defects. A plea of failure of consideration must be sustained by evidence showing, not only the failure of consideration, but the extent of the failure of consideration. The jury must have data presented by the evidence upon which to base a verdict sustaining a plea of this character. Grier v. Enterprise Stone Co., 126 Ga. 17, 54 S. E. 806.

[5] 4. There was no error in excluding testimony to the effect that plaintiff had agreed to furnish an "iceless" soda fountain, and that the one furnished was not of this character. The fountain to be furnished was specifically described in the written contract, and it does not appear that it was to be "iceless." The effect of this testimony would be to vary the terms of the contract.

[1] We have carefully examined the numerous assignments of error contained in the amended motion for a new trial, and we fail to find any material error. The evidence demanded the verdict for the plaintiff as directed.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

1. BROKERS (§ 40*) — COMPENSATION — CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT.

Under the evidence in this case, the broker, who sued to recover commission from the owner of the real estate, was apparently agent for the proposed purchaser, and not for the seller. The proposed purchaser of the real estate was not found by the broker in response to any request or desire of the owner of the real estate; but the broker, at the request of the proposed purchaser, submitted to the owner an offer, which the owner declined to accept. If, therefore, the broker was entitled to commission, it was from the proposed purchaser, and not from the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-40; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 65*) — COMPENSATION — AGENCY FOR BOTH PARTIES.

Construing the evidence most favorably to the plaintiff, he assumed to be agent for both parties, and did not disclose to the defendant the fact that he represented the proposed purchaser. The existence of the undisclosed duality of agency is always a good defense against the payment of commissions. Gann v. Zettler, 3 Ga. App. 589, 60 S. E. 283.

The verdict in this case was without evidence to support it, and was therefore contrary to law, and a new trial should have been granted.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 227*)—INJURIES TO RAILROAD EMPLOYE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Prior to the passage of the act of 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 160), relating to the liability of railroad companies for injuries to employes, the rule as to such liability was thus stated by the Supreme Court: "An employe cannot recover from a railroad company, if he is negligent and his negligence appreciably contributes to his injury." Little v. Southern Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 347, 47 S. E. 953, 66 L. R. A. 509, 102 Am. St. Rep. 104. He could not recover if he "immediately or remotely, directly or indirectly, caused the injury, or any part of it, or contributed to it at all." Prather v. R. & D. R. Co., 80 Ga. 427, 9 S. E. 530, 12 Am. St. Rep. 263; W. & A. R. R. Co. v. Herndon, 114 Ga. 168, 39 S. E. 911. Applying to the facts in the present case the principle laid down in these decisions, the petition should have been dismissed on general demurrer.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 224*)—INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

When an employe participates in the movement of standing cars in a railroad switchyard, so as to keep the tracks therein open for the passage of other engines and cars continuously and at all times, and such cars are moved and such track is left open for the passage of other cars, the employe is thereby put upon notice that such track may be so used, and of the danger of getting upon or near such track, where he might be hit by passing engines or cars, and if, shortly after the removal of such cars from such track, he stands upon or so near such track as to be hit by a passing engine, he cannot recover for the injury, which could have been avoided by the use of ordinary care and diligence.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 208*)—REMEDIES OF PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE MONEY PAID.

This case is fully controlled by the decision rendered when the case was previously here. 9 Ga. App. 656, 72 S. E. 44. The defendant's answer failed to allege a rescission. The vendee under the bond for title, so far as appears from the answer, was entitled to cut and sell the timber, the value of which the defendants sought to set off against the plaintiff's demand for the purchase price. There could be no rescission, unless it had been alleged that the vendor notified the vendee of his purpose to rescind, and tendered him the amount he had previously paid. The vendor, holding the legal title, had the right to proceed against the vendee, the holder of the bond for title, and to recover the unpaid purchase price, by a sale of the premises under his judgment, or he could have recovered possession of the land in question by buying it in at the sale. In this event the vendor would have been discharged from any liability to repay the portion of the purchase price that he had received from the vendee, although he might have secured the property far below its value. But, having elected to totally disregard his bond for title and the rights of the purchaser thereunder, the sale effected by him must be treated as having been made by him as agent for the vendee, and he must account to the latter for the purchase price, less the amount due him by the vendee upon the purchase-money notes.

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—NONSUIT.

This being a suit brought by an employe's widow against the employer for the death of the employe, alleging defects in the employer's machinery which caused his injury, and it clearly appearing, by the undisputed evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses, that the defect complained of was actually known by the employe, and that, notwithstanding this knowledge, he assumed the risk of the defect, a nonsuit was properly awarded. Civil Code 1910, § 3131. Under the evidence, the plaintiff's husband, not only had the best opportunity of knowing the perilous position that he occupied at the time he lost his life, and a better opportunity than the master had, but, also, from the nature of his duties, as well as from his opportunity for knowing, he was charged with knowledge of the danger from the defect which caused his death. It was therefore not error to nonsuit. Civil Code 1910, § 3131. There is nothing in the evidence to show that this case falls within the decision of King v. S. A. L. Ry., 1 Ga. App. 88 (2), 58 S. This was an action in trover, and the evidence being undisputed that the plaintiff sold the horse which he sought to recover, and voluntarily parted with its possession after receiving the stipulated purchase price, it was not error to award a nonsuit. The plaintiff failed to show either title or right of possession, and either one or the other of these is essential to a recovery in trover. The fact that the plaintiff may have had a right of action, arising from a breach of the warranty of the title, as to the horse for which he swapped, would not entitle him to recover by trover the horse he traded; there being no evidence that the trade was rescinded.

JUDGMENT (§ 314*)—AMENDMENT—GROUNDS.

Where it appeared from the record that the suit was filed 8 days after the maturity of the note sued on, and consequently that the plaintiff had not given and it was not possible to give the 10 days' notice required by law, to entitle him to recover for attorney's fees stipulated in the note, it was not error for the presiding judge, on proper motion at the same term in which a judgment by default had been rendered, in which attorney's fees had been included, to reopen the record and amend the judgment by default, so as to strike from it a recovery of attorney's fees. The decision is controlled by the ruling of this court in Mt. Vernon Bank v. Gibbs, 1 Ga. App. 665, 58 S. E. 269. Prior to the maturity of a note which provides for the payment of attorney's fees the right of the creditor to collect these fees is embryonic only. It can have no active existence until after the debtor fails to pay (after maturity of the contract and after notice), because prior to that energizing period the law denies it active life. The liability to pay attorney's fees upon a note is contingent upon the failure of the debtor to pay his obligation after 10 days' notice of an intention to sue is given him. Civil Code 1910, § 4252. The service of the 10 days' notice by the plaintiff clothes him with a right which he would not otherwise possess. Rylee v. Bank of Statham, 7 Ga. App. 500 (6), 67 S. E. 383.

PLEADING (§ 356*)—PLEA—WAIVER OF TORT.

The amendment to the plea was not objected to, and the plea as amended was practically a declaration of the defendant's election to waive the tort and to sue upon a breach of contract. Civil Code, § 4407. The ruling of the court, therefore, in striking the plea on the ground that it was an effort to set off a tort against a suit arising ex contractu, and in thereafter directing a verdict, was erroneous. Even if the original action can be construed as set-off sounding in tort, the defendant had the right to waive the tort and sue upon the alleged breach of contract.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 733*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—JUDGMENT.

This was a suit on a promissory note, in which the plaintiff prayed for a general judgment against the defendant, and a special judgment against certain real estate, alleged to have been conveyed by him as security, for principal, interest, and attorney's fees as stipulated in the note. No defense was filed, and a judgment was entered by default, for principal, interest, and attorney's fees, and setting up a special lien on the described property. The bill of exceptions recites these facts, and makes the following assignment of error: "The defendant, W. B. Willingham, excepts to the said judgment, and assigns the same as error." A motion to dismiss the writ of error was made on the ground that there was no sufficient assignment of error. Held, under the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court, the motion must be granted. The language used is entirely too general. There are several things involved in the judgment rendered by the court below, and the assignment should be specific enough to clearly indicate the thing or things complained of. Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Anderson, 102 Ga. 551, 28 S. E. 382, and cases cited; Kimball v. Williams, 108 Ga. 812, 33 S. E. 994; Patterson v. Beck, 133 Ga. 701, 66 S. E. 911, and cases cited.

1. CARRIERS (§ 92*)—DELIVERY BY CARRIER—EXCUSE FOR FAILURE TO DELIVER—LEVY OF PROCESS.

Ordinarily a common carrier who receives goods for shipment is not relieved from the duty of delivering them, unless prevented by "the act of God or the public enemies of the state." An exception to this rule is found where the carrier surrenders the goods in obedience to valid legal process, or such as is apparently valid; but the carrier is not relieved from his duty to the shipper, even when he delivers a shipment in response to process, on demand of a levying officer, unless he has exercised due diligence to ascertain whether the process is in fact legal. Morris Storage & Transfer Co. v. Wilkes, 1 Ga. App. 751, 58 S. E. 232.

2. CARRIERS (§ 92*)—DELIVERY BY CARRIER—EXCUSE FOR FAILURE TO DELIVER—LEVY OF PROCESS.

The goods were delivered to a common carrier for transportation, and an attachment was sued out for the purpose of seizing the goods. The affidavit and the attachment process were on a printed form, upon which also appeared a form for the bond required by law as a condition precedent for the issuance of the attachment; but the blanks in the bond had not been filled in, and no attachment bond had, in fact, been given. The record does not disclose that the agent of the carrier made any inquiry to ascertain whether or not the bond required by law had in fact been given. Held, that the carrier was lacking in diligence in failing to make inquiry to ascertain whether any bond had in fact been given. The attachment proceedings were absolutely void, and the carrier was not protected in surrendering the property to the levying officer. The case differs from that of Southern Express Co. v. Sottile Bros., 134 Ga. 40, 67 S. E. 414, in that in that case the process was valid on its face, and the decision is authority only for the proposition that the carrier was not bound to know that the law was unconstitutional, until it had been judicially declared to be so.

SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL PROPERLY REFUSED.

The controlling issue in this case being whether the employment of the attorney was joint on the part of the two banks, or where there were several undertakings of the attorney to represent each of said corporations in a proposed combination, which did not materialize, and there being evidence that the services were necessarily separate up to the time of the attempted consolidation, and that there was no contract of joint employment, the verdict is supported by the evidence. There being no error of law assigned, there was no error in refusing a new trial.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—EXISTENCE OF AGENCY—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

Agency cannot be proved by the mere declarations of a person purporting to act as agent for another; and one who deals with such a person is bound to inquire into his authority, or take the risk of ascertaining, when it is too late, that he was not authorized to bind the alleged principal. The evidence in this case fails to show, except by the declarations of the alleged agent, that he was authorized to sign the name of the alleged indorser to the note sued on.

J. P. Dukes, of Pembroke, for plaintiff in error. E. C. Elmore, of Pembroke, and P. M. Anderson, of Claxton, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. We think the judgment in this case is wrong for two reasons. In the first place it is apparent, from the testimony of all the officials of the bank, that the note sued on was given in lieu of one for which the bank looked to M. E. Carter for payment, and therefore any assumption of that debt by his wife could be repudiated by her at her option. In the next place, the evidence fails to support the verdict for a more serious reason. There is no proper evidence that Carter was authorized to indorse the note. In the evidence it is undisputed that the People's Supply Company was the name under which Mrs. Carter did business, and that she is a married woman. Granting that the officials of the bank knew, at the time that Carter indorsed the note in behalf of the People's Supply Company as its general manager, that Mrs. Carter was the People's Supply Company, still each person present knew that Carter was doing the signing. They knew that the note being executed represented no value or consideration to the People's Supply Company, whoever it might be, and therefore they were charged with the duty of inquiring into the nature and extent of the authority under which Carter assumed to act. If in fact he had such authority, the note would be good. In the absence of express authority, the effort to have the People's Supply Company assume the debt of the M. E. Carter Company would be entirely abortive. Nothing is better settled than that agency cannot be proved by mere declarations of one who purports to be an agent. Suppose that A. B. desires to comply with the wishes of the officers of a bank, by renewing a note which represents his individual indebtedness to the bank. He goes to the bank, which is pressing him for renewal, and whose officers perhaps desire additional security, and tells them that he has power of attorney to sign the name of C. D., who is known by the bank to be a thoroughly solvent individual. The officers of the bank, charged with the conduct of the business, accept his statement that he has the authority to sign C. D.'s name, and, in exchange for his old note, accept a new note purporting to be indorsed by C. D., per A. B., as his agent. Will any one question that, in an action brought to recover upon the note, the plaintiff would be required to show, before he could recover against C. D. and subject his property to levy and sale, that A. B. was in fact duly authorized by C. D. to sign his name as an indorser? It is in this respect that we think the present plaintiff's case fails.

The jury, being the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses, had the right to find that the bank did not know who composed the People's Supply Company, and did not know that "People's Supply Company" was merely the trade-name used by Mrs. Carter; that the bank did not know that Carter had no authority to indorse the note, and that it acted in perfect good faith. Concede, for the sake of the argument, that the jury had the right to find, from the evidence, that the M. E. Carter Company being a corporation, the original note (for which the note now involved was given in renewal) was not the debt of Mrs. Carter's husband, and that for that reason liability upon the note now before us did not involve an assumption of her husband's debt; still the plaintiff failed to make out its case, since it appears, from the uncontradicted evidence, that the only proof of Carter's agency (except an alleged admission of Mrs. Carter to which we will refer later) rests upon his declaration that he was agent for Mrs. Carter, doing business as the People's Supply Company. He denied even this, but we are bound to assume that he stated that he was authorized to indorse the note; for there was evidence to this effect, and the jury found this to be the truth of the transaction. Mrs. Carter's admission to the witness Morgan that Carter had authority to sign for the People's Supply Company was coupled with the statement that Carter's authority was defined by a power of attorney, and there was no testimony that this instrument conferred upon Carter the right to bind Mrs. Carter for the pre-existing debts of the M. E. Carter Company or his own. The fact that Carter testified that he, as general manager of the People's Supply Company, was accustomed to transact business for his wife and sign notes for the People's Supply Company, promising payment for goods purchased by the People's Supply Company and for its benefit, would not authorize the inference that he was thereby authorized to pledge the credit of the People's Supply Company to secure debts of the M. E. Carter Company, or any debts other than those of the People's Supply Company itself. No reasonable man could infer that the scope of the agency extended so far. The Code expressly declares that it is the duty of those who are dealing with agents to inquire into the nature of the agency and the scope of the agent's authority; and when the Pembroke National Bank accepted the note involved in this suit, without inquiring of Mrs. Carter, or without being shown any written order or power of attorney, it assumed the risk of discovering later that there was no such binding authority. RAILROADS (§ 454*)—OPERATION—INJURIES BY FIRE—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court did not err in the charge complained of. The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

(a) In charging the jury on the duty of a railroad company as to the use of appliances to prevent the setting out of fire by the operation of its engines, it is proper to instruct them that it is the duty of the railroad company to use "ordinary care and diligence to apply to its engines the best appliances in general use, the use of which is consistent with the practicable operation of its engines, and to use reasonable care and diligence in keeping same in good order." The words "in general use," etc., sufficiently qualify the words "best appliances," preceding them, to overcome the objection that the language used imposes too heavy a burden upon the defendant. The charge is in exact conformity with the ruling in Southern Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 129 Ga. 367 (7), 58 S. E. 1044.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Daley & Daley, of Wrightsville, and Roberts & Smith, of Eastman, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Neese, of Eastman, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error excepted to an amendment of the defendant's petition; but, as this exception is not mentioned in the brief of counsel, it will be treated as abandoned.

Complaint is made that the judge charged the jury that "it would be incumbent upon the defendant to show that it not only used an improved spark arrester, or other appliance for the prevention of fires, but that it used ordinary care and diligence to apply to its engines the best appliances in general use, the use of which is consistent with the practicable operation of its engines, and to use reasonable care and skill in keeping the same in good order." The exception to this charge is that it is not a correct statement of the law applicable to the issues involved, and placed upon the defendant the burden of rebutting the presumption against it by proof, not only of ordinary care and diligence, but also that it had equipped its engines with the best appliances in general use for the purpose of preventing fires, which charge is too stringent, and placed upon the defendant a burden not legally required. We do not think that the charge of the court, under the evidence in this case, imposed any hardship upon the defendant, or subjected it to any different burden than that which is placed there by law.

There was conflict in the evidence as to the origin of the fire which burned the plaintiff's property. Witnesses for the defendant company testified that there had been a fire in the woods for some time, and that this fire caused the injury of which the plaintiff complained; that the fire was not caused by sparks thrown out by the engine. On the other hand, the plaintiff introduced witnesses who testified that they saw the fire start from sparks thrown out by the engine as it passed. This testimony, if credited by the jury, cast upon the railroad company the burden of satisfying the jury that the company was not liable for the damage; that although the fire might have been occasioned by sparks from its engine, still there was no liability, because the company had provided itself with such appliances, and had so used them as that the casualty could not have been prevented if the trains were operated at all; in other words, that the prevention of the fire, under the circumstances, would have necessitated the total abandonment of its public duty by the common carrier.

The charge complained of follows literally the ruling in Southern Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 129 Ga. 367, 58 S. E. 1044; but, under the testimony in the present case, the instructions of the court as to the "best appliances" could not have been harmful, even if the law was different, because the defendant's witnesses who testified upon that subject both swore that the defendant had the very best appliances known to American master mechanics. And even if they had not so testified, to say that the company has the "best in general use" does not import that it is required to have the best that are made, or the best that have been discovered, but merely that in exercising due diligence the company has procured, as it should do in the exercise of even ordinary diligence, such appliances as are shown by experience and usage to be the best suited for the purpose intended. A charge that the company should show that it had provided itself with the "best appliances" would have been subject to the objection raised; but the words "in general use," etc., qualify this meaning, so that the requirement merely conforms to the rule of ordinary diligence.

The case at bar is distinguished from those of Southern Railway Company v. Pace, 114 Ga. 712, 40 S. E. 723, Gainesville, etc., R. Co., v. Edmondson, 101 Ga. 747, 29 S. E. 213, and Southern Ry. Co. v. Myers, 108 Ga. 165, 33 S. E. 917, in that in those cases, not only was the evidence of the fire wholly circumstantial but the great preponderance of the evidence tended to show, not only that the appliances were the best in general use, but that they were in proper condition and properly handled in the present case. While the evidence is undisputed that the appliances conformed to the law, the testimony as to the origin of the fire, given by the witnesses for the plaintiff, as well as other circumstances in the case, authorized the inference on the part of the jury that, although the company may have had the best appliances in general use, they were either not in good condition at the time of the fire, or that they were not properly handled at that time.

Judgment affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 210, 258*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—PLEADING.

Two railway companies, hereinafter designated as company A and company B, were sued jointly for damages for personal injuries. The petition alleged substantially the following facts: The two companies maintain and operate a common railroad yard, through which two parallel tracks extend. Plaintiff was a flagman in the employment of company B, and at the time of his injury was standing between the two tracks and engaged in giving signals to the engineer in charge of an engine of company B. While he was thus engaged, an engine of company A came along the parallel track, adjoining the one upon which the engine of company B was moving, and the plaintiff was struck by the running board of the engine of company A and injured. The allegations of negligence are that both companies were negligent in maintaining the parallel tracks too near together, and that the servants in charge of the engine of company A were guilty of negligence in using one of the parallel tracks at the time when the adjoining track was being used by company B, and in failing to give the plaintiff any warning or signal of the approach of the engine of company A. There was no allegation that the servants of company B, in charge of its engine, knew of the approach of the engine of company A and failed to warn the plaintiff thereof. The petition was dismissed as to company A, and the general demurrer of company B was overruled. Held that, even if it was negligence to maintain the two parallel tracks too close together, this was, relatively to company B, an assumed risk, and was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. Held, further, that no actionable negligence was alleged against company B, and as to it the petition should have been dismissed on general demurrer.

RUSSELL, J. J. D. Frazier & Co. brought suit against the Georgia Brokerage Company to recover a certain sum, alleged to be a rebate allowed on a car of corn on account of its damaged condition and its failure to come up to sample, and to recover, also, for an alleged shortage in the weight of the corn. The defendant relied upon two defenses: (1) That the sale was made with the knowledge of the buyers that the defendant was acting therein simply as agent for other parties, and was not the seller; (2) that there was no guaranty of the quality of the corn. The plaintiff relied, for evidence of the guaranty, upon an agreement in reference to the corn, made, as the plaintiff contended, after the trade under the first contract had been rescinded. This rescission, and the existence of any second contract, was denied in toto by the defendant; and, under the evidence and the pleadings, this conflict presented a material issue in the case. As an inspection of the charge of the trial judge shows that the contention of the defendant as to this material point was not referred to, a new trial should have been granted. The contentions of both parties should be presented with equal fullness, and no material contention of either plaintiff or defendant should be omitted.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CORPORATIONS (§ 80)—STOCK—RECOVERY OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

An insolvent corporation cannot enforce payment of a stock subscription from one who was induced by the fraud of the authorized agent of the corporation to make the subscription, if the subscriber was not guilty of laches in discovering the fraud, did not in any manner waive the fraud, and within a reasonable time after the discovery of the fraud repudiated his subscription contract before the corporation became insolvent and the rights of bona fide creditors had intervened.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 80*)—STOCK—RECOVERY OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Where a stock subscription has been induced by fraud, it is not necessary, in order to prevent rescission of the contract, that insolvency proceedings be actually instituted, or some act of insolvency be committed by the corporation; but where the effect of the rescission would be to diminish the security of the bona fide creditors of the corporation, becoming such after the contract of subscription had been made, the rescission will not be allowed. What fraud creates, justice will destroy, provided that in the destruction greater injustice is not done to innocent third persons.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 80*)—STOCK—RECOVERY OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Where the president of a corporation, while holding an unrecorded mortgage covering the assets of the corporation, induces one, by falsely stating that there is no debt or lien against the corporation, to subscribe to its stock, he cannot be heard, when the subscriber discovers the fraud and endeavors to rescind his contract of stock subscription, to object to the rescission, on the ground that it would affect his rights as a creditor of the corporation. The rule is universal that no man can take advantage of his own wrong.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by the Southern Tobacco Company against James P. Armstrong. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This was a suit brought by the Southern Tobacco Company against James P. Armstrong on a promissory note for $3,750. The note was given by Armstrong in part payment for 50 shares of the capital stock of the Southern Tobacco Company; he having paid for the stock $1,250 in cash in addition to the note. The defendant resisted payment of the note, on the ground that his subscription was procured by false and fraudulent representations, made to him by the president and the secretary of the corporation; the specific representations being that the total liability of the corporation consisted of preferred capital stock amounting to $250,000, and common stock amounting to $100,000, and that other than this stock liability the corporation had no liabilities of any character. He alleges that, relying upon the truth of the representations so made by the authorized agents of the corporation, he subscribed for and purchased 50 shares of the preferred stock of the corporation, paying therefor on account the sum of $1,250, and executed the note sued on for the balance; that before the note matured he discovered that the representations made by the president and secretary of the company to him to induce him to buy the stock were false and fraudulent; that, while the president stated to him specifically that there were no liens or mortgages on the property, he, the president, held an unrecorded mortgage for $150,000 against the company, payable to himself, which covered the entire assets of the company; that, if he had known of the existence of this mortgage, he would not have subscribed for the stock; and that the failure of the president to disclose to him the existence of the debt secured by the mortgage, when specifically asked in reference thereto by him, amounted to such fraud as would release him from all liability on the note. In his plea he asked judgment against the plaintiff corporation for the $1,250 obtained from him through the perpetration of the fraud as set forth.

On the trial of the case the plaintiff amended his petition, by way of replication, by specifically denying all the allegations of fraud, and alleged that the defendant had been guilty of such laches in setting up the alleged fraud as would estop him from setting up that defense; also that after his subscription to the stock, and after the time he claims to have discovered the alleged fraud and misrepresentations, he ratified his subscription by continuing to act as a stockholder of the corporation; that subsequently to the giving of the note sued on, for the balance owing on subscription for the stock, the corporation created a large amount of debts, many of which were outstanding and unpaid, approximating as follows: Bonds, $100,000; banks, $10,388; other obligations, $9,615; and that the assets owned by the corporation were not sufficient, when the stock subscription was made by the defendant, to pay this outstanding indebtedness, and the corporation was then, since, and now is, insolvent, and it was necessary, for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation, to collect the amount owed by the defendant on this note, and that even, therefore, if the allegations of the defendant as to fraud and misrepresentations, as set out in his answer, were true, it would amount to no legal defense to this suit.

The defendant offered testimony to prove that the corporation was insolvent at the time of the stock subscription and at the time suit was brought on the note; and this testimony was excluded by the court, on the ground that, as the suit was brought by the corporation, and not by its creditors, and as the corporation was a going concern, such evidence was immaterial; that this defense could only be material in a suit brought by creditors of the corporation, either by an assignee or a receiver. Error is assigned as to this ruling. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant for $1,250, and the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled.

Wm. H. Barrett, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error. C. H. & R. S. Cohen, of Augusta, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The principal question raised by the record has been well settled by frequent adjudications, both in England and in this country. Mr Justice Lumpkin, in the recent case of Gress v. Knight, 135 Ga. 60, 68 S. E. 834, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 900, after reviewing different adjudications on the subject, and especially the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state relating thereto, lays down the following legal principles: (1) "As between a stockholder and the corporation, unless special circumstances alter the case, the general rule that contracts obtained by fraud may be avoided by the party defrauded applies to a stock subscription induced by the fraud of the company through its authorized agents; and so, likewise, where only the rights of other shareholders are affected, the company being solvent and a going concern." (2) "If a person subscribes for stock in a corporation, and thereupon the company proceeds to do business upon the basis of the stock subscribed, and incurs indebtedness, the subscriber cannot, after insolvency of the company and the appointment of a receiver, obtain relief on the ground of fraudulent representations of the agents of the company in securing his subscription, as against creditors thus obtaining rights, or a receiver representing them." (3) "Where a subscriber for stock in a corporation seeks to set aside the subscription on the ground of fraud in its procurement, after a receiver has been appointed for the company, in determining whether he can do so it is to be considered what length of time has elapsed since the subscription was made; whether the subscriber has actively participated in the management of the affairs of the corporation; whether there has been any lack of diligence on his part, either in discovering the fraud, or in taking steps to rescind after its discovery, and whether any considerable amount of corporate indebtedness has been created since the subscription was made, which remains outstanding and unpaid."

It will be seen, from Mr. Justice Lumpkin's résumé of the decisions, that all the cases cited by him were cases in which the proceedings were instituted against the stockholder in favor of creditors of the corporation. In each case the plaintiff was either a receiver, an assignee, or trustee, or the corporation had ceased to be a going concern, or the subscriber had paid his money into the corporation treasury, and subsequently brought suit to recover the money so paid in on the ground that it was procured from him by fraudulent representations made by authorized agents of the corporation. It may be stated, then, as a well-settled principle, founded in equity, justice, and law, that where the suit is between the corporation and a subscribing stockholder, and no invasion of rights of creditors is involved, the defense of fraud would be a good defense to recovery on a note given for the stock subscription; but where the rights of creditors are involved, and debts have been incurred by the corporation after the subscription, and on the faith of the subscription credit has been extended to the corporation, that as against such creditors the defense of fraud would not be good.

[2] This leaves in the present case only one general question to be decided, which is not fully controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Gress v. Knight, supra; and this question is as to the meaning of the term "insolvency of the corporation." It will be noted that in that decision Mr. Justice Lumpkin states the proposition that a subscriber cannot, after the insolvency of the company and the appointment of a receiver, obtain relief on the ground of fraudulent representations of the agents of the company in securing his subscription, as against creditors thus obtaining rights, or a receiver representing them. The question is: Can a subscriber obtain relief on the ground of fraud, although the corporation may be in debt, where no insolvency proceeding of any kind has been instituted against it, and where the corporation is still a going concern? In the case of Newton National Bank v. Newbegin, decided by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit, and reported in 74 Fed. 135, 20 C. C. A. 339, 33 L. R. A. 727, the learned judge uses the following language in discussing this subject: "There are obvious reasons why a shareholder of a corporation should not be released from his subscription to its capital stock after the insolvency of the company, and particularly after a proceeding has been inaugurated to liquidate its affairs, unless the case is one in which the stockholder has exercised due diligence, and in which no facts exist upon which corporate creditors can reasonably predicate an estoppel. When a corporation becomes bankrupt, the temptation to lay aside the garb of stockholder, on one pretense or another, and to assume the role of a creditor, is very strong, and all attempts of that kind should be viewed with suspicion. If a considerable period of time has elapsed since the subscription was made, if the subscriber has actively participated in the management of the affairs of the corporation, if there has been any want of diligence on the part of the stockholder, either in discovering the alleged fraud, or in taking steps to rescind when the fraud was discovered, and, above all, if any considerable amount of corporate indebtedness has been created since the subscription was made, which is outstanding and unpaid, in all of these cases the right to rescind should be denied, where the attempt is not made until the corporation becomes insolvent. But if none of these conditions exist, and the proof of the alleged fraud is clear, we think that a stockholder should be permitted to rescind his subscription as well after as before the company ceases to be a going concern." See, also, Hinkley v. Sac Oil & Pipe Line Co., 132 Iowa, 396, 107 N. W. 629, 119 Am. St. Rep. 564; Fear v. Bartlett, 81 Md. 435, 32 Atl. 322, 33 L. R. A. 723. In the case of Fear v. Bartlett, supra, it was held that the doctrine that unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation were a trust fund for the creditors has no application until the corporation becomes insolvent, and in the course of the opinion the learned judge said that the right to rescind may be exercised (assuming diligence) unless "proceedings of insolvency, voluntary or involuntary, have been instituted, or some act done that in law is regarded as an act of insolvency." Not until then does the entire property of the corporation, including unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock, become a trust fund for the payment of its debts, and not until then are the creditors entitled to the payment of their debts before there can be any distribution among the stockholders.

Unquestionably the rule is the same in England as in America, that a stockholder cannot, after bankruptcy or insolvency, rescind his subscription for fraud. 10 Cyc. 441. Can a subscriber rescind for fraud if the fact of insolvency exists, where no proceedings of insolvency have begun, or payment of debts of the corporation has not been stopped by reason of its insolvency? While some of the decisions which we have just cited seem to indicate that this cannot be done, yet we are inclined to the view that the sounder rule is that wherever a corporation incurs debts after the subscription to the capital stock has been made, and the fact of insolvency, by reason of these debts, exists, the right of the creditor would be superior in dignity to the right of a subscriber to rescind for fraud. Indeed, some authorities go to the extent of holding that where the debts of the corporation, even though it is a going concern, exceeded the amount of the subscription, the defrauded stockholder cannot rescind. This seems to be the decision of the Supreme Court of Georgia in Turner v. Grangers' Insurance Co., 65 Ga. 649, 39 Am. Rep. 801, where it is expressly held that, though a subscription to stock may have been induced by fraud, the subscriber could not recover the amount paid, if there were debts contracted after his subscription. The underlying principle for the rule here discussed is that creditors of corporations have superior rights to the assets of the corporation, including its capital stock; and as expressed by Mr. Morawetz, in his admirable work: "It has been settled that, if a corporation is insolvent, a shareholder whose contract of subscription was obtained by fraud of the company's agents cannot diminish the security of bona fide creditors by rescinding his contract to contribute to the amount of capital stock subscribed to by him." Morawetz on Private Corporations (2d Ed.) § 595. And see 1 Thompson on Corporations, § 737, and cases there cited.

On the trial of this case the plaintiff offered evidence to show that debts were incurred by the corporation subsequently to the defendant's subscription to the capital stock, and that these debts were still in existence, and that by reason thereof the corporation was insolvent, and that it was necessary to collect the subscription sued for and represented by the note, in order to pay these debts. The learned trial judge repelled this testimony, on the ground that the suit was by the corporation itself, and that there was no proof that when the subscription was made the corporation had ceased to be a going concern, and that, to constitute a bar to the rescission, suit should be brought by a creditor, through an assignee or receiver. In other words, he ruled out the testimony as to the fact of insolvency. We think the testimony was admissible, for we are clearly of the opinion that the sounder rule, as above indicated, is that, wherever the fact of insolvency exists, there can be no rescission for fraud; or, as expressed by Judge Lumpkin in Gress v. Knight, supra, as to creditors whose claims arose after the stockholders became such, their rights are superior to any rights of rescission. The reason for the rule is that, when a person subscribes to the capital stock of a corporation, he must be held to contemplate that the corporation shall incur debts and pledge its capital, including the liability of its members for unpaid capital, as security; that the creditors who in good faith trust the corporation upon the faith of this security stand in the position of innocent purchasers for value, to the extent of their equitable lien; and that it would be unjust to permit a shareholder to disaffirm his contract and refuse to pay his share of the capital stock after it had been thus pledged with his knowledge and consent to innocent third persons. 1 Thompson on Corporations, § 737. What fraud creates justice will destroy, provided that in the destruction greater injustice is not done to innocent third persons.

[3] It is insisted by learned counsel for defendant that the special facts of this case entitle him in equity and good conscience to rescind his contract of subscription and to be paid back the amount of cash paid on his subscription, notwithstanding the rule as above stated. It is claimed that the corporation was rendered insolvent by reason of the existence of a debt of $100,000, which was secured by a mortgage on all its assets, and that this mortgage was held by the authorized agent, to wit, the president of the corporation, who had induced him, by false representations of the company's solvency, to purchase the 50 shares of the company's capital stock; in other words, that the outstanding debts of the corporation were due to the very party, acting as agent of the corporation, who committed the fraud against him, and that it would be inequitable and unjust, in view of these facts, to permit the creditor who stood in such relation to him to prevent a rescission of his contract of subscription. The argument strikes us with great force, and, if the testimony offered was limited to this debt of $100,000 held by the president, we would be inclined to hold in favor of the contention of the defendant. But the testimony offered included, in addition to this debt of $100,000, other debts amounting to $20,000. These debts are much greater in amount than the subscription made by the defendant to the capital stock of the company, and it is alleged that these debts were incurred after the subscription had been made. If these facts were shown, and it was further shown that by reason of this $20,000 debt the company was insolvent, the principle of the rule which we have discussed would apply, and there could not be, legally and equitably, a rescission by the defendant; and for this reason we reverse the judgment of the court below, in order that these questions may be determined.

[4] It was insisted on the part of the plaintiff that, even conceding that the alleged fraud was perpetrated on the defendant, yet his long delay in asserting his rights, and his active participation in the affairs of the corporation after he discovered the existence of the debts, would estop him from now setting up his rights. This was a question of fact for the jury to determine, and, as the evidence was in conflict, both on the question as to diligence and the question as to participation by the defendant as a stockholder in the management of the affairs of the corporation after the discovery of the fraud which he claimed had been perpetrated against him, this court cannot say that on these points the verdict in favor of the defendant was not authorized.

We grant a new trial in the case because of the error of the trial judge in excluding the evidence offered to prove the insolvency of the corporation. The exceptions to the charge of the court, and to the refusal to charge as requested, are, we think, without merit.

Judgment reversed.

MYERS v. HOOK. (No. 3,563.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 966*)—CONTINUANCE (§ 13*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

Motions for continuance are addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and the discretion of the court will not be controlled, unless clearly abused. Generally an amendment to the plaintiff's petition, which merely amplifies the statement of the plaintiff's case, will not require the grant of a continuance; and the facts of the present case do not place it within an exception to the general rule.

2. PLEADING (§ 218*)—DEMURRER.

The demurrer was properly overruled, because the petition asserted with sufficient particularity an individual liability on the part of the defendant, and did not set forth, as insisted by the demurrer, a partnership liability.

3. PLEADING (§ 392*)—VARIANCE.

The plaintiff having alleged in his petition that the defendant was indebted to him as an individual, and having proved that the indebtedness, if there was any, was due by a partnership, he failed to prove his case as laid, and the motion to award a nonsuit should have been granted.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by L. T. Hook against I. W. Myers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hendricks & Christian, of Nashville, and Jas. H. Price and R. D. Smith, both of Tifton, for plaintiff in error. C. C. Hall, of Tifton, and Claude Payton, of Sylvester, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. It appears from the record that Hook brought suit against Myers upon an open account for $525, with interest from January 1, 1906, alleging in his petition an individual indebtedness on the part of Myers, consisting of an item of $400 for a third interest in mules and log carts (alleged to be worth $1,200), and $125 as the "balance of one-third payment" for 3½ months' wages. The defendant specially demurred to the plaintiff's petition as not setting forth the plaintiff's demand with sufficient particularity, and also because the liability of the defendant for the $125 (if the defendant was liable at all) was a liability of the partnership of Parker, Hook & Co., and not chargeable to the defendant as an individual. The plaintiff filed two amendments to the petition, the court overruled the demurrers, and the exceptions pendente lite were duly filed to this judgment. Thereupon the defendant moved for a continuance, based upon the ground that he was surprised by the contentions of the amendment to the plaintiff's petition, and by the amendment less prepared to proceed to trial, and unable to produce proof to disprove plaintiff's cause of action as amended. The motion to continue was overruled. At the conclusion of the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff, and this motion was overruled. The defendant again moved to continue the case; but, this motion being again overruled, the trial proceeded, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

[1] 1. It is not necessary to discuss in detail the various assignments of error, for our ruling upon two of the points is controlling. In so far as the motion to continue (which was twice presented) is concerned, we need only say that all motions for continuance are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and the discretion of the court will not be interfered with, except where there is a manifest abuse of discretion. In the present case it cannot be said that the amendment (which appears to us merely to amplify the statement of the plaintiff's case, and does not present any new state of facts) should necessarily have found the defendant less prepared for trial than he was under the original petition. It seems to us that in ordinary prudence he might as reasonably have anticipated that the testimony of the absent witness would be necessary before the amendment was filed as after it was allowed.

[3] 3. We are of the opinion that the court erred in not granting a nonsuit. The testimony, reasonably construed, if it establishes anything, establishes the fact that the partnership of Parker, Hook & Co. owed Hook $1,200 for mules and $375 for salary. According to the testimony of the plaintiff himself, Parker, Hook & Co. bought the mules. It is true that he (the plaintiff) stated that Parker was to pay him $400, and Wood (who was then a partner) was likewise to pay him $400, and that his $400 was already paid. But this purely arbitrary placing of liability cannot be supported, in view of the fact that the plaintiff states in the same connection that the partnership bought the mules and log carts, and used them, and finally sold them to the Tallahassee Lumber Company, and that Myers, at the time he purchased Wood's interest in the partnership, found the mules and log carts among the assets of the partnership. Furthermore, if the partners, without striking a balance or undertaking to effect a settlement, as pointed out in the case of Paulk v. Creech, 8 Ga. App. 738 (5), 70 S. E. 145, were treating the sale of the mules as an individual matter, and for that reason Myers agreed to pay Hook $400, which Wood owed him as an individual, then in that case it would have been necessary, in order for Myers to assume the indebtedness of Wood to Hook, that the obligation should have been assumed in writing. The verbal promise of Myers to pay Wood's debt could not be enforced, and there could not be a part payment, because the mules were already in the possession of the partnership at the time Myers bought Wood's interest. While it is perhaps true that Hook thought that the matter could be treated as an individual transaction, the whole matter was clearly a partnership affair. Parker testified, as Hook had done, that the mules were put into the partnership—they became partnership property; and even if, at the outset, there was an individual liability on the part of Parker and Wood, each to pay Hook $400, this liability could not be transferred to Myers, so as to bind him, unless it had been assumed in writing, because, according to the testimony of the plaintiff himself, the debt of Wood was already a subsisting debt.

What we have said upon the motion for nonsuit practically disposes of the errors assigned upon the charge of the court, and obviates the necessity of any further reference to them. The plaintiff may have a good cause of action in a proper equitable proceeding to require Myers to account to him; but under his testimony in the present case, after pleading a right of action against Myers as an individual, he proved an indebtedness to himself on the part of the partnership known as Parker, Hook & Co. For this reason, a nonsuit should have been awarded.

TRIAL (§ 28*)—CONDUCT IN GENERAL—INSPECTION BY JURY.

There being no statute in this state permitting a trial judge to authorize the jury to leave the courtroom and inspect personal property which is the subject-matter of the action, it is error to permit such an inspection to be made, over the objection of counsel for one of the parties. This case is distinguished from that of Jones v. Royater Guano Company, 6 Ga. App. 506, 65 S. E. 361, by the fact that the right of trial by view in real and mixed actions existed at common law.

Error from City Court of Baxley; A. V. Sellers, Judge.

Claim case between Peterson & Lott and John M. Lott. From the judgment, Peterson & Lott bring error. Reversed.

Parker & Highsmith, of Baxley, and F. Willis Dart, of Douglas, for plaintiffs in error. O'Steen & Wallace, of Douglas, and Wade H. Watson, of Baxley, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. This was a claim case. The property involved was personal property. It is assigned as error that the court permitted the jury, over the objection of plaintiff in fi. fa., to go out into the courtyard and view the mule which had been levied on and which was claimed. At common law an inspection is permitted where the subject-matter of the suit is real or mixed property, but the jury could not view personal property, if such was the subject of litigation. Inasmuch as by our adopting statute of 1784 the common law became of force in this state, it would seem that a trial court is not authorized, as a matter of judicial discretion, to have personal property, when such personal property is the subject-matter of the action, inspected by a jury. Perhaps the consent of both parties will be such a waiver of the error that neither could except. But it is our opinion that, if either party objected, it would be ground for a new trial. At common law the right to demand a view appertained only to real and mixed actions. "In the United States," as said by Mr. Thompson, in his work on Trials (section 881), "the subject is one generally of statutory regulation, and it has been held not competent for the court to order a view against the objection of a party, except in cases where the view is authorized by statute." It is further pointed out by Mr. Thompson that the courts proceed upon the conception that it is more in consonance with the theory and method of judicial trials that the jury should base their finding solely upon sworn testimony, taken in open court, or upon depositions taken as provided by law. Only four states in the Union (one of which is Georgia) have failed to regulate the matter by statute; Alabama, Louisiana, and Maryland being the other three.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Broyles v. Prisco, 97 Ga. 643, 25 S. E. 389, seemed to be doubtful if it was within the discretion of the trial judge, over the objection of either party, to allow an inspection of the premises in an action for damages, and would not reverse his action in refusing to do so, basing this ruling upon the ground that it affirmatively appeared that material physical changes had occurred in the character of the premises between the time of the injury and the time of the trial. We may assume from this that the ruling might have been different if it had appeared that the premises were in practically the same condition at the time the motion was made that they were in at the time of the injury. Upon this ruling in the Broyles Case, Judge Cobb held, in the case of Johnson v. Winship Machine Co., 108 Ga. 555, 33 S. E. 1014: "It is doubtful whether an application to allow the jury to inspect the property which is involved in a suit is allowable at all, except by consent of all the parties to the case." However, in County of Bibb v. Reese, 115 Ga. 346, 41 S. E. 636, a ruling was made upon authority, and Chief Justice Simmons, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "At common law this right of the judge to permit the jury to view the premises existed only in real and mixed actions, and did not extend to personal actions and criminal cases without the consent of both parties. The Legislature of this state having in 1784 adopted the common law of England as it existed prior to 1776, including this right of trial by view in the discretion of the trial judge, and no repealing statute ever having been passed, that law is still in force in Georgia, as much so as if the Legislature had expressly enacted it. The present case being an action to recover damages to land, the trial judge had the right, with or without the consent of the parties, to direct the jury to view the premises."

As the case of Jones v. Royster Guano Company, 6 Ga. App. 506, 65 S. E. 361, in which this question was involved, was, like the case of County of Bibb v. Reese, supra, an action to recover damages to land, the ruling in the latter case was followed. But in the present case the property (which one party desired the jury to view, and to the view of which the other party objected) was personal property (a mule), and as a view of personal property was not permitted by the common law, the judge erred in overruling the objection and in permitting the view. It would seem to be, in the interest of justice, that all avenues for the entry of truth should be permitted, and that the jury should be given the very fullest opportunity to know the exact truth in regard to every material matter involved in a legal investigation, and, for ourselves, we see no reason for any valid distinction between a view of real property and personal property, other than the greater liability of the latter to be subject to alteration and change, and even this could be controlled by evidence as to whether there had been any alteration of the subject-matter or not. But, as was remarked by Chief Justice Simmons, in the Reese Case, the adoption of the common law fixed the status of the law of Georgia upon the subject, and in the absence of any legislation authorizing the court to permit a view of personal property which is the subject of dispute, it is error to direct the jury to view the property, especially if either party objects.

Judgment reversed.

ATKINSON v. F. S. DISMUKE & BRO.

FITZGERALD, O. & B. R. CO. v. F. S. DISMUKE & BRO.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 482*)—OPERATION—INJURIES BY FIRES—EVIDENCE.

There was no error in overruling the demurrers or in declining to dismiss the petition on oral motion, or in refusing to award a nonsuit. The defendant introduced no testimony. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the plaintiffs' personal property was destroyed by fire set out by an engine of the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company, and that its codefendant, the receiver of the railroad company from which it had leased the railroad, had elected to adopt the lease. The evidence, therefore, authorized a finding for the plaintiffs.

2. RAILROADS (§ 256*)—OPERATION—COMPANIES LIABLE.

"A corporation charged with a duty to the public cannot, by sale or otherwise, dispose of its property or franchises so as to relieve itself from acts done or omitted, without legislative sanction expressly exempting it from liability." Civ. Code 1910, § 2228.

3. RAILROADS (§ 265*)—OPERATION—PERSONS LIABLE—RECEIVER.

While "the receiver of a corporation, without the permission of the court which appointed him, cannot be sued for any acts of negligence of the corporation prior to his appointment as receiver" (Harrell v. Atkinson, 9 Ga. App. 150, 70 S. E. 954), still, as to torts committed after his appointment as receiver, if the receiver of a lessor railroad corporation has elected to adopt an outstanding lease, by the terms of which a portion of the railroad of which he has been appointed receiver is operated by another railroad corporation, and the election is evidenced by unequivocal acts, the receiver is liable for the tortious acts of the lessee corporation committed after his appointment as receiver and after a reasonable time has been allowed him in which to make an election, in the same manner and to the same extent as the corporation for which he is receiver would have been liable if there had been no receivership.

4. TRIAL (§ 267*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

While a party who presents an appropriate request therefor is entitled to have the court give to the jury instructions applying the law of the case to the particular facts in evidence, and, while a presentation of the law concretely applied to the facts directly at issue is greatly preferable to a mere statement of an abstract legal proposition, still, without charging in the terms of the request, the request may be sufficiently complied with (as in the present case) to render harmless the omission to give in charge the language of the request. In the present case the court, after stating all the material contentions of both parties, instructed the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover unless they proved every material allegation in the petition.

5. RAILROADS (§ 265*)—OPERATION—INJURIES BY FIRE—DAMAGES.

The liability of the receiver being statutory, and depending upon the proof of his relationship as lessor of the railroad company which was alleged to have set out the fire, the quantum of the liability of the receiver, if he was liable at all, would be fixed by the amount of damages, if any, found by the jury against the lessee railroad company, and the court did not err in instructing the jury to this effect.

Error from City Court of Ocilla; H. E. Oxford, Judge.

Actions by F. S. Dismuke & Bro. against H. M. Atkinson and another, as receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, and by the same plaintiffs against the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

F. S. Dismuke & Bro. brought a suit in the city court of Ocilla against the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company and Atkinson and Parrott as receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, alleging that the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company, by negligence in the operation of a locomotive engine, set fire to and destroyed a stock of goods belonging to the plaintiffs, and that the receivers of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company had leased to the codefendant the line of railroad upon which the latter negligently operated the engine which destroyed the stock of goods. Parrott having died, the action proceeded against Atkinson as sole receiver. The plaintiffs' petition alleged that both of the corporations mentioned owned and operated lines of railroad in Irwin county, and that each had an office and an agent in that county. The petition alleged that the fire which destroyed the plaintiffs' stock of merchandise, worth $15,000, was a result of the carelessness and negligence of the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company, in the following respects: (1) In not having its engines equipped with a spark arrester of the proper make and kind and in the proper state of repair, and with other appliances designed to prevent the escape of fire from the engine; (2) in that the spark arrester on the said engine was defective in having holes through which coals, sparks, and particles of fire were constantly thrown out while the engine was in operation; (3) in not managing, operating, and handling said engine with the proper care and diligence as it passed the building in which the plaintiffs' goods were stored. By amendment the plaintiffs alleged that the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company on November 20, 1905, leased the line of railroad, near which the plaintiffs' store was situated, to the Ocilla & Valdosta Railroad Company, which thereafter assigned and transferred the lease in writing to the Broxton, Hazlehurst & Savannah Railroad Company, and at a later day the lease was assigned and transferred by the last-named company to the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company, and that on April 12, 1906, the original lessor, the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company, sold and conveyed by deed to the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company all of its property and franchises, including the line of railroad from Ocilla to Irwinville, Ga., which it had previously leased as above stated. It is alleged in the original petition, and admitted in the answer, that H. M. Atkinson was duly appointed receiver of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company. Atkinson, as receiver, demurred to the petition upon the grounds (1) that no cause of action was set forth; (2) that the allegations in the petition constitute in law no reason why the plaintiffs should have judgment against the receiver jointly with the defendant railroad company; (3) that the facts alleged do not show that the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit or of the receiver, nor is any right to institute action on account of the alleged damage made to appear. There were further special grounds of demurrer, complaining that the property destroyed was not sufficiently described nor its value identified, and that an invoice or bill of particulars should have been attached to the petition. The Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company demurred specially upon the grounds that the various allegations in the petition, said to be material, were too vague and indefinite, and that certain paragraphs of the petition, specifically referred to, set forth mere conclusions of the pleader. The demurrers were overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were duly filed.

At the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiffs, the defendants moved a nonsuit, which was refused, and exceptions to this ruling were duly preserved. In addition to the motion to nonsuit, the defendant receiver, at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' testimony, made an oral motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' petition, on the ground that it set forth no cause of action, and that the facts therein showed no reason why the plaintiff should have judgment against the receiver. This motion the court likewise overruled, and the receiver filed exceptions pendente lite. The defendants introduced no testimony, and the trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, for $4,500. In separate bills of exceptions the defendants complain of the overruling of their motions for a new trial.

With the exception of two grounds of the receiver's amended motion for a new trial, one of which complains of certain instructions to the jury, and the other of the refusal of the court to give certain instructions which were timely requested, the receiver's various assignments of error seek to raise the same questions presented by the demurrer and the motion to dismiss. The grounds of the motion for a new trial presented by the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company complain that the verdict was without evidence to support it, especially in view of the fact that the plaintiffs did not introduce evidence that would authorize any certain verdict, and that the verdict was excessive, and that the court erred in certain instructions to the jury and in refusing to charge as requested.

McDonald & Grantham, Elkins & Wall, all of Fitzgerald, Rosser & Brandon, of Atlanta, and Bolling Whitfield, of Brunswick, for plaintiffs in error. L. Kennedy, of Fitzgerald and H. J. Quincey, of Ocilla, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. We will decide the points raised in these two separate writs of error together, pointing out, as we go along, those exceptions which are made in the one and not in the other. We shall deal first with the evidence, for the reason that in both motions for a new trial it is insisted that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize the plaintiffs to recover, and that, even if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover some amount, the amount could not be definitely ascertained from the evidence, and that, even if it be granted that a definite amount could be arrived at, the verdict was excessive. If either of the first two of these contentions were sustained, the defendants would be entitled to a new trial, regardless of the other points in the case. We will deal with the evidence first for the further reason that some of the positions most strenuously maintained, so far as the receiver is concerned, and which were presented after the conclusion of the evidence, in the motion to dismiss and in the motion to nonsuit, were also raised by demurrer at the beginning of the trial.

So far as the evidence relates to the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company (which we will hereafter designate the "lessee company"), it appears that it was operating a line of railroad the track of which ran within a few feet of the storehouse in which the plaintiffs' goods were stored, and the breaking out of the fire in the vicinity almost immediately after the passing of one of its engines, under circumstances which almost necessarily enforce the conclusion that the fire was caused by sparks from this engine and nothing else, in the absence of any explanation, would have authorized the jury to impose upon the lessee company liability for the resulting damage. We bear in mind that under the ruling in the case of Gainesville, etc., Railroad Company v. Edmondson, 101 Ga. 747, 29 S. E. 213, liability does not necessarily follow from the destruction of personal property of another by sparks emitted from a passing engine, if it be shown that the appliances, agencies, and instrumentalities used by the railroad company were of the kind in general use and were used with due care; but in the present case the nature of the fire was such as to support the inference that the engine used by the lessee company was not equipped with such appliances as were and should be in general use, and there was no testimony on the part of the defendant, nor was there evidence introduced by the plaintiffs which would rebut this inference. We conclude that the liability of the lessee company was established by some evidence, and, if it was enough to satisfy the jury, we cannot, in the state of the record, say it was too little.

As to the indefiniteness of description in the testimony as to the articles described, and the lack of definite proof of their value, while more specific identification of the stock of goods, and more definite testimony as to its value, might have been produced, still we cannot say that the jury would not have the right to believe the witness if he had sworn that his stock was one of general merchandise, with the fixtures usual for such stock, and that its value was $15,000. Such a general statement might tend to affect the credibility of a witness, and yet, if the jury were satisfied that it was the absolute truth, the objection that the testimony was vague and indefinite would amount to nothing. It was, no doubt, for this reason, among others, that the court overruled the demurrer addressed to the same point; and we find no error in this ruling.

[3] Having reached the conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to fix liability upon the lessee company, the liability or non-liability of the receiver of the lessor company must depend upon one of two facts—the lease must have been made by the receiver, or it must have been adopted by him. As already ruled by this court in Harrell v. Atkinson, 9 Ga. App. 150, 70 S. E. 954, in accord with what we deemed to be the uniform current of authority, a receiver cannot be held liable for a tort of the corporation of which he is receiver which was committed prior to his appointment as receiver; but in the present case the tort, if it was committed at all, was inflicted 17 months after the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company was placed in the hands of the receiver. There is no contention that the receiver made the lease, but it is undisputed, in the evidence, that the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company bought all of the assets of the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company, the original lessor, and that during the 17 months subsequent to the appointment of the receiver he had the right to collect $559.60 each month as rental from the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company, and that the receiver had made, so far as it appears from the record, no effort to have himself relieved from the contract of rental, or to call the attention of the United States court to the fact that he was exposed to the liability for the negligence of the lessee company imposed by the Code upon any railroad company which occupies the relation of lessor. The documentary evidence sustained the allegations of the petition that the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company, prior to the sale of its property and franchises to the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, had leased the branch railroad upon which the damage here involved was occasioned to the Ocilla & Valdosta Railroad Company, which, in turn, after the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company had been purchased by the company now represented by the receiver, transferred that lease to the Broxton, Hazlehurst & Savannah Railroad Company, which, in turn, transferred it to the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company. Each of these transfers must be presumed to have been known to the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company and to its receiver, because the deed of conveyance from the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company to the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company specifically refers to it, and knowledge of the assets of his cestui que trust must always be imputed to a trustee or receiver, where there is evidence of such circumstances as would put an ordinarily reasonable man on notice. Under our view of the law, the liability of the lessee company was established; and, the lease being proved, and the adoption of this lease by the receiver satisfactorily if not incontestably established, it follows that the verdict is not without evidence to support it, and the grounds assigning various reasons why such is not the case were none of them sustained.

2. Our conclusion that the verdict is authorized by the evidence effects a disposition of the case, but in view of the fact that this conclusion is at variance with the contentions of the receiver, as insisted upon by demurrer (both general and special), by motion to dismiss, and by various assignments of error in his motion for a new trial, and as it is our duty to rule upon all of the points presented, we shall briefly state the reasons why, in our judgment, the trial court did not err in overruling the demurrer or in refusing to dismiss the petition, or in charging the jury upon the precise point to which the exceptions relate. The contention of the receiver that in no event can he be held liable for damage resulting from fire set out by an engine of the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company rests upon two propositions: (1) That the fire was not due to the act of the receiver or the act of any of his agents or servants in carrying on the business connected with the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company; and (2) that, if he can be held liable at all, no liability can attach in the present case, because the lease was made, not by himself, as receiver, nor even by the railroad company which he is operating and whose estate he is administering under orders of the United States court, but by the predecessor in title of that corporation. To quote from the brief, "such act or transaction took place long before his appointment, and was in no sense an act or transaction of his in carrying on the business of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company." and counsel rely upon the rulings in Hollifield v. Wrightsville & Tennille Railroad Company, 99 Ga. 365, 27 S. E. 715, Glover v. Thayer, 101 Ga. 824, 29 S. E. 36, and Harrell v. Atkinson, 9 Ga. App. 150, 70 S. E. 954, in support of his position. These cases are not on the point now before us, because in each of them there was a distinct absence of any affirmative act on the part of the receiver. In the Harrell Case, supra, we held that the receiver could not be held liable for a tort committed by the corporation before his appointment as receiver, and that, where it appeared that the cause of action arose before the receivership, the point might be raised by general demurrer or motion to dismiss. But, under the allegations in the present petition, the cause of action arose 17 months after the receiver was appointed.

A correct decision of the vital question raised in this case must turn upon the issue as to whether the receiver of a corporation being operated under the orders of the court is subject (just as was the corporation itself prior to the receivership) to the provisions of section 2228 of the Civil Code (1910), and, in the next case, upon whether the facts set up in the petition and its amendment are sufficient to evidence an affirmative act on the part of the receiver prior to the alleged tort, whereby he voluntarily assumed liability for torts of the leasing company imposed by law upon a railroad company which leases to another a portion of its line of railroad. We confess we have not reached a conclusion without some difficulty, largely on account of some of the language used in the case of Glover v. Thayer, supra. It is to be borne in mind, however, that in that case the receiver was in possession of the property of a telegraph company as an officer of the court, and it was not liability for tort which was sought to be fixed upon him, but rather the effort was made to apply a debt alleged to be due by the receiver to the telegraph company, in payment of a judgment which Thayer had obtained against the latter. In the case at bar the pleadings allege and the evidence showed that the railroad company which the receiver is operating is the owner of another railroad, which the receiver permitted to be operated, without objection, by a corporation which holds it under a contract of lease, entered into between its predecessor in title and the railroad company which sold it, subject to the lease, to the railroad corporation operated by the receiver; and if the mere fact that a railroad is being operated by a receiver will relieve a railroad corporation, which has disposed of a portion of its railroad, from the general operation of section 2228 of the Civil Code (1910), and from liability for torts committed by the lessee or leasing company, then it would only be necessary for a railroad corporation to lease its unprofitable lines to insolvent railroad companies (which might be created for the very purpose of leasing them), and thereafter, in a friendly suit, have itself placed in the hands of a receiver, with the knowledge that, so long as the receivership continued, the leasing railroad company would be immune from any liability for the torts of the nominal lessee, no matter how great might be the negligence and carelessness with which the latter was operated to the jeopardy of the traveling public.

[2] "A corporation charged with a duty to the public cannot, by sale or otherwise, dispose of its property or franchises so as to relieve itself from liability for acts done or omitted, without legislative sanction expressly exempting it from liability." Civ. Code (1910) § 2228. Under this section, if the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company had not been placed in the hands of a receiver, it would clearly be liable for any torts shown to have been committed by the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company as its lessee; for, under its purchase of the railroad and franchises of the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company, it became as much the owner of that portion of the railroad from Ocilla to Irwinville (which had been leased) as of any other portion of the line which it purchased, and would have been primarily chargeable for all of the duties of such a corporation to the public, as if the road had not been leased; and, as the railroad was purchased subject to the lease, the provisions of section 2228 were nevertheless applicable. As was well said by the Supreme Court in Gregory v. Georgia Granite Railroad Company, 132 Ga. 590, 64 S. E. 687: "In accepting the grant of rights and franchises from the state a railroad impliedly assumes the duty of a common carrier. The consideration of the grant is the undertaking of the corporation to perform this public duty. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1392. A railroad cannot divest itself of these public duties, nor shirk its liabilities, by simply allowing another corporation to take possession of its track and operate cars thereon. Ga. R. Co. v. Haas, 127 Ga. 193, 56 S. E. 313, 119 Am. St. Rep. 327, 9 Ann. Cas. 677; Civil Code, § 1864." In view of the reason for this rule, it is immaterial that there is a contract of lease. The effect upon the carrier which owned the railroad and had been granted the franchise would be the same even if the tort was the act of a mere licensee. Ruling upon the liability of the railroad company which owns the track, Chief Justice Bleckley used the following language: "There is no less skepticism in law than in theology. This court is called upon again and again for a further revelation of some legal truth which has already been revealed. After the cases of Macon & Augusta R. R. Co. v. Mays, 49 Ga. 355 [15 Am. Rep. 678], Singleton v. Southwestern R. R. Co., 70 Ga. 464 [48 Am. Rep. 574], and Chattanooga, Rome & Columbus R. R. Co. v. Liddell, 85 Ga. 482 [11 S. E. 853, 21 Am. St. Rep. 169], it would seem that there could be no reasonable doubt of the liability of a chartered railroad company permitting another company to run trains over its railway, and thus use its franchise, to respond for any damage occasioned by negligence, whether its own or that of its lessee or licensee." Central R. Co. v. Phinazee, 93 Ga. 488, 21 S. E. 66. Under our statutes, a corporation which owns a railroad and the franchises may be exempted by express legislative sanction from liability, but no such statute has been passed in behalf of the company whose receiver is the plaintiff in error in the present case. There can be no reasonable doubt that, as a general rule, a receiver of a railroad company, while not suable for torts committed prior to his appointment, in this state stands in the shoes of the corporation whose franchises he is operating, subject to all liabilities which may be created subsequent to his appointment.

3. It is insisted, however, by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that, in order for liability to attach to a receiver, he must do some affirmative act. Under our construction of section 2228, the receiver in this case was liable for any negligence of the company exercising the franchises of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company, subsequent to his appointment, though not liable (for the reasons stated in Harrell v. Atkinson, supra) for the results of any acts of negligence prior to that time, though the corporation itself might be liable. But if we are wrong in this, and the receiver was unable to set aside or breach the contract, still it appears that for 17 months he made no effort to obtain the intervention of the court by which he was appointed and relief from the situation in which he found himself. We think, therefore, that it could be assumed from the allegations of the petition, and that the jury were authorized to infer from the proof, that the receiver adopted the contract entered into between the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company and the lessee company. Even if we narrow the matter to this view of the case, it is well settled that where a receiver has a reasonable time in which to adopt or to rescind a contract, and does not adopt the latter course, he will be presumed to have elected to adopt the contract, and will be subject to the same liabilities as if the contract had been originally his own act.

So much in response to the argument and citations of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error. In our opinion the receiver stood in the shoes of the lessor company, and he is liable, not because of the lease (the existence of which, for reasons which we have stated, is immaterial), but because the company of which he is receiver owns the railroad over which the engine which caused the damage was operated, and because the law puts upon the lessor the burden of responsibility for the acts of the lessee. As receiver he was liable to the same extent that the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company was liable, because, under the provisions of section 2788 of the Civil Code, "the liability of receivers, trustees, assignees, and other officers operating railroads in this state, or partially in this state, for injuries or damages to personal property, shall be the same as the liability now fixed by law governing the operation of railroad corporations in this state for like injuries and damages." If any affirmance, ratification, or other act on the part of the receiver, in approval of the alleged lease, was necessary as is contended by the plaintiff in error, we think such an affirmance can reasonably be inferred from the fact that the receiver permitted the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railway Company, whose road connects with the railroad which he is operating and is a part of it, to operate its trains under his very eyes for 17 months, without protest or objection, over tracks owned by the company of which he is receiver.

[4] 4. The fact that the judge declined to charge the jury as requested is not in our opinion sufficient ground for reversal, although we think the charge requested should have been given substantially in the language in which it was presented. A party is entitled to have the law applied to the particular facts in testimony, and the presentation of the law concretely applied to the points directly at issue is greatly preferable to a mere statement of the law in the abstract. This court has frequently pointed out that instructions of the former character are much more intelligible to a jury of laymen than the mere statement of an abstract legal proposition. We think, therefore, that the jury should have been told that Dismuke & Bro. were not entitled to any amount, unless they had proved that the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company actually caused the fire by the negligent acts, or some of them, set out in their petition, and the jury should further have been told, as requested, that a railroad company is not responsible, and cannot be made to pay, for causing a fire, unless the fire was the result of its negligent acts or omission. However, although these instructions, which apply the law directly to the evidence in the case, should have been given, still we think the request was substantially complied with when the judge instructed the jury, more than once, that the plaintiffs could not recover unless they proved every material allegation in the petition; this statement, too, being made after the judge had read to the jury the material portion of the petition and stated the material contentions of both parties.

[5] 5. It is insisted on the part of the receiver that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "In passing upon this case. I charge you that you should determine what your verdict is as to the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company, and, when you have done this, determine whether or not the allegations as to the other defendants have been established. If they have, then you will be authorized to find a verdict against them also, of course, for whatever you determine to find against the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company." This instruction is not subject to the objection made to it, that the jury were thereby instructed that, if they found the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company liable, then the receiver would be liable also, or that the jury were instructed that the receiver was liable without regard to the special defenses set up by him. The meaning of the charge (and we are certain the jury must have so understood it) was that in no event would the receiver be liable, unless the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company was found to be liable; and that, if liable at all, the amount of the receiver's liability would be the same as that found against the Fitzgerald, Ocilla & Broxton Railroad Company. Moreover, in another part of his charge the judge gave a clear instruction to this effect; so that the jury could not have been misled by this instruction, which in no event conveyed the meaning stated in the assignment of error.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. STEPHENS. (No. 3,567.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 665*)—FOREIGN CORPORATION—ACTION—JURISDICTION.

It being alleged in the petition that the tort was committed in the state of Florida, and that the defendant railroad company was a foreign corporation, with an office and place of business in the county in which the suit was brought, there was no error in overruling the demurrer, based upon the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction. S. F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Evans, 121 Ga. 391 (2), 49 S. E. 308. The statutory rule confining suits against railroad companies for torts to the county in which the cause of action arose does not apply to torts committed beyond the limits of the state by a nonresident railway company. Cincinnati, etc., Ry. Co. v. Pless, 3 Ga. App. 400, 60 S. E. 8. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2595-2600; Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

There are no facts in the record which take this case out of the general rule that damages are given as compensation for the injury done. The plaintiff was not entitled to recover substantial damages. According to the evidence, the agent of the defendant company, at Homosassa, Fla., sold to the plaintiff a ticket different from that which he requested, in that the plaintiff had asked for a ticket via the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway from Jacksonville, while the ticket sold him was routed over the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad from Jacksonville, and he boarded a train of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway at Jacksonville, when, according to the ticket he had purchased, he should have boarded a train of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. According to the plaintiff's evidence, this latter mistake was due to the misdirection of a gatekeeper at the Jacksonville station, who, on looking at the plaintiff's ticket, pointed out a passenger train of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway and permitted him to enter it. The conductor of the train, upon the plaintiff's refusal to pay fare, and after notifying him that the ticket presented by him was only good for passage over the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, ejected him from the train. It does not appear, however, that the plaintiff was subjected to any humiliation or indignity. It is undisputed that he returned to Jacksonville without charge, that he had no expense for lodging or meals (these being paid for by the gatekeeper who made the mistake), and that, at an expense of $3.80 for railroad fare, he reached his destination at 2 o'clock p. m. on Sunday, when, if he had been sold the ticket he actually requested, he could not have reached his home earlier than 2 a. m. of the same day. The day of his return being Sunday, he lost no time from his business, and the evidence does not disclose that there was any exigency of a personal or domestic character demanding his earlier presence at his home. In view of these facts, a recovery of $400 cannot be treated as nominal damages.

3. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

The plaintiff, having the right to elect the route he preferred to take, is entitled to recover the amount he expended for a ticket over the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway from Jacksonville to his home, regardless of the fact that he had been erroneously supplied with a ticket over a different route, which he could have used. The sum which may be disclosed by the evidence as necessary to comply with the original request of the plaintiff, that he be carried to his home over the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway from Jacksonville, may be recovered by him, in addition to such a sum (sufficient to carry the costs) as nominal damages as the jury may award in establishing and declaring the plaintiff's right to maintain his action for tort due to the carrier's breach of its public duty in not selling the plaintiff a ticket over the route that he had selected, if, upon another trial, the evidence satisfies the jury that there was a breach of this duty.

CONTINUANCE (§ 19*)—GROUNDS—ABSENCE OF PARTY.

Where it is uncontradicted that the absence of a party to a cause is due to the fact that he is at home, where his presence is necessary, for the reason that "his wife is liable to be confined at any minute," and his counsel makes the requisite statement that he (counsel) cannot safely go to trial without the presence of the absent party, and especially when it is shown, in addition, that the absent party is a material witness, the ends of justice require that a continuance be had. Civil Code 1910, § 5717. Under such circumstances, the continuances of such a party are not exhausted, although the case may previously have been continued by reason of the absence of his counsel in the General Assembly, and in another instance continued by agreement. The judge erred in refusing to continue the case, and the subsequent proceedings in the trial were therefore nugatory.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Flte, Judge.

M. C. Tarver, of Dalton, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Rivers, of Summerville, and Maddox, McCarny & Shumate, of Dalton, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The first exception to the judgment of the court below, which was adverse to the plaintiff in error, depends on the correctness of the lower court's ruling upon the motion for continuance. Upon the call of the case counsel for the plaintiff in error moved for a continuance, on account of the absence of his client (as well as on account of the absence of another witness, as to whom the ruling was correct). The father-in-law of the absent party testified: "He is not here this morning, and will not be here. His wife is about to be confined; likely to be confined at any minute. His presence there is necessary." It appears from the bill of exceptions that counsel made the statement, required by section 5717 of the Civil Code of 1910, that he could not safely go to trial in the absence of his client, and it further appears that, if Ritchey had been present, he would have been a material witness in his own behalf. We think that, under these facts, the ends of justice required that the case should have been continued. We cannot conceive of a more pressing obligation than that which binds the husband to care for his wife in sickness, and we can see no reason why the sickness incident to confinement and the travail of childbearing should be an exception. The general rule is to permit a husband to minister to his wife in her illness, and to excuse his absence from court if his presence at his home is necessary.

It is urged by counsel that the witness (who appears from the record to have been the father of the sick wife) was incompetent to testify as to her condition, and the consequent necessity of her husband's presence at home. It is apparent that this point is without merit, because a physician who is attending a wife "likely to be confined at any minute" should, if he is performing his duty as a physician, be with his patient, and cannot be in court to testify. Furthermore, the nature of the illness which was made the basis of the motion for a continuance in this case is a matter of common knowledge. Any witness can testify to the facts, if he knows them; and we apprehend there would be few witnesses better able to state the necessity for the husband to be at home than his father-in-law, who was presumably familiar with all of the circumstances surrounding the wife—the number of small children, if any, who required the attention of the father in the sickness of the mother, the amount of domestic help, the temperament and disposition of the sick wife, etc.

The learned trial judge, in overruling the motion to continue, does not seem to have placed his decision upon the ground advanced by the defendants in error, but rather upon the fact that the movant's continuances had been exhausted. Section 5717 is as follows: "If either party shall be providentially prevented from attending at the trial of any cause, and the counsel of such absent party will state in his place that he cannot go safely to trial without the presence of such absent party, such cause shall be continued, provided his continuances are not exhausted." Taking into consideration the nature of the showing in the present instance, we do not think that the movant's continuances had been exhausted, merely because at a prior term of the court the case had been continued by agreement of parties, and at the July term, 1911, had been continued because of the absence of his counsel in the General Assembly. The latter was a continuance by law, designed primarily, not for the benefit of parties, but for their counsel. It was not, strictly speaking, a continuance for Ritchey, because, if his counsel thought it his duty to remain in attendance on the Legislature, he could have done so, and Ritchey could not have gotten a trial, even if he had desired to have the case tried, unless he had gone to the expense of employing other counsel. The continuance by agreement of parties was not, strictly speaking, a continuance by this movant, and therefore was not wholly chargeable to him.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v.
CARTER. (No. 4,230.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 7*)—EX OFFICIO JUSTICES—JURISDICTION AND PROCEEDINGS.

Under the statutes of this state, a justice's court and the court of a commissioned notary public, ex officio justice of the peace, are identical, having the same jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 87*)—PROCEEDINGS—GARNISHMENT—RETURN TO OTHER JUSTICE.

ments of section 4754 of the Civil Code of 1910, garnishment based thereon is sued out and served on a person residing in a militia district of the same county, different from the militia district in which the suit is pending or the judgment was obtained, the garnishment may be returned to and tried in either the justice's court or the court of a notary public, ex officio justice of the peace, of the district in which the garnishee resides.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action between the Western Union Telegraph Company and George A. Carter. From the judgment, the Western Union Telegraph Company brings error. Reversed.

J. D. Greene, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Geo. A. Carter, of Atlanta, pro se.

HILL, C. J. The only point at issue in this case was as to the construction of section 4754 of the Civil Code of 1910; the plaintiff contending that a garnishment based upon a judgment obtained in the court of a notary public and ex officio justice of the peace could be sued out in, returned to, and tried in the court of the justice of the peace of a different militia district of the same county, in which district the garnishee resided, and the garnishee contending that the garnishment should have been returned to and tried in the court of a notary public and ex officio justice of the peace, and not the court of a justice of the peace. The judge of the superior court held in favor of the garnishee's contention; the plaintiff's petition for certiorari being overruled and final judgment rendered in favor of the garnishee.

The Code section referred to provides that, "when any person or persons, sought to be garnished, reside in a militia district in the same county, different from the militia district in which suit is pending or judgment was obtained," garnishment may be sued out "in the militia district where the person or persons sought to be garnished reside, * * * requiring such person or persons to appear at the next notary public's or justice's court of the district of the garnishee's residence, according as such suit was pending, or judgment was obtained, in the notary public's or justice's court, then and there * * * to depose and answer," etc.

tion of the grand jury. Justices of the peace and notaries public, ex officio justices of the peace, are commissioned by the Governor for a term of four years, and the statute expressly declares that commissioned notaries public, appointed by the judge of the superior court upon recommendation of the grand jury, shall be ex officio justices of the peace, and shall be removed from office for malpractice in office. In Childers v. State, 3 Ga. App. 449, 60 S. E. 128, it is said by this court that "a commissioned notary public is ex officio a justice of the peace," and this is the declaration of the statute. In Pool v. Perdue, 44 Ga. 454, the Supreme Court holds that under the Constitution of 1868 (article 5, § 6, par. 4)—and as to this the Constitution of 1877 makes no change—a commissioned notary public is a justice of the peace of the district in which he is appointed, with all the powers and functions of such office. Lynes v. State, 46 Ga. 208; Ormond v. Ball, 120 Ga. 919, 48 S. E. 383. The Constitution of this state also provides that "the jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice of all courts or officers invested with judicial power (except city courts), of the same grade or class, so far as regulated by law, and the force and effect of the process, judgment, and decree by such courts, severally, shall be uniform. This uniformity must be established by the General Assembly." Const. art. 6, § 9, par. 1 (Civil Code 1910, § 6527). And section 4722 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that "the proceedings of the justices' courts shall be uniform throughout the state."

[2] The confusion on the point arises out of the following language of section 4754 of the Civil Code of 1910: "Requiring such person or persons to appear at the next notary public's or justice's court of the district of the garnishee's residence, according as such suit was pending, or judgment was obtained, in the notary public's or justice's court." We do not think that the language emphasized means that if the suit was pending, or the judgment obtained, in a notary public's court, only a notary public's court could be resorted to in trying the garnishment, or that if the suit was pending or the judgment was obtained in the court of a justice of the peace, the garnishment must be returned to and tried in the court of a justice of the peace. Such an interpretation would necessarily create a difference between the powers and jurisdiction of these two classes of courts, in direct violation of the provision of the Constitution above cited (Const. art. 6, § 9, par. 1; Civil Code, § 6527), and would make this part of section 4754 unconstitutional. We are clear that the only reasonable construction of this section, notwithstanding the apparent confusion in its language, is that when suit is pending, or when judgment has been obtained, in either a justice's court or a notary public's court of one militia district, and garnishment based thereon is sued out and served on a person residing in another district of the same county, in compliance with the provisions of section 4754, the garnishment may be returned to and tried in either the justice's court or a notary public's court of the district in which the garnishee resides.

MISENHEIMER v. GAINNEY. (No. 4,038.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 23, 1912.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 27, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 302*)—VERIFICATION—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY.

Where an amendment to a plea or answer is offered after the time allowed for answer has expired, the verification prescribed by section 5640 of the Civil Code of 1910 must be made by the defendant in person, and cannot be made by his attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 898-903; Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 380*)—ISSUES AND PROOFS—EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE UNDER PLEADING.

Testimony which is not relevant to the issues made by the pleadings is not admissible as evidence.

3. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 33*)—LIENS—FORECLOSURE.

The counter affidavit did not call in question the legality of the lien as claimed in the affidavit for foreclosure, and, the amendment offered for that purpose having been properly rejected, the testimony tending to prove that the plaintiff was not entitled to the lien was properly excluded, and the court did not err in refusing to dismiss the foreclosure proceedings, on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to the statutory lien as claimed.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. D. Gainney against C. O. Misenheimer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was a proceeding to foreclose a lien on a sawmill and on lumber for logs furnished the mill, under section 3358 of the Civil Code of 1910. The defendant, through his agent, filed a counter affidavit, alleging: (1) He was not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum sued for. (2) He admitted an indebtedness of $40, and tendered this amount, but denied any indebtedness in excess of this sum, contending that the balance sued for was not yet due. (3) No demand for payment of the debt was ever made upon him as required by law. (4) He denies that the plaintiff had "faithfully performed and completed her contract as required by law." (5) "At the time that said lien was foreclosed the amount sued for was not yet due, and the plaintiff was not entitled to the same." On the hearing the defendant sought to amend the counter affidavit by alleging that the plaintiff was "not entitled to any lien whatever under the laws of Georgia." This amendment was verified by the defendant's attorney at law. The court refused to allow the amendment, and the refusal is assigned as error.

The case proceeded to trial, and the plaintiff, by her agent, proved that she sold to the defendant, who was operating the sawmill in question, the logs described in the affidavit of foreclosure. On cross-examination this witness testified that at the time the timber was sold to the defendant it was standing upon the land and had not been cut, but that it was cut and removed after the contract was made; that the plaintiff did not cut and deliver any of the timber, but that all of it was cut by the defendant and hauled by him to his sawmill. The defendant offered in evidence the contract for the sale of the timber, but it was excluded, on objection made by the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no plea which made the contract material or relevant evidence. The court also, at the instance of the plaintiff, excluded from evidence the testimony of the defendant that there were no logs or cut timber sold, but that it was all growing at the time of the contract, and was subsequently cut and hauled to the mill by the defendant; this testimony being objected to on the ground that there was no plea that made it relevant or material evidence.

The defendant, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, made a motion to dismiss the levy, on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to any lien under the statute of the state, in that the evidence disclosed the fact that the timber was growing at the time the contract was made, and was not personalty, but was a part of the realty. The motion was overruled, and this ruling is assigned as error.

J. R. Wilson, of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error. E. S. Longley, of Muskogee, Okl., and Russell & Custer, of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The first question to be decided is whether the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment to the plea as verified by the defendant's attorney at law. The general rule is that attorneys are not authorized to make affidavits required to be made by the parties unless specially permitted by law. Civil Code 1910, § 4955. Section 3366, par. 6, relating to the foreclosure of liens on personal property, declares: "If the person defendant in such execution, or any creditor of such defendant, contests the amount or justice of the claim, or the existence of such lien, he may file his affidavit of the fact, setting forth the ground of such denial, which affidavit shall form an issue to be returned to the court and tried as other causes." Section 5810 provides that the affidavit of illegality may be filed by an attorney in fact; but an attorney in fact is not necessarily an attorney at law. And section 5640, relating to the verification of an amendment to an answer or plea, is as follows: "The defendant, after the time allowed for answer has expired, shall not in any case by amendment set up any new facts or defense of which notice was not given by the original plea or answer, unless at the time of filing such amended plea or answer containing the new matter he shall attach an affidavit that at the time of filing the original plea or answer he did not omit the new facts or defense set out in the amended plea or answer for the purpose of delay," etc. It would seem from this section of the Code that the counter affidavit to the foreclosure of the lien is required to be made by the defendant in person. In this case, however, no objection seems to have been made to the original counter affidavit which was made by the agent of the plaintiff; but the objection was interposed and sustained as to the amendment verified by the defendant's attorney at law, which brought into question the validity of the lien claim, and this section of the Code explicitly declares that the verification of the amended plea or answer, after the time allowed for plea or answer has expired, must be made by the defendant. The "defendant" must make affidavit that the matter of defense set up in the amendment was not omitted from the original answer or plea for the purpose of delay; in other words, that he, as the defendant, did not omit these facts in the original plea for the purpose of delay. It would seem to be immaterial whether they had been omitted from the original plea by the attorney representing the defendant.

The attorney for the plaintiff in error relies upon section 5642 of the Civil Code in support of his position that the amended plea was sufficiently verified by the attorney. This section provides as follows: "In all civil cases founded on unconditional contracts in writing, where there is an issuable defense, and where the defendant does not reside in the county in which the suit is pending, it shall and may be lawful for the agent or attorney at law of such defendant to make oath to the plea, and the same shall be as good and sufficient as if made by the defendant himself." It will be seen that the authority given by this section is confined to unconditional contracts in writing, where there is an issuable defense, and where the defendant does not reside in the county in which the suit is pending. The amendment to the plea offered in the present case alleged that the defendant did not reside in the county but was beyond the jurisdiction of the court. Manifestly a statutory lien for furnishing logs for a sawmill is not within the class of unconditional contracts in writing referred to, and this section of the Code has no application to the present case. The cases of Fort v. West, 53 Ga. 584, and Poullain v. Pigg, 60 Ga. 263, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, where an amendment to the original plea was verified by the attorney at law, were suits on unconditional contracts in writing and squarely within the provisions of the statute embodied in section 5642. In view of the fact that section 3366, par. 3, allows an attorney for the plaintiff to make the affidavit foreclosing a lien claim, we do not see any substantial reason why a similar right relating to counter affidavits should not be granted to the defendant; but the law is explicit that the defendant shall make the counter affidavit, and also that the amendment to the answer or plea, filed after the time for making a defense, shall be verified by the affidavit of the defendant in person. We therefore conclude that the trial judge committed no error in refusing to allow the amendment to the counter affidavit or answer of the defendant, which was verified by his attorney at law.

[3] 2. It is next insisted by the plaintiff in error that the original counter affidavit was sufficient to traverse each and every fact contained in the affidavit of foreclosure, especially in view of the fact that there was no special or general demurrer filed to the counter affidavit. In Slappey v. Charles, 7 Ga. App. 796, 68 S. E. 303, this court held that a counter affidavit stating that the defendant was "not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum named, nor in any sum whatever, for which the plaintiff has a lien," in the absence of a special demurrer, was sufficient to raise an issue that the items claimed to have been furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant did not fall within the class as to which the law allows a lien. A comparison of the counter affidavit in the present case with the one filed in the Slappey Case shows a marked difference in the allegations of the two affidavits. In the Slappey Case there was an express denial of the plaintiff's right to the lien claimed; in the present case the counter affidavit contained no denial of the right to the lien claimed, but simply a denial of the allegation that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum sued for. It was admitted that the defendant did owe the sum of $40; but it was alleged that the balance claimed in the affidavit was not yet due, that no demand had ever been made upon defendant for payment, and that the plaintiff had not performed or completed her contract, and that for this reason the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount claimed by the foreclosure proceeding. But the counter affidavit, which constitutes the answer, nowhere denies the right to the lien claimed.

[2] It follows, therefore, that, no denial of this right having been contained in the original counter affidavit or plea, and the amendment to the original plea having been disallowed because of improper verification, the question of the plaintiff's right under the statute was not in issue at all, and the trial court did not err in excluding from evidence the testimony going to show that the plaintiff was not entitled to a lien, because there were no logs furnished to the sawmill, but the contract of sale was for growing timber which was attached to the realty upon which there was no lien. It is true that the testimony of the plaintiff's witness on cross-examination disclosed this fact; but, since there was no issue under the plea which made this testimony relevant or material, the defendant could not take advantage of it. Evidence is never admissible, unless relevant or material to the issues made by the pleadings. While the contention of plaintiff in error, that under the statute of this state no lien is given for growing timber which is a part of the realty, is in conformity with the repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, yet, since this question was not put in issue by the pleadings, the court did not err in refusing to dismiss the foreclosure proceedings on this ground.

Judgment affirmed.

KALMON v. SCARBORO et al. (No. 3,882.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

1. GUARANTY (§ 85*) — ACTION AGAINST GUARANTOR—PLEADING.

Under the decision of this court in Small Company v. Claxton, 1 Ga. App. 83, 57 S. E. 977, following the decision of the Supreme Court in Sims v. Clark, 91 Ga. 302, 18 S. E. 158, the allegations of the petition are sufficient to withstand the general demurrer, and the dismissal of the petition on demurrer was therefore error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

2. GUARANTY (§ 53*)—RELEASE OF LIABILITY—CHANGE OF CONTRACT.

Even if it could be inferred from the petition that the contract of purchase originally created an indebtedness on account, instead of by note as one of the original terms of the sale, still a guarantor is not, as a matter of law, released by reason of the mere fact that an account which he guaranteed has been reduced to a note, when it appears that the account was for goods furnished "in pursuance of the contract of guaranty," and when it appears that the note represents the same amount, and stands in lieu of the account. It is plain, from the allegations of the petition, that the action is based upon the guaranty, and not upon the notes; and the statements in regard to the notes may be treated as a recital of the history of the case.

3. GUARANTY (§ 77*) — ACTION AGAINST GUARANTOR—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

The liability of the guarantors in the present case depends upon the failure of the original debtor to pay the debt at maturity. It is not necessary that the creditor should obtain a judgment against the original debtor before suit against the guarantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 87-90; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

4. GUARANTY (§ 53*)—RELEASE OF LIABILITY—CHANGE OF OBLIGATION.

It does not appear from the allegations of the petition that the guarantors' risk was increased or their liability enlarged. The execution of the notes merely evidenced in writing an admission, on the part of the principal debtor, of an indebtedness to the plaintiff, which (according to other allegations of the petition) was the subject of the guaranty; and although the note contained a stipulation for attorney's fees and for interest at the rate of 8 per cent. (instead of 7 per cent., which the account would have drawn), still the petition did not ask for a recovery of attorney's fees, or for interest at the higher rate.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by E. H. Kalmon against Frank Scarboro and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

C. W. Fulwood, of Tifton, for plaintiff in error. L. P. Skeen and J. M. Kent, both of Tifton, and J. J. Murray, of Nashville, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Kalmon filed a suit in which it was alleged that Frank Scarboro, W. L. Yeomans, and J. M. Kent entered into a contract with him whereby they became guarantors of the account of J. M. Kent Company. He attached to the petition a copy of the contract, and alleged that in pursuance of the contract he sold J. M. Kent Company goods and merchandise, whereby that company became indebted to him in the sum of $300, with interest; that the indebtedness is evidenced by two promissory notes, for $150 each, one due April 15, 1910, and the other May 15, 1910; that these notes are due and unpaid; that the Kent Company has failed and refused to pay them, and that this corporation is insolvent and unable to respond to a judgment for the amount of the debt, and has ceased to do business. On demurrer the judge dismissed the petition, and this judgment is the ground of the bill of exceptions.

The defendants, Yeomans and Scarboro, filed separate demurrers. Each demurred generally, and Scarboro demurred upon the ground that the petition failed to show that the plaintiff had liquidated his demand against the J. M. Kent Company by a suit to judgment, insisting that there can be no liability upon the guaranty until the plaintiff has obtained judgment against J. M.

Kent Company or joined J. M. Kent Company as a defendant in the suit. The demurrer of Yeomans, in addition to urging that the petition set forth no cause of action, objected to it as being duplicitous. Yeomans demurred also upon the ground that it is impossible to determine judicially whether the plaintiff bases his action upon the alleged contract of guaranty, or whether it is the notes attached to the petition that are sued upon; also upon the ground that no recovery can be had, except upon the notes, which are made a part of the petition, and that it does not appear that the defendants, Yeomans and Scarboro, in any way obligated themselves for the payment of these notes. A further special demurrer set up the contention that the liability of the defendants rests solely upon the following stipulation of the contract of guaranty: "We do hereby guarantee to the said E. H. Kalmon the payment at maturity, in accordance with the terms of sale, of the price and value of all goods, wares, and merchandise sold by them to the said J. M. Kent Company"—and it is insisted that the petition fails to show what goods (or whether any) were ever sold to the J. M. Kent Company, or the price and value of such goods, or when they were sold, or the terms of sale, or the maturity of the debt.

[1] The question of first importance raised by the demurrers is whether the suit is an action on the contract of guaranty, or on the promissory notes executed by the original debtor. If the petition can be construed as a suit upon the notes, its dismissal upon the demurrer was proper. If, upon the other hand the recovery is sought upon the liability imposed by the contract of guaranty, the action should not have been dismissed, and for the purpose of another trial, we should next inquire into the merits of the special demurrers. We hold that the petition sets forth a good cause of action, which we construe to be a suit on the contract of guaranty, to recover $300 of a possible liability for $1,000 (which was assumed by the guarantors), with interest upon the $300 at the rate of 7 per cent. Without any relaxation of the rule which requires pleadings to be most strongly construed against the pleader, it is apparent that the plaintiff relies entirely upon the contract, because he sets out the contract and pleads it. He alleges that the goods which he sold were sold in pursuance of the contract, and that the indebtedness of the J. M. Kent Company depended upon this, and he asks for no more than the value of the goods, with lawful interest. It is true that he says the amount which the Kent Company owes him, and which he alleges the defendants are due to pay him by reason of the terms of their contract of guaranty, is evidenced by two promissory notes, and that these are attached to the petition; but he does not seek to recover according to the stipulations of the promissory notes, for he does not ask a judgment for interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, nor any recovery of the attorney's fees provided for in the notes. The main point is that he alleges that the liability of the defendants to him depends upon the fact that the goods were sold to the Kent Company in pursuance of the contract. It is well settled that the liability of a guarantor is distinct from that of the original debtor. There is no liability on the part of the guarantor until the original debtor fails to pay. It is equally well settled that any change of the contract without the consent of the guarantor relieves him, and also that any act that is done by the party guaranteed, which will increase his risk, will likewise void the contract of guaranty. According to the allegations of the petition, reasonably construed, the plaintiff sold to the principal debtor, J. M. Kent Company, $300 worth of goods, and the debt is evidenced by $300 worth of notes. It is not alleged that the goods were sold upon an account. It is possible that they were sold in exchange for the principal debtor's notes, possibly at the dates fixed for the maturity of each. So far as appears from the petition, this may have been the course of the matter, for the contract of guaranty places no restriction upon the terms of sale which might be agreed upon between Kalmon and the Kent Company.

[2] If we should assume that the goods were sold on account, and that, in order to avoid misunderstanding and to liquidate the account, the Kent Company gave its notes; would this be any change of the contract of guaranty under which these guarantors undertook to guarantee to the said E. H. Kalmon the payment at maturity, in accordance with the terms of sale, of the price and value of all goods sold to the Kent Company, from time to time, on and after September 22, 1909, until Kalmon should be given 10 days' written notice of the withdrawal of the guaranty? There is nothing on the face of the petition to show that the notes were the result of any extension of time to the Kent Company of an overdue demand, and so we are not required to hold whether this would be a novation of the contract, such as would release the guarantors, or such an act as, by increasing the liability of the guarantors, would relieve them. So far as appears from the petition, Kalmon preferred for his sales to the Kent Company to be evidenced by notes (which are admissions of indebtedness), rather than by accounts, which are subject to dispute. However, we incline to the opinion that the mere fact of taking the notes in lieu of open accounts, the payment of which has been guaranteed, would not in any way change the relation of the parties or subject the guarantors of the account, under the contract involved in this case, to any greater liability. The contract bespoke a continuing guaranty, until the guarantors should notify Kalmon to sell to the Kent Company no further. It extended a continuing credit of $1,000 to the Kent Company.

Civil Code 1910, § 3543, declares that "a change of the nature or terms of a contract is called a novation; such novation, without the consent of the surety, discharges him." The sense of the contract entered into by the guarantors in this case is that they assume liability up to $1,000 for whatever goods Kalmon might sell to the Kent Company, until such time as the guaranty might be withdrawn. How can the nature of this contract be affected, or its terms exceeded, by mere failure to collect promptly, or failure to collect at all? When the Kent Company fails to pay, the guarantors become liable, says this contract of guaranty. True it is that "the undertaking of a surety is stricti juris, and he cannot be bound further than the very terms of the contract, and if the principal and the obligee change the terms of the contract without his consent the surety is discharged." Bethune v. Dozier, 10 Ga. 235. But what are the terms of the present contract? There is no stipulation as to the terms of payment which Kalmon shall impose on the Kent Company; no provision that he shall not, by deed or mortgage, take security for its payment; no requirement that he shall not take from the Kent Company an admission of its indebtedness. The contract does not speak of any of these things; and therefore it cannot be said that its terms are varied because Kalmon's debt is represented by notes, instead of an account. The terms of the contract of guaranty in the instant case are that Kalmon shall not, on the faith of the guaranty, sell to the Kent Company such an amount of goods as will cause their indebtedness to Kalmon, at any one time, to exceed $1,000. This is manifest from the language used, "Our liability shall not at any time exceed $1,000." The guarantors reserved in the contract the right to withdraw their guaranty upon ten days' notice, and they waived notice of nonpayment on the part of Kalmon. They guaranteed that the Kent Company would pay at maturity in accordance with the terms of sale. To our minds the waiver of the notice of nonpayment implies an understanding and agreement on the part of the guarantors that Kalmon was not required to promptly enforce the payment at its maturity of any demand he might have against the Kent Company for goods sold it in pursuance of the guaranty, and this view is strengthened by the stipulation of the contract to the effect that the liability of the guarantors shall not at any time exceed $1,000.

Construing the contract as a whole, there is no term or provision of the instrument which, in our opinion, would have forbidden Kalmon, if the Kent Company owed him less than $1,000, to take a note for the pre-existing account, and certainly this mode of procedure would not have subjected the guarantors to any additional risk upon their contract of guaranty.

[4] Coming to the special demurrers: It is plain that the suit was upon the contract of guaranty, because the petition asks only for the $300 alleged to be the value of the goods sold (as evidenced by the notes), with interest. If the suit had been proceeding upon the notes, the plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment for 8 per cent. interest, and in the event of the nonpayment of the notes, after service of the 10 days' notice, would have been entitled to attorney's fees. The disclaimer of the higher rate of interest and the avoidance of any reference to attorney's fees are of themselves sufficient to indicate that the plaintiff elected to pursue his action upon the contract of guaranty; and this point is strengthened by the reference to the contract. It is plain that the notes are referred to as part of the history of the case; and they can properly be referred to as admissions on the part of the original obligee of his indebtedness for the sum which the plaintiff is seeking to recover from the guarantors upon their collateral liability.

[3] The contention set up by demurrer, as to failure to show that the plaintiff had obtained a judgment against the Kent Company, is without merit. See Sims v. Clark, 91 Ga. 802, 18 S. E. 158. The plaintiff is not required to reduce to judgment his claim against the principal debtor, if the contract of guaranty guarantees payment of the debt at maturity; and unless the principal debtor participates in the execution of the contract of guaranty, he will not, of course, be a proper party to a suit in which the instrument is the basis of the action.

In view of our opinion as to the nature of the action, the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer; and, for the reasons stated, the special demurrers should be overruled.

Judgment reversed.

PRITCHARD v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF ORANGE COUNTY.

COUNTIES (§ 183*)—ROAD BONDS—VALIDITY.

Since Const. art. 7, § 7, and Revisal 1905, § 1318, subsec. 27, authorize a county to contract indebtedness without a vote of the qualified electors to cover necessary expenses, bonds issued by a county for public roads under Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 600, are not invalid, even if that act was not passed in the manner prescribed by Const. art. 2, § 14.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action without controversy between W. N. Pritchard and the Board of Commissioners of Orange County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Nash, of Hillsboro, for appellant. Manning & Everett, of Durham, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action submitted without controversy to determine the validity of the proposed issue of $250,000 bonds by the county of Orange for the public roads of said county. An election was held March 19, 1912, in pursuance of chapter 600, Pub. Local Laws 1911, at which, as required by the terms of said act, a majority of the votes cast approved the issue of said bonds, though not a majority of the qualified voters.

The validity of the bonds is contested, upon the ground that the bill which passed its several readings in the Senate in the manner required by Const. art. 2, § 14, was changed in substantial and material respects on the passage of the bill through the House, and that, as amended by the House, the bill was not re-enacted in the Senate in the manner required by Const. art. 2, § 14. Glenn v. Wray, 126 N. C. 730, 36 S. E. 167; Com'rs v. Stafford, 138 N. C. 453, 50 S. E. 862; Bank v. Lacy, 151 N. C. 4, 65 S. E. 441; Russell v. Troy, 159 N. C. —, 74 S. E. 1021.

But we need not consider this ground of objection, because, under Const. art. 7, § 7, the county is authorized to contract indebtedness without the vote of the qualified voters, when it is for the necessary expenses thereof. Vaughn v. Com'rs, 117 N. C. 432, 23 S. E. 354. Rev. 1905, § 1318, subsec. 27, authorizes county commissioners to borrow money for necessary expenses, and in such case no vote of the people is necessary. Board of Trustees v. Webb, 155 N. C. 388, 71 S. E. 520. The court has repeatedly held that the public roads are a necessary expense. Board of Trustees v. Webb, supra, and numerous cases there cited.

It is true that, "where the Legislature has interposed its will and plainly declared it, where it has by its act prescribed the limit of expenditure, even for a necessary expense for the county, the county commissioners cannot, under the decision of this court herein cited, set at naught the legislative will by setting up a general power of contracting debts for necessary expenses, restrained only by the constitutional limitation of taxation." Burgin v. Smith, 151 N. C. 568, 66 S. E. 607. But here the county commissioners have not attempted to exceed the limitations in the special act of the Legislature, and have consulted the popular will at the ballot box, as required by said act, and its terms, approval by a "majority of the votes cast," have been complied with.

The act itself does not come under the requirements of section 14, art. 2, of the Constitution; and hence, even conceding that the amendments made in the House to the Senate bill were substantial and material, and though the conference report was adopted by each house without conforming to article 2, § 14, the act is valid as an act of ordinary legislation. If there had been no such act, the county could have contracted a debt for its necessary expenses without a vote of the people. The proposed bond issue will therefore be a valid indebtedness of the county of Orange. Jones v. New Bern, 152 N. C. 64, 87 S. E. 173.

The judgment of the court below is reversed.

HARRINGTON v. TOWN OF GREENVILLE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 25, 1912.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 739*)—CIVIL LIABILITY—NEGLECT OF GOVERNMENTAL DUTIES.

Under the rule that, unless a right of action is given by statute, a municipal corporation is not liable to an individual for neglect to perform, or negligence in performing, a duty governmental in its nature, it is not liable for the burning of one's property through its failure to exercise its powers, under Revisal 1905, §§ 2929, 2981, et seq., to abate nuisances and condemn buildings, or its negligent default in equipment and operation of fire department.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1556, 1557; Dec. Dig. § 739.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Foushee, Judge.

Action by W. H. Harrington against the Town of Greenville. Judgment for defendant; plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action heard on demurrer to the complaint before his honor, H. A. Foushee, judge, at February term, 1911, of the superior court of Pitt county. The material portions of the complaint are as follows: "That from time to time, for a number of years prior to February 23, 1910, this plaintiff repeatedly called the attention of the governing body of said town of Greenville to, and requested them, as members, both personally and in meeting, of said board of alderman, to examine, the dangerous condition of the property known as King's stables, the buildings of Sam Cherry, and the old Flanagan buggy shops as a source of danger from fire, which buildings were unoccupied and worthless, being mere hulls and fire traps. (4) That the plaintiff repeatedly requested said board of aldermen to condemn and have removed said buildings, because they were dangerous as a source of fire; and that the defendant, under its powers, authorities, and duties conferred and imposed upon it by the general law and by special acts of the General Assembly, had full power and authority to condemn and remove the same. (5) That the defendant negligently, disregardful of the interest and rights of its property holders and residents, permitted said property to stand as fire traps and gambling dens for negroes, to the great jeopardy and peril of adjacent property owners. (6) That as a result of said negligence on the part of the defendant, and permitting said property to stand as a source of fire, owing to its rotten, decayed condition and dry, accumulated material, on the night of the 23d of February, 1910, it became the source of a fire which destroyed the adjacent property of this plaintiff, to his great damage. (7) That as a result of said fire, and as a result of an inadequate supply of water with sufficient force and quantity, and an inadequate supply of hose, hydrants, and fire equipments and force, this plaintiff suffered the loss of his above-described property, to wit, one brick stable and one brick store and the contents of the same, consisting of lumber, one buggy, and other property, in the sum of $2,000." The court entered judgment sustaining defendant's demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Col. Harry Skinner and S. J. Everett, both of Greenville, for appellant. F. M. Wooten, of Greenville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. As we interpret the complaint, plaintiff states and intends to state his grievance in two aspects: (1) That his property was destroyed by reason of negligent failure of the city of Greenville to abate a nuisance which threatened the result. (2) That the injury arose, in whole or in part, from negligent default in equipment and operation of a fire department maintained by the city for the public benefit, and under our decisions both questions must be resolved against him.

It is well recognized with us that, unless a right of action is given by statute, municipal corporations may not be held civilly liable to individuals for "neglect to perform or negligence in performing" duties which are governmental in their nature, and including generally all duties existent or imposed upon them by law solely for the public benefit. McIlhenney v. City of Wilmington, 127 N. C. 146, 37 S. E. 187, 50 L. R. A. 470; Moffitt v. City of Asheville, 103 N. C. 237, 9 S. E. 695, 14 Am. St. Rep. 810; Hill v. City of Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55, 21 Am. Rep. 451. The general power to abate nuisances conferred on municipalities by section 2929 and other sections of the Revisal, and the powers to regulate, inspect, and condemn buildings contained in sections 2981 et seq., are clearly governmental in character, and for negligent default on the part of the city and its officers and agents no action lies; none having been given by the law. Applying this principle, the well-considered case of Hull v. Roxboro, 142 N. C. 453, 55 S. E. 351, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 638, is an authority directly against the first proposition contended for by plaintiff, and Peterson v. Wilmington, 130 N. C. 76, 40 S. E. 853, 56 L. R. A. 959, is equally decisive on the second. In Hull's Case it was held: "A municipal corporation is not civilly liable for the failure to pass ordinances to preserve the public health or otherwise promote the public good, nor for any omission to enforce the ordinances enacted under the legislative powers granted in its charter, or to see that they are properly observed by its citizens, or those who may be resident within the corporate limits." And in the Peterson Case: "That an employé of a fire department of a city cannot recover for injuries caused by a hose reel of the city fire department being knowingly allowed to be and remain in unsafe and dangerous condition." The ruling in this last case was made to rest on the principle that in maintaining and operating a fire department for the benefit of the public the city was engaged in the exercise of governmental duties, and therefore not liable to individuals, unless made so by statute—a position in accord with the general current of authority. Wild v. Paterson, 47 N. J. Law, 406, 1 Atl. 490; Fisher v. City of Boston, 104 Mass. 87, 6 Am. Rep. 196; Jewett v. City of New Haven, 38 Conn. 368, 9 Am. Rep. 382; Torbush v. City of Norwich, 38 Conn. 225, 9 Am. Rep. 395; Long v. City of Birmingham, 161 Ala. 427, 49 South. 881, 18 Ann. Cas. 507; Mayor of New York v. Workman, 67 Fed. 347, 14 C. C. A. 530.

We are not called on to decide whether the cases of Coley v. Statesville, 121 N. C. 301, 28 S. E. 482, and Lewis v. Raleigh, 77 N. C. 229, are in strict adherence to the principle. We have no disposition to disturb the responsibility as established on the particular facts of those cases and others of similar import, and the liability of such municipalities by reason of defective streets, if in any way inconsistent, is too firmly established to permit of further question.

In more especial reference to the negligence alleged in the proper maintenance of the fire department and the failure of the water supply for the same, we deem it well to refer to a class of cases which hold that, where municipal corporations are engaged in a business enterprise for profit, they will not be considered and dealt with as in the exercise of governmental functions, though their work may inure to some extent to the public benefit, and in such case the corporation is held subject to the ordinary burdens and liabilities arising in the course of the business, as in Woodie v. North Wilkesboro, 159 N. C. —, 74 S. E. 924; Terrell v. Washington, 158 N. C. 281, 73 S. E. 888; Harrington v. Wadesboro, 153 N. C. 437, 69 S. E. 399; Fisher v. New Bern, 140 N. C. 506, 53 S. E. 342, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 542, 111 Am. St. Rep. 857. But this modification of the general principle, if it be such, must be held to extend only to those burdens and liabilities incident to the business features of the enterprise, and does not obtain where, as in this case, the municipality, in the exercise of powers and duties imposed by the law, is maintaining and operating a fire department solely for the public benefit.

There is no error, and the judgment sustaining the demurrer must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

PENDER v. SPEIGHT et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 25, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 542*) — SALES OF MERCANTILE STOCK.

Regardless of the Bulk Sales Law (Pub. Acts 1907, c. 623), a sale of an insolvent mercantile corporation's stock to one of the directors for 60 per cent. of its actual value is void as in fraud of creditors.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 307*) — DIRECTORS — TRUST RELATION.

Directors of a corporation are trustees of its property for the benefit of the corporate creditors as well as shareholders; it being their duty to administer the trust for the benefit of all parties interested.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 547*) — DIRECTORS — KNOWLEDGE OF CORPORATE MATTERS.

Since the directors of a corporation are presumed to know its financial condition, it is not necessary, in order to defeat a conveyance of an insolvent corporation's property to one of its directors at less than actual value, to show that they knew of such insolvency.

An insolvent corporation cannot buy its own stock, and, if it becomes insolvent after such purchase, the stockholder is liable to the corporate creditors for the purchase money received by him; the corporation not being empowered to retire stock until it has first discharged all of its liabilities, and an agreement looking to such retirement being void as to creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Carter, Judge.

Action by James Pender, receiver of the Edgecombe Hardware Company, against W. L. Speight and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiff moved for judgment upon the admissions in the pleadings. The court gave judgment that the plaintiff recover of the defendants Speight and Murdock all the stock of goods, etc., described in the complaint, and further that the plaintiff recover of the defendant Murdock the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) with interest from January 9th, 1912, and that the cause be retained for further orders. The defendant appealed.

G. M. T. Fountain & Son, of Tarboro, for appellants. W. O. Howard, H. A. Gilliam, and J. M. Norfleet, all of Tarboro, for appellee.

BROWN, J. It appears from the admissions in the complaint and answer that the Edgecombe Hardware Company was a corporation with a capital stock of $6,000; that the defendant Speight was the president, Riddick the vice president, and Murdock secretary, and all were directors; that on January 9, 1912, the said corporation was insolvent; that on the 27th of March, 1912, the next and last meeting of the directors the entire stock of goods, furniture, and fixtures and all the property of the corporation were sold to the defendant Murdock for $4,144.70, purporting to be 60 per cent. of their actual value, and this was done by resolution of the directors; the said Murdock being present and participating. It further appears that the said directors passed a resolution on January 9, 1912, to retire a portion of the capital stock of this insolvent corporation, and, in pursuance thereof, the defendant Speight surrendered 10 shares of the capital stock standing in the name of Ethel Speight, and credited his account with $1,000, he then owing the Hardware Company $1,161; that F. G. Davis on said date surrendered 5 shares of the capital stock held by him, and caused the account of F. G. Davis and wife, Addie, which amounted to over $600, to be credited with the sum of $317.63; and that on said date the defendant Murdock surrendered 10 shares of the capital stock held by him, and received therefor $1,000. These are the salient facts admitted in the pleadings.

[1] We will first consider the judgment of the court for the recovery of the stock of goods. It is not pretended that the defendants made any pretense to comply with the provisions of chapter 623, Acts of 1907, entitled "An act to prohibit the sale of merchandise in bulk in fraud of creditors." The learned counsel for the defendant argued with much earnestness that the said act was unconstitutional and void as an unwarranted limitation of the right to sell and dispose of property. We think this point has been decided adversely to him by the Supreme Court of the United States in Lemleux v. Young, 211 U. S. 489, 29 Sup. Ct. 174, 53 L. Ed. 295, in which a statute very similar to ours was upheld. The states of Mississippi, Michigan, Washington, Indiana, and Nebraska have statutes similar to ours which have been sustained by the highest courts of these states. But it is not necessary to consider the statute in this case. The conduct of the defendants was such as to render the sale to one of the directors of the company absolutely void under the general principles of law. In this case the bargainer and the bargainee were officers and directors of the company, and they knew that the company was heavily in debt, and that they were disposing of its entire property without reference to the interest of creditors or stockholders at 60 per cent. of its actual value.

[2] Directors of a corporation are trustees of the property of the corporation for the benefit of the corporate creditors, as well as shareholders. It is their duty to administer the trust assumed by them not for their own profit, but for the mutual benefit of all parties interested, and, when such directors receive an advantage to themselves not common to all, they are guilty of a plain breach of trust. 1 Beach, Pr. Corp. § 241; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1252; Drury v. Cross, 7 Wall. 299, 19 L. Ed. 40; Hill v. Lumber Co., 113 N. C. 173, 18 S. E. 107, 21 L. R. A. 560, 37 Am. St. Rep. 621; Harvey's Rights of Minority Stockholders, 13; and McIver v. Hardware Company, 144 N. C. 485, 57 S. E. 169, 119 Am. St. Rep. 970. In the Hill Case it was held that a confession of judgment by an insolvent corporation in favor of a director who is a creditor, and upon a debt theretofore existing, is void as against other creditors.

[3] It is said in behalf of these defendants that they did not know on January 9, 1912, that the corporation was insolvent. The sale of the goods was made on the 27th of March, 1912, when it is perfectly patent from the defendants' answer that they knew that the corporation could not pay its debts, and the means that they were devising for paying off the indebtedness of the company was to sell out its entire assets at 60 per cent. on the dollar to one of their number. The answer discloses the fact that even on January 9, 1912, these defendants knew that the corporation was not in a healthy condition, and that it was about to expire from inanition. The treatment which these financial doctors undertook to give to the patient soon put an end to it. They were evidently physicians of the old school, and, as said by the counsel for the plaintiff, believed in curing disease by purging and bleeding, instead of nourishment. After this drastic treatment insolvency and death naturally followed. The defendants were evidently not educated in the modern school of high finance, and the crudeness of their methods would have made a high priest of that school blush. They went at the thing in a very direct manner, and appropriated to their own use without any scruples the entire property of the corporation, whose interests they had undertaken to guard. But it is not necessary that they should admit knowledge of insolvency. The law charges them with actual knowledge of the financial condition of the corporation (Soloman v. Bates, 118 N. C. 311, 24 S. E. 478, 54 Am. St. Rep. 725), and holds them liable for damages sustained by stockholders and creditors by reason of their negligence, fraud, or deceit.

[4] The defendant Murdock appeals because his honor gave judgment against him for $1,000, the cash he had taken out of the treasury of the company in payment for his apparently worthless stock. The resolution to retire the stock of an insolvent corporation and to take money out of its treasury for that purpose was a very novel method of sustaining the credit of the corporation, to say the least. But, as this money found its way from a depleted treasury into the pockets of the directors, the motive for passing the resolution at the January meeting is very apparent. An insolvent corporation cannot buy in its own stock, and, if it becomes insolvent after such purchase, the stockholder is held liable to the creditor for the purchase money received by him. Heggle v. Building & Loan Ass'n, 107 N. C. 581, 12 S. E. 275.

It is generally held that a corporation cannot settle with its members by the application of assets to the retirement of their stock until it has first discharged all of its liabilities, and any agreement looking to such arrangement among its shareholders is void as to creditors. It will be the duty of the receiver to proceed against the other directors and stockholders who have undertaken to retire their stock by having it credited on their debts to the corporation. Such transaction is fraudulent and void on its face, and cannot be sustained.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

CHADWICK v. NORFOLK-SOUTHERN
R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 25, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 77*)—APPEALABLE ORDER—PREMATURE APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

An order of the superior court reversing an order of the clerk dismissing a processioning proceeding and remanding the same to him for a proper order of survey was not appealable; defendant's remedy being to note an exception and permit the cause to proceed to a hearing, and then, if dissatisfied with the final result, to appeal therefrom on the exceptions so taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 444-463; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Foushee, Judge.

Processioning proceeding by W. S. Chadwick against the Norfolk-Southern Railroad Company and others. From a judgment of the superior court reversing a judgment of the clerk, dismissing the proceedings and remanding the same to him for an order of survey, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

E. H. Gorham, of Morehead City, C. R. Thomas, of New Bern, and J. F. Duncan, of Beaufort, for appellants. Guion & Guion, of New Bern, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff moves to dismiss this appeal in this court upon the ground that the same is premature. The clerk of the superior court dismissed the proceedings. Upon appeal at chambers, the judge presiding in the Third judicial district reversed the judgment of the clerk, and remanded the same to him, to the end that the proper order be made of survey, etc., in accordance with the statute. Rev. § 326.

We are of opinion that the motion to dismiss this appeal because it is premature should be allowed. It was the duty of the defendant to have noted every exception and let the cause proceed to the hearing under the statute, and then, if dissatisfied with the final result, upon exceptions properly taken, the cause can be heard in the superior court, and thence by appeal to this court.

Appeal dismissed.

STANCILL v. JOYNER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 25, 1912.)

INJUNCTION (§ 163*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—RIGHT TO.

An order restraining defendant from constructing a drainage ditch so as to overflow plaintiff's upper land is properly continued until final hearing, where it appears that the ditch has been used to drain plaintiff's land for many years, and that defendant's threatened obstruction would render plaintiff's land unfit for cultivation and cause irreparable damage to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 357-371; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by J. T. Stancill against O. L. Joyner. From a judgment continuing a restraining order until final hearing, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albion Dunn, of Greenville, for appellant. W. F. Evans, of Greenville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. In Tise v. Whitaker, 144 N. C. 510, 57 S. E. 211, the court said: "It is the rule with us that in actions of this character the main purpose of which is to obtain a permanent injunction, if the evidence raises serious question as to the existence of facts which make for plaintiff's right, and sufficient to establish it, a preliminary restraining order will be continued to the hearing. Hyatt v. De Hart, 140 N. C. 270 [52 S. E. 781]; Harrington v. Rawls, 131 N. C. 39 [42 S. E. 461]; Whittaker v. Hill, 96 N. C. 2 [1 S. E. 639]; Marshall v. Commissioners, 89 N. C. 103."

The verified complaint and affidavits on the part of plaintiff in the present case tend to show: That plaintiff and defendant are owners of adjoining tracts of land, and that plaintiff, the proprietor of the upper tract, and those under whom he claims, for 30 years have held and exercised the right of drainage over the lands of defendant through a certain ditch of specified dimensions, and that plaintiff has acquired and holds an easement over said lands. "That said ditch is cut and constructed along the natural water flow, and is the only way through and along which the lands of the plaintiff can be successfully drained, and that the lands of the plaintiff are now, and have been for more than 30 years, drained through and along said ditch; and that the plaintiff has been for 20 years, and is now, keeping up and maintaining said ditch through his own lands, and also from where the ditch crosses the dividing line between the plaintiff and defendant, on through the lands of defendant, about 130 yards, to a point where said ditch empties into another ditch. (6) That the defendant is threatening and attempting to dam, close up, and obstruct said ditch, above referred to, at a point immediately on or within a few feet of the dividing line between the lands of the plaintiff and defendant for the purpose of preventing and hindering the flow of water through said ditch. (7) That if the defendant is permitted to dam, fill up, or obstruct said ditch, as set out in the sixth paragraph of this complaint, it will stop the flow of the water from the lands of the plaintiff, thereby causing the water, which has heretofore drained off through said ditch, to back up and stand upon the lands of the plaintiff, and will thereby render said lands unfit for cultivation, and will cause said lands of the plaintiff to become water-sodden and soured, and will thereby greatly injure said lands, and the plaintiff will thereby be irreparably damaged."

The answer and affidavits on the part of the defendant controvert many of the essential features of plaintiff's complaint and the affidavits tending to support it, and material issues are raised as to the ultimate rights of the parties. As the cause goes back for further investigation, we do not consider it desirable to make more extended reference to the facts in evidence; but we are of opinion that these facts clearly bring the controversy within the principle of the case referred to and others of like import, notably the well-considered case of Cobb v. Clegg, 137 N. C. 153, 49 S. E. 80. The judgment continuing the restraining order to the hearing is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

ELKS et al. v. HEMBY et ux.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 256*)—CONFORMITY TO VERDICT.

Where, in foreclosure of a mortgage for $3,800, the jury found, on conflicting evidence, that the loan secured was $1,900, with interest, a decree directing a sale if $1,900 and interest were not paid within a specified time, and that such payment should be in satisfaction of the mortgage, was in accordance with the verdict.

2. TRIAL (§ 25*)—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE—ISSUES.

Where, in a foreclosure of a mortgage for $3,800, plaintiff contended that he had bought the land for $1,900 and resold it to defendant for $3,800, secured by the mortgage, while defendant claimed that the transaction was a purchase of the land by him for $1,900 and a loan of the price by plaintiff, and admitted the execution of the mortgage and note, defendant had the burden of proof; and he was properly permitted to open and close.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 44-75; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 106*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

Under superior court rule No. 6 (140 N. C. 679), a ruling that defendant has the right to open and close is not appealable.

4. MORTGAGES (§ 461*)—FORECLOSURE—ISSUES.

Where, in foreclosure of a mortgage for $3,800, plaintiff claimed that he had bought the land for $1,900 and resold it to defendant for $3,800, secured by the mortgage, while defendant alleged that the transaction was a purchase of the land by him and a loan of the price, $1,900, by plaintiff, evidence that the vendor contracted to sell the land to defendant, and of the circumstances of the conveyance to plaintiff and the understanding of the parties at the time, was relevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1353-1360; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

5. MORTGAGES (§ 480*)—ISSUES.

Issues as to whether the real transaction was as stated by defendant, and, if so, the amount of the loan by plaintiff, properly submitted the questions involved.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 199*)—JUDGMENT NON OBSTANTE.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage for $3,800, the issue was whether the mortgage secured a debt for $3,800 or a debt for $1,900, and the jury, on conflicting evidence, found that the loan was for $1,900, a judgment of foreclosure for $3,800 non obstante veredicto was properly denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Foushee, Judge.

Action by W. H. Elks and another against Adam Hemby and wife. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jarvis & Blow, of Greenville, for appellants. H. Skinner and F. G. James & Son, all of Greenville, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The defendant Adam Hemby, who is an ignorant colored man, applied to the plaintiffs, who owned a store in the neighborhood, to lend him $1,900 to assist in purchasing a tract of land. The plaintiffs agreed to do so, but required, as defendants allege, a bonus of $1,100 and a mortgage for the $3,000, payable in 10 annual installments, with interest. Subsequently the vendor, on the suggestion of the plaintiffs and with the assent of the defendant, conveyed the land directly to the plaintiffs, with an understanding, as the defendants contend, that the plaintiffs were to convey same to Hemby and receive back the mortgage for $3,000, as aforesaid; and the defendants went into possession of the land. But subsequently the plaintiffs declined to make the arrangements, unless the mortgage was executed for $3,800. This was given, and when the first note fell due the plaintiff brought this action to foreclose the mortgage. The defendants immediately applied for a restraining order and asked an accounting, and alleged that all of the debt in excess of $1,900 was void, because usurious. The injunction was continued to the hearing.

[1] The plaintiffs contended that the transaction was a straight sale of the land to the plaintiffs for $1,900 and a resale by them to the defendants for $3,800, secured by mortgage. The jury found, upon the conflicting evidence, on the issues submitted to them as follows:

"(1) Was the real transaction stated in the pleadings a purchase of land by Adam Hemby and wife from Mark Wilkes and a loan of money by plaintiffs to defendant Adam Hemby to pay for such land? Answer: Yes.

"(2) If so, how much money did plaintiffs loan to Adam Hemby? Answer: $1,900, with 6 per cent. interest from January 8, 1910."

Thereupon the court rendered judgment for that sum and appointed commissioners to advertise and sell, if said amount and interest was not paid in 60 days. It was further decreed that the payment of such sum, with interest, should be in full payment and satisfaction of the debt, and all in excess thereof was declared null and void, and canceled. This decree is in accordance with the verdict. Riley v. Sears, 154 N. C. 516, 70 S. E. 997; Doster v. English, 152 N. C. 339, 67 S. E. 754; Bennett v. Best, 142 N. C. 168, 55 S. E. 84; Ervin v. Morris, 137 N. C. 50, 49 S. E. 53; Ward v. Sugg, 113 N. C. 489, 18 S. E. 717, 24 L. R. A. 280. If there is any error, it is not in favor of the defendants.

[2, 3] Exceptions 1 and 13 are to the opening and conclusion, which were properly held to be upon the defendant. The defendant having admitted the execution of the notes and mortgage, the burden was upon him to show the matters alleged in avoidance. Besides, as to the argument, the ruling was not appealable. Rules of superior court No. 6 (140 N. C. 679).

[4] Exceptions 3, 5, 6, and 8 were to the admission of evidence, which was offered to show that the vendor Mark Wilkes, contracted to sell his land, not to plaintiffs, but to Hemby, and under what circumstances he conveyed to plaintiffs, and the understanding of the parties at the time. This evidence was both pertinent and relevant.

[5] The exception to the form of the issues cannot be sustained. They properly presented the issues which arose upon the pleadings as to the "true inwardness of the transaction," and, if found with the defendants, then the amount of the money loaned. Williamson v. Bryan, 142 N. C. 81, 55 S. E. 77; Gray v. Jenkins, 151 N. C. 80, 65 S. E. 644.

[6] The court properly refused to nonsuit the defendant as to the matters set up in his counterclaim, and also properly refused a motion non obstante veredicto. Doster v. English, 152 N. C. 339, 67 S. E. 754; Shives v. Cotton Mills, 151 N. C. 291, 66 S. E. 141. The other exceptions are abandoned.

No error.

HARDY et al. v. HINES BROS. LUMBER CO.

1. RAILROADS (§ 482*)—FIRES—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action for damages from fire set by defendant's locomotive held sufficient to establish negligence, in that the engine was not properly equipped to prevent emission of sparks or fire, and that the track and right of way was foul with combustible material.

2. RAILROADS (§ 480*)—FIRES—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The setting of fire by sparks from defendant's locomotive, damaging plaintiff, being shown, makes a prima facie showing of negligence, requiring defendant to overcome it.

3. RAILROADS (§ 465*)—FIRES—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Neither the distance traversed by a fire before it reached plaintiff's property, nor the time elapsing between the initial fire and that which destroyed plaintiff's property, is conclusive for or against the initial fire being the proximate cause of the destruction, though it may be properly considered on the question.

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

While the question of proximate cause may be one of law, it is generally a question of fact for the jury, under instructions as to what the law requires to constitute it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 464*)—FIRES—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

The identity of a fire set by defendant as the proximate cause of the burning of plaintiff's property was not lost, because it died down and for several days smoldered in stumps and other combustible material, if it finally revived and broke out afresh by reason of contact with dry leaves, which carried it at once to plaintiff's property.

6. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

A charge, though general, being in itself correct, a party desiring some other view presented, or that it be more pointed or addressed more closely to the particular facts, should make a specific request therefor.

7. RAILROADS (§ 482*)—RIGHT OF WAY—EVIDENCE.

Testimony in an action for fire, alleged by the complaint to have been set on defendant's track and right of way, that the fire was seen on the right of way and track implies, necessarily, that there was a right of way, and is some evidence of defendant having a right of way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1730-1736; Dec. Dig. § 482.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Greene County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by W. B. Hardy and another against Hines Bros. Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rouse & Land and Loftin & Dawson, all of Kinston, and J. P. Frizzelle, of Snow Hill, for appellant. Langston & Allen, of Goldsboro, and J. G. Anderson, for appellees.

WALKER, J. These actions were brought by W. B. Hardy and B. T. Hardy against the defendant to recover damages for negligently burning their timber. The allegations as to the burning, they being substantially the same in the two cases, are that the defendant's locomotive engine set fire to combustible material on its track and right of way, which was covered with dry leaves, pine straw, and wood mould, and in a very foul condition, and that the fire spread to the adjoining land, burning over a considerable area; that an effort was made to extinguish the flames, plaintiffs taking some part in it, but that some days afterwards the fire, which had been left smoldering in the woods, broke out afresh, extending to the lands of plaintiffs and burning some of their timber. The cases, by consent of all parties, or rather without objection, were consolidated by order of the court and tried together; the facts being practically alike.

[1,2] The fire, as testified by at least two of plaintiffs' witnesses, L. C. Turnage and W. C. Carlyle, was first seen on the track and right of way, just after the train had passed; and there was evidence that the smokestack of the engine was defectively constructed, so that large and live sparks could be emitted therefrom, and that the same engine had before caused fires along the track. It is true that there was evidence to the effect that the engine was properly constructed and supplied with an efficient spark arrester, and a good ash pan, save when bad wood was used; but the facts we have stated were fully deductible from some of the evidence by the jury, and they seem, under a perfectly correct charge, to have accepted them as proven to their satisfaction. It cannot be disputed that there was evidence sufficient to establish the charge of negligence in either of two aspects—a defective engine and a foul and dangerous track and right of way—either of which would constitute actionable negligence if it caused the fire in the beginning, and was the proximate cause of the damage. We said recently, in Kornegay v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731: "When it is shown that the fire originated from sparks which came from the defendant's engine, the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, entitling him to have the issue as to negligence submitted to the jury; and they were justified in finding negligence, unless they were satisfied, upon all the evidence in the case, that, in fact, there was no negligence, but that the defendant's engine was equipped with a proper spark arrester or ash pan, and otherwise to prevent the emission of sparks or fire, and had been operated in a careful or prudent manner." This was but a summary of what had been so often decided in former cases. Williams v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 623, 53 S. E. 448; Craft v. Timber Co., 132 N. C. 151, 43 S. E. 597; Knott v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 238, 55 S. E. 150; Cox v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 117, 62 S. E. 884; Deppe v. Railroad, 152 N. C. 79, 67 S. E. 262; Currie & McQueen v. Railroad, 156 N. C. 419, 72 S. E. 488. We early stated the proposition, which seems to be a clear logical syllogism, that "when the plaintiff shows damage resulting from the act of the defendant, which act, with the exercise of proper care, does not ordinarily produce damage, he makes out a prima facie case of negligence, which cannot be repelled but by proof of care, or some extraordinary accident which makes care useless." Ellis v. Railroad, 24 N. C. 138; Chaffin v. Lawrence, 50 N. C. 179; Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 321; Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E.

344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; and more recently in Mizzell v. Manufacturing Co., 158 N. C. 265, 73 S. E. 802. The rule may be justified, not only on the ground that negligence is a fair and reasonable deduction from the fact of casting the spark from the engine, as ordinarily, when care is exercised, such a result does not follow, but for the further reason that the proof of care can more easily be produced by the defendant, who has control of the engine and should know its true condition, than by the plaintiff, who may be ignorant of it. Aycock v. Railroad, supra. We do not say that there is no exception to or qualification of the rule; but it applies in this case, and that is sufficient for our purpose.

Referring to this subject in Deppe v. Railroad, 152 N. C. at page 82, 67 S. E. 263, Justice Manning thus states the rule applicable to the state of facts here presented: "In considering the origin of the fire, it is immaterial whether the fire caught on or off the right of way. The place of ignition is important on the second question. The second question presented is, Could the jury find from this primal fact that the plaintiff's property was negligently burned by the defendant? In Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (section 676), the learned authors say: 'The decided weight of authority and of reason is in favor of holding that, the origin of the fire being fixed upon the railroad company, it is presumptively chargeable with negligence, and must assume the burden of proving that it had used all those precautions for confining sparks or cinders (as the case may be) which have already been mentioned as necessary.'" He adds that this is the common law of England, and has been followed in many states, several of which he names, and he cites the following cases decided by this court as sustaining it: Ellis v. Railroad, supra; Manufacturing Co. v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 881, 29 S. E. 575; Hosliery Co. v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 238, 42 S. E. 602; Lumber Company v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 324, 55 S. E. 781.

The evidence in our case, though somewhat circumstantial, tends to show conclusively that the fire was ignited by live sparks or coals that fell from the defendant's engine. This being so, the proof is also clear that the track and right of way were foul with dry stubble, which readily caught from the spark or cinder, and that there and in that way the fire originated. If it caught off the right of way, there is equally strong evidence of negligence against defendant; and it was for the jury to find the fact. The question was fairly submitted to them. It was sufficient for them to find that the fire occurred in either one of the suggested ways; for it does not, in law, require two acts of negligence to make a wrong. Knott v. Railroad, supra.

[3,4] But defendant contends that if the fire was negligently caused by the engine dropping a live spark from the smokestack, or a live cinder from the ash pan, it was apparently extinguished after burning over intervening land for some distance from its track; and, while it smoldered in the stumps, and, perhaps, in other places, it was several days before it broke out again and destroyed the plaintiffs' timber. The evidence is that on June 12, 1911, and at first, it burned timber on land next to the railroad track, before it reached the plaintiffs' timber on that day, a small portion of which was consumed, and that on June 23, 1911, it "sprang up" again, and spread to plaintiffs' other timber. The evidence also discloses the fact that plaintiffs assisted in the attempt to put out the fire; but it turns out that the combined efforts of all the neighbors failed to extinguish it. But it is argued from these facts that the fire that destroyed the plaintiffs' woods on June 23, 1911, was not proximately caused by that which started on the defendant's right of way June 12, 1911. Neither the distance traversed by the fire, though lands of other parties intervened, nor the time elapsing between the initial fire and the final conflagration, which destroyed the plaintiffs' property, is conclusive against the existence of proximate cause; that is, that the second fire was proximately caused by the first. The connection of cause and effect must be established; the breach of duty must not only be the cause, but the proximate cause, of the damage to the complaining party. We may thus illustrate and state the rule: The proximate cause of an event is understood to be that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new, independent cause, produces the event, and without which it would not have occurred. This is a general statement of the rule. 1 Sh. & Redf. on Neg. (5th Ed.) § 28. The learned authors add something which is peculiarly applicable to the facts of our case: "Proximity in point of time or space, however, is no part of the definition. That is of no importance, except as it may afford evidence for or against proximity of causation; that is, the proximate cause which is nearest in the order of responsible causation." 1 Sh. & Redf. (5th Ed.) p. 28.

While we do not say that the question of proximate cause may not sometimes, owing to the special facts of the case in hand, resolve itself into one of law, it has been said to be the general and true rule that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury; the court instructing them as to what the law requires to constitute it, and the jury applying the law to the facts. It is not a question of science or of legal knowledge. It is to be determined as a fact, in view of the circumstances of fact attending it. The primary cause may be the proximate cause of a disaster, though it may operate through successive instruments, as an article at the end of a chain may be moved by a force applied to the other end, that force being the proximate cause of the movement, or as in the oft-cited case of the squib thrown in the market place. Scott v. Shepherd (Squib Case) 2 W. Bl. 892. "The question always is: Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury—a continuous operation? Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole; or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury? It is admitted that the rule is difficult of application. But it is generally held that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." Railway v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256. What was said by Justice Strong in the Kellogg Case has generally been approved and adopted by the courts as an apt statement and explanation of the rule. Ramsbottom v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 39, 50 S. E. 448.

Judge Cooley has given us three propositions which further illustrate the application of the general rule, and in which he states it a little differently, but with his usual accuracy: "(1) In the case of any distinct legal wrong, which in itself constitutes an invasion of the right of another, the law will presume that some damage follows as a natural, necessary, and proximate result. Here the wrong itself fixes the right of action. We need not go further to show a right of recovery, though the extent of recovery may depend upon the evidence. (2) When the act or omission complained of is not in itself a distinct wrong, and can only become a wrong to any particular individual through injurious consequences resulting therefrom, this consequence must not only be shown, but it must be so connected by averment and evidence with the act or omission as to appear to have resulted therefrom according to the ordinary course of events and as a proximate result of a sufficient cause. (3) If the original act was wrongful, and would naturally, according to the ordinary course of events, prove injurious to some other person or persons, and does actually result in injury through the intervention of other causes which are not wrongful, the injury shall be referred to the wrongful cause, passing by those which were innocent. But if the original wrong only becomes injurious in consequence of the intervention of some distinct wrongful act or omission by another, the injury shall be imputed to the last wrong as the proximate cause, and not to that which was more remote." Cooley on Torts (Ed. of 1879), p. 69.

In substantial agreement with this view of Judge Cooley is the further observation of the court in the Kellogg Case, 94 U. S. at page 475 (24 L. Ed. 256): "We do not say that even the natural and probable consequences of a wrongful act or omission are in all cases to be chargeable to the misfeasance or nonfeasance. They are not when there is a sufficient and independent cause operating between the wrong and the injury. In such a case the resort of the sufferer must be to the originator of the intermediate cause. But when there is no intermediate efficient cause, the original wrong must be considered as reaching to the effect, and proximate to it. The inquiry must therefore always be whether there was any intermediate cause, disconnected from the primary fault and self-operating, which produced the injury. Here lies the difficulty." Justice Strong adds that this difficulty must be met and the inquiry answered in accordance with common understanding as applied to the peculiar facts. What would be the proximate cause of an event under some circumstances might not be under other and different facts and surroundings; and our common sense, which is the essence of the law, must be brought into service.

[5, 6] We may now the more readily answer the objection of the defendant to the plaintiffs' recovery, based upon the absence of any proximate cause for the last fire which can be referred to its original negligence. "The intervention of time or distance between the two fires, as when seen, is not fatal to plaintiffs, but was proper to be considered by the jury on the question of proximate cause. Phillips v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 12, 50 S. E. 462; Black v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 687, 20 S. E. 713, 909; Poeppers v. Railroad, 87 Mo. 715, 29 Am. Rep. 518; Railroad v. McBride, 54 Kan. 172, 37 Pac. 978. If the continuity in sequence of the several events was not broken, and the causes operated together and in connection with each other, either successively or concurrently, each being a contributing cause to the final result, as the jury, by their verdict, evidently found to be the fact, the defendant's act in starting the fire would, in law, be said to have proximately caused the damage to the plaintiffs' lands, and a case of actionable negligence would then be presented. The court charged the jury, in substance, that the burden was on the plaintiffs to satisfy them that the same fire which was started on June 12, 1911, burned the land of the plaintiffs on the 23d, and if they had failed to do so they were not entitled to recover; otherwise they would be. The fire might be so continuous as to form an unbroken chain of causation leading up to the last outbreak, which destroyed plaintiffs' trees, although there may have been a considerable interval of time elapsing between the first and the last fire. Its identity was not lost, because it died down and smoldered in the stumps and in other burnable matter, and finally was revived and broke out afresh by reason of the contact with the dry pine leaves, which carried it at once to plaintiffs' land.

But the defendant's counsel rely on the case of Doggett v. Railroad, 78 N. C. 305, and it must be admitted that, at first blush, there is a seemingly close resemblance between the two cases; but upon further comparison it is found to be a similarity more apparent than real, and, besides, a critical examination of that case will discover that the two cases are essentially different. In this case the court instructed that they must not answer the issue in favor of plaintiffs, unless they were satisfied that the fire of the 12th was the same that burned the plaintiffs' woods on the 23d; it being one continuous fire from the start. There was evidence to support this charge; for the jury might well have inferred from the testimony of the witnesses Lindsay Brown and others that the fire had never been extinguished, but continued to burn slowly, or to smolder, until Friday the 23d, when it reached plaintiffs' trees and destroyed them. In the Doggett Case, the very learned justice laid stress upon the negligence of the plaintiff, placing the burden upon him to show its absence, and also undertook to decide the question of plaintiff's negligence as matter of law. We know that, in both respects the law of negligence has since undergone great change by statute and decisions of this court. Again, in that case, it was said: "The second burning did not necessarily follow the first, because of the intervening arrest of the progress of the fire. But even supposing that the progress of the flames had been continuous, if there was any intervening negligence in the effort to extinguish the fire, either by the intermediate owners of fences, or by the neighbors who assembled for that purpose, when their endeavors, properly exerted, might have been successful, the entire weight of authority is that the plaintiff cannot recover." In our case there is no allegation of negligence on the part of the plaintiffs in the answer, and no issue as to it was submitted; nor, we believe, is there any suggestion that they did not do their best to stay the progress of the fire—all that the law required of them. In the Doggett Case, as we have seen, in the words taken from the opinion, the "progress of the fire was arrested," while there is evidence in this record that the fire started on the 12th was not extinguished. If the defendant wished to rely upon plaintiffs' negligence, or desired any more definite instruction in regard to it, a specific request should have been made, based upon proper averment in the answer and upon the evidence. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225, and cases cited in note.

Conceding, only for the sake of argument, that the judge's charge was somewhat general in its terms, it was in itself correct; and if the defendant thought that some other view of the matter should be presented, or that it should be more pointed, or addressed more closely to the particular facts, he should have made his want known to the court in the usual way. So we said, by Justice Hoke, in the apposite case of Gay v. Mitchell, 146 N. C. 509, 60 S. E. 426, when the question of proximate cause was likewise involved. The court might well have asked the jury in our case to inquire and find whether, in the exercise of care, the defendant could reasonably have foreseen that the injury to plaintiffs' property would be the natural and probable consequence of its negligence in dropping sparks in the right of way, and explained more fully the rule of proximate cause, in any view of the evidence presenting the question; but we cannot say that its omission to give the charge is positive or reversible error, in the absence of any special request to do so. The jury have evidently found that the fire was not extinguished, but continued in its progress, though very slowly at times, until the final catastrophe. It may be true that plaintiffs were under the duty to protect their property against a seen or known and threatened danger, and to prevent or minimize the danger by the use of proper care (2 Sh. & Redf. on Neg. [5th Ed.] § 679; Hocutt v. Telegraph Co., 147 N. C. 186, 60 S. E. 980), and that their failure to do so would exculpate defendant or diminish the measure of its liability. But this question is not now before us, and we forbear to discuss it.

Nor need we determine whether there was any intervening or independent cause, or evidence of it, which, in law, or in the judgment of the jury acting under proper instructions from the court, would insulate the defendant's original negligence or affect its liability. Nor need we inquire as to the nature or intent of such an intervening cause, with respect to its sufficiency for the purpose of breaking or dissevering the sequence of events; that is, whether it should be itself a superseding, responsible, or culpable cause. Suffice it to say that proximity of cause has no necessary connection with contiguity of space or nearness in time. The negligent fire, in its foreseeable, natural, and probable course and progress, to be ascertained by attending circumstances, is regarded as a unity. Cooley on Torts (1879) pp. 76, 77, and notes. The intervention of considerable time and space may be considered by the jury on the question of proximate cause; but it is not controlling. 2 Sh. & Redf. on Neg. (5th Ed.) § 686, and notes, especially 7 and 8. The pauses in the progress of the fire, and the lapse of time, while matters for the consideration of the jury in determining the continuity of effect, do not enable the court to say, as matter of law, that the causal connection between the defendant's negligence in firing the right of way and the injury to the plaintiffs was broken. It was so said, substantially, in Haverly v. Railroad, 135 Pa. 50, 19 Atl. 1013, 20 Am. St. Rep. 848.

The damage, it is true, must be the legitimate sequence of the thing amiss, and if the negligent act and the resulting loss are not known by common experience to be naturally and usually in such sequence, and the damage does not, according to the ordinary course of events, follow from the wrong, then the latter and the damage are not sufficiently conjoined or concatenated, as cause and effect, to constitute actionable negligence; the element of proximate cause being absent. Cooley on Torts, 69. In this case the jury must have found that it was one and the same fire throughout its various stages; there being no complete cessation of it. With this fact before us, there does not appear to have been any intermediate efficient and adequate cause operating by itself to break the connection; and the primary wrong must be considered as reaching to the effect, and therefore as proximate to it. Railroad v. Kellogg, supra; Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 24 L. Ed. 395. We have declined to enter upon the wide field of investigation which would have opened up to us if we had attempted a critical review of the doctrine of proximate and remote cause, as it is discussed in cases without number, being admonished against the futility of such a course by the words of a wise judge, when discussing a similar question: "It would be an unprofitable labor to enter into an examination of the cases. If we could deduce from them the best possible expression of the rule, it would remain after all to decide each case largely upon the special facts belonging to it, and often upon the very nicest discriminations. One of the most valuable of the criteria furnished us by these authorities is to ascertain whether any new cause has intervened between the fact accomplished and the alleged cause. If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote." Insurance Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. Ed. 65. For the reason given, we do not regard the case of Doggett v. Railroad as controlling the decision in this case.

[7] The question raised, as to whether there was any evidence that defendant owned a right of way, and, if so, as to its extent, is answered by the language of the witnesses, who testified, in so many words, that the fire was seen on the right of way and track, which implies, necessarily, that there was a right of way, and, nothing else appearing, this is some evidence of the fact for the jury. A similar question was decided at this term. Lumber Co. v. Brown, 75 S. E. 714.

We find no error in the record.
No error.

PIGFORD v. NORFOLK-SOUTHERN R. CO.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 226*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—NEGLECT OF MASTER.

A servant assumes only the risks incident to his service, and not those which are the result of the master's negligence, unless such negligence has produced a condition so obviously dangerous that the servant is guilty of contributory negligence in working in his surroundings.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for injuries to an employé from the negligence of his master, the burden is on the employer to show contributory negligence.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether an employé was guilty of contributory negligence which would bar a recovery in proceeding with his work of loading a car with iron rails, after a refusal of the master to grant his request for more help, was a question for the jury, to be decided on the standard of an ordinarily prudent man.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 163*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY OF MASTER.

A master must use the same care in providing his servant with reasonably safe and sufficient number of assistants as he is obliged to use in furnishing a safe place to work.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 190*)—INJURIES TO EMPLOYÉ—ACTS OF VICE PRINCIPAL.

Where an employer intrusts the control of his employés to another, he is liable for any abuse of the delegated authority to the same extent as though he had been personally present and acting himself.

6. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF CONTOVERTED FACTS.

Instructions which assume controverted facts as established were properly refused.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 553*)—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—SUFFICIENCY OF HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION.

In an action for injuries to an employé, a hypothetical question put to a medical witness as to the cause of the injury was sufficient where it combined substantially all the facts which the evidence would have justified the jury in finding, and was sufficiently explicit for him to give an intelligent and safe opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2369-2374; Dec. Dig. § 553.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 276*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER—EFFECT OF DELAY IN BRINGING SUIT.

An employé's delay in bringing suit for injuries does not determine the liability of the master, but is only a circumstance for the jury.

9. TRIAL (§ 114*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

Latitude in permitting statements in argument must be indulged, when not prejudicial on account of the heat of argument and the excited zeal of counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 275-278; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Justice, Judge.

Action by T. H. Pigford against the Norfolk-Southern Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Action for injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence. Plaintiff was employed by defendant, and, at the time he was hurt, was instructed by J. D. Spradlin, the supervisor and his superior officer, to load a gondola car with iron rails, which had been twisted and bent in a wreck and were very crooked. Defendant told Spradlin that he would want more help. The situation may be better described in his own words: "I told him I would want more help. I told him I had three men and my boy working with me, and I didn't think I had help enough to load it. He said: 'Go and try; do the best you can. It is the engineer's orders.' I went down and tried to load it; but I could not, and got hurt. We were loading up the rail on a slide; that car was about seven feet high. We had laid some pieces of rail for a slide, and was putting it up that way. The rail was top heavy. I was in the center of it, and we got it up about four feet high, and it turned over on me, and I felt something tear loose. I had hold of the rail. Q. Why did something tear loose? A. Because I was holding the rail with all my strength; that is about all. I got hurt, and we laid the rail down on the ground. Q. State why you got hurt. A. Because I was trying to hold the rail. It was crooked, and the rail was about to turn over in the center—about to fall. Both ends were about to fall, and if it fell it would turn over on the man; and I got hurt because I was trying to hold it up in that position (indicating what he meant)."

Plaintiff suffered a rupture, which was progressive in its nature, and resulted in serious and permanent injury. After he was first hurt, Spradlin furnished the help asked for, and he then performed the work assigned to him. Three issues were submitted to the jury as to negligence, contributory negligence, and damages. There was nothing said in the answer, nor was there any issue, as to assumption of risk. The court charged the jury as to the duty of defendant to provide for its employé reasonably safe means and sufficient help to perform his work, and that if it had failed in this duty—the special act of negligence being the failure to furnish necessary or adequate help—and this was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, they would answer the first issue "Yes," and that if defendant undertook to do the work, after Spradlin had failed, upon proper application, to give him more help, and that a man of ordinary prudence would not have undertaken the performance of the task under the circumstances, or if defendant did not exercise ordinary care in the manner of doing the work, and either act of carelessness proximately caused the injury, they would answer the second issue "Yes"; the burden as to the first issue being upon the plaintiff, and as to the second upon the defendant. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appealed from the judgment thereon.

Moore & Dunn, of New Bern, for appellant. Guion & Guion and D. L. Ward, all of New Bern, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The duty of the defendant to supply help sufficient for the safe performance of the work allotted to the plaintiff is not questioned by the appellant, but it is contended that if it failed to do so the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence in going on with the work, after the refusal to comply with his request, as bars his recovery; it being an act of contributory negligence on his part which was the proximate cause of the injury to him. We cannot assent to this proposition, except in a qualified sense. The doctrine of assumption of risk is dependent upon the servant's knowledge of the dangers incident to his employment and the ordinary risks he is presumed to know. But extraordinary risks, created by the master's negligence, if he knows of them, will not defeat a recovery, should he remain in the service, unless the danger to which he is exposed thereby is so obvious and imminent that the servant cannot help seeing and understanding it fully if he uses due care and precaution, and he falls, under the circumstances, to exercise that degree of care for his own safety which is characteristic of the ordinarily prudent man. 26 Cyc. 1196-1203. We consider the rule to have been settled by this court in Pressly v. Yarn Mills, 138 N. C. 410, 51 S. E. 69, and subsequent decisions approving it. Justice Hoke, for the court, in that case approving what had formerly been decided in Hicks v. Manufacturing Co., 138 N. C. 819, 50 S. E. 703, gave this clear statement of the rule, as deduced from the authorities: "While the employé assumes all the ordinary risks incident to his employment, he does not assume the risk of defective machinery and appliances due to the employer's negligence.

These are usually considered as extraordinary risks which the employés do not assume, unless the defect attributable to the employer's negligence is obvious and so immediately dangerous that no prudent man would continue to work on and incur the attendant risks. This is, in effect, referring the question of assumption of risk, where the injury is caused by the negligent failure of the employer to furnish a safe and suitable appliance, to the principles of contributory negligence; but it is usually and in most cases desirable to submit this question to the jury on a separate issue as to assumption of risk, as was done in this case. When the matter is for the jury to determine on the evidence, it may be well to submit this question to their consideration on the standard of the prudent man, in terms as indicated above. The charge on the third issue substantially does this, and the language used is sanctioned by the authorities"—citing Sims v. Lindsay, 122 N. C. 678, 30 S. E. 19; Lloyd v. Hanes, 128 N. C. 359, 35 S. E. 611; Coley v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 407, 40 S. E. 195, 57 L. R. A. 817; Marks v. Cotton Mills, 135 N. C. 287, 47 S. E. 432.

There is a clearly marked line of divide between assumption of risk and contributory negligence, the former being confined to the ordinary perils of the service, and the servant could not be held by his contract, or upon any other ground, at least in a technical sense, to have assumed the risk of his master's negligence, as the contractual relation is the other way; the master impliedly undertaking, by the contract of service, to exercise proper care for the servant's safety by selecting reasonably fit and safe tools and appliances, and providing a reasonably safe place and a sufficient and competent force for the performance of the work, and, perhaps, other duties not necessary to be here enumerated. "He complies with the requirements of the law in this respect if, in the selection of machinery and appliances and the employment of sufficient help, he uses that degree of care which a man of ordinary prudence would use, having regard to his own safety, if he were supplying them for his own personal use. It is culpable negligence which makes the employer liable, not a mere error of judgment. We believe this is substantially the rule which has been recognized as the correct one and recommended for our guide in all such cases. It measures accurately the duty of the employer and fixes the limit of his responsibility to his employé"—citing Harley v. B. C. M. Co., 142 N. Y. 81, 36 N. E. 813. So that the liability of the employer to the employé in damages for any injury the latter may receive while engaged in his work depends upon whether the employer has been negligent. Avery v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 592 [60 S. E. 646]; Barkley v. Waste Co., 147 N. C. 585 [61 S. E. 565]." Cotton v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 227, 62 S. E. 1093.

[2] If, therefore, the master is culpably negligent, and the servant receives an injury which the law will impute to that negligence as its proximate cause, the master will be held liable in damages, because the master's breach of duty was not by any means an ordinary peril of the service within the scope of the contract, but an extraordinary one, for which the master is liable, unless the servant's own negligence contributed to the injury, and is considered to be its proximate cause. If the master, by his own negligence, has brought about a dangerous condition with which the servant is confronted, the obviousness of the danger and the impression the situation would make upon a man of ordinary prudence and discretion, with respect to his own safety, would determine the servant's measure of duty to himself, which the law will require of him under the circumstances, always bearing in mind that, as the question of negligence is composed of law and fact, it is difficult, if not impossible, to extract from the authorities a rule so nicely and comprehensively expressed as to fit all cases. There is no such touchstone in the law by which we can try and test the legal quality of any act of negligence; but with the general principle in hand each case must be decided upon the facts peculiarly its own. Subject to the private act of 1897, c. 56 (Revisal, § 2646), the servant assumes only the ordinary and incidental risks of the service, those which necessarily and naturally, in the course of things, accompany it, and which exclude the idea of any negligence of the master; and if the master negligently injures him, he must show negligence of the servant, in order to defeat a recovery. In several recent cases this question has been considered favorably to the views herein expressed. Justice Allen said, in Norris v. Mills, 154 N. C. 474, 70 S. E. 912: "The charge to the jury was, we think, in some respects more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to, and particularly as to the doctrine of assumption of risk, as the employé never assumes the risk of any injury caused by the failure of the employer to perform a duty which he cannot delegate; and the duty to provide a reasonably safe place to work is one of them." Hamilton v. Lumber Co., 156 N. C. 519, 72 S. E. 588; Pritchett v. Railroad, 157 N. C. 88, 72 S. E. 828. It is better for the servant that his case should be decided upon a principle of contributory negligence, as it casts the burden of proof upon the defendant under our law. Pell's Revisal, § 483.

[3] The defendant contended that when the plaintiff's request for more help was refused, and he was directed to go on with the work and do the best he could without it, he should have quit the service, and not have exposed himself to the danger which resulted in his injury. This would be a harsh rule to apply in such a case. There are many reasons, some humane, why it should not prevail. The master should be fair and just to his servant. It is best for both that he should be so. The latter is entitled to fair treatment, just compensation, proper facilities for doing his work, and reasonable care and protection while engaged in it. The servant is not required to retire from the service, or to refuse to go on with his work, unless, as we have said, the danger is obvious, or he knows and appreciates it. He may know of the risk without fully appreciating the danger. Whether such a situation was presented to him at the time of the injury is a question for the jury, to be decided generally upon the rule of the prudent man. We cannot do better than to reproduce here the carefully expressed views by Justice Hoke in Hamilton v. Lumber Co., 156 N. C. at page 523, 72 S. E. at page 589, as they seem to be specially applicable to the facts of this case: "On the conduct of the intestate, while we have held that our statute, known as the fellow servant law (Revisal, § 2646), applies to these logging roads, we do not think that the terms of the law, giving a right of action to an employé injured by reason of defective 'machinery, ways or appliances,' refer to conditions as now disclosed in the testimony; the term 'ways,' we think, having reference rather to roadways and objective conditions relevant to the inquiry, and which it is the duty of the employer to provide. The negligence, if any, imputable to defendant on the testimony is by reason of negligent directions given and methods established by the employer, subjective in their nature, and to which the statute, on the facts presented, was not intended to apply. It is well understood, however, that an employer of labor may be held responsible for directions given or methods established, of the kind indicated, by reason of which an employé is injured, as in Noble v. Lumber Co., 151 N. C. 76 [65 S. E. 622, 134 Am. St. Rep. 974], Shaw v. Manufacturing Co., 146 N. C. 235 [59 S. E. 676], Jones v. Warehouse Co., 138 N. C. 546 [51 S. E. 106]; and where such negligence is established it is further held in this jurisdiction that the doctrine of assumption of risk, in its technical acceptance, is no longer applicable (Norris v. Cotton Mills, 154 N. C. 475 [70 S. E. 912]; Tanner v. Lumber Co., 140 N. C. 475 [53 S. E. 287]), but the effect of working on in the presence of conditions which are known and observed must be considered and determined on the question whether the attendant dangers were so obvious that a man of ordinary prudence, and acting with such prudence, should quit the employment rather than incur them (Bissell v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 123 [67 S. E. 259]), and, on the issues as to plaintiff's conduct, the fact that the particular service was rendered with the knowledge and approval of the employer or his vice principal, or under his express directions, if given; also the employé's reasonable apprehensions of discharge in case of disobedience, etc., may be circumstances relevant to the inquiry."

[4, 5] It is as much the duty of the master to exercise care in providing the servant with reasonably safe means and methods of work, such as proper assistance for performing his task, as it is to furnish him a safe place and proper tools and appliances. The one is just as much a primary, absolute, and nondelegable duty as the other. When he intrusts the control of his hands to another, he thereby appoints him in his own place, and is responsible for the proper exercise of the delegated authority, and liable for any abuse of it to the same extent as if he had been personally present and acting in that behalf himself. This principle is well settled. Shaw v. Manufacturing Co., 146 N. C. 239, 59 S. E. 676; Tanner v. Lumber Co., 140 N. C. 475, 53 S. E. 287; Mason v. Machine Works (C. C.) 28 Fed. 228; Railroad v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 6 Sup. Ct. 590, 29 L. Ed. 755; Shives v. Cotton Mills, 151 N. C. 290, 66 S. E. 141; Pritchett v. Railroad, supra; Holton v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 68, 67 S. E. 54.

It may be assumed that the law does not impose on the master any duty to take more care of his servant than the latter should take of himself; their respective obligations in this respect being equal and the same—that is, to be careful, and to adjust their conduct to the standard of the ordinarily prudent man. In measuring the extent of this duty, the jury will always consider their situation and opportunities, their comparative ability to know the peril of the service and to realize the attendant danger, and any other circumstance shedding light upon the main or principal question of negligence and its proximity to the injury inflicted.

We cannot say, as matter of law, upon the evidence in this case, that the danger of continuing to load the car with the rails upon the slanting skid, without additional help, was such as to bar a recovery. Whether it was so great and obvious that no man of ordinary prudence would have gone on with the work in its presence was properly submitted by the court to the jury, under what we hold to be correct instructions. The charge, in every respect, seems to have been as favorable to the defendant as the law permitted, or it had any right to expect. The judge would not have been warranted in practically taking the case from the jury by such a peremptory charge upon both of the issues upon negligence, as he was requested to give. It was the province of the jury to find the facts, under instructions of the court as to the law. Nor does it make any difference that the work required of the plaintiff was not complicated but simple in its nature. He was entitled, in any view of it, to a reasonably sufficient squad of hands to help him perform it. In this connection, we may well consider the case of Shaw v. Manufacturing Co., 146 N. C. 235, 59 S. E.

676, the facts of which are very similar to those in this case. The plaintiff, Shaw, was told to remove a bed plate and plunger from one part of the defendant's mill to another, and reported to the superintendent that he needed a large chain block for the purpose. His request was refused, and he was directed to do the work with his two small chain blocks. He protested that they were too small, and again asked for a larger chain block, but was told to go ahead and use the small ones anyway. Shaw also applied for more help; but none was supplied. With reference to these facts, this court, by Justice Brown, said: "The evidence shows, further, that insufficient help was furnished (one man and three inexperienced colored boys), and, upon plaintiff's protesting that such help was insufficient, Constable said he knew the three boys were not 'worth a damn,' but that they were all he had, and he directed plaintiff to go ahead, and promised to furnish more help, which he failed to do. Upon this uncontradicted evidence, his honor would have been justified in charging the jury that, if believed to be true, it proved that the defendant's superintendent had been undeniably negligent in his duty to plaintiff." The only difference between the two cases is that in the Shaw Case the evidence was held to be uncontradicted; while in this case it was disputed, and the court left it to the jury to find the facts, and they found that plaintiff's version was the true one. This assimilates the cases, and they cannot be distinguished upon the ground that in Shaw's Case one of the appliances was defective and unusable. The court lays no particular stress upon that fact. Sufficient help was just as necessary to safeguard the servant as flawless implements. The two cases, in their essential and controlling facts, are substantially alike, and the same rule must govern both.

[6] Defendant submitted many prayers for instructions. Some of them assumed facts as established, which were disputed, and others called upon the court to treat the question of negligence as one of law. Those that were proper in form, and applicable to the case, were substantially given.

[7] The hypothetical question put to the expert, Dr. Caton, as to the cause of the hernia, while, perhaps, not as full as it might have been, combined substantially all the facts, and was sufficiently explicit for him to give an intelligent and safe opinion. The evidence would justify a finding of those facts by the jury. This is sufficient. Summerlin v. Carolina & N. W. R. Co., 133 N. C. 551, 45 S. E. 898; State v. Bowman, 78 N. C. 509; State v. Cole, 94 N. C. 938; State v. Wilcox, 132 N. C. 1120, 44 S. E. 625.

There are other exceptions which, upon a careful review of them, we do not think require separate discussion. The central and controlling question relates to the conduct of the plaintiff in the presence of a dangerous situation thrust upon him by defendant's negligence in ignoring his reasonable request for more help to do the work of lifting the heavy rails, which was made more difficult by their twisted condition. Plaintiff nevertheless attempted to do the work by the command of the defendant's superintendent and alter ego, Spradlin, who was in authority over him, with power to discharge him for disobedience of the order. The jury did not think the danger was so obvious or menacing that a man of ordinary prudence would not have faced it in the effort to comply with the instruction to go ahead and do the best he could with the help he then had. He was injured seriously in his endeavor to follow Spradlin's direction; and, the jury having further found that it was a negligent order, and that plaintiff was without fault, the defendant must answer to him in damages for the consequent injury.

[8] The delay in bringing the suit is, by itself, of no legal significance. It was a circumstance for the jury to consider upon the general question, and was explained by the fact that the disease produced by the injury was almost imperceptibly slow in its progress and development.

[9] If the remarks of plaintiff's attorney, in his address to the jury, were improper, though we are not ready to admit it, but rather think they were legitimate, it could not, in our view of the facts, have so seriously affected the rights of appellant as to call for a reversal. There must be prejudice by the offending counsel of one party to his adversary's rights to induce us to reverse. What counsel said was entirely too mild to hurt, even if it had been not altogether fair in forensic debate, when some latitude must be indulged for the undue heat of argument and the excited zeal of counsel, and sometimes they must give and take, if there is no gross abuse of privilege. State v. Underwood, 77 N. C. 502; State v. Bryan, 89 N. C. 531; State v. Suggs, 89 N. C. 527; Devries v. Haywood, 63 N. C. 53; State v. Tyson, 133 N. C. 692, 45 S. E. 838; Railway v. Witte, 68 Tex. 295, 4 S. W. 490.

We have given good heed to the able and learned brief and oral argument of the defendant's counsel, Mr. Moore, but after all has been said and duly considered we are unable to say that any error in the case has been discovered.

No error.

STATE v. BOOZER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 26, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1137*) — APPEAL — WAIVER OF ERROR.

Where, on an appeal from a prosecution for murder, the statement of facts submitted contains the admission that the defendant did the killing, no error can be predicated on the court's assumption of such fact in its charge. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3007-3010; Dec. Dig. § 1137.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE—ANALYSIS OF OTHER CASES.

The analyzing of another case in the charge in a prosecution for murder to illustrate the doctrine that the plea of self-defense is not available to one who brings on the difficulty could not have injured the defendant, and will not require a reversal.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1038*)—FAILURE TO CHARGE—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

In a prosecution for murder, the court's omission to charge that defendant's failure to testify should not be taken against him will not constitute ground for reversal, in the absence of a request therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2646; Dec. Dig. § 1038.*]

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Newberry County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Sam Boozer was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed and remanded.

See, also, 74 S. E. 646.

G. G. Sale, of Newberry, for appellant. Solicitor R. A. Cooper, of Laurens, for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant was convicted of the murder of James S. Gilliam and sentenced to death at the summer term, 1911, of the court of general sessions for Newberry county. While the main reliance is on alleged errors in the charge, the appeal as first presented contained only isolated excerpts from the charge, the proposed case was not assented to by the solicitor, and there was nothing to show that it was ever served on him. In place of exceptions, the record contained the grounds on which a motion was made for a new trial. In this condition of the case, the court ordered the record to be amended by including the charge of the circuit judge. That order has now been complied with.

In favor of life, we waive all irregularities in the record. It is not necessary to delay the decision, even to have the case as made up served on the solicitor; for, accepting the record as made up ex parte on behalf of the defendant, we think there was no error on the trial. The following is a statement of the facts of the case as made up by defendant's counsel:

"It appears from the testimony that on the day of the killing Sam Boozer and others living on the plantation of John Hipp had gone to the town of Newberry, some 12 miles distant; that during the morning James S. Gilliam, the deceased, who was superintendent or foreman of the farm owned by Mr. Hipp, and upon which Sam Boozer worked and resided, while drinking, had chased Clayton Boozer, wife of Sam Boozer, out of his (Gilliam's) yard with a gun, had forcibly entered the house of Sam Boozer, and in the struggle which took place cut May Belle Rook, the stepdaughter of Sam Boozer, on the throat, and Clayton Boozer, Sam Boozer's wife, slightly on the hand. The testimony further shows that John Hipp received a message, while in the town of Newberry, requesting him to come to his plantation to quiet a difficulty, but it appears that neither Hipp nor Sam Boozer knew the parties involved in the difficulty until they reached the plantation about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the killing; that Hipp, together with Sam Boozer and Amos Boozer, went from Newberry to Old Town, which is a railroad station near Hipp's plantation, where the killing occurred, on the train leaving Newberry about 3 o'clock. When they reached the plantation, everything was quiet, and Gilliam was lying down. Clayton Boozer and May Belle Rook, after the difficulty with Gilliam in the morning, had left the place and gone to the house of a colored man living on an adjoining plantation, where Sam Boozer found them shortly after his arrival from Newberry. It appears that Hipp's wagon, loaded with provisions for different laborers, Sam Boozer among them, reached the plantation late in the afternoon and before sundown, and was to be unloaded at what the witness called the "big house," being the house in which Gilliam, the overseer, lived. Sam Boozer came to Gilliam's back yard with his shot gun about the time the wagon came. Gilliam left his house, going out of the back door towards the lot, for the purpose, as he stated, of feeding the stock, and this seems to be the first time that he and Sam Boozer had met since the difficulty of the morning. The witnesses do not agree as to the conversation which took place between them, but, at any rate, all the witnesses testify that Gilliam turned and started back into his house; whereupon Sam Boozer shot him in the back of the head, killing him instantly."

The requests to charge were as follows:

"(1) Where all the facts are proved, the jury must say whether there was malice, and not imply it from the mere fact of killing.

"(2) Whether the killing was under sudden heat and passion, or from a settled, deliberate purpose, must be determined by the jury upon the facts of the case.

"(3) Although there may have been time for deliberation, if the purpose to kill was formed and immediately executed in a passion, especially if the passion was aroused by a recent provocation, the murder is not deliberate and premeditated.

"(4) While an intentional homicide, if neither justifiable nor excusable, is nominally murder, yet, where it is committed upon a sudden heat of passion, aroused by adequate provocation, technical malice being lacking, the crime is reduced to manslaughter.

"(5) Although anger is the passion usually existing in cases of killing in sudden heat and passion, yet any other passion, as sudden resentment or terror, rendering the mind incapable of cool reflection, may reduce the grade of the crime from murder to manslaughter.

"(6) A violent attack upon or injury to a relative or friend in the presence of defendant, or, under peculiar circumstances, even in his absence, but shortly before the homicide, may be adequate provocation to reduce a homicide to manslaughter, if it was not committed with malice."

Reference to the charge shows that the substance of every sound proposition of law contained in the requests was given to the jury. It is true the jury were told that the defendant relied on the plea of self-defense; but the charge covered the subject of manslaughter and the requests to charge in this language: "The boast of the law is to protect human life. The Constitution guarantees the protection of human life; but the law realizes that when a man is in hot blood, and has been provoked by that reasonably, not entirely dethroned his reason, but while the blood is coursing hot through his veins, and he is in a temper, his feelings are wrought up, and if he has had such provocation as would be likely to put him in that condition, and he acts then, on the spur of the moment, the law will put that veil of charity over his acts and says: 'Now, you acted beyond the pale of the law; but, inasmuch as you did it in hot blood, while your passions were aroused, while you were smarting from an indignity that was reasonably a legal provocation, we will put that veil of charity over your act, and reduce the killing, under those circumstances, if not done in malice—will reduce the killing, under those circumstances, to manslaughter, which is the killing of another without malice aforethought, either expressed or implied, and upon sufficient legal provocation.' To give you an illustration: Two citizens meet on the street, who have no ill will one against the other; but they get into a conversation. That waxes into a debate, into a dispute. Hot words pass, and they get to blows; and, while one is smarting under the insults he has had—the blow, possibly, that he has had—he strikes, and with no intention of taking human life, but while he is in hot blood, and the result of that blow produces death, the law would throw that veil of charity I have been speaking of over his acts—'You did it in hot blood, and I will not hold you to that strict accountability as if you had gone off, prepared yourself, made preparation, and then come back to avenge your grievances, whether real or imaginary.' It does not permit one to take out his vengeance, and then undertake to excuse himself on the ground that he was in hot blood."

[1] The court cannot hold that the circuit judge erred in assuming that the killing by the defendant was admitted, when the statement of facts submitted on appeal contains that admission.

[2] Careful consideration fails to show how reference in the charge to the case of State v. Emerson was injurious to the defendant. It was used merely as an illustration of the doctrine that the plea of self-defense is not available to one who brings on the difficulty. State v. Jones, 86 S. C. 49, 67 S. E. 160.

[3] The omission from the charge of an instruction that defendant's failure to testify was not to be taken against him is not reversible error. If the defendant's counsel desired such an instruction, it was his duty to call it to the attention of the circuit judge. State v. Adams, 68 S. C. 421, 47 S. E. 676.

We are unable to find any case in this state deciding the question whether it is necessary to the validity of a verdict in a felony case that defendant's counsel should be present when it is received. The rule generally followed is that the presence of the defendant is necessary, but not the presence of his counsel. Hommer v. State, 85 Md. 562, 37 Atl. 26; Martin v. State, 79 Wis. 175, 48 N. W. 119; Barnard v. State, 88 Wis. 659, 60 N. W. 1058; O'Bannon v. State, 76 Ga. 32; Baker v. State, 58 Ark. 513, 25 S. W. 603; Huffman v. State, 28 Tex. App. 174, 12 S. W. 588.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and that the cause be remanded, so that another day may be assigned for the execution of the sentence.

GARY, C. J., and HYDRICK and WATTS, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court. The defendant's plea was "not guilty," and his defense anything that negated or reduced the grave offense charged. To charge that the defense was "self-defense" tended to eliminate from the minds of the jury all other defenses.

It seems to me that the defendant would have been very unwise to confine his defense to self-defense, when the deceased was shot in the back of the head, especially when two women of his household had been wounded in his house by the deceased. I do not mean to say that the defense was sufficient and ought to have prevailed. I simply do not think that where the plea is "not guilty" that the court has the right to restrict the defense. In State v. Wyse, 32 S. C. 54, 10 S. E. 615, the court says: "He pleaded not guilty, and the issue was made upon that plea. The issue involved the questions: First, Had a homicide been committed by the appellant; and, if so, secondly, what was the degree of the offense committed, whether murder, manslaughter, or excusable homicide?" The plea of "not guilty" put in issue every fact in the case. He did not go on the stand, so he could not have admitted anything.

His honor charged: "Now, the question that comes up, in the first instance, as to Sam Boozer is not whether he killed the deceased or not; that is not the issue; that is inferred or implied from the defense that he set up. By his defense and the evidence, his defense is that he did it, but that he did it under such circumstances as that the law would excuse him for it; in other words, that he did it in self-defense."

It is true that his honor charges as to manslaughter; but I do not think his illustration, which deals solely with a blow to the defendant, covers a case in which the evidence shows a blow to the wife of the defendant. The defendant requested a charge on that subject, and I do not think it was covered by the charge.

For these reasons, I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority.

STATE ex rel. LYON, Atty. Gen., v.

BOWDEN et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 21, 1912.)

1. OFFICERS (§ 6*)—GOVERNOR — POWER OF APPOINTMENT.

The Governor has no inherent power of appointment to office, and the power must be conferred by the Constitution or the statutes, and appointments must be made in accordance with such power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. OFFICERS (§ 15*)—GOVERNOR—POWER OF APPOINTMENT.

Under Const. art. 5, § 20, empowering the Governor to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, magistrates who shall hold their offices for two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, an appointment for a full term without the advice and consent of the Senate is without effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 8*)—APPOINTMENT—VACANCIES — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 5, § 11, providing that vacancies in the Supreme Court or inferior tribunals shall be filled by elections, relates to elective judicial officers only, and does not apply to the office of magistrate filled by the Governor's appointment and the Senate's confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 8*)—VACANCIES APPOINTMENT—STATUTORY AUTHORITY.

Since the Constitution does not provide for the filling of vacancies in the office of magistrate, the Legislature, under its general legislative power, may provide for filling vacancies occurring while the Senate is not in session.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. OFFICERS (§ 15*)—VACANCIES — APPOINTMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 254, authorizing the Governor to fill by appointment vacancies in county offices, and section 624, providing for the appointment of magistrates by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that any vacancy which may happen during the recess of the Senate may be filled by the Governor, who shall report the appointment to the Senate at its next session, and, if the Senate do not consent thereto at such session, the office shall be vacant, the Governor's power of appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate is limited to vacancies occurring during a recess of the Senate, and the appointment ceases to be of force on the Senate at its next session failing to confirm it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

6. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 8*)—TERM OF OFFICE.

Under Const. art. 5, § 20, providing that magistrates shall hold their offices for two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, one who was appointed to the office of magistrate by and with the advice and consent of the Senate holds the office until the expiration of two years, and until his successor has been appointed by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and has qualified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

7. OFFICERS (§ 54*)—TERM OF OFFICE.

Where a term of office is fixed by law at a term of years, and until the appointment or election and qualification of a successor, the term of the incumbent does not end until the expiration of the term, and the appointment, or election, and qualification of his successor, and there is no vacancy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

8. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 8*)—TERM OF OFFICE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 5, § 20, providing that magistrates shall hold their offices for two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, is not inconsistent with article 1, § 11, providing that no person shall be elected or appointed to office for life or during good behavior, but the terms of all officers shall be for some specified period; the purpose of which being only to change the rule that offices could be held during good behavior.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

9. STATUTES (§ 207*)—CONSTRUCTION—INCONSISTENT PROVISIONS.

Where, in a legislative enactment, a special provision is made as to a subject which would otherwise be embraced in a general provision on the same subject, the special provision is an exception, and is not intended to be embraced in the general provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 284; Dec. Dig. § 207.*]

Gary, C. J., Watts, J., and Sease, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

Quo warranto by the State, on the relation of J. Fraser Lyon, as Attorney General, against J. M. Bowden and another, and against S. S. Tiner and another, and against W. R. Tanner and another, and against T. O. Fowler and another. Judgment that enumerated defendants are lawful magistrates, and that other defendants are intruders.

Attorney General Lyon, for plaintiff. Wm. McGowan, of Spartanburg, for defendant. Bowden. C. P. Sanders, of Spartanburg, for defendant Kirby.

WATTS, J. These cases were heard together in the original jurisdiction of the court, upon a rule to show cause issued by the Chief Justice upon verified complaints, and the pleadings in the cases, complaints, answers, and returns and demurrers to answers and returns are substantially the same and raise the same questions, so it is only necessary to set out the pleadings in the first case. The complaint is as follows:

"The plaintiff above named respectfully shows to the court:

"(1) That he is informed and believes that one J. M. Bowden has since the 22d day of February, 1911, been exercising, and still is exercising, the power and duties of the office of magistrate for the county of Spartanburg, in the city of Spartanburg, without legal appointment or authority therefor.

"(2) That A. H. Kirby was on the 5th day of February, 1909, duly appointed by the Governor magistrate for the county of Spartanburg, in the city of Spartanburg, and on the 8th day of February, 1909, his appointment to said office was regularly confirmed by the Senate of said state, and he was duly commissioned as said magistrate.

"(3) That the said A. H. Kirby at once entered upon the discharge of the duties of said office, and has since continuously discharged the duties thereof, and is now exercising the powers and discharging the duties of said office under and by virtue of the appointment and commission aforesaid.

"(4) That on the 20th day of February, 1911, the Governor of this state, without recommendation of the Senator or members of the House of Representatives from Spartanburg county, unlawfully appointed J. M. Bowden to be magistrate for the county of Spartanburg, in the city of Spartanburg (this being the office held by A. H. Kirby), and on the 22d day of February, 1911, issued to him a commission as magistrate aforesaid. That said appointment has never been submitted to the Senate for approval, and has not been confirmed by the Senate.

"(5) That the said J. M. Bowden under the said commission so unlawfully issued to him as magistrate aforesaid, and without the consent and approval of the Senate as required by section 20, art. 5, of the Constitution, and without any other or legal warrant, right, or grant whatsoever, has undertaken to exercise the powers and duties of said office, and has since that time continuously exercised the powers and duties notwithstanding the fact that the said A. H. Kirby was legally appointed and commissioned as magistrate for the county of Spartanburg, in the city of Spartanburg, as provided by section 20, art. 5, of the Constitution, and was at the time of the attempted appointment of J. M. Bowden, and is now, holding said office and lawfully exercising the powers and performing the duties thereof.

"(6) That no appointment of a successor to the said A. H. Kirby has ever been confirmed by the Senate, nor has any legal appointment of a successor to the said A. H. Kirby been made.

"Wherefore, the plaintiff prays that this court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction issue its order against the said J. M. Bowden and A. H. Kirby, the defendants, requiring them to answer and show by what authority they claim to hold and exercise the duties of said office of magistrate for the county of Spartanburg, in the city of Spartanburg; that it be adjudged that the said J. M. Bowden is guilty of unlawfully exercising said office of magistrate, and that he be excluded therefrom; that the said J. M. Bowden be required to pay the cost of the proceeding, together with such fine, not to exceed two thousand ($2,000) dollars, as the court may adjudge; that the said A. H. Kirby be adjudged to be entitled to the said office, and that he be allowed to continue to hold the same and exercise the powers and duties thereof."

The answer and return of A. H. Kirby, one of the defendants above named, is as follows:

"(1) This defendant respectfully says that no copy of the complaint has been served upon him, and he is therefore unable to say whether he formally admits or denies the allegations thereof, but, in so far as he is informed, he believes the allegations are true.

"(2) This defendant further says that he was regularly appointed and commissioned and sworn in as a magistrate in and for the county of Spartanburg on or about the — day of February, 1909, his office being in the city of Spartanburg; that he is informed and believes no one has been legally appointed to succeed him, and that he has been performing the duties of said office of magistrate ever since his appointment and qualification, and claims the right to hold and exercise the duties of said office, and to collect the salary and fees belonging to the same until some one has been duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn in as his successor. Wherefore, this defendant prays that the complaint be dismissed as to him."

The answer and return of J. M. Bowden, the other defendant above named, is as follows:

"(1) That he admits paragraph 1, as to exercising the duties of magistrate for Spartanburg county, and no other part thereof.

"(2) That the defendant has no knowledge of paragraph 2, of the complaint.

"(3) That the defendant is informed that A. H. Kirby has been exercising the authority of magistrate, but has no knowledge of the legality of the same.

"(4) That the defendant, replying to paragraph 4, says that he was duly commissioned by the Governor of South Carolina on the 22d day of February, 1911, as magistrate for Spartanburg county, and directed to exercise the duties thereof, and has no knowledge whether the appointment was brought before the Senate or not.

"(5) The defendant, replying to paragraph 5 of the complaint, denies that he is unlawfully exercising the duties of magistrate.

"(6) That defendant, replying to paragraph 6 of the complaint, alleges that he was duly appointed magistrate for Spartanburg county as stated in paragraph 1, and knows nothing about the appointment of A. H. Kirby. Wherefore, the defendant demands that the complaint herein be dismissed with costs."

The demurrer to the answer and return of J. M. Bowden by the Attorney General is as follows:

"Now comes the plaintiff herein, and demurs to the answer and return of the defendant J. M. Bowden upon the ground that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, in that (1) it admits all the material allegations of the complaint; (2) it fails to deny that the appointment of J. M. Bowden as magistrate was not confirmed by the Senate; (3) it fails to set up any facts by way of affirmative defense."

It will be seen that A. H. Kirby was appointed magistrate on February 5, 1909, and on February 8, 1909, his appointment was confirmed by the Senate. J. M. Bowden was appointed and commissioned by the Governor to this same office on February 22, 1911. D. T. Gossett was appointed magistrate on February 5, 1909, and his appointment confirmed by the Senate on February 8, 1909, and on February 22, 1911, S. S. Tiner was appointed by the Governor and commissioned to the same office. E. Potter was appointed magistrate on February 8, 1909, and his appointment was confirmed by the Senate. On February 28, 1911, W. R. Tanner was appointed and commissioned by the Governor to the same office. On February 19, 1910, W. C. Harrison was appointed a magistrate (to fill out the unexpired term of R. L. Pearson, resigned), and commissioned as such on March 4, 1910, and on February 27, 1911, T. O. Fowler was appointed and commissioned as magistrate for the same office. It was conceded at the hearing of the cases that Bowden, Tiner, Tanner, and Fowler's appointments had never been confirmed by the Senate, and that the Legislature had adjourned and was not in session after their appointments until 1912. There is no evidence that Harrison's appointment was confirmed by the Senate. Section 20, art. 5, of the Constitution, contains this provision: "A sufficient number of magistrates shall be appointed and commissioned by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate for each county who shall hold their office for the term of two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified." After the adoption of the Constitution, a statute was enacted providing that: "The Governor shall have authority by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint magistrates in each county of the state, who shall hold their office for the term of two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified. Such magistrates may be suspended by the Governor for incapacity, misconduct or neglect of duty; and the Governor shall report any suspension with the cause thereof to the Senate at its next session for its approval or disapproval." Code of Laws, § 982. Also that "the Governor shall have authority by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to fill any vacancy caused by death, removal or otherwise of any magistrate for the unexpired term." Code of Laws, § 983. Also: "In the event of a vacancy at any time in any of the offices of any county of the state, whether from death, resignation, disqualification, refusal or neglect to qualify of the person elected or appointed thereto, expiration of the term of office, removal from the county or from any other cause, the Governor shall have full power to appoint some suitable person, who shall be an elector of the county, and, upon duly qualifying according to law, shall be entitled to enter upon and hold the office to which he has been appointed, if it be an elective office, until the next general election, when an election shall be held to fill the unexpired term, and the officer so appointed or elected shall hold said office for the term of said election or appointment, and until his successor shall qualify; and if it be an office which was filled originally by appointment, until the adjournment of the General Assembly at the regular session after such appointment; and shall be subject to all the duties and liabilities incident to said office during the term of his service therein." Code of Laws, § 254. Also: "That the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint the following officers: * * * Magistrates. * * * Any vacancy which may happen in any of the said offices during the recess of the Senate may be filled by the Governor, who shall report the appointment to the Senate at its next regular session, and if the Senate do not advise and consent thereto at such session, the office shall be vacant." Code of Laws, § 624. Also: "That the following officers shall be appointed by the Governor: * * * Any vacancy in a county office, by reason of death, resignation, refusal or neglect to qualify of the person elected or appointed thereto, expiration of the term of office, or any other cause. The person so appointed to hold his office, in all cases in which the office is elective, until the next general election and until his successor shall qualify, and in cases of offices which are originally filled by appointment and not by election, until the adjournment of the session of the General Assembly next after such vacancy has occurred." Code of Laws, § 625.

By the quotations above as to the law and an application of facts thereto, it will be seen that Kirby, Gossett, and Potter, being appointed by the Governor and confirmed by the Senate in 1909, held office until the adjournment of the General Assembly in 1911. Harrison, having been appointed in 1910 for an unexpired term, and his appointment being a recess appointment, held until the adjournment of the General Assembly in 1911. There being a vacancy in the offices, the Governor appointed Bowden, Tiner, Tanner, and Fowler to these offices, and they were commissioned and were entitled to hold and enjoy the offices until the General Assembly met and their names sent to the Senate for approval and confirmation. The Senate having failed to confirm them, they were no longer magistrates, after the adjournment of the General Assembly in 1912. Since February 22, 1911, Kirby has wrongfully held the office of magistrate. Since February 22, 1911, Gossett has wrongfully held the office of magistrate. Since February 28, 1911, Potter has wrongfully held the office of magistrate. Since February 27, 1911, Harrison has wrongfully held the office of magistrate. Since the time in 1912 that the Senate refused to confirm the appointments made by the Governor of Bowden, Tiner, Tanner, and Fowler they have wrongfully held the office of magistrate.

Wherefore, it is adjudged that each of the defendants herein are guilty of usurping and intruding into, and are unlawfully holding and exercising, the offices of magistrates in Spartanburg county, and it is the judgment of this court that the defendants be excluded from the office of magistrate, and that the plaintiff recover costs against each defendant.

GARY, C. J., concurs.

SEASE, Circuit Judge. In the cases of State ex rel. Lyon v. Bowden et al., Same v. Tanner et al., Same v. Tiner et al., Same v. Fowler et al., I concur in the opinion of Associate Justice R. C. WATTS, and direct that this concurrence be attached to the original opinion and filed therewith.

WOODS, J. In these actions instituted by the Attorney General under chapter 2, tit. 13, of the Code of Procedure, is to be determined the tenure by which a magistrate holds office under the Constitution and statutes of the state. The complaints, which are substantially the same in all the cases, allege that under commissions issued by the Governor, without authority of law, certain of the defendants have undertaken to exercise the duties of the office of magistrate in Spartanburg county in the place of magistrates whose terms of office have not expired; namely, J. M. Bowden in the place of A. H. Kirby, S. S. Tiner in the place of D. T. Gossett, W. R. Tanner in the place of E. Potter, and T. O. Fowler in the place of W. C. Harrison. The court is asked to adjudge that A. H. Kirby, D. T. Gossett, E. Potter, and W. C. Harrison are lawful magistrates, and that the defendants J. M. Bowden, S. S. Tiner, W. R. Tanner, and T. O. Fowler be excluded from the offices they claim, and that each of them pay the costs of the proceedings against him, and a fine not exceeding $2,000. An order was made requiring the defendants to show cause why the relief asked in the complaint should not be granted. There were returns and demurrers thereto, but there is no controversy as to the facts. Kirby, Gossett, and Potter were appointed magistrates in Spartanburg county, and their appointments confirmed by the Senate in February, 1909. No appointments were sent to the Senate at the session in 1911, but in February, 1911, after the adjournment of the Senate, his excellency, the Governor, undertook to appoint as successors to Kirby, Gossett, and Potter the defendants Bowden, Tiner, and Tanner. These appointments were submitted to the Senate at its session in 1912, and the Senate refused to confirm them. W. C. Harrison was appointed by the Governor magistrate in Spartanburg county in 1910, and his appointment was confirmed by the Senate at the session of 1910. On February 28, 1911, after the adjournment of the Senate, the Governor undertook to appoint the defendant T. O. Fowler as successor to Harrison. This appointment was submitted to the Senate at the session of 1912, and the Senate refused to confirm it.

[1] The authority of the Governor to appoint magistrates is conferred and limited by the Constitution, and, if the appointments of Bowden, Tiner, Tanner, and Fowler were not made in accordance with that authority, they were of no effect. The principle is universally recognized that the Governor of a state has no inherent power of appointment to office, and that his power must be found in the Constitution or statutes of the state. Elledge v. Wharton, 89 S. C. 113, 71 S. E. 657; Bruce v. Matlock, 86 Ark. 555, 111 S.

W. 990; Throop on Public Officers, § 362; 8 Cyc. 857. After a review of the cases, the principle deduced is thus stated in the note to People v. Freeman (Cal.) 13 Am. St. Rep. 130. "The truth is that the power of appointing or electing to office does not necessarily and ordinarily belong to either the legislative, the executive, or the judicial department. It is commonly exercised by the people, but the Legislature may, as the law-making power, when not restrained by the Constitution, provide for its exercise by either department of the government, or by any person or association of persons whom it may choose to designate for that purpose. It is an executive function when the law has committed it to the executive, a legislative function when the law has committed it to the Legislature, and a judicial function, or at least a function of a judge, when the law has committed it to any member or members of the judiciary."

[2] What, then, is the limitation placed by the supreme law of the state on the power of the Governor to appoint magistrates? The Constitution thus provides for magistrates as officers of the judicial department of the state government: "A sufficient number of magistrates shall be appointed and commissioned by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for each county, who shall hold their offices for the term of two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified." Article 5, § 20. Since this supreme law which confers on the Governor the power of appointment expressly limits and conditions that power on the advice and consent of the Senate, it is clear beyond controversy that an appointment for the full term provided by the Constitution without the advice and consent of the Senate is beyond the power of the Governor and without effect. State v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 588, 18 Am. Rep. 321; People v. Bissell, 49 Cal. 407; Attorney General v. Rareshide, 32 La. Ann. 934; Watkins v. Watkins, 2 Md. 354; Brady v. Howe, 50 Miss. 607; Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 507; State ex rel. Standish, Attorney General v. Boucher, 3 N. D. 389, 56 N. W. 142, 21 L. R. A. 539.

[3] It will be observed that the section of the Constitution above quoted, providing for the appointment of magistrates by the concurrent action of the Governor and the Senate and fixing the term, does not provide for temporary vacancies in the office by resignation, death, removal, or other cause. The only section of the Constitution relating to the filling of vacancies in judicial offices is section 11 of article 5, which provides: "All vacancies in the Supreme Court or inferior tribunals shall be filled by elections as herein prescribed: Provided, that if the unexpired term does not exceed one year such vacancy may be filled by executive appointment. All judges, by virtue of their office, shall be conservators of the peace throughout the state; and when a vacancy is filled by either appointment or election, the incumbent shall hold only for the unexpired term of his predecessor." This section, by its terms, relates exclusively to elective judicial officers, for it provides that all vacancies shall be filled by election. The "unexpired term" referred to then manifestly means the term which will expire at the next election. The impossibility of making this section, relating to elective judicial officers, fit the office of magistrate, which is not elective, but filled by the Governor's appointment and the Senate's confirmation, is too manifest to require elaboration.

[4] As it thus appears that the Constitution does not provide for the filling of vacancies in the office of magistrate, there can be no doubt of the authority of the General Assembly, under its general legislative power, to provide for filling such vacancies occurring while the Senate is not in session. The principle is stated in McAllister v. U. S., 141 U. S. 174, 11 Sup. Ct. 949, 35 L. Ed. 693, and many other cases, and the exact point was decided in Tappan v. Gray, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 507.

[5] The General Assembly in the exercise of this power has by section 254 of the Civil Code authorized the Governor to fill by appointment vacancies "in any of the offices of any county of the state, whether from death, resignation, disqualification, refusal or neglect to qualify of the person elected or appointed thereto, expiration of the term of office, removal from the county or any other cause; * * * and if it be an office which was filled originally by appointment, until the adjournment, of the General Assembly at the regular session next after such appointment." The office of magistrate falls under this statute. Section 624 provides for the appointment of magistrates and other officers by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and enacts further with respect to vacancies that "any vacancy which may happen in any of said offices during the recess of the Senate may be filled by the Governor, who shall report the appointment to the Senate at its next session, and if the Senate do not advise and consent thereto at such session, the office shall be vacant." No one will doubt that, under these statutes, the Governor's power of appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate is limited to vacancies occurring during a recess of the Senate, and that the appointment ceases to be of force if the Senate at its next session fails to confirm it. The appointments in the cases now under consideration were made by the Governor without the advice and consent of the Senate; and they were without effect because when they were made there were no vacancies in the office.

[6] The length of the term of office of magistrate is specifically ordained by the Constitution to be "two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified." Therefore one who is appointed to the office of magistrate by and with the advice and consent of the Senate holds the office until the expiration of two years, and until his successor has been appointed by the Governor by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and has qualified. Unless the words "until their successors have been appointed and qualified" are to be erased from the Constitution, the time which may elapse between the expiration of the two years and the actual appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the qualification of the successor is as much a part of the specific term of office fixed by the Constitution as the two years. The failure of the Governor to appoint, or of the Senate to act upon the appointment or the rejection by the Senate of the appointment of the Governor, does not create a vacancy. On the contrary, it was the clear intention of the framers of the Constitution to provide against the inconvenience to the people of a vacancy arising from the failure of due appointment by the Governor and confirmation by the Senate of a successor in the office at the expiration of the two years. To take any other view would be not only to erase words from the Constitution, but to attribute to the constitutional convention and the General Assembly the purpose to empower the Governor to exercise sole control of the appointment of magistrates of the state in total disregard of the constitutional safeguard that his appointment shall be subject to the advice and consent of the Senate. The manner in which such sole control could be exercised is obvious. Upon the expiration of the term of two years, the Governor could refuse to appoint and submit to the Senate for confirmation. If it were true that the office then became vacant on the adjournment of the Senate, the Governor could, under the statutes, appoint to the vacancy, and the appointee would hold until the Senate should act upon the appointment at its next session. If the appointment should be rejected by the Senate or not submitted to the Senate, the Governor could again refuse to submit an appointment to the Senate, and again, after its adjournment, appoint to the vacancy. This process could be continued indefinitely to the complete subversion of the Constitution and the destruction of the checks on the executive power which the Constitution has so clearly ordained.

[7] No citation of authority can make the matter plainer than the words of the Constitution, but we think it safe to say that the courts have held with complete unanimity that, when a term of office is fixed by law at a term of years and until the appointment or election and qualification of a successor, the term of the incumbent does not end until the expiration of the time named and the appointment or election and qualification of his successor, and there is no vacancy. State v. Hadley, 64 N. H. 473, 13 Atl. 643; State v. Metcalf, 80 Ohio St. 244, 88 N. E. 738; State v. Boucher, 3 N. D. 389, 56 N. W. 142, 21 L. R. A. 539; People ex rel. Parsons v. Edwards, 93 Cal. 153, 28 Pac. 831; Carr v. Wilson, 32 W. Va. 419, 9 S. E. 31, 3 L. R. A. 64; State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 16 N. E. 384, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663.

[8] It has been suggested, however, that the provision of section 20, article 5, of the Constitution, that magistrates shall hold beyond the two years until their successors are appointed and qualified, is inconsistent with and must yield to section 11, art. 1, which provides that "no person shall be elected or appointed to office in this state for life or during good behavior, but the terms of all officers shall be for some specified period, except notaries public and officers in the militia." There is no inconsistency in the two provisions. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1895, offices in this state might be held during good behavior. The purpose of section 11, art. 1, was to change this rule, and make the term a limited one so as to make office holders more amenable to the elective or appointive power. It would be most unreasonable to impute to the constitutional convention a purpose to give to the expression, "some specified period," a meaning so narrow as to prohibit any legislative provision against the inconvenience arising from vacancies in public office, which would occur if the incumbent could not be allowed to hold until the appointment or election and qualification of his successor. Such a construction of the Constitution is impossible. The convention could not have meant to prohibit itself and the General Assembly from doing that which it later in the same Constitution actually did in providing that the Governor and the justices of the Supreme Court should hold their office for the number of years mentioned, and until their successors should be elected and qualified, and that magistrates should hold their offices for two years and until their successors should be appointed and confirmed, and should qualify.

[9] But, even if the two provisions were inconsistent, no principle of construction is better settled, both by authority and reason, than this. Where, in a legislative enactment, a special provision is made as to a subject which would otherwise be embraced in a general provision on the same subject, the special provision is held to be an exception, and not intended to be embraced in the general provision. Enlich on Statutes, § 399; 36 Cyc. 1151. From these considerations the conclusion is inevitable that there were no vacancies when the Governor attempted to appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate, that the appointments were without authority of law, and were of no effect. The term of office of Kirby, Gossett, and Potter extended from their appointment, with the advice and consent of the Senate, in February, 1909, for two years and until their successors should be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, and should qualify. The Constitution and statute law of the state provide that the Governor should appoint their successors and submit the appointments to the Senate for its consent and advice at the expiration of two years from February, 1909; that is, at the session of the Senate in 1911 and the session of 1912. It is thus evident that there has been no appointment of successors to these magistrates by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; that their terms of office had not expired and the offices were not vacant when the Governor undertook to appoint, without the advice and consent of the Senate and during a recess, Bowden, Tiner, and Tanner as magistrates; that these last appointments were of no effect; and that Kirby, Gossett, and Potter are still lawful magistrates of Spartanburg county. By the same reasoning it results that the appointment of Fowler as successor to Harrison was without authority of law, and that Harrison is still the lawful magistrate.

The judgment of this court, therefore, is that A. H. Kirby, D. T. Gossett, E. Potter, and W. C. Harrison are lawful magistrates of Spartanburg county, and that the defendants J. M. Bowden, S. S. Tiner, W. R. Tanner, and T. O. Fowler be excluded from the office of magistrate, and that they pay the costs of these proceedings.

HYDRICK and FRASER, JJ., and GAGE, PRINCE, WILSON, DE VORE, RICE, SPAIN, and FRANK B. GARY, Circuit Judges, concur. GARY, C. J., dissents for the reasons stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice WATTS, filed on the 5th of June, 1912, in these cases.

GARY, C. J. Whereas by inadvertence it was stated in the opinion rendered in these cases that the appointments of J. M. Bowden, S. S. Tiner, W. R. Tanner, and T. O. Fowler as magistrates were not submitted by the Governor to the Senate at its session in 1912, the fact being that they were submitted and rejected by the Senate, it is ordered that correction of the error be made in the opinion of the court.

McDOWELL v. BURNETT, County Sup'r, et al.(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 21, 1912.)1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 8*)—TERM OF OFFICE—APPOINTMENT.

Under Const. art. 5, § 20, providing for the appointment by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of magistrates who shall hold their offices for two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, one appointed a magistrate during a session of the Senate and confirmed by the Senate holds the office for the full term from the date of his confirmation, and Civ. Code 1902, § 983, limiting the tenure to the unexpired portion of the predecessor's term, is without effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. OFFICERS (§ 61*)—REMOVAL—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 8, § 27, providing for the removal of officers for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty in such manner as may be provided by law when no mode of trial or removal is provided in the Constitution, requires that officers shall be removed in the manner provided by law for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, legally shown to the removing power, and leaves to the Legislature the discretion to provide the manner of removal, the designation of the person or tribunal which shall have the power of removal, and the procedure to ascertain the fact of incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, unless a mode of trial or removal is provided in the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 90; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

3. OFFICERS (§ 7*)—REMOVAL—GROUNDS.

Const. art. 4, § 22, authorizing the Governor to suspend an officer indicted for embezzlement of public funds, and declaring the office vacant in case of conviction, applies to the removal of all officers, including magistrates, except the Governor, but is limited to the misconduct of embezzlement, and does not apply to other forms of misconduct, or incapacity or neglect of duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. OFFICERS (§ 61*)—REMOVAL—IMPEACHMENT.

Under Const. art. 3, § 27, authorizing the removal of officers for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty in the manner provided by law when no mode of trial or removal is provided in the Constitution, and article 4, § 22, authorizing the Governor to suspend an officer indicted for embezzlement and declaring the office vacant on conviction, and article 15, §§ 3, 4, providing that the Governor and all other executive and judicial officers shall be liable to impeachment, and that for any willful neglect of duty not a sufficient ground of impeachment, the Governor shall remove an executive or judicial officer on the address of two-thirds of each house of the Legislature, every executive and judicial officer whose authority and jurisdiction extend over the entire state, and whose office is created by the Constitution or by statute, and filled by election by the people at large, is removable by impeachment, or by the Governor on the address of the Legislature, or by conviction of embezzlement of trust funds, and all other officers are subject to removal under the statute or under common law where that is applicable, and magistrates are not such judicial officers as are removable by impeachment or by the Governor on the address of the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 90; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 14*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONSTITUTION.

A court in construing the Constitution must not limit the meaning of plain language in the Constitution used without express limitation further than it can be made plain with reasonable certainty that such limitation was intended.

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 20*)—CONSTRUCTION—LEGISLATIVE CONSTRUCTION—EFFECT.

A legislative construction of a constitutional provision, though not binding on the court, is entitled to great consideration.

7. OFFICERS (§ 7*)—REMOVAL—POWER OF GOVERNOR.

The Governor has no implied power to remove an officer holding under the Constitution creating the office and fixing the tenure, unless the power is conferred by the Constitution or statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

8. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 10*)—"REMOVAL"—"SUSPENSION"—POWER OF GOVERNOR.

Under Const. art. 12, § 8, conferring on the Governor power to remove officers of charitable and penal institutions, and article 4, § 22, authorizing the Governor to suspend an officer indicted for embezzlement, and Cr. Code 1902, §§ 381, 388, 389, 410, providing for the removal by the Governor of local officers convicted of specific misconduct, and providing for the dismissal from office of any magistrate convicted of neglecting to pay over fines, and Civ. Code 1902, §§ 625, 982, authorizing the Governor to remove for cause any officer appointed by him to fill a vacancy, and authorizing the Governor to suspend magistrates for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, etc., the Governor has no power to remove magistrates serving for a full term except after trial and conviction, as provided by the Constitution and the statutes, but he may suspend any magistrate when a showing has been made to him by affidavit that the magistrate is probably guilty of embezzlement and a true bill has been found, and he may suspend for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, but submit the suspension to the Senate for approval or disapproval, and an attempt of the Governor to remove a magistrate without indictment and conviction is without effect as a removal. A "suspension" is the mere temporary withdrawal of the power to exercise the duties of an office, while a "removal" is a complete deprivation of official tenure.

9. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—PERFORMANCE OF OFFICIAL DUTIES.

The presumption is that the Governor in the exercise of the power of his office acts with a view to the public interest, and the courts will give effect to his acts to the utmost extent that they are authorized by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

10. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 10*)—REMOVAL—POWER OF GOVERNOR.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 982, authorizing the Governor to suspend magistrates for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, requiring the Governor to report any suspension with the cause thereof to the Senate for its approval or disapproval, the power of suspension can only be exercised after notice and hearing, though a public office is not property, and though the incumbent may not complain when suspended or removed without reason under a power to suspend or remove at will conferred by law.

Gary, C. J., Watts, J., and Gary and Sease, Circuit Judges, dissenting.

"To be officially reported."

Mandamus by B. L. McDowell against T. C. Burnett, County Supervisor, and another, County Treasurer of Greenwood County, in which W. H. Kerr was made a party defendant by order of court. Petition dismissed.

D. H. Magill, of Greenwood, for petitioner. Giles & Ouzts and Grier, Park & Nicholson, all of Greenwood, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The important question presented in this case is whether the Governor of the state has the power, at his discretion, to remove from office a magistrate whose appointment has been confirmed by the Senate. The duty of the court to pass on the limitations of the power of the General Assembly or the chief executive of the state is one of great delicacy, to be entered upon with the greatest deliberation and with care to find in the law support for the legislative action or the action of the chief executive if it be possible. While several provisions of the Constitution and a number of the statutes are to be examined and reconciled in the light of the legal history of the state, we venture to think that the correct solution may be made evident. The question arises under a petition filed by B. L. McDowell, asking the court to issue a writ of mandamus requiring the supervisor of Greenwood county to issue, and the county treasurer to pay, a check for his salary as magistrate. An order was made requiring the defendants to show cause why the writ should not be issued. Afterwards W. H. Kerr, who claimed to hold the office of magistrate against McDowell, was made a party by order of the court. 90 S. C. 400, 73 S. E. 782. Returns were made which were not traversed. The facts appear from the petition, returns, and from an agreed statement submitted by counsel. W. G. Austin, whose term of office as magistrate began in 1909, died during the session of the General Assembly of 1910. W. H. Kerr was appointed, and his appointment was confirmed by the Senate at the same session.

[1] We have held in the case of State ex rel. Attorney General v. Bowden et al., 75

S. E. 866, that section 11 of article 5 of the Constitution relating to vacancies and unexpired terms of elective judicial officers has no application to magistrates, who are appointive officers. As the Constitution provides that magistrates "shall hold their offices for the term of two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified" (article 5, § 20), when Kerr was appointed during a session of the Senate and confirmed by the Senate and qualified, his tenure was not for an unexpired term, but for a full term from the date of his confirmation. The effort of the General Assembly to limit the tenure in such a case to the unexpired portion of the predecessor's term by section 983 of the Civil Code, being inconsistent with the Constitution, is without effect. The court has so held in several cases. Wright v. Charles, 4 S. C. 178; Whipper v. Reed, 9 S. C. 5; Macoy v. Curtis, 14 S. C. 367; Simpson v. Willard, 14 S. C. 191; Smith v. McConnell, 44 S. C. 493, 22 S. E. 721. The two years from the date of Kerr's confirmation did not expire until the session of the Senate in 1912. On February 25, 1911, the Governor issued a commission to J. W. Canfield, and wrote Kerr: "Your successor having been appointed your commission is hereby revoked and made null and void." Kerr refused to surrender the office, and retained his books and records, and continued to exercise the duties of magistrate. Thereafter, on March 21, 1911, the Governor wrote Kerr a formal notice of removal as follows: "I am informed that you continue to act as magistrate. I have already advised you that your commission has been revoked, and while I had hoped you would retire gracefully, I now repeat to you that you are hereby removed from the office of magistrate for neglect of duty, having refused and failed to make your monthly statement in writing to the auditor and treasurer of the county of Greenwood." Canfield sent his resignation to the Governor in May, 1911, whereupon the Governor issued a commission to McDowell, the petitioner. As Kerr's term had not expired when these appointments of Canfield and McDowell were made, neither of them could be sustained on the ground that it was made to fill a vacancy arising from the expiration of Kerr's term of office. But the Governor gave Kerr formal notice of removal by the revocation of his commission; and, if the law has invested the Governor with the power to remove magistrates serving for the full term at his discretion, a vacancy was created by removal, the appointments of Canfield in February, 1911, and of McDowell in May, 1911, when Canfield resigned, were valid, and McDowell would be entitled to the salary of the office until the end of the session of 1912, when the Senate refused to confirm his appointment. The inquiry into the power of the Governor to remove requires a detailed examination of the constitutional and statute law of the state.

[2] The first provision in the Constitution in respect to the removal of officers is found under the head of "Legislative Department," and is in these very general terms: "Officers shall be removed for incapacity, misconduct or neglect of duty, in such manner as may be provided by law, when no mode of trial or removal is provided in this Constitution." Article 3, § 27. It will be observed that the provision is mandatory, in that it requires that officers shall be removed in such manner as may be provided by law, when incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty has been legally shown to the removing power. It was held, however, in Sanders v. Belue, 78 S. C. 171, 58 S. E. 762: "The requirement that officers shall be removed for incapacity, official misconduct or neglect of duty in such manner as may be provided by law, by no means implies abrogation of the general rule of law above stated, that an appointive officer may be removed at the pleasure of the officer who appointed him." This section, it is to be remarked, further leaves to the legislative department the discretion to provide the manner of the removal, and this includes the designation of the person or tribunal who shall have the power of removal, and the procedure by which such person or tribunal shall have a hearing and ascertain the fact of incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, except when a mode of trial or removal is provided—that is, a person or tribunal designated and a procedure indicated—in subsequent provisions of the Constitution.

[3] The first question, then, is whether a mode of trial or removal of magistrates has been laid down in the Constitution. There are three sections providing modes of trial and removal of officers. Article 4, § 22, reads as follows: "Whenever it shall be brought to the notice of the Governor by affidavit that any officer who has the custody of public or trust funds is probably guilty of embezzlement or the appropriation of public or trust funds to private use, then the Governor shall direct his immediate prosecution by the proper officer, and upon true bill found the Governor shall suspend such officer and appoint one in his stead, until he shall have been acquitted by the verdict of a jury. In case of conviction the office shall be declared vacant and the vacancy filled as may be provided by law." This applies to the removal of all officers, including magistrates, except the Governor; but, being limited to the misconduct of embezzlement, it has no application to other forms of misconduct or to incapacity or neglect of duty.

[4] The other sections are those relating to impeachment and removal from office upon address of the General Assembly, and they are very broad in their terms. They are found in article 15 under the head "Impeachment":

"Sec. 3. The Governor and all other executive and judicial officers shall be liable to impeachment; but judgment in such cases shall not extend further than removal from office. The person convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable to indictment, trial and punishment according to law.

"Sec. 4. For any willful neglect of duty, or other reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the Governor shall remove any executive or judicial officer on the address of two-thirds of each house of the General Assembly. * * *

If the convention meant to include magistrates in the term "all other executive and judicial officers," then magistrates could be removed for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty only by impeachment, or by the Governor on address of two-thirds of each house of the General Assembly. In the widest and usual meaning of the words, "all other executive and judicial officers," would include every officer of the state not of the legislative department from the highest to the most insignificant. Yet, even if sections 3 and 4 of article 15 stood alone, it would hardly be reasonable to suppose that the framers of the Constitution meant to use the words in such a broad sense that every petty officer of the state and county, except in case of conviction of embezzlement, should be subject to impeachment, and could be removed only by impeachment or address of two-thirds of the General Assembly. But they do not stand alone, and it must be that "all other executive and judicial officers" was meant in some limited sense, for section 27 of article 3 clearly contemplates the removal of officers of some kind in a manner other than by impeachment, address of the General Assembly, or conviction of embezzlement. That section must have some meaning, and its meaning, if possible, must be reconciled with the article relating to impeachment. In other words, if both provisions are to be given effect, there must be a line of distinction somewhere between impeachable executive and judicial officers and those smaller local officers subject to removal under the statutes of the state or the common law. The use of such general terms as "all executive and judicial officers," "all civil officers," and the like in the impeachment articles of Constitutions, where they must have been meant to have some limited meaning, is one of the most curious anomalies of legislation. However difficult the task, the court must try to find the line of distinction which the convention probably had in mind and mark that as the true line.

[5] In essaying the task, the primary principle must be kept in view that, in construing the Constitution of the state, the court should not take the liberty of limiting the meaning of plain language, used without express limitation, further than it can be made plain with reasonable certainty that such limitation was intended. On first impression, it may seem logical to hold the incumbents of all offices created by the Constitution removable by impeachment, and the incumbents of offices created by the General Assembly subject to removal in such manner as the General Assembly may provide. But this distinction would lead to results which could not have been intended, for under it not only magistrates, but solicitors, could be removed only by impeachment, legislative address, or on conviction of embezzlement, and even sheriffs and coroners would fall under the rule except for the single offense of allowing a prisoner to be taken by a mob and injured through the negligence, permission, or connivance of the officer. Search for the line of distinction which the framers of the Constitutions of 1868 and 1895 intended to draw in the light of the history of the subject in this state and of judicial authority in this country leads to this conclusion: Every executive and judicial officer whose authority and jurisdiction extends over the entire state, in whose official conduct the entire state is concerned, and whose office was created by the Constitution, or created by statute and filled by election by the people at large, is removable by impeachment or by the Governor on the address of the General Assembly or by conviction of embezzlement or of appropriation of trust funds and in these modes only. All other officers are subject to removal under the provisions of the statute law of the state or under the common law where that is applicable. The Constitution of 1790 provided that "the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor and all the civil officers shall be liable to impeachment." Article 5, § 8. Under this provision, it was held in State v. O'Driscoll, 2 Tread. Const. 713, Id., 3 Brev. 526, decided in 1815, that a clerk of the court was subject to impeachment; the court saying as to the procedure by impeachment: "It is not pretended that there is any other which is authorized to disqualify state delinquents from holding offices of trust or profit. * * * All the civil officers (which is the phrase of the Constitution) must be understood to mean all public officers, holding civil offices of any grade of honor, trust, or profit under this state. If the purpose of the prosecution is to punish them officially, or for any misdemeanor in office, or remove them from office, or disqualify them from holding offices of honor, trust, and profit, and not merely to punish them as criminal offenders in the ordinary course of justice, the party must be proceeded against by impeachment, and in no other mode; at all events, he may be so proceeded against, although he may be liable to other mode of prosecution." To remedy the inconvenience of the removal of local officers by impeachment and to dissipate all doubt as to whether they could be removed otherwise, in 1828 the impeachment article of the Constitution of 1790 was amended as follows: "Sec. 4.

All civil officers, whose authority is limited to a single election district, single judicial district, or part of either, shall be appointed, hold their office, be removed from office, and in addition to liability to impeachment, may be punished for official misconduct, in such manner as the Legislature, previous to their appointment, may provide." Under this amendment of the Constitution of 1790, the General Assembly, by the statute of 1829, provided for the removal by the Governor, after indictment and conviction of official misconduct, of "any public officer hereafter to be elected or appointed whose authority is limited to a single election or judicial district." 6 St. at Large, p. 390.

[6] Although the Constitution of 1790 was supplanted by that of 1868, this statute has remained a part of the law of the state, and with insignificant verbal change, is now embodied in section 388 and the first sentence of section 389 of the Criminal Code. Thus we find a legislative declaration running from 1829 to a very late day that "officers whose authority is limited to a single election or judicial district" may be removed without impeachment. The validity of section 388 and section 389 of the Criminal Code and of trials thereunder of a magistrate and a probate judge was recognized in State v. Tarrant, 24 S. C. 593, and State v. Green, 52 S. C. 520, 30 S. E. 683. Not only so, but this line of cleavage on the subject of removal from office between local officers and all officers having jurisdiction over the entire state has been followed in many other statutes enacted at various times through the course of many years. Among these are section 381 of the Criminal Code for the removal of any county officer, section 383 for the removal of clerks of court, sheriffs, and magistrates, section 395 and section 403 for the removal of sheriffs, section 410 for the removal of magistrates, section 416 for the removal of constables, and section 393 for the removal of solicitors. This apparent legislative construction, though not binding on the court, is entitled to great consideration. It was departed from, but to a very limited extent, in State v. Ansel, 76 S. C. 395, 57 S. E. 185, 11 Ann. Cas. 613. The statute provided that the board of directors of the state dispensary should be elected by the General Assembly, and that the term of office should be "for two years unless sooner removed by the Governor." It was held that the Governor could remove and that the members of the board were not such officers as were subject to impeachment under the Constitution, although they had general charge of the state's entire interest in the sale of liquor. The important consideration was that these dispensary directors held offices, not only created by the General Assembly, but filled by the election of the General Assembly; and it was reasonable to hold that officers so entirely the creatures of the General Assembly were not of such dignity as to be ranked with officers subject to impeachment, and that they could be removed as the General Assembly should direct. The same reasoning and rule would apply with even greater force to offices created by the General Assembly and filled by appointment of the Governor under legislative authority.

But there is no reason to depart from the rule recognized and followed in the entire history and scheme of legislation on the subject to the extent of holding that offices created by the General Assembly and filled by election of the people at large do not fall within the class whose incumbents are removable by impeachment. On the contrary, when the people at large have chosen by election an officer charged with duties affecting the interests of the entire state, such an officer is responsible to all the people, and there are the strongest reasons why the commission received from the people should not be annulled by removal, except in the solemn method of an impeachment trial before a body representative of all the people. It would be an unwarranted, not to say arbitrary, stretch of judicial authority to hold that such an officer is not embraced in the constitutional description "all other executive and judicial officers."

The few precedents on the subject indicate perplexity of the courts, but they also indicate approval of the line between impeachable and nonimpeachable officers which we have stated. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, construing a clause of the Constitution providing for impeachment proceedings "against any officer or officers of the commonwealth," held that it was not intended to apply to local offices created either by the Constitution or the statutes, but to "officers elected by the people at large, or provided for in the Constitution, for the administration of matters of general or state concern." Opinion of the Justices, 187 Mass. 599, 46 N. E. 118. This case, it will be observed, expressly lays down the line of distinction we have adopted as required by our legislation and decisions. The Constitution of Wyoming provided for impeachment of the "Governor and other state and judicial officers." In State v. Grant, 14 Wyo. 41, 81 Pac. 795, 82 Pac. 2, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 588, 116 Am. St. Rep. 982, the courts in holding that the provision was not applicable to the office of superintendent of one of the water divisions of the state did not lay down any line of distinction, but made these general observations: "We are strongly inclined to the opinion, without deciding the point, that the officers liable to impeachment are the Governor and other state officers mentioned in section 11, art. 4, of the Constitution, which does not include the office in question. Certainly and it has generally been so considered that only the superior executive and judicial officers of a state are subject to impeachment and we have found no case where an officer holding by appointment, or an inferior officer of any kind, has been held subject to impeachment." In State v. Hewitt, 3 S. D. 187, 52 N. W. 875, 16 L. R. A. 413, 44 Am. St. Rep. 788, the question was whether the trustee of a state college was an impeachable officer under the Constitution, providing for impeachment of "the Governor and all other state and judicial officers except county judges, justices of the peace and police magistrates." The court in deciding that he was not said: "We are of the opinion that the term 'state officers,' as used in said section, includes only such general officers as immediately belong to one of the three constituent branches of the state government. * * * The Constitutions of many of the states contain the same language as our own, defining what officers are subject to impeachment, but, so far as we have observed, such language has not been taken to include officers who hold by appointment either by the Governor or some supervising board, authorized to make such selection and appointment. * * * Similar conditions exist in other states, demonstrating the fact that trustees or superintending officers of state institutions, receiving their office not directly from the people, but by appointment from some other officers or boards for subordinate administrative purposes, are not understood to be included in the term 'state officers,' as used in the constitutional article on impeachment." The question was discussed in State v. Smith, 6 Wash. 496, 33 Pac. 974, and State v. Burke, 8 Wash. 412, 36 Pac. 281, but the line of distinction was not definitely drawn. We conclude that magistrates are not such judicial officers as are removable under the impeachment article of the Constitution, but are removable in such manner as the General Assembly may provide.

[7] We have held in State ex rel. Lyon, Atty. Gen., v. Rhame, 75 S. E. 881, herewith filed, that the Governor has no implied power to remove an officer holding under a statute which creates the office and fixes the tenure. For a still greater reason, such power must be denied when the Constitution creates the office and fixes the tenure, and no power of removal is conferred either by the Constitution or by statute.

[8] But even if it could be assumed that, in the absence of a statute covering the subject, the Governor, as the appointing officer, would have, under the common law, the power to remove at will magistrates serving for a full term, although the term of office is fixed by the Constitution, still it cannot be doubted that such common-law power is at an end when the Legislature, under express constitutional authority, has provided the condition on which the Governor may remove such officers. The General Assembly has provided for the removal by the Governor of all local officers, and magistrates fall in this class, for neglect of duty of any kind, but the power of removal is expressly conditioned on indictment and conviction. Criminal Code, §§ 388, 389. The General Assembly has provided further, by section 381, for removal by sentence of the court of any county officer convicted of incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, and specifically by section 410 for the dismissal from office of any magistrate who shall be convicted of neglecting or refusing to pay over fines. Can it be doubted that these statutes supersede any common-law power of removal at the will of the executive, even if without them such power would have existed? Further, the Constitution itself negatives the claim that the Governor has unlimited power of removal of officers whose terms are fixed by law. The minds of the framers of the Constitution adverted to the subject of removal by the Governor, and conferred that power only as to the officers of charitable and penal institutions. Article 12, § 8. In addition to this, both the Constitution and the statute law of the state, by necessary implication, have denied the Governor the unconditional power of removal by conferring the power of suspension and the power of removal of those whom he has appointed to fill vacancies. Section 22 of article 4 confers on the Governor the power to suspend an officer having the custody of public funds when it appears to the Governor that such officer is probably guilty of embezzlement and a true bill has been found, but in such case the suspension is at an end if the officer is acquitted, and removal follows the suspension only in the event of trial and conviction. This clearly shows that even for the highest official crime the Governor has only the power of suspension, and certainly implies that he shall not have the power of removal at will. Kerr, having been appointed by the Governor and confirmed by the Senate, was not filling a vacancy by appointment of the Governor, but was serving a full term. Section 625 of Civil Code authorizes the Governor to remove for cause an officer appointed by him to fill a vacancy, and thus negatives the intention to confer on the Governor the power to remove an officer holding for a full term. But, aside from all other considerations, section 982 of Civil Code is conclusive against the power of the Governor to remove a magistrate serving a full term, at his discretion, without the approval of the Senate. That section provides: "Such magistrates may be suspended by the Governor for incapacity, misconduct or neglect of duty; and the Governor shall report any suspension, with the cause thereof, to the Senate at its next session, for its approval or disapproval." The difference between suspension and removal is evident to all men. One is the mere temporary withdrawal of the power to exercise the duties of an office, the other is a complete and final deprivation of official tenure.

29 Cyc. 1405; Sumpter v. State, 81 Ark. 61, 98 S. W. 719; Poe v. State, 72 Tex. 625, 10 S. W. 737; Gregory v. Mayor, 113 N. Y. 416, 21 N. E. 119, 3 L. R. A. 854; Maben v. Rosser, 24 Okl. 588, 103 Pac. 674. The General Assembly, in conferring on the Governor the power to suspend, denied him the power to remove magistrates, except as such power was conferred conditionally by other statutes to which we have referred.

Consideration of the Constitution and the statute law of the state forces the court to these conclusions: First. The Governor has no power to remove magistrates serving for a full term, except after trial and conviction as provided by the Constitution and the statutes referred to. Second. The Governor has power to suspend such magistrates, when a showing has been made to him by affidavit that the magistrate is probably guilty of embezzlement and a true bill has been found. Third. The Governor has the power of suspension also for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, subject to the requirement that he should submit the suspension to the Senate at its next session for its approval or disapproval. Fourth. The attempt of the Governor to remove Kerr without indictment and conviction, as provided by law, was without effect as a removal.

[9, 10] But the question remains, Can any effect be given to the Governor's order, designed as a removal, by giving to it the lesser effect of a suspension for the misconduct, imputed by the Governor, of failing to make monthly statements to the auditor and treasurer of the county? The presumption is that the chief executive, in the exercise of the powers of his great office, acts with a view to the public interest, and therefore the courts should give effect to his acts to the utmost extent that they are authorized by law. The attempt to remove under this principle might be given effect as a suspension of Kerr from office from March 21, 1911, when the Governor undertook to remove for cause, until the adjournment of the Senate at its next session in 1912; but section 982 of Civil Code expressly provides that the Governor shall report the suspension of an officer to the Senate at its next session for its approval or disapproval, and the suspension of Kerr was not so reported to the Senate. In addition to this, the Senate expressed its refusal to approve Kerr's suspension by passing a joint resolution that Kerr was entitled to the salary of the office after the attempted removal. Aside from all this, however, we have reached the conclusion, after much consideration, that the attempted removal cannot be given the effect of a suspension because Kerr was not first notified and given an opportunity to be heard on the charge of misconduct. The power of suspension is conferred in this clause of section 982: "Such magistrates may be suspended by the Governor for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty; and the Governor shall report any suspension, with the cause thereof, to the Senate at its next session, for its approval or disapproval." The power is not intended for arbitrary exercise, but is conditioned on a finding by the Governor of incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty. It is true that a public office is not property, and an incumbent has no legal cause of complaint when suspended or removed, even without reason, under a power to suspend or remove at will conferred by law. Such a suspension or removal implies no condemnation; for, under such provisions of law, changes in public office are common for reasons which in no wise reflect on the person suspended or removed. But, under a statute like this, conferring on the Governor the power to suspend a magistrate for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, suspension implies that the Governor has by careful investigation ascertained the fact that the officer is incapable, or has been guilty of misconduct or neglect of duty. When it is remembered that the Governor, to whom the law has intrusted the power to suspend an officer, is presumed to act with fairness and sedate judgment, it becomes evident that the suspension by him for misconduct is a most serious condemnation. The court cannot impute to the General Assembly the intention to subject an officer to such a condemnation without notice and an opportunity to be heard, for the intention to preserve the right to be heard before condemnation is implied in all legislation unless it is expressly denied. Under statutes like this conferring the power of removal, the right to be heard under the principle we have stated has been upheld by the courts with little dissent. The authorities on the subject, both English and American, are too numerous for citation. Elaboration of the principle referred to and the authorities will be found in Trainor v. Wayne County Auditors, 89 Mich. 162, 50 N. W. 809, 15 L. R. A. 95, and note; State v. Hewitt, 3 S. D. 187, 52 N. W. 875, 16 L. R. A. 413, 44 Am. St. Rep. 788; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. 436; 29 Cyc. 1409. It is true, as we have already pointed out, that removal is a permanent deprivation of office, while suspension is only a temporary deprivation; but, on the other hand, suspension is in some respects more serious than removal since the officer suspended must remain in uncertainty as to his future. It is also true that the public interests sometimes require that an officer should be quickly suspended, but even in such emergencies the present facilities of communication make possible notice and hearing before suspension, without detriment to the public. Stronger than all other considerations, however, is the fact that the General Assembly might have conferred on the Governor the power to suspend at will for any cause he thought sufficient, and that power could have been exercised without notice and hearing, but it chose to withhold that power, and the limitation imposed on the power of suspension connotes the condition that it shall be exercised only after notice and hearing. There is little authority on the right to notice and hearing before suspension from office, but in State v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 433, 11 South. 845, 18 L. R. A. 410, the court seems to regard suspension in this respect as standing on the same footing as removal.

Our conclusion is that the attempted removal of Kerr from the office of magistrate was without effect, and that he is now, and has been since his confirmation by the Senate, a lawful magistrate of Greenwood county, and that he, and not McDowell, is entitled to the salary.

The judgment of the court is that the petition be dismissed.

HYDRICK and FRASER, JJ., and PRINCE, GAGE, WILSON, DE VORE, RICE, and SPAIN, Circuit Judges, concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). The pleadings and facts are fully set out in the opinions filed in the case heretofore on February 26, 1912. Mr. Kerr made answer as required by the court, and denies the right of the Governor to remove him, and claims that he was duly appointed and commissioned on January 27, 1910, by the Governor of this state magistrate at Greenwood for the unexpired term of W. G. Austin, deceased, and until his successor was appointed and qualified, and denies that any one has been legally appointed as his successor. I adhere to the views expressed in my dissenting opinion herein, and am of the opinion that Kerr's term of office expired when the General Assembly adjourned in 1911, and there was a vacancy in the office then, and the Governor had the right to and did fill it, and that the petitioner was both de jure and de facto magistrate from the date he was commissioned until the Senate failed to confirm him in 1912, and entitled to pay for his services, and even if he was not de jure the magistrate, but only de facto being commissioned and rendering services as such he would be entitled to be paid for his services, under Elledge v. Wharton, 89 S. C. 113, 71 S. E. 657. I think the petition should be granted and mandamus issued in accordance with views indicated.

GARY, C. J. I dissent on the following grounds: First, for the reasons stated in the opinion herein of Mr. Justice Watts, reported in 90 S. C. 400, 73 S. E. 782; and, second, because the petitioner is entitled to his salary from the date of his appointment until the adjournment of the Senate in 1912, for the reasons stated in the case of Elledge v. Wharton, 89 S. C. 119, 71 S. E. 657, especially as a joint resolution was adopted by the General Assembly at its session commencing the 9th of January, 1912, requiring the county supervisor of Greenwood county to draw his warrant for each month from January 1, 1911, for $29.16% monthly salary in favor of W. H. Kerr, till the expiration of his term of office as magistrate, and directing the treasurer of said county to pay said warrants. There is no difference in principle between that case and the one under consideration.

GARY, Circuit Judge. In the case of McDowell v. Burnett I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court en banc. The question that the court is called upon to decide is whether or not Mr. McDowell is entitled to demand payment of his salary as magistrate.

I am of the opinion that Mr. Kerr is a suspended officer. Whether he was justly or unjustly suspended is beside the question. Mr. McDowell having discharged the duties of the office by commission from the Governor pending the suspension of Mr. Kerr, he is at least a de facto officer, and I think he should be paid the salary for his services while so acting. The fact that the General Assembly made provision for paying a salary to Mr. Kerr also pending his suspension does not change the status of the parties.

I therefore dissent.

SEASE, Circuit Judge. In the case of McDowell v. Burnett I concur in the opinion of Associate Justice WATTS, and direct that this concurrence be attached to the original opinion, and be filed therewith.

STATE ex rel. LYON, Atty. Gen., v. WHITTEN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 21, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 8*)—APPOINTMENT—POWER OF GOVERNOR.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 254, authorizing the Governor to fill vacancies in county offices, and section 624, authorizing the Governor to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, magistrates, and that any vacancy which may happen during the recess of the Senate may be filled by the Governor, who shall report the appointment to the Senate at its next session, and, if the Senate do not confirm the appointment, the office shall be vacant, a recess appointment of the Governor to the office of magistrate made to fill a vacancy terminates on the adjournment of the next session of the Senate without confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. QUO WARRANTO (§ 57*)—ISSUES.

The court in quo warranto to oust defendants from the office of magistrates notwithstanding their appointment by the Governor will not consider whether the persons who were exercising the duties of the offices before the appointments have since made the offices vacant by abandonment or otherwise, since the questions are outside of the scope of the action, and since the persons holding the offices at the time of the appointments are not before the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quo Warranto, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

"To be officially reported."

Quo warranto by the State, on the relation of J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, against S. E. Whitten, and against W. E. Green, and against W. T. Chamblee, and against J. A. Young. Judgment excluding defendants from the office of magistrate.

Attorney General Lyon, for plaintiff. K. P. Smith and J. E. Breazeale, both of Anderson, for defendants.

WOODS, J. The complaints in these actions brought by the Attorney General in April, 1912, under chapter 2, tit. 13, of the Code of Procedure, allege that the defendants have unlawfully obtruded themselves into the office of magistrate, and ask as relief that the court will so find and adjudge that the defendants be excluded from office.

The material allegation in all the complaints is that each of the defendants is undertaking to perform the duties of magistrate under an appointment made by the Governor in the year 1911 after the adjournment of the Senate, and not confirmed by the Senate at its session of 1912. The complaints do not allege that there are any lawful incumbents of the offices whose terms have not expired, nor are any persons who may have held the office at the time the defendants were appointed before the court. The answer of the defendant, S. E. Whitten, is as follows: "(1) That he denies each and every allegation of the complaint not herein admitted. (2) That he was on February 23, 1911, by the Governor of the state of South Carolina duly appointed to the office of magistrate for Anderson county at Pendleton in said state and county, and that his commission as magistrate was issued to him by the Governor and attested by R. M. McCown as Secretary of State, and, upon being so appointed and commissioned, his predecessor in office voluntarily surrendered to defendant the office of magistrate at Pendleton, together with the books and records of said office. (3) That his appointment, as aforesaid, was made during a recess of the Senate, that body having adjourned sine die on February 18, 1911. (4) That until this action was begun defendant did not know whether or not his appointment as magistrate had been confirmed by the Senate, and did not know whether or not his appointment as magistrate was made without the recommendation of the senator or members of the House of Representatives from Anderson county. (5) That since his appointment, as aforesaid, he has been performing the duties of said office without adverse claim of any one, or in opposition to any claimant to said office, and until this action was commenced no one had ever questioned his right to hold and enjoy said office, and that he has been and is performing the duties of said office in good faith, believing himself to be a legally appointed magistrate. Wherefore defendant prays (1) that the rule to show cause and the complaint herein be dismissed without cost to the defendant; (2) that his holding said office be declared legal." On the answer is indorsed an admission that the defendant's appointment has not been confirmed by the Senate.

The answer and admission of the defendant W. E. Green is the same, except that it contains the allegation that his predecessor, S. M. Johnson, was appointed during a recess of the Senate, and that his appointment has never been confirmed. The answer of the defendant J. A. Young does not deny any of the allegations of the complaint, but admits that he has been acting as magistrate since the 27th day of February, 1911, under a recess appointment made by the Governor. It does not deny that the appointment has never been confirmed by the Senate, but alleges that such lack of confirmation was not known to the defendant until the complaint herein was served upon him. It alleges that he has performed the duties of the office, believing himself to be the lawful magistrate. The answer of W. T. Chamblee is to the same effect, but it further alleges that, when the defendant received his commission, his predecessor in office turned over to him the books and papers belonging to the office, and soon thereafter removed from Anderson county, and has not made his home in the county since, and that, if he had not accepted the office, his community would have been deprived of the services of a magistrate for several months. The Attorney General demurred to all the answers on the ground that they admitted the material allegations of the complaints, and failed to set up any affirmative defense.

[1] The question thus presented by the pleadings is whether these appointments to the office of magistrate made by the Governor after the adjournment of the Senate in 1911, and not confirmed by the Senate at its next session in 1912, entitle the appointees to hold the office after the adjournment of the Senate in 1912. After full discussion of the question, it was decided in State ex rel. Lyon, Attorney General, v. Bowden and Others (75 S. E. 866), that, under sections 254 and 624 of the Civil Code, a recess appointment of the Governor to the office of magistrate, even if made to fill a vacancy, was at an end upon the adjournment of the next session of the Senate without confirmation. It follows that all the defendants must be excluded from the office of magistrate.

[2] There are two reasons why the court cannot legally decide nor with propriety express an opinion as to whether there were any vacancies in the offices when the defendants were appointed, or whether the persons who were exercising the duties of the office before the appointment of the defendants have since made the offices vacant by abandonment or otherwise. The first reason is that those questions are entirely outside the scope of the actions; the other is that the persons holding the office or exercising its duties at the time the defendants were appointed are not before the court.

The judgment of the court is that the defendants be excluded from the office of magistrate, and they pay the costs of these actions.

STATE ex rel. LYON, Atty. Gen., v. RHAME et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 21, 1912.)

1. OFFICERS (§ 7*)—REMOVAL—POWER OF GOVERNOR.

The power of removal from office by the Governor is not an incident to his office, but exists only when conferred by the Constitution or statutes, or is implied from the conferring of the power of appointment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. OFFICERS (§ 7*)—APPOINTMENT—REMOVAL.

The power of removal from office is not incident to the power of appointment, where the term of office is fixed by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 17*)—BANK EXAMINER—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE—POWER OF GOVERNOR.

Under the common law and under Const. art. 12, § 8, authorizing the removal by the Governor of officers of charitable and penal institutions, and article 4, § 22, empowering the Governor to suspend officers when indicted for embezzlement, and to remove them after a conviction, and under Civ. Code 1902, §§ 340, 393, authorizing removal of officers by the Governor with the consent of the Senate, the Governor has no authority to remove from office the State Bank Examiner, whose term of office is fixed at four years by Act Feb. 23, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 103), as amended by Act Feb. 20, 1911 (27 St. at Large, p. 4), without conferring on the Governor the power of removal or referring to the subject of removal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 22; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 102*)—PUBLIC OFFICERS—TERM OF OFFICE.

Public officers have no contract or property rights in their offices, and, except as provided by the Constitution, they are subject to legislative control, and the Legislature may, subject to the Constitution, fix the term of office, provide for removal, abolish the office, or reduce the term.

Watts, J., and Gage, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

Original action by the State, on the relation of J. Fraser Lyon, Attorney General, against B. J. Rhame and another, to adjudge B. J. Rhame an intruder in the office of State Bank Examiner. Dismissed.

Attorney General Lyon, for petitioner. W. F. Stevenson, of Cheraw, for respondents.

WOODS, J. His excellency, the Governor, on April 1, 1912, issued his proclamation, reciting acts and omissions which he characterized as neglect of duty by B. J. Rhame, State Bank Examiner, and declaring that he did thereby, for the imputed neglect of duty, remove Rhame from his office. Thereafter the Governor appointed H. W. Fraser State Bank Examiner. Rhame having refused to surrender the office, this action was brought by the Attorney General under title 13, c. 2, asking the court to adjudge Rhame an intruder in the office, and that he be excluded therefrom. Fraser was made a party, and by answer has alleged that he is the lawful State Bank Examiner under the appointment of the Governor. Rhame by his answer alleges, first, that the term of office of the State Bank Examiner is fixed by statute, and that the Governor has no power to remove him; second, that, if such power exists, it can be exercised only for cause and after a hearing on the charge made, and that no hearing was given him on the charge set out in the proclamation as the cause of removal; and, third, that the charge of misconduct was without foundation. The defendant Fraser replied to the answer of Rhame, alleging that the Governor had full power to remove Rhame, that Rhame had been heard on the charges preferred against him, that his defense was insufficient, and that the Governor had found him guilty of neglect of duty and misconduct, and for that reason had removed him. The Attorney General demurred to Rhame's return.

The first and main question thus raised is whether the Governor has power to remove from office the State Bank Examiner. The office of State Bank Examiner was first created by the Act of 1896. Civil Code 1902, §§ 1768, 1769. That statute provided that he should be appointed by an advisory board consisting of the Governor, Comptroller General, Secretary of State, Treasurer, and Attorney General, "and hold the said office for two years unless sooner removed by the advisory board, which board shall fill any vacancy by an appointment for the unexpired term." In 1906 the act of 1896 was repealed, and a new statute enacted providing that the Governor should appoint a competent person as Bank Examiner, and that in the selection the Governor "may advise with the executive committee of the South Carolina Bankers' Association." 25 Stat. 103. This act was amended in 1911 (27 Stat. 4), but the amendment does not bear on the tenure of office. The statute of 1906, as amended in 1911, provides: "The term of the office of said Bank Examiner shall be four years and he shall receive as compensation therefor three thousand dollars per annum," etc. But no power of removal is conferred on the Governor, nor is any reference made to the subject of removal.

The question then comes to this: When a statute creates an office to be filled by appointment of the Governor and fixes the term for which the appointee shall hold, but confers on the Governor no power of removal, does the Governor, nevertheless, have the power of removal under the Constitution or the statute law of the state or under the common law? Laying aside for the moment the Constitution and the statute law of the state, we consider the common-law rule as established by judicial expression. Surely, men of common sense, learned and unlearned, would be surprised to find the law to be that, when the legislative department has created an office to be filled by appointment of the Governor and extended and limited its term to four years, yet the Governor could at will shorten the term by removal, although no power of removal has been conferred. Such executive power is denied by both reason and authority.

[1] The Governor, as chief executive, has no prerogative control over officers such as is held by the king of Great Britain. The power of removal from office, therefore, is not an incident of the executive office, and it exists only where it is conferred by the Constitution or by the statute law, or is implied from the conferring of the power of appointment. In Sanders v. Belue, 78 S. C. 177, 58 S. E. 762, this court held that the absolute power of removal at pleasure is incident to the power of appointment, unless the law provides duration of the official term or mode of removal. In Hardy v. Reamer, 84 S. C. 487, 66 S. E. 678, the statute authorized the city council to establish a board of police commissioners and set their terms of office. After establishing the board and selecting its members, the city council undertook to abolish the board. In an opinion delivered on the circuit and adopted by this court, Judge Ernest Gary thus clearly states the principle: "The power given the mayor and aldermen is that of electing or appointing members of the board provided for by the act. In exercising this power they act as executives, as the appointing to office is an executive, and not a legislative, function. Having exercised this power by electing or appointing plaintiffs to the offices provided for by the act, and being neither authorized to remove such officers or to abolish such offices, created by a superior sovereignty, their power is exhausted, and they cannot remove plaintiffs, either directly or by abolishing their offices, so long as their terms are unexpired."

[2, 3] These cases laying down the rule in this state that the power of removal is not incident to the power of appointment, where the extent of the term of office is fixed by the statute, and not subject to be shortened, are buttressed by unbroken authority in other jurisdictions. Avery v. Tyringham, 3 Mass. 177, 3 Am. Dec. 105; People v. Robb, 128 N. Y. 180, 27 N. E. 267; State ex rel. Relley v. Chatfield, 71 Conn. 112, 40 Atl. 922; State v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748; Bruce v. Matlock, 86 Ark. 555, 111 S. W. 990. In People v. Robb, supra, the New York Court of Appeals says that the following provision of the Constitution of New York was an embodiment of the generally recognized rule: "When the duration of any office is not provided by the Constitution, it may be declared by law, and, if not so declared, such office shall be held during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment." Const. art. 10, § 3. In Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 138, 2 L. Ed. 60, Chief Justice Marshall thus stated the general rule: "Mr. Marbury, then, since his commission was signed by the President, and sealed by the Secretary of State, was appointed; and as the law creating his office gave the officer a right to hold for five years, independent of the executive, the appointment was not revocable, but vested in the officer legal rights, which are protected by the laws of his country. * * * It has been created by special act of Congress, and has been secured, to the person appointed to fill it, for five years." This rule was restated and recognized in McAllister v. U. S., 141 U. S. 174, 11 Sup. Ct. 949, 35 L. Ed. 693; Ex parte Hennen, 13 Pet. 230, 10 L. Ed. 138; Reagan v. U. S., 182 U. S. 419, 21 Sup. Ct. 842, 45 L. Ed. 1162. At the argument the case of Parsons v. U. S., 167 U. S. 324, 17 Sup. Ct. 880, 42 L. Ed. 185, was mainly relied on as completely overturning the rule stated, and laying down the rule that the power of appointment implies the power of removal, even where the term of office is fixed by the statute which confers the power of appointment, and no power of removal is expressed. The case does not bear that construction. On the contrary, the entire opinion of Justice Peckham rests on the argument that, under the Constitution and statutes of the United States, the office of district attorney and like federal offices fall without the general rule, and are not controlled by it. The federal statute provided: "District attorneys shall be appointed for four years and their commissions shall cease and expire at the expiration of four years from their respective dates." After consideration of the powers bestowed by the Constitution on the President to remove officers, and an elaborate review of the acts of Congress on the subject, the court holds that the debates in Congress, the history of congressional action on the subject, and the statutes themselves show that four years was fixed as a limitation on a term which was at one time indefinite, and that in so limiting the term it was not the intention of the Congress to interfere with the President's power of removal which he had when the term was indefinite, and so under the Constitution subject to his power of removal. It is on this ground that the court distinguishes the case, and takes it out of the general rule laid down in Marbury v. Madison. Thus it appears, we think, beyond controversy that the Parsons Case is in no wise opposed to the rule that the power of removal is not an incident of the power of appointment if the length of the term is fixed by statute, and no authority to remove is conferred by the statute. Not only does the common law deny the power of removal as an incident of the power of appointment when the term of office is fixed by the statute and the power of removal not expressed, but the Constitution and statutes of the state strongly negative such a power. The Constitution by expressly conferring on the Governor the power (section 8, art. 12) to remove the officers of charitable and penal institutions "until the next session of the General Assembly and until a successor or successors shall be appointed" impliedly negatives the intention to bestow the power to remove other officers; and the conferring, by section 22, art. 4, of the lesser power to suspend officers for the grave offense of embezzlement, and that only on a true bill found, and providing that there shall be removal only after conviction, negatives the intention to bestow the larger power of removal without a true bill and without conviction on a charge less grave than embezzlement.

[4] The statute law of the state by the strongest implication denies the authority to remove here asserted. Public officers are created for the benefit of the commonwealth, incumbents have no contract or property rights in them, and, unless otherwise it be provided by the Constitution, they are subject entirely to legislative control. Hence, subject to the Constitution, the General Assembly may fix the term, provide for removal, abolish the office, reduce the term, and in every respect control the existence, powers, emoluments, and tenure of public officers. In the exercise of this power the General Assembly has, with assiduous care, provided that the removal of even minor and local officers should take place only after indictment and conviction of misconduct, as instance the provisions for the removal of all local officers by section 388 and section 389 of the Criminal Code only on trial and conviction, or has provided that they should be merely suspended by the Governor, and be removed only on consent of the Senate, as instance the provision made for the suspension and removal of county auditors and treasurers (Civil Code 1902, §§ 340, 393), or has enacted that they should be removed by judicial decree in a civil action as provided in the article of the Code of Procedure under which this action was brought. When a different policy was intended, the tenure has been expressly stated to be subject to removal, as in the case of the dispensary directors and the election commissioners whose tenure was made subject to removal by the Governor. Criminal Code 1902, § 556; Civil Code, § 206. There is no escape from the conclusion that the Governor has no power to remove the State Bank Examiner. The duties of the State Bank Examiner extend over the entire state, but he is not elected by the people at large, hence he is not an officer removable only by impeachment; for the rule was thus laid down in McDowell v. Burnett, 75 S. E. 873, herewith filed: "Every executive and judicial officer whose authority and jurisdiction extends over the entire state, in whose official conduct the entire state is concerned, and whose office was created by the Constitution, or created by statute and filled by election by the people at large, is removable by impeachment or by the Governor on address of the General Assembly, or by conviction of embezzlement or appropriation of trust funds and in these modes only. All other officers are subject to removal under the provisions of the statute law of the state or under the common law where that is applicable." Under this rule the General Assembly in creating the office of State Bank Examiner might have provided that the term should be four years subject to be shortened by removal by the Governor or on the happening of any other contingency. But it did not see fit to do so.

[5] The wisdom of legislative action is without the sphere of judicial inquiry. It may be that fixing the term of the office of State Bank Examiner rigidly at four years in the last statute, when, by the earlier statute, it had been fixed at two years subject to be shortened by removal, was an oversight, or it may be the change was due to an intention to make an officer, clothed with so much discretion and power and charged with such great responsibility in safeguarding, by his supervision, enormous public and private interests, entirely independent of any outside influence, and removable only by a civil action under the Code of Procedure. These questions are not for us. The court can only declare that under the law as it exists the State Bank Examiner is not subject to removal at the discretion of the Governor, and that the defendant, B. J. Rhame, is still State Bank Examiner.

This conclusion makes unnecessary the consideration of the other questions argued, and it is therefore ordered and adjudged that the petition be dismissed.

GARY, C. J. I concur in the opinion of WOODS, J., for the reason that the law does not provide for the removal of the State Bank Examiner by the Governor, as it does in the case of magistrates.

HYDRICK, J., and SEASE, PRINCE, WILSON, RICE, FRANK B. GARY, and SPAIN, Circuit Judges, concur.

GAGE, Circuit Judge (dissenting). I think the Governor had the power to remove the Bank Examiner. If he had not then in a supposed case, admitted to be flagrant, and touching the most sensitive interests of the people, the Governor, sworn to "take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed," is powerless to execute them. In such a case the Examiner might accept from the banks bribe money; he might refuse to make any examination; he might be convicted of crime; and the Governor would be powerless to act. Such a result ought not to be abided, except upon the plainest mandates of the law, and from which there is no escape. The banks carry the arterial blood of the business world. It ought to reach the people quickly, free from taint of suspicion. A broken bank is like a poisoned spring of water. It affects the whole community, stockholders and strangers. Its evil effects last for a generation. The risk of such a disaster ought not to be taken by that construction of the law which will promote bank failures. If there is an officer in the state who needs to be kept closely at his work, and always on the alert, he is the Bank Examiner. If the Governor is robbed of the power to exact such a performance by the Examiner, and if such exaction be necessary, who will do it? The Constitution only prescribes in the article on Corporations that the General Assembly shall provide by law for the thorough examination of banks. The General Assembly only provided that the Governor shall appoint a competent person to examine the banks. The term of service was fixed at four years. No provision was made in the act, or elsewhere in the statutes, for the removal of such an officer.

The Constitution, it is claimed, limits the power of the Governor. The section relied upon is found in the article (article 15) on impeachments, and is section 4 of that article. It is confessedly irrelevant to this case, unless the Bank Examiner is an executive officer liable to impeachment. It is inconceivable that an officer of that character, created under a general provision of the Constitution, should be subject to trial by impeachment. Such a construction is calculated to bring the administration of law into ridicule. The General Assembly evidently thought that the Examiner might be removed otherwise than by impeachment; for in the first act on the subject another mode of his removal was explicitly prescribed. Code Laws, § 1768 (Civil Code). There is no reason to dogmatically classify every officer of the state as either executive or judicial; and, if there was, the framers of the Constitution never intended that an executive officer like a Bank Examiner was subject to trial by impeachment. They only provided for the impeachment of such executive or judicial officer as was liable to that procedure. Nor did they intend that he could only be removed upon an address of two-thirds of the General Assembly in the event there was not sufficient ground for impeachment. When it has been once admitted that the General Assembly had the power which it undertook to exercise at section 1768 of the Code of Laws, then the article on impeachments has no relevancy to this case. The circumstance that the Constitution has limited the Governor's power to suspend officers guilty of embezzlement (article 4, § 22), and officers of penal and charitable institutions (article 12, § 8), does not warrant the conclusion that it was intended to limit his power in the case at bar. But rather the contrary conclusion is inferable. The circumstance that his power was limited in particular cases implies that in other cases it was not limited.

This case is rather governed by article 3, § 27, of the Constitution. Reference there is made simply to "officers," not executive and judicial officers, and for any neglect of duty by them, wilful or not, they may be removed as the law provides; for the Constitution, they thought, in the article on impeachments provided no remedy—else why this? It must be conceded that there is no statute "law" provided, and the law referred to includes the common law, and must be governed by that law.

The issue, therefore, is this: If such an officer be confessedly guilty of a neglect of duty midway his term of office, is he exempt from removal by any power? For, if not subject to this power, then to none. The question ought to furnish the answer. Admittedly the power to be exercised by the Governor is not arbitrary, nor at will; it must be for cause, and cause will move any man from any office any time.

The next issue is a mixed one of law and fact; and it is, Has the Governor given the Examiner a right to be heard before his removal? Perhaps it was not such a hearing as courts give litigants; but it was a hearing, and it would not be wise for the courts to hamper the executive by set rules to govern him in his execution of the laws. Nor is it wise to weigh too nicely the evidence upon which he acted. If injustice has thereby been done, it will be incomparable to the statement of the law which will paralyze all Governors in their efforts to preserve the fiscal institutions of the state. Finally, in my opinion, this cause is controlled by the case of the State ex rel. Rawlinson v. Ansel, Governor, 76 S. C. 395, 57 S. E. 185, 11 Ann. Cas. 613. The dispensary commissioners were as much executive officers as is the Bank Examiner. The Constitution and the statutes also made provision for them. It is true the statute provided that the Governor might remove them; but, if the case was controlled by the Constitution, in the article on Impeachments, that provision of the statute was of no force. In that case Governor Ansel removed the Commissioners, and his act was sustained.

I am of the opinion that H. W. Fraser is the lawful Bank Examiner of the state.

WATTS, J. I cannot concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice WOODS in this case that the Governor did not have the power to remove Rhame as Bank Examiner, and appoint Fraser in his stead. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that he had the power, both by reason and authority; and, while the cases of Sanders v. Belue, 78 S. C. 177, 58 S. E. 762, and State v. Ansel, 76 S. C. 395, 57 S. E. 185, 11 Ann. Cas. 613, are not exactly decisive of the precise point at issue, yet the inference to be drawn from these cases are that the Governor had ample and plenary power to remove any one appointed by him to office where there was no express provision to the contrary in the act creating the office. I cannot see how the created can be greater than the creator. I think, under the Constitution and statute law of the state, the Governor has the right to remove from office any one appointed by him to office, where there was no express provision in the act creating the office to the contrary, for incapacity, neglect of duty, misconduct, etc. The Governor is charged with executing the laws, and has the innate and inherent power to remove any appointee of his for failure to perform the duties of the office to which he has been appointed, where the act creating the office is worded like the act creating the office of Bank Examiner in this case. The office of Bank Examiner is not, in my opinion, a constitutional office. It is one of immense importance, and he has great powers for good and evil in looking into the banking institutions created under the laws of the state. The Constitutional Convention of 1895 was so careful to guard the interests of depositors in the banks that by a constitutional provision it discriminated against and increased the liabilities of the stockholders in banks more than the stockholders of any other institutions. Money is not deposited in banks alone by persons who are competent to manage their affairs, but a great deal is deposited there under the orders of court, such as estate money, widows' and orphans' money, money in litigation, etc. One of the objects in creating the office of Bank Examiner was that he inspect the condition of the bank's affairs rigidly, and see that the officials of the bank conduct them as the law required. Now, say that a Bank Examiner who is appointed for four years, after he gets his appointment, can neglect his duties, be guilty of misconduct, be incapable, be guilty of the sins of both commission and omission, cannot be removed by the Governor, who appointed him, for any of the reasons enumerated or for willful misconduct, because the act creating the office fixes the tenure and gives no right of removal, is a doctrine that I will never subscribe to until a majority of the court decides to the contrary. We have no binding authority to the contrary; and, even if we did have, I would be in favor of overruling it. In the case at bar it is being decided by the highest court in the state, the court en banc, where the circuit judges have been called to the assistance of the Supreme Court, and, in the absence of any binding authority to the contrary, I do not intend to be bound by any moss-covered, antiquated rules, but be governed by what, in my opinion, is in consonance with reason, common sense, and the exigencies demanded by an enlightened and progressive age. It is far preferable that an office holder, appointed under such a statute as the Bank Examiner, should be removed by an erroneous, arbitrary exercise of power or even by tyrannical abuse of the power on the part of the Governor than to say that he cannot be removed for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty. Even to exercise the powers of removal in this way would be less injurious to good government, and would command more respect for the laws of the state. To hold that he cannot be removed for these causes in my opinion will stagger and surprise citizens of the state and weaken the enforcement of the laws by the executive department, made by the legislative department, and construed by the judicial branch of the government.

As to whether Mr. Rhame could be removed without a hearing, I do not think that question is properly here, as, when the Governor called on him to explain, he contented himself with challenging the right of the Governor to remove him, and he thereby waived his right to be heard.

I think the judgment of the court should be that the defendant, Rhame, be ousted from office.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by E. T. Elliott against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Gibson, of Dillon, and Jas. W. Johnson, of Marion, for appellant. Henry Buck, of Marion, and Henry E. Davis, of Florence, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action for damages by plaintiff against defendant. The complaint alleges that on May 2, 1907, at Norfolk, Va., the plaintiff delivered and defendant received for shipment a car load of mules and horses in consideration of the usual freight charges paid thereon, and the defendant agreed to safely carry and deliver same to plaintiff at Dillon, S. C.; that the defendant did not fulfill and perform its agreement, but, on the contrary, so carelessly and negligently acted and conducted itself in the business of common carrier that one of the horses died, and three others were injured and became diseased to such an extent that he was injured and damaged in the sum of $577.33, and he filed claim for that amount on July 10, 1907. Defendant denied the material allegations of the complaint, and as a further defense set up "that, in consideration of a reduced freight rate granted to plaintiff by this defendant at the time of the shipment alleged in the complaint, plaintiff agreed and contracted with the defendant that, should damages occur to any of the horses or mules contained in the shipment described in the complaint, for which this defendant might be liable, the value at shipping point on the day of shipment should govern the settlement, in which the amount claimed for each horse or mule damaged should not exceed the sum of $75; and this defendant alleges that by reason of said contract, fairly entered into between plaintiff and defendant, for valuable consideration, the plaintiff is estopped from claiming a greater sum than $75 for loss of or damage to either or any of the horses or mules alleged in the complaint to have been damaged, or to have died, and is estopped from setting up the value of any of the said horses or mules at point of destination."

Other defenses were set up, but not relied on at the hearing. The case was first tried before Judge Shipp and a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed. Upon motion of defendant, Judge Shipp granted a new trial, on the ground he had committed error in ruling out volume 13, Interstate Commerce Reports, offered to be introduced in evidence by defendant's counsel. The case was then tried before Judge Prince and a jury in 1911, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff for $275.88, which represented the value of the horses, as limited in the bill of lading, and damage to others and freight and expenses. At the trial plaintiff offered to introduce in evidence volume 13, Interstate Commerce Reports, which Judge Prince ruled out. After verdict, plaintiff appeals and alleges error on part of the presiding judge in 12 exceptions. Exceptions 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 question the correctness of his honor's ruling in holding virtually that Congress has legislated upon this subject, and the Virginia statute will not control. These exceptions are as follows:

Exception 4: "In holding 'that this contract, being for an interstate shipment, is regulated by the Interstate Commerce Law, and not by the laws of Virginia'; whereas it is submitted that, Congress not having legislated on the subject, the Interstate Commerce Law did not apply, and the contract should have been construed according to the laws of the state of Virginia, where the contract was made."

Exception 5: "In not charging the jury that the contract for shipment of the horses in question, having been made in the state of Virginia, was to be construed according to the laws of Virginia, and under the statute law of Virginia and the decisions of its courts a common carrier could not limit the common-law liability for negligence; and therefore the stipulation in the bill of lading in question undertaking to do so was null and void, and the shipper was not bound thereby."

Exception 6: "In charging the jury, 'Now, it is competent for a common carrier to limit its common-law liability to a certain extent,' in the face of the statute law of Virginia, and the decisions of the Virginia courts construing it, which had been introduced in evidence; the contract in question having been entered in the state of Virginia."

Exception 7: "In charging the jury that the stipulation contained in the bill of lading limiting the amount to be recovered in case of loss for each horse to $75, if there was a reduction of the rate of freight caused by that limitation, was valid."

Exception 8: "In not charging the jury that the attempt of the defendant to limit its common-law liability for negligence, as shown by the bill of lading introduced in evidence, was null and void under the laws of the state of Virginia, where the contract in question was entered into, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of the damages sustained, not exceeding the amount claimed, provided he had sustained loss and damage through the negligence of defendant."

Exception 9: "In not charging the jury that they should disregard that part of the bill of lading which undertook to limit the defendant's liability for damages caused by its negligence."

Exception 10: "In not charging the jury that, even if the Interstate Commerce Law was applicable, the stipulation in the bill of lading undertaking to limit the defendant's common-law liability for damages caused by its negligence was void, for the reason that the amount fixed in the bill of lading does not purport to be an agreed valuation, but was fixed arbitrarily by the defendant, without reference to the real value of the horses in question."

[1] There is no question, if Congress has legislated upon the question we are now considering, that the state statute of Virginia must give way, and, if the act in question of the Virginia Legislature burdens interstate commerce, that it must also give way;

but if Congress has not legislated upon this precise question, and the Virginia act does not burden interstate commerce, then this appeal must be determined by the Virginia statute. The Virginia statute is as follows: "Whenever any property is received by a common carrier to be transferred from one place to another, within or without this state, or when a railroad or other transportation company issues its receipt or bills of lading, in this state, the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing such bill of lading shall be liable for any loss or damage or injury to such property caused by its negligence or the negligence of any common carrier, railroad or transportation company operating within any territory or state of the United States to which such property may be delivered, or over whose lines such property may pass; and the fact of loss or damage in such case shall itself be prima facie evidence of negligence, and the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing any such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover in a proper action the amount of any loss, damage or injury it may be required to pay the owner of such property from the common carrier, railroad or transportation company aforesaid through whose negligence the loss, damage or injury may be sustained. No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into. The receipt of goods destined to a point beyond the line or route of the initial carrier or the acceptance of through freight on same shall be deemed to be a contract for carriage to ultimate destination and delivery of such property at that point. And unless the common carrier, railroad or transportation company first receiving such property shall, within a reasonable time after loss or damage thereto, pay to the consignor, his agent or assignee the amount or damage sustained thereby, then such consignor, his agent or assignee may by proper action recover of such common carrier, railroad or transportation company first receiving such property the amount of such loss or damage. No agreement made by a transportation company for exemption from liability for injury or loss occasioned by its own neglect or misconduct as a common carrier shall be valid." Acts of Assembly of Virginia, Extra Session 1902-04, p. 960, pars. 24 and 25 (Code 1904, § 1294).

The provision of the Virginia Code has been construed by the Court of Appeals of that state in the case of Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. v. Beasley, 104 Va. 788, 52 S. E. 566, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, wherein this language is used: "The conclusion of the whole matter may, in our view, be summed up as follows: At common law the carrier could not by contract limit or restrict his liability for injury or loss caused by negligence of himself or servants. The object of the Legislature was to give to this recognized, common-law principle the force of a statute; and it would, indeed, be a singular outcome of an effort on the part of the Legislature to give an added sanction to the common law if by the ingenious construction the power to limit should be deduced from the prohibition to exempt."

That court had the right to and did interpret the Code of Virginia; and unless the Congress of the United States has sought to prohibit a carrier engaged in interstate transportation from limiting, or has permitted a carrier to limit, its liability to a stipulated valuation, or has legislated on the precise question at issue, the state of Virginia may require common carriers, although engaged in interstate commerce, to answer for the whole loss resulting from their negligence, whether there is a contract or not.

The sections of the act of Congress to regulate commerce (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8154]), and the act known as the Elkins Act (Act Feb. 19, 1903, c. 708, 32 Stat. 847 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1309]), that can have any bearing in this case deal exclusively with the matter of rates and rebates; and what is known as the Carmack Amendment to that act (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 20, pars. 11, 12, 34 Stat. 595 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1307]), deals with the right of a common carrier to relieve itself of liability for the acts of its connecting carriers, who in effect are made its agents, instead of the shipper.

The purpose of the Interstate Commerce Act is stated in Armour Packing Co. v. United States, 209 U. S. 56, 28 Sup. Ct. 428, 52 L. Ed. 681, Texas & Pacific Railway Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U. S. 428, 27 Sup. Ct. 350, 51 L. Ed. 553, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. 297, 84 L. R. A. (N. S.) 671, all of which cases point to the fact that Congress' great purpose was to prevent unjust and unreasonable rates, prevent favoritism, secure equality, require publication of rates and tariff, and to give all the same opportunity to know what the rates were, and to have the equal benefit of them. These cases point to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Act deals primarily with rates and discriminations; and the right of a common carrier to limit its liability by special contract is not included, either expressly or by implication.

In our opinion, the acts of Congress have not legislated, or attempted to legislate, upon the subject dealt with by the Virginia statute; and the Virginia statute has been construed by the Virginia court, and should govern in this case.

This is not in conflict with the principle as laid down in the case of Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Co. v. Hefley, 158 U. S.

98, 15 Sup. Ct. 802, 89 L. Ed. 910, as there the state and federal statutes operated upon the same subject-matter, both dealing with rates and prescribing different rules; the federal statute being within the competency of Congress to enact, the state statute had to give way.

The respondents rely upon the case of Southern Railway Co. v. Reid, 222 U. S. 424, 82 Sup. Ct. 140, 56 L. Ed. 257, decided in January last by Supreme Court of the United States. We do not think this case controls the case at bar. A careful examination of the entire opinion will show that it was on the subject of rate making and the regulation of interstate commerce. It holds that Congress had taken control of rate making; and when the Legislature of North Carolina undertook to penalize a carrier for not receiving freight intended for interstate shipment, when no rate had been established, it was invading the field already covered by an act of Congress, and its action was void.

[2] Each state may determine what powers may be possessed by corporations organized under its authority, and what effect shall attach to acts done by such corporations beyond their powers. That is a question of state policy, and therefore a matter of local and not general law. Anglo-American Land, Mortgage & Agency Co. v. Lombard, 132 Fed. 721, 68 O. C. A. 89. The Virginia statute does not attempt to undertake to deal with rates. It deals with contracts. It does not attempt to regulate interstate commerce, but prohibits, under the police powers of the state, the carrier from making a contract which it regards as contrary to public policy. It forbids a certain kind of contract, and stops. This question has been settled in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 18 Sup. Ct. 289, 42 L. Ed. 688; and Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Hughes, 191 U. S. 477, 24 Sup. Ct. 132, 48 L. Ed. 268.

[3] The case should have been determined by the law of Virginia, where the contract of shipment was made. Frasier v. Railway Co., 73 S. C. 140, 52 S. E. 964; Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 406, 412, 23 L. Ed. 245; Walker v. Telegraph Co., 75 S. C. 526, 56 S. E. 38; Gilliland & Gaffney v. So. Ry., 85 S. C. 30, 67 S. E. 20, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106, 137 Am. St. Rep. 861.

[4] Even if the act of Congress was intended to supersede all state legislation on the question under consideration in the case at bar, it would have no application, for the reason that the defendant failed to allege or prove that it had complied with the requirements of the act of Congress. See Blitch v. Railroad, 87 S. C. 107, 69 S. E. 16; Hardaway v. Railroad, 90 S. C. 475, 73 S. E. 1020. The case is therefore governed by the statute of Virginia and the construction of its state courts.

His honor was in error in holding that Congress had legislated upon the subject, and that the Virginia statute did not control. The exceptions raising this question must be sustained. It is unnecessary to consider the other exceptions.

Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

WOODS, HYDRICK, and FRASER, JJ., concur.

GARY, C. J. I concur for the reason stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice WATTS, that, even if the act of Congress was intended to supersede all state legislation on the question under consideration, it would have no application, for the reason that the defendant failed to allege or prove that it had complied with the requirements of the act of Congress.

LELAND v. MORRISON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 1, 1912.)

1. REFERENCE (§ 63*)—DUTY OF MASTER—TAKING EVIDENCE.

A master is bound to take and report all testimony offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 94, 95; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

On appeal from a decree after a reference to a master, the trial judge will be presumed to have based his conclusions on competent evidence only, though the master reported incompetent evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3728, 3762-3771; Dec. Dig. § 981.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 37*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE—PAROL EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed absolute on its face is in reality a mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 97-107; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 901*)—REVIEW—BURDEN TO SHOW ERROR.

On appeal from a decree, the burden is on appellant to show that the trial judge erred in his findings of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3670; Dec. Dig. § 901.*]

5. MORTGAGES (§ 139*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE.

Where a deed, though absolute in form, is shown to have been intended as a mortgage, it will remain as security until foreclosed, unless the grantor deprives himself of the interest he has in the property by some subsequent conveyance or relinquishment of interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 278; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

6. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE—LACHES.

Suit brought January 21, 1911, to declare a deed absolute in form to be a mortgage was not barred by laches, though the deed was dated October 24, 1894.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by H. G. Leland against J. B. Morrison. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the decree entered by the trial court:

"The object of the action is to declare an instrument of writing to be a mortgage, which on its face appears to be a deed absolute. The action was begun in January, 1911.

"The defendant married the plaintiff's sister, and thus there is added to the issue an element of delicacy and difficulty.

"A history of the transaction is this: In December, 1890, the plaintiff bought from one Sanders about 2,000 acres of land near McClellanville, and known as the 'Doe Hall' plantation. The price agreed to be paid was $6,000, but the plaintiff paid down only $1,200, and made a mortgage for the balance of $4,800. Of the cash payment, one-half thereof was borrowed from one Walker. On February 2, 1892, the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to sell him a one-half interest in the land. The agreement was reduced to writing, and it recites that the balance of $4,800 was due and payable in four equal annual installments of $1,200 each, payable January 1, 1892, January 1, 1893, January 1, 1894, and January 1, 1895.

"The agreement further recites that of the $1,200 which fell due January 1, 1892, the defendant had paid $600, and he agreed to pay $600 each year thereafter.

"The agreement further provided that, in the event either party to it should fail to meet his own annual payments of $600, then the other party might meet it and hold the interest of that party as security for its return.

"January 6, 1893, the plaintiff executed to the defendant a mortgage on the said plantation to secure a debt expressed to be $2,200. October 24, 1894, the plaintiff executed to the defendant an absolute deed to the said plantation. The consideration expressed in the deed was $3,000. The deed recites that there was then due on the purchase-money mortgage to Sanders the sum of $1,800 and interest.

"The same day the deed was made the defendant addressed to the plaintiff a letter, which is the basis of this action. That letter declares that upon the payment by Leland to Morrison, on or before December 1, 1896, of one-half of all such amounts as Morrison may have paid, or may thereafter pay, on the purchase price of the said plantation, with interest on such payments at the rate of 7 per cent., then Morrison would convey to Leland a one-half interest in the plantation. This letter and the deed are in the handwriting of the Honorable Henry A. M. Smith.

"January 3, 1894, Leland and Morrison leased the plantation to one C. Henry Leland for turpentine uses, and they were to receive therefor $140. March 11, 1895, Morrison leased to H. G. Leland the same premises for the same uses and for the same price. January 29, 1896, Morrison leased to H. G. Leland the same premises for turpentine uses, and for cultivation in agriculture, for the price of $140 for the turpentine and for 800 pounds lint cotton for farm cultivation.

"December 16, 1896, Morrison addressed to Leland a letter, and therein made a statement of the account betwixt them. The plaintiff largely rests his case on the terms of this letter. Therein Morrison charges Leland with one-half the principal of the purchase price and interest thereon, and credits him with those sums received by him from Leland in 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896 under the aforesaid lease. The general statement of the account is thus:

To sums paid by Morrison on price & taxes	$2,816 00
To balance due Sanders on price....	1,008 00
	$3,824 00
By cash paid by Leland.....	741 00
To balance due by Leland to Morrison	$3,083 00

"In the letter Morrison wrote that Leland would owe him that much, 'should we go back to the agreement of 1892,' which agreement was expressed in the Smith letter. In the letter Morrison also wrote: 'Will it be possible for you to sell your half for over $3,000 and save anything for yourself? Let me hear from you at once.' The record does not disclose a written answer to this letter of December 16, 1896.

"Mr. Morrison took exclusive possession of the plantation in 1897, and has made valuable improvements upon it. He has erected thereon a mansion house worth $3,000 or $4,000. He has felled trees, drained the land, and brought it into cultivation. At the outstart there was only about 100 acres of arable land. Now there are some 225 acres open to cultivation. Mr. Morrison has underdrained the land at a cost of $1,000, and he has fenced it and built tenant houses and barns. He has cut 3,000,000 feet of timber worth $3,000.

"It is conceded that in 1890 the premises were barely worth $6,000, if as much as that. As a part of the history of the country, it is known that lands throughout the whole state began to rise in value about 1900, and since then have steadily appreciated. Now the plaintiff fixes the value of Doe Hall at $20,000. The defendant fixes the value at not less than $10,000. I have no doubt but that fact, in a measure, accounts for this controversy, both the demand and the refusal of the demand.

"The parties submitted their differences to a friendly board of arbitrators; but its conclusion is not set up as a bar, and throws no light on the issues now made.

"The plaintiff concedes that one-half the land belongs to the defendant; that his one-half is liable to contribute a moiety of the purchase price of $6,000; and that the defendant is entitled to have the improvements he has made on the premises, but that the defendant is chargeable with the timber he gathered from the premises and for the rents which he received in excess of his share.

"The issue of fact which lies at the threshold of the controversy is the meaning of the Smith letter. The defendant's contention is that this letter amounted only to an option, extended by Morrison to Leland, to buy a one-half interest in the premises at any time before December 1, 1896. The plaintiff's contention is that it was more than that, and was a declaration, in effect, which modified the title, made at the same sitting and absolute on its face.

"If the Smith letter is considered in connection with the fact that Leland was the owner at outstart, that he first made a contract to let Morrison have a one-half interest, that he thereafter mortgaged the land to Morrison to save him from loss, that the last payment to Sanders was due January 1, 1895, that after December 1, 1896, and on December 16, 1896, Morrison acknowledged in writing that Leland was the owner of one-half, then the conclusion is irresistible that the two men were tenants in common, each of a half. The fact is fixed, not altogether, it is true, but in large measure, by the writings of the defendant, and there is no escape from that conclusion.

"Beyond question, on December 16, 1896, by the defendant's own confession in the letter of that date, Leland had then the full right to pay $3,083 and accept a deed for a one-half interest in the land. That was 16 days after the expiration of the alleged option. It is true that defendant now denies that Leland had this right of redemption; but the letter fixes the fact against the present denial, and the present denial gives pregnant meaning to the letter.

"If the defendant had that right on that day, when and how did he lose it?

"Rights are reciprocal. The defendant then had the right to sell Leland's one-half and have the proceeds applied to the payment of his half of the Sanders debt, and have the plaintiff's equity barred. The defendant had the right for 20 years thereafter. The lapse of that time alone would have defeated the right. The plaintiff had the corresponding right to wait 14 years thereafter to enforce his right. The long lapse of time, to wit, 14 years, operates only to throw a doubt over the fact of plaintiff's contention; but the proper evidence dissolves the doubt.

"The defendant objected to the parol testimony of the plaintiff, which tends to prove that the deed was not intended to be absolute. I think the testimony was competent. It does not vary the terms of the written instrument; but it tends to well explain and confirm the evidence of all the writings together that the parties intended that Leland should be half owner of the plantation. Shute v. Shute, 82 S. C. 264, 64 S. E. 145.

"The defendant relies upon a verbal and strict construction of the letter of December 16, 1896, to show that Morrison was not fully minded to go back to the contract of 1892, and that at best he proposed a case for Leland's action on the hypothesis that they did go back to the contract of 1892. But the letter in its entirety—all of it—proves that Morrison was there mindful of Leland's right to pay up and take legal title. And this view is strengthened when the history of the transaction from first to last is recalled.

"There is no room to apply the defense of estoppel to the plaintiff. And I do not understand that such a defense is seriously, if at all, made. But if it is, the testimony does not sustain it. Leland had no knowledge that Morrison did not have. Morrison had done no act, at Leland's suggestion or acquiescence, which will work injury to him. Morrison has not been misled. If anybody has been injured by the transaction, it is Leland. The improvements made by Morrison were made on his own land, and of right.

"Now, am I able to sustain the plea of laches? That doctrine is applied to prevent the commission of a wrong.

"The plaintiff's long delay in prosecuting his right may, in a measure, be explained. Some men are slow at any time to take action. They procrastinate, and months lengthen into years, and years into decades. And the parties are akin, and either of them might well abhor a resort to the courts of the county to settle their differences.

"At the outstart the land was of small value; timber growing upon it was not then exploited; the rise in value was gradual and constant, so that at last it grew to be an estate.

"But above all things no harm can come to Morrison by granting the relief sought. He cannot lose a cent. He testified that the improvements, which cost him some $5,000, are on such part of the whole as may be set aside to him when partition be had. He is entitled to have that remedy to protect him from loss.

"He is furthermore entitled to have Leland's half interest first subjected to the payment of all sums which Morrison has paid, and which Leland ought to have paid. When that has been done, if there yet be a surplus, then Leland is entitled to it. It seems to me that this is complete equity.

"Finally, the defendant contends that in the making of the mortgage and the deed by Leland to Morrison there was present in Leland's mind a fraudulent intent to circumvent his creditors and sequester his property from their reach. If that be so, then Leland is not entitled, as matter of course, to the remedy he now seeks.

"But the testimony does not merely establish so grave an issue. There is no proof that Leland is now insolvent, or that his creditors have not been paid, or that they were hindered, or that he has the intent which moves men to deceive. He was embarrassed. He did prefer Morrison, and the preference was accepted; and, so far as the evidence shows, the preference was lawful.

"I think all the issues have been thus passed upon; and I conclude that the prayer of the complaint must be allowed.

"I shall not undertake to formulate a technical order for relief, but shall remand the case to the master to take an account of what may be due by Leland on the purchase price of the plantation; to ascertain what Leland is chargeable with while he was in possession; to ascertain what Morrison is chargeable with while he was in possession; to ascertain the value of the timber cut by Morrison, and if he is liable therefor, or for any part of it; to ascertain what rents Morrison got, and if he is liable to Leland for any part thereof. It is so ordered."

Wm. Henry Parker, of Charleston, for appellant. W. A. Holman, of Charleston, and R. C. Holman, of Barnwell, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff against the defendant on January 21, 1911, and was in a general nature an action to declare as a mortgage a deed, absolute in form, conveying realty and transferring personality, dated October 24, 1894; for an accounting of the rents and profits of the realty and a partition and division of the realty as between tenants in common. The answer denies that there was any understanding between the parties that the deed was a mortgage, and alleges that the deed was a deed absolute, and the consideration an existing indebtedness between the parties, and alleges facts setting up the defenses of laches and estoppel; also invokes the equity of the court not to aid the plaintiff in enforcing an alleged agreement by way of secret trust, where the plaintiff's purpose was to sequester property from his creditors. The cause was heard by his honor, Judge Gage, on the pleadings and testimony taken before the master, who filed his decree in September, 1911, granting the relief asked for in the complaint. Thereupon defendant appealed, and asks reversal of the same.

For a proper understanding, the decree of Judge Gage should be set out in the report of the case. The exceptions are 25 in number. Exceptions 1, 2, 3, and 4 question the correctness of his ruling in holding the deed of October 24, 1896, to be a mortgage, and not a deed absolute. Exceptions 5, 6, and 7 in holding certain parol testimony competent and admitting the same. Exceptions 8, 9, 10, and 11 question his honor's construction and findings as to the effect of certain letters and leases introduced in evidence. Exceptions 12, 13, and 14 question his holding and finding as to plaintiff's right to redeem, and that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply under the facts of the case, and the testimony does not sustain the doctrine of estoppel. The other exceptions complain of the finding of facts by the judge, and except to pretty much all of his findings of fact and his conclusions of law. We will not undertake to discuss the exceptions in the case seriatim, but will try to dispose of them under general heads.

The pivotal point in the case hinges upon the question of law whether the conveyance of Leland to Morrison, in October, 1884, was what it purported to be, a deed absolute, or a mortgage; and, if it was intended as a mortgage, has Leland by his conduct and acts so conducted himself during this time as to mislead Morrison to his prejudice, and to be guilty of such laches as to defeat his contention?

[1, 2] We will first consider and dispose of the exceptions which complain of error on the part of his honor in admitting parol testimony. It will be borne in mind that the evidence in this case was taken before the master, and, under the law, it is his duty to take all of the testimony offered and report it to the court. Even if incompetent testimony was in evidence, as this was not a jury trial, but a trial before the judge, it is reasonable to suppose his honor, in reaching his conclusions as to the facts of the case, did not base his decision upon anything but competent, relevant testimony.

[3] There is no doubt that testimony is competent to show that a deed, absolute on its face, is in reality a mortgage, and that this may be shown by parol evidence. Brownlee v. Martin, 21 S. C. 399; Tant v. Guess, 37 S. C. 489, 16 S. E. 472; Cresswell v. Smith, 61 S. C. 579, 39 S. E. 757.

[4] His honor committed no error in admitting this testimony; he having been satisfied by all of the competent testimony in the case that the purported deed was intended by the parties to be a mortgage, and not a deed, and this being conclusively proven by the letter of Morrison to Leland, dated October 24, 1894, as to the exceptions of his honor's finding of fact in reference thereto. For the reasons stated by the circuit judge, this court is satisfied with his findings. "It was incumbent on the appellant to satisfy this court by the preponderance of the evidence that his honor, the presiding judge, erred in his findings of fact, which he has failed to do." Hickson Lumber Co. v. Stallings, 91 S. C. 473, 74 S. E. 1072. These exceptions are overruled.

[5] Having concurred with his honor in his finding that the deed was intended as a mortgage, we will next consider: Has Leland so conducted himself as to have his claim that it was intended as a mortgage to be defeated by laches, estoppel, or any other cause by the action and conduct of Leland during this time?

There is no doubt that where a deed, though absolute in form, is shown to be intended as a security for the payment for a debt, it will always remain a security until foreclosed by some judicial proceeding, or unless the party deprives himself of the interest he has in the property by some subsequent conveyance or relinquishment of interest.

In Walling v. Aiken, McMul. Eq. 18, the court says: "We concur very fully with the presiding chancellor that the conveyances of the lands by Neely and Kennedy, connected with the written agreement between the complainant and the defendant, constitute a mortgage or security. And it is the well-known rule of the court that that which was originally intended as a security shall never be turned into an absolute conveyance. Even if it be expressly stipulated that if the money be not paid at a given day the title shall be absolute, and the estate irredeemable, this stipulation operates nothing. And it is equally incompetent to stipulate from what source the funds to redeem shall be derived. The mortgagee is considered in this court only as a creditor; and all that he is entitled to is his money, coming at what time (within the known limits), or from what source, it may."

In Brownlee v. Martin, 21 S. C. 400, this language is used by Chief Justice McIver: "The law looks with jealousy and suspicion upon all dealings between the mortgagee and the mortgagor from the supposed influence which the former has over the latter. If, therefore, a deed, absolute on its face, is shown (as it may be shown by parol evidence) to have been executed merely as a security for a debt, it will operate only as a mortgage, and it cannot be converted by any subsequent written agreement into an absolute conveyance, unless such subsequent agreement is based upon a sufficient consideration, and is shown to have been fairly made, without undue influence by the creditor; and the burden of showing this is upon the mortgagee. In other words, it must amount to a sale of the equity of redemption, fairly made, upon sufficient consideration. These views are fully supported by authority. Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 139 [13 L. Ed. 927], recognized in Lee v. Lee, 11 Rich. Eq. 582, and followed by Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. 289, [15 L. Ed. 644]; Villa v. Rodriguez, 12 Wall. 323 [20 L. Ed. 406]; Morgan v. Shinn, 15 Wall. 105 [21 L. Ed. 87]; Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332 [24 L. Ed. 775]; Brick v. Brick, 98 U. S. 514 [25 L. Ed. 256]." This doctrine is adhered to and reaffirmed in the case of Tant v. Guess, 37 S. C. 497, 16 S. E. 472.

Applying the facts of the case to these decisions, the irresistible conclusion is that Morrison only held one-half of the land as security for a debt; and that he and Leland are tenants in common of the land in dispute, unless Leland is estopped by lapse of time or some other good cause from asserting his right to have the deed in question declared a mortgage or security to one-half interest.

Jones on Mortgages (volume 1, § 330) says: "Delay in asserting an absolute deed to be a mortgage has not the same effect upon the rights of the parties that attends delay in seeking to enforce, in equity, the performance of an executory contract. Once a mortgage, always a mortgage, is the maxim of the law; and payment does not stand on the footing of performance in equity. The character of the deed being fixed by the evidence as conditional, the mortgagor has the same time to make payment that any other debtor has. The right to foreclose and the right to redeem are reciprocal; and if one is barred the other is also barred. The only effect that delay can have in such a case is in its bearing on the primary question of mortgage or no mortgage. The poverty of the mortgagor, and many other circumstances, may sufficiently explain this. No lapse of time short of that which is sufficient to bar the action will prevent the introduction of parol evidence to show a deed was 'intended as a mortgage.'"

In Anding v. Davis, 38 Miss. 574, 77 Am. Dec. 653, we find: "Parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed, absolute on its face, was intended by the parties to have operation only as a mortgage; and it is immaterial in this respect, as between the parties, whether the debt intended to be secured was then contracted by the mortgagor, or was contracted for the purpose of securing a pre-existing debt. Complainant's right, if competent in its inception to be established by parol evidence, will not be lost by any lapse of time not sufficient to bar it by the statute."

[8] Under the law of this state, the life of a mortgage is 20 years. Any time during that period, the owner of it has the right to foreclose it; and if the statute of limitations does not bar the right to foreclose it would not bar the right to redeem. The right to foreclose and the right to redeem are reciprocal. When the right of one exists, the other exists. When one is barred, the other is barred. The questions presented by these exceptions are dependent upon the findings of fact. For the reasons stated by his honor, the circuit judge, this court is satisfied with his finding of facts, mentioned in the assignment of error, and these exceptions are overruled. These conclusions practically dispose of the whole case; and, while the testimony shows that Morrison behaved in the most lenient and forbearing manner with Leland and treated him with the greatest consideration, and used his credit by borrowing money, when it was hard to do, and befriended him in every way, and patiently tried to get the matter adjusted on the most generous terms and honestly thought later that he had an absolute deed to the land, we are constrained to hold that the deed was a mortgage, and that Leland has the right to redeem; that Morrison should have foreclosed, and his leniency, forbearance, and generosity has been his undoing.

This court is satisfied with the finding of facts, set out in the assignment of error on the part of his honor, the circuit judge, that the court will not aid the plaintiff in enforcing an alleged agreement, by way of secret trust, where the purpose of the plaintiff was to sequester property from his creditors, for the reasons stated by the circuit judge. We may say that the appellant has failed to convince this court that there was error in the particulars mentioned in the other exceptions. All exceptions are therefore overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur. FRASER, J., did not sit in this case.

MARTIN et al. v. BERKELEY COUNTY COURT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Sept. 7, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 61*) — LICENSE — MANDAMUS.

Section 46, c. 6, Acts of 1909, gives the council of the city of Martinsburg sole power to grant or refuse license to sell intoxicating liquors, in the city or within two miles of its limits, and when it has granted such license the act is mandatory upon the county court to grant a state license.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 60-62; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

Application of T. W. Martin and others for writ of mandamus to the County Court of Berkeley County. Writ granted.

Faulkner, Walker & Woods and H. H. Emmert, all of Martinsburg, for petitioners. A. B. Noll and A. C. Nadenbousch, both of Martinsburg, and Marshall McCormick, of Roanoke, Va., for respondent.

BRANNON, P. On the 10th day of June, 1912, the council of the city of Martinsburg granted to T. W. Martin a license to sell at retail spirituous liquors at the Berkeley Hotel in that city. On the 11th day of July, 1912, said Martin presented to the county court of Berkeley county a certified copy of the order of the city council granting such license and asked the court to grant him a state license to sell such liquors at said hotel. The county court entered an order stating such application to it for such state license, and the council grant, and stating that Martin had paid the tax and complied with all the requirements of law in relation to the matter, and refusing to grant such state license. Said Martin now asks this court to grant him a writ of mandamus against the county court requiring it to grant such state license.

The case involves the construction of section 46 of chapter 6 of the Acts of the Legislature of 1909, the present charter of Martinsburg. That section says that whenever anything for which a state license is required to be done within that city its authorities may require a license. A power of revocation of license is also given the city. This gives the licensing power to the city, indicating intent to give this populous, important municipality an autonomy or self-governing power as to this matter. This clause is followed by the language: "And no license to sell strong or spirituous liquors, or wine, or beer, ale, porter or drinks of like nature, within said city, or within two miles of the corporate limits thereof, shall be granted by the county court of Berkeley county, unless the person applying therefor shall produce to said county court the certificate of the council of the city that said council has granted a city license authorizing said person to sell as aforesaid; and upon the production of said certificate before said county court, said court shall grant a state license to sell as aforesaid to said person, upon his compliance with all the requirements of law in relation thereto."

Here is plainly further manifested a purpose to vest in the city the sole power to grant or refuse such license. We do not deem it necessary to further discuss the case, or go over the numerous points made in argument, as we are of the unanimous opinion that this case is ruled by the case of Ward & Co. v. County Court, 51 W. Va. 102, 41 S. E. 154.

Therefore we award the mandamus.

ROME INS. CO. v. THOMAS. (No. 3,833.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

While declarations of an alleged agent are not admissible to prove agency, still the error of permitting a witness to testify that a named person said he was the agent of another is immaterial, when the statement is made in connection with the recital of such facts and circumstances as would fully authorize the conclusion that he did in fact sustain that relation to the alleged principal. Where the extraneous circumstances, independently of and without regard to the declarations of the agent himself, conclusively tend to establish the fact of his agency, his declarations, though inadmissible if standing alone, may, as part of the res gestæ of the transaction, be considered.

2. TRIAL (§ 261*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

A trial judge is not required to perfect a request which is incorrect, and, if the charge as requested is defective, he may refuse instructions upon that subject altogether, unless the instruction relates to a matter so material to the issue as that, even in the absence of a request, it would be error to omit to charge the jury upon the subject.

3. INSURANCE (§ 378*)—AVOIDANCE—ESTOPPEL—KNOWLEDGE OF AGENT.

As to all matters affecting conditions precedent to a contract of insurance, the knowledge of the agent of the insurance company is imputed to the company, and the company is thereby charged with notice of any facts, affecting the risk about to be assumed, which may have come to or rest in the knowledge of its agent, and which good faith in the discharge of his duty as agent would require him to disclose to his principal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 968-974; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 378*)—AVOIDANCE—ESTOPPEL—KNOWLEDGE OF AGENT.

If, before or at the time of execution of the contract of insurance, the insurance company's agent who procured the contract had notice that the assured was not in good health, but, on the contrary, was suffering from an incurable disease, and nevertheless the policy was issued and delivered, and the premium accepted thereon, the insurer will be presumed to have waived a condition avoiding the policy in the event of ill health of the assured at the time of its delivery, and will be estopped from setting up that provision of the policy in defense to an action upon the contract of insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 968-974; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

Error from City Court of Columbus; G. Y. Tigner, Judge.

Action by Hazel Thomas, by next friend, against the Rome Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. R. Goetchius and Chapman & Howard, all of Columbus, for plaintiff in error. D. L. Parmer and E. H. Rawls, both of Columbus, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Hazel Thomas, by her next friend, brought suit against the Rome Insurance Company for $180, beside interest, claimed to be due her as beneficiary of an insurance policy upon the life of her mother. It was admitted that the policy was issued by the company and the premiums paid up to and including September 26, 1910, that the insured died on October 31, 1910, and that demand for payment had been made by the beneficiary, and had been refused. There was no contradiction of the evidence to the effect that the application was taken by one J. E. Sharpe, who was an agent of the company; that the policy was issued August 1, 1910; that the premiums were regularly paid when due, up to and including September 26, 1910; that the next premium was due October 3, 1910; that the insured died of pellagra, and had pellagra two years before her death, and had been attended by physicians for it, but that she was not afflicted with any other disease or complaint. There was sharp conflict in the testimony as to whether the agent, Sharpe, had notice at the time he took the policy that the insured had pellagra. The evidence was also in conflict as to whether the assured signed the application and the physician's certificate. There was positive testimony in behalf of the plaintiff that the assured did not sign either the application or the medical examiner's report—that the signatures there appearing were not her genuine signatures. The defendant produced evidence to the effect that its agent had no notice of the ill health of the assured, and that no other agent of the company had any reason to suspect that the assured was not in good health. The defendant contended that the policy lapsed for non-payment of premiums, and the evidence as to this point was in conflict. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff was that the insured died on October 28, 1910, while there was testimony in behalf of the defendant that she did not die until October 31, 1910. The clause of the policy pertinent to this issue was that, "should the death of the insured occur while any premium is in arrears not exceeding four weeks, the company will nevertheless pay the policy, subject to its conditions." Under the defendant's evidence if the insured died October 31st, the policy had lapsed, because the premiums were then more than four weeks in arrears. But under the plaintiff's testimony that the insured died October 28th the policy had not lapsed. In addition to this, the plaintiff introduced testimony to the effect that payment of the accrued premiums was tendered on October 18th, and was refused by an agent of the company, who was authorized to receive them. Summarizing the material issues of fact, only three were presented: (1) Did the company, at the time the application was taken, have notice that the insured had pellagra? (2) Did the insured die on October 28, or on October 31, 1910? (3) Did the insured make any material misrepresentations with intent to defraud the insurance company by inducing it to issue the policy? The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff as to each of these issues was sufficient to sustain as matter of fact the finding of the jury; and therefore the question as to whether the trial court erred in refusing a new trial depends upon the general assignment of error; that the verdict is contrary to law, and those specific assignments of error in which complaint is made that the court erred in the admission of certain testimony, in instructions to the jury, and in refusing to instruct as requested.

[1] 1. It is insisted that the court erred in permitting the witness Ellene Thomas, over the objection of the defendant that agency could not legally be shown by proof of declarations of the alleged agent, and that the proposed evidence was hearsay, to testify: "I offered to pay certain premiums to a man who said his name was Wright and was an agent of the company, but he declined to receive the unpaid premiums. He said the policy had lapsed." Proof of agency cannot be made by mere declarations of the alleged agent, and, if the evidence in question stood alone, the objection would be meritorious. The court, however, stated that the testimony was admitted to be considered in connection with other testimony in the case, to enable the jury, upon consideration of the testimony as a whole, to determine whether Wright was the agent, and that the agency could not be proved by declarations of the alleged agent alone. By reference to the brief of testimony it appears that the man who said his name was Wright, and who another witness said was Wright, came to the home of this witness in response to a request by telephone to the insurance company to send an agent to collect premiums. In response to this telephone message two men (one of them the man who said his name was Wright) appeared. They stated they had come in response to the telephone message. They asked for the beneficiary's receipt book. They had the company's books and receipt book. They examined the beneficiary's receipt book, and they then declined to accept any premium on the policy, stating as the reason that the policy had lapsed. We agree with the trial judge that these circumstances were sufficient to authorize the jury to conclude that Wright was an agent of the company. His statement that he was an agent, in connection with the fact that he came in response to a telephonic request for an agent, was at least a part of the res gestæ of the transaction, and so illustrative of the other circumstances to which the witness testified as to be practically inseparable from them. Even if the objection to that portion of the testimony in which the witness alleged that Wright said he was an agent should have been sustained, the fact that a man who had the company's books and receipt book, after examining the receipts for premiums which had been paid upon the policy, said that the policy had lapsed, should certainly not have been excluded; and nothing is better settled than that when an objection is offered to certain testimony as a whole, and any portion of it is competent, the objection should not be sustained. It is the duty of the counsel in making his objection, and not the duty of the court in passing upon it, to separate the wheat from the chaff.

While declarations of an alleged agent are not admissible to prove agency, still the error of permitting a witness to testify that a named person said he was the agent of another is immaterial when the statement is made in connection with the recital of such facts and circumstances as would fully authorize the conclusion that he did in fact sustain that relation to the alleged principal. Where the extraneous circumstances, independently of and without regard to the declarations of the agent himself, conclusively tend to establish the fact of his agency, his declarations, though inadmissible if standing alone, may be considered as part of the res gestæ of the transaction.

[2] 2. It is insisted that the court erred in failing to charge the jury, as requested in writing, that "whatever you may find as to the representations of the assured to the agent of the defendant, if any were made, as to pellagra, you may also go further, and inquire if the assured did or did not make any representations to the agent as to not having been attended by a physician for a serious disease preceding the date of the policy. If the facts show that she had been so attended, and she suppressed that fact when asked with reference thereto, then, under the terms of the policy, she could not recover." It is insisted that the court's failure to give this charge was error and harmful to the defendant, because the company's answer specifically set up the defense that in the written application of the assured she had been asked if she had been attended by a physician during the period, and she answered "No," and that the failure of the court to give this specific charge as requested deprived the defendant of one of its main grounds of defense, and was particularly harmful for the additional reason that there was no testimony that any agent of the insurance company had ever been informed that the assured had been attended by a physician for pellagra during the year previous to the application, or at any time; and, under the express terms of the contract of insurance, the policy should be avoided. Of course, a trial judge is never required to comply with a request to the judge which does not correctly present the law, nor is he required to perfect the charge, so as to render it appropriate to the issues involved. For this reason, we think the court did not err in refusing the request to charge as presented. But there is an additional reason why the request was properly refused. To have given the instruction in the form requested, the court would necessarily have taken away from the jury the right to pass upon the materiality of the representations, and would have permitted the jury to consider them without any reference to whether they were made with intent to deceive and defraud the company. There was evidence to the effect that the agent of the company was informed at the time he filled in the application that the insured had pellagra. If this evidence was believed by the jury, it would seem that it would be immaterial whether the applicant stated that the assured had been treated by a physician or not, because all the testimony was to the effect that pellagra is an incurable disease, and the purpose of the inquiry as to the attendance of a physician is to enable the company by inquiry of the physician, to ascertain whether the person whom it is proposed to have insured is in fact in good health. This must necessarily be true, because the statement that one is in good health is so largely a matter of opinion and so general as as very readily to give rise to controversy. If the insurance company had knowledge brought home to its agent that the assured was afflicted with pellagra, it could not reasonably be assumed that the applicant would be in good health at the time of the delivery of the policy, which perhaps would occur only a few days later.

Even if the first clause of the request to charge is correct, the judge could not instruct the jury that if the evidence showed that she had been attended by a physician, and she suppressed that fact when asked with reference thereto, that she could not recover, because it was in the province of the jury to say whether, as a matter of fact, the agent of the company had been notified that the proposed assured was suffering with pellagra. It was for the jury to say whether or not pellagra is an incurable disease, and it was for the jury to say, if they found the truth to be that the assured had pellagra and the agent of the company knew it at the time he took the application, whether any misrepresentation the assured may have made as to the condition of her health was material or fraudulent. The request for an instruction upon the principle which the plaintiff in error sought to have presented to the jury might have been so framed as to have been a complete statement of the principle as applicable to the evidence, but "unless the charge is itself a complete statement of the principle involved, without requiring addition or alteration to make it perfect, a failure to give it will not require new trial." Head v. Bridges, 67 Ga. 227 (4).

[3,4] 8. In two grounds of the motion for a new trial complaint is made of instructions of the court under which notice to an agent of an insurance company of material facts affecting the risk was imputed to the company; and, as these two grounds concern the same matter, we shall treat them together. Exception is taken to an instruction to the effect that the knowledge of the agent was the knowledge of the company, and if the agent knew, at the time that the application was made, that the assured had a fatal disease, and notwithstanding this the policy was issued, a recovery would not necessarily be defeated. Also to the following charge: "If the agent of the company had notice before and at the time of taking the application that the assured was afflicted with a serious or fatal disease, it would be notice to the company, and be a waiver of the clause in the policy saying it was void unless assured was in good health when the policy was issued." Neither of these instructions was erroneous. In Fair v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 5 Ga. App. 708, 63 S. E. 812, this court held that the knowledge of the examining physician of the company, after physical examination of an applicant for insurance, of any of the applicant's ailments, was notice to the company; and in Johnson v. Aetna Insurance Co., 123 Ga. 404 (2), 51 S. E. 339, 107 Am. St. Rep. 92, it was ruled that limitations in insurance policies upon the authority of the agent of the company to waive the conditions of the contract for insurance are to be treated as referring to waivers made subsequently to the issuance of the policy. See, also, Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Mutual Bldg. Co., 98 Ga. 266, 25 S. E. 457. In Aetna Insurance Co. v. Johnson, supra, the ruling in Thornton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 116 Ga. 122, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99, to the effect that an insurance company which, with notice that the insurer has not complied with some of the conditions of the policy, issues the policy, can defend on the ground that these conditions were not complied with, was disapproved, and since then the Supreme Court has uniformly adhered to the ruling announced in the Johnson Case. See, also, Springfield Fire Insurance Company v. Price, 132 Ga. 687, 694-695, 64 S. E. 1074; Athens Mutual Insurance Co. v. Evans, 132 Ga. 710 (5), 64 S. E. 993; Athens Mutual Insurance Company v. O'Keefe, 133 Ga. 792, 66 S. E. 1093; Athens Mutual Insurance Company v. Ledford, 134 Ga. 503, 504, 68 S. E. 91.

In the policy which is the subject-matter of this suit it is stipulated that "no obligation is assumed by the company prior to the date hereof, nor unless on said date the insured is alive and in sound health," and the point is urged that as the evidence is undisputed that the insured was not in good health on the date specified, but, on the contrary, was practically in a dying condition, as an effect of an incurable disease, there could be no recovery on the policy.

In other portions of the charge of the court all of the contentions of the defendant, so far as they are supported by the law, are fairly presented, but the trial judge took the view (and, we think, correctly) that if the jury, instead of believing that the agent of the company had no knowledge of the true condition of the health of the assured, and instead of believing that the application and the physician's report were signed by the assured, preferred to believe that the agent of the company was informed prior to the filing of the application for insurance that the assured had pellagra, and further preferred to believe that she did not sign the application or the physician's report, and for that reason had not made any representation as to whether she had been attended by a physician or not, the jury should be plainly told that notice to an agent who procured the contract of any defects in the health of the assured was notice to the company, and that, if the policy was issued after this notice, the company thereby waived the stipulation which provided that no obligation was assumed by the company unless the assured was in good health on the date of the policy. It was perhaps questionable whether the judge was technically correct in using the term "waiver," but this expression was not harmful to the plaintiff in error. He could perhaps more correctly have said that if the company, with knowledge that the applicant for insurance was suffering from an incurable disease, nevertheless issued the policy and accepted premiums thereon, it would be estopped from setting up as a defense, the provision in reference to good health at the time and date of the policy which was relied upon by the defendant. Upon this subject, see Aetna Insurance Company v. Johnson, supra, and citations. Though there is apparently an irreconcilable conflict between the rule laid down in that case and that declared in Thornton v. Travelers' Insurance Company, 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99, the doctrine announced in the Thornton Case was properly overruled in the Johnson Case, and it is now well settled that knowledge of material facts on the part of an agent of an insurance company is notice to the company, and, if with this notice the company issues a policy, it is estopped in equity from deriving benefit from any stipulation in the policy which might have availed it if it had been ignorant of the facts. This rule is especially to be upheld in that form of insurance known as "Industrial insurance," for the reason that it operates largely among and principally affects that portion of our population who pay for the protection which life insurance affords out of the weekly earnings derived from their labor, and who are in many instances easily imposed upon by the statements of agents.

Judgment affirmed.

J. G. B. Erwin, Jr., of Calhoun, for plaintiff in error. J. M. Lang, of Calhoun, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Hales sought to foreclose his statutory lien, for hauling logs, upon 29,000 feet of lumber, the property of the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company, and the company interposed a claim, setting up that the lumber was its property, and not the property of one G. W. Spears, under whose employment the hauling was done, and who was the defendant in the foreclosure of the lien. When the case came on for trial, the judge, over the objection of the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company, allowed an amendment to the lien foreclosure proceedings, or, as it may more properly be called, an amendment to the plaintiff's joinder of issue in a claim case equitable in its nature. This amendment set up that the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company, being the owner of a large quantity of timber in Gordon county, contracted with one Oart to haul it to mill, and saw it and stack it, for $8 per 1,000 feet; that Oart in turn sublet the contract to Spears (the defendant in this lien proceeding) for $7 per 1,000 feet, and Spears contracted with Hales, the plaintiff, to cut and haul the logs to the millyard for $3.40 per 1,000 feet. It was under this contract that Hales performed the work for which he claims the lien. The equitable amendment in aid of the levy further set up that, soon after Hales began hauling the logs under the contract with Spears, Mr. Sattes, a member of the firm of Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company, came into the woods where he was at work, and on several different occasions gave him instructions as to the kind and size of timber to cut, and told him that all timber cut and hauled by him, which was not within the proper specifications, would not be accepted, and that the company would not pay him therefor. It is alleged that the claimant company, through its agents and members of the firm, knew that Hales was doing the work, and that they not only gave him no notice that they would not pay him, but, on the contrary, directed him how to do the work, and that he carried out their directions, with the result that the value of the company's property was enhanced to the amount claimed by him in his lien foreclosure; that the original contractors are residents of West Virginia, and reside near the claimant, and Spears is not worth more than the homestead exemption allowed by law, and, by reason of the nonresidence of Cart, the plaintiff is without remedy to collect this debt. The amendment further alleged that the lumber levied on was cut from the very timber which he (Hales) cut and hauled, and that, as the lumber company could have deducted the amount due him from the amount it contracted to pay, if either party must sustain a loss, it should be the lumber company, rather than the plaintiff, because it had knowingly accepted his services.

The claimant demurred orally to the lien foreclosure, on the ground that it purported to be a foreclosure against the defendant, Spears, and upon the property of the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company, and that it was not alleged that any demand was ever made or other reason given authorizing proceedings against the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company; also upon the grounds that the plaintiff's lien foreclosure proceeding failed to set out any cause of action, and moved the court to dismiss it upon these grounds. After the allowance of the amendment the claimant renewed its oral motion to dismiss the proceedings. Upon the trial there was no testimony except that of the plaintiff himself, who testified that he cut and hauled timber to Spears' sawmill, under his contract with Spears, at $3.40 per 1,000 feet, from November, 1910, until May, 1911; that Spears paid him monthly until April, 1911, when he failed to make payment; that he completed his contract with Spears, and made demand on him for payment, before bringing this suit; that the lumber levied on was sawed from the timber which he cut and hauled to the mill; that Mr. Sattes, of the claimant company, was there when he began cutting and hauling, and came to the woods and gave him the direction that no timber which was not 15 inches in diameter was to be cut, and told him that the company would not pay for any that was unsound or smaller than the prescribed diameter. The lumber company paid Cart monthly the price agreed upon for timber that was sawed and stacked. The plaintiff's testimony established all of the allegations of his amendment.

[1] We do not think the court erred in allowing the amendment. A claim case is a proceeding equitable in its nature, and nothing is more common than to permit the claimant to make amendments amplifying his original claim and invoking the aid of equitable principles to establish it. There is no reason why the plaintiff in a claim case should be entitled to less rights than the claimant, nor does any good reason appear why the plaintiff cannot file an amendment in behalf of his joinder of issue as well as the claimant. That is all the amendment amounts to in this case. See Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 56 (7), 38 S. E. 374, 84 Am. St. Rep. 204.

[2] 2. Then, did the court err in not dismissing the proceedings upon the ground that it appeared that the labor was done for one Spears, and the lien was foreclosed against him as the nominal employer, and yet the foreclosure was sought to be enforced against the property of the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company? We bear in mind that the enforcement of the plaintiff's right involved the use of a harsh statutory remedy, which must therefore be strictly construed and applied; but as we view the case, under the allegations of the lienor's amendment, the services were practically performed, not for the original contractor (Spears), but for the claimant. By coming in under the amendment the formal foreclosure by the justice of the peace was, in effect, set aside, and it became an open question as to whether Hales was entitled to foreclose any lien at all, and who (if anybody) owed him for the hauling, and what property, if any, was subject to the foreclosure of his lien, if he had a lien. The execution issued upon the foreclosure by the justice of the peace is only apparently final process. Its issuance does not preclude the defendant or other parties at interest from showing that it should not have been issued. The claimant having arrested the levy of the lien fi. fa., and transferred it into mere mesne process, the court had before it an affidavit which was subject to amendment, and which, as we think, was properly amended so as to show that the real debtor under equitable principles was the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company, and not Spears. The superior court had jurisdiction to apply equitable principles, and, as it appeared undisputed in the testimony that the Sattes & Wimer Lumber Company knew that Hales was performing the services under and in accordance with their contract, and as they received the benefits of Hales' labor, it would seem that, if either party should lose, that party should lose who, with knowledge of all the facts, could most easily have prevented loss from accruing to either party.

The judgment in this case is sustainable for a still better reason. The affidavit of foreclosure as amended, and the evidence, set up that the plaintiff's lien was that of a laborer, and that the property levied upon was the product of his labor. The claimant must be presumed to know the law with regard to the lienor's services in cutting and hauling the logs, and to have known that its property could not be discharged from this lien by paying the original contractor, who undertook the contract as a whole, and then employed the plaintiff as a laborer to do a portion of the work. There is no evidence that the laborer had waived his lien, and there is undisputed evidence that he had not been paid for his labor. If the claimant had purchased the property in ignorance of the existence of the lien, the case would be different; but the lien of a laborer upon the product of his labor cannot be defeated by one who has knowledge of the performance of the labor, and who accepts the benefit thereof, otherwise than by proof that the lien was waived, or has been discharged by payment.

Judgment affirmed.

FLEMING et al. v. SMITH, Governor.
(No. 3,777.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1912.)

STATES (§ 111*)—FEES OF SOLICITORS—LIABILITY OF STATE.

The fees and commissions allowed to solicitors in cases of litigated recognizances, under Pen. Code 1910, § 1128, are payable only out of proceeds of such suits, and not out of the state treasury; the fees in Supreme Court, for which the state is liable under section 1128, being limited to fees for services rendered in criminal cases proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

Motion by P. L. Fleming and others against Hoke Smith, Governor, to tax costs in Court of Appeals against the State. Motion disallowed.

J. Rod Skelton, of Hartwell, for the motion.

PER CURIAM. The solicitor of the city court of Hartwell filed in this court a motion claiming a fee of $15 for services rendered in the Supreme Court, the case being one of litigated recognizance, arising upon the forfeiture of a bond in a criminal case, and asked that this fee be taxed as costs and be paid by the state.

We are of the opinion that solicitors general and solicitors of city courts are not entitled to be paid such fees from the state treasury, but that the double fees and commissions allowed in cases of litigated recognizances (Penal Code, § 1128) are only to be paid in the event of collection, and out of the amount collected from criminal bonds. Section 1128 of the Penal Code applies only to fees for services rendered in criminal cases proper, either where the defendant has been acquitted, or where there has been a conviction, and the defendant is unable to pay the costs. It does not apply to cases of a civil character, or even of a quasi criminal character.

The motion, therefore, to tax the costs against the state, is disallowed.

1. VENUE (§ 22*)—DOMICILE OF PARTIES—DEFENSES.

As a general rule, where the maker and indorser of a promissory note reside in different counties, suit may be brought on the note in either county; but the maker of a note cannot be deprived of his constitutional right to be sued in the county of his own residence by an indorsement procured by the payee without the knowledge and consent of the maker, and for the sole purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the county of the indorser's residence.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company against J. W. Arnold, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

The Atlanta Oil & Fertilizer Company sued J. W. Arnold, Jr., and E. C. Arnold, as principal makers, and W. C. Thompson, as surety, on a promissory note payable to the plaintiff. The suit was brought in the city court of Atlanta. Before pleading to the merits, J. W. Arnold, Jr., and E. C. Arnold, at the appearance term, filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, alleging that they were at the time of the filing of the suit, and still are, residents of Walton county, Ga.; that the city court of Monroe, in Walton county, and the superior court of Walton county, had jurisdiction of their persons and of the subject-matter of the suit; and that the city court of Atlanta did not have jurisdiction of their persons. They further alleged that the indorsement of W. C. Thompson, who resided in Fulton county, was obtained for the sole purpose of giving to the courts of Fulton county jurisdiction of the persons of these defendants, and this was done without the consent of the defendants, either express or implied; that the indorsement was obtained as a device, at the instigation of the plaintiff and its attorney, whereby these defendants "should and would be inveigled into the jurisdiction of this honorable court, for the sole purpose of giving this court jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants, and that the same was an effort conceived in fraud, whereby the defendants were to be deprived of their legal rights in the premises." The plaintiff moved to strike this plea to the jurisdiction upon the ground that it was insufficient; that it failed to show want of jurisdiction in the city court of Atlanta as to defendants in the cause of action upon which was brought; that the note appeared on its face to be joint and several, and that the defendant Thompson resided in the county of Fulton, which gave the city court of Atlanta jurisdiction of the persons of all of the joint obligors on the note; that the allegation in the plea that fraudulent practices were used by the plaintiff in order to give the city court of Atlanta jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants was a mere conclusion of the pleader, without any facts stated in support of such conclusion. The court sustained the motion to strike, and exceptions pendente lite were duly preserved.

The defendant J. W. Arnold, Jr., filed a plea of set-off, averring that at the time of the commencement of the suit the plaintiff was indebted to him "10 per cent. of $11,516.65, to wit, in the sum of $1,151.66, which said last-named sum is a reasonable, fair, and equitable commission for the collection of plaintiff's notes placed with defendant by plaintiff for collection, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum." A copy of the account, attached to this plea, shows that before the execution of the note sued on the defendant J. W. Arnold, Jr., had paid over to the plaintiff, on collections made by him for the plaintiff, the sum of $11,516.65, less 10 per cent. commission. Subsequently J. W. Arnold, Jr., amended his plea of set-off, by alleging that his account against the plaintiff arose as follows: On the 1st of September, 1910, the plaintiff placed with this defendant certain promissory notes against parties residing in the counties of Walton and Morgan, and this defendant, with considerable loss of time and much expense, succeeded in collecting for the plaintiff the aggregate sum above stated, "and, in the absence of any definite agreement as to what defendant was to receive for making such collections, defendant asks that he be allowed a commission as aforesaid. It was understood and agreed that he would be paid a reasonable amount therefor."

The plaintiff demurred to the plea of set-off, on the grounds that it was insufficient; that it did not show any contract between them to pay any commission on the collections made; that it does not show any facts or circumstances that would authorize the inference that the plaintiff was to pay the defendant any commission on the alleged collections, and that the plea as amended was insufficient to show any right on the part of defendant to recover commissions from the plaintiff; that the plea does not show that the defendant did not retain his commissions on the collections; that it fails to show that the defendant turned over any money to the plaintiff that he was entitled to retain as commissions, nor does it show any reason why he turned over to the plaintiff his commissions, or why he did not retain them, if in fact he paid them over; that, the note sued upon having been executed by the defendant subsequent to the time when he claimed that the commissions became due to him, his plea of set-off is insufficient to show that his commissions were not satisfied at the time of the execution of the note, nor does the plea show any reason on the part of the defendant for executing the note, if he had any valid claim against the plaintiff for the commissions. The court struck this plea, and exceptions pendente lite were preserved.

The defendant E. C. Arnold filed a plea of suretyship, but no evidence was submitted in support of the plea. The plaintiff introduced the note sued upon, which note showed that the defendants J. W. Arnold, Jr., and E. C. Arnold had each signed it as makers, and that W. C. Thompson, the other defendant, had signed it as surety; that it was payable at the Fourth National Bank of Atlanta, to the order of the plaintiff, and was for $2,003.17 principal. Thereupon a verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly. Error is assigned on allowing the verdict and judgment, because of the erroneous rulings heretofore excepted to, which entered into, affected, and controlled the final judgment.

Hal G. Nowell and E. W. Roberts, both of Monroe, for plaintiffs in error. Sam D. Hewlett, of Atlanta, and D. W. Blair, of Marietta, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. This court is of the opinion that the plea to the jurisdiction was sufficient, as against the general motion to strike, filed at the trial term. We all agree that it was defective in form and would have been subject to a timely special demurrer. We do not think that the payee of a note has the right, without the knowledge or consent of the maker and over his objection, to procure the accommodation indorsement of a person residing in a county other than that in which the maker lives, for the sole purpose of obtaining jurisdiction of the person of the maker in the county where the accommodation indorser resides. Every citizen has, subject to certain exceptions expressly declared, the right to be sued at his own domicile, and, unless the case be within one of the exceptions mentioned in the Constitution, this right cannot be taken away, except with the consent of the citizen. It frequently happens that where one in good faith executes a promissory note, expecting at the time to pay it at its maturity, facts may thereafter arise constituting a good defense to the note. In our opinion, the payee of such a note cannot, either because he apprehends a defense will be made, or after discovering that a defense will be made to it, procure the signature of an indorser or surety residing in any county which he may select, for the sole purpose of obtaining jurisdiction of the maker in that county, unless the maker consents for such indorsement to be obtained. The force of every word in the contract, as well as the legal effect of the contract as a whole, with the resultant consequences to each party, under the law, has its origin in the consent of the parties to the contract in the form in which it was at the time when it was mutually agreed to and executed. If a contract has been so changed that the legal consequences, even though these are only consequences attending its enforcement, are different from the consequences which would have ensued from the enforcement of the contract as made, then the contract has been materially changed; and this change cannot be made effectual, except by the consent of both parties.

Every one is presumed to know the legal effect of his act, and to anticipate the legal consequences which will legitimately result; but without his consent one cannot be bound to a change of his relation to the opposite party to the contract, so that the consequences to himself will be different from what he had the right to expect them to be at the time he entered into the contract. The right of being sued at one's domicile (if one is to be sued at all) is a substantial right, provided for the convenience of the citizen, who in every case is brought into court at the demand of another, who seeks to have a liability imposed upon him, and who must establish that liability by proof. The defendant presumptively has wronged no one, nor violated any obligation, and it devolves upon the plaintiff to prove his case by the preponderance of evidence, and if the plaintiff fails in this, the presence of the defendant has been required merely for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to make the effort of establishing his case.

It is alleged in the plea to the jurisdiction that the indorsement was obtained without the consent of the makers, either express or implied, and for the sole purpose of giving the courts of the county in which the indorser resided jurisdiction of the person of the defendants, and was a fraud on the rights of the makers. This averment was sufficient, as a matter of law, against the general motion to strike. Of course, the mere fact that the indorsement was obtained for the single purpose of giving the court of the county of the indorser jurisdiction of the maker would make no difference, if the maker knew of the indorsement and even tacitly assented thereto. Indorsements are frequently required for this purpose, and this is entirely legitimate. What we hold is that such an indorsement, obtained without the knowledge or consent of the maker, does not deprive the maker of the right to be sued in his own county.

[2] 2. There was no error in striking the plea of set-off, filed by J. W. Arnold, Jr. It is true, of course, that where there are two makers of a promissory note, either as principals or indorsers, one can set off an individual claim against the plaintiff, growing out of the transaction which gave rise to the execution of the note. Wilson v. Exchange Bank, 122 Ga. 495, 50 S. E. 357, 69 L. R. A.

97, 2 Ann. Cas. 597. Here, however, it is manifest, from an examination of the averments of the plea of set-off, that it was wholly insufficient to show a prima facie indebtedness by the plaintiff to the defendant. It was insufficient for this purpose, for all of the reasons stated in the demurrer to the plea; and this is so manifest that we deem it unnecessary to discuss the question, or to cite authorities in support of the judgment of the learned trial judge in striking this plea.

Judgment affirmed in part, and in part reversed.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. BLACK-SHEAR. (No. 3,837.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§§ 344, 350*)—OPERATION—INJURIES AT CROSSINGS—PLEADING—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The court did not err in overruling the general demurrer, and the amendments to the petition sufficiently complied with the defendant's demand for particular information. The petition amplified every illustrative circumstance pertaining to the occasion upon which the injury was said to have been committed, and charged that the defendant was negligent in so storing cars upon one of its side tracks as to obstruct his view and prevent him from seeing an approaching train; that the defendant was negligent, in that the train which caused the injury approached the public crossing too rapidly; and that there was no flagman or other employé stationed upon the train to keep a lookout and give warning of its approach, and that no signal of its approach was given. It was alleged that the plaintiff was riding in a wagon owned and driven by another person, and, there being nothing to indicate that a train was approaching, they attempted to cross the railroad tracks, and had crossed the side track, and were just getting upon the main track, when the occupants of the wagon saw the backing train approaching with great speed and within from six to ten feet of them, and that in this alleged emergency the plaintiff jumped from the wagon to save himself, and in the fall received the injuries described in the petition.

(a) While a railway company has generally the right to place and store cars upon its side tracks, it is a jury question whether the storing of cars upon the particular side track, under stated circumstances, is negligence as related to one whose injury may have been caused or contributed to by the improper or untimely placing of such cars. An instruction to the jury that, "where a car is left on a side track, whether that is negligence is a question for the jury under all the circumstances of the case," was not error, for the reason, assigned by the plaintiff in error, that the defendant had the right to store on its side track whatever cars it saw proper.

2. INSTRUCTIONS OF COURT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The evidence authorized the instructions of the court upon the subject of contributory negligence.

3. TRIAL (§ 267*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS PARTLY ERRONEOUS.

The instructions requested were properly refused. A portion of the request was not adjusted to the evidence, and another portion was clearly objectionable, because it would have been a statement of the court's opinion that certain facts therein referred to had been proved. A trial judge is not required to separate that which is good in a request from that which is bad; but, if the request is in any respect defective, he may refuse it as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 668-672, 674; Dec. Dig. § 267.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

The judge's statement, in his charge to the jury, that "backing cars across a crossing is especially dangerous," and that "it is negligence to back a train without proper lookout, lights, or other signals of warning," was such error as, under the mandatory provisions of section 4863 of the Civil Code of 1910, requires the grant of a new trial, and upon this ground only the judgment refusing a new trial is reversed. The circumstances which may constitute negligence in a particular case are so peculiarly and exclusively for the determination of the jury that a trial judge cannot declare that the omission or commission of any act is, as a matter of law, negligence, unless it has been so expressly declared by law.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

Action by the Diamond Power Specialty Company against the City of West Point. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

E. R. Bradfield, Jr., of La Grange, for plaintiff in error. Benj. H. Hill, of West Point, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] The court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant. There is a remarkable similarity between the defense in this case, as well as the evidence in support of it, and the defense and the facts appearing in the case of City of Conyers v. Kirk & Company, 78 Ga. 482, 3 S. E. 442. When the facts and the law of that case were analyzed by Chief Justice Bleckley, he summarized the defense (as it must be construed in this case) to be twofold: (1) That no purchase was made; and (2) that, if it was made, there was a breach by the plaintiff and a failure of consideration. And he held that, even if a city cannot make a contract through a committee, or the chairman of that committee (and it appears that in that case, as in the case sub judice, the chairman of the committee "was the chief actor in the matter"), but the proposed action must be reported to the council in assembled meeting, and there determined in a formal way and entered upon the minutes, nevertheless "a municipal corporation can make a cash contract for current supplies * * * for lighting the streets, through its appropriate officers or committees, as effectually as by formal resolution entered on its minutes."

[2] And we may say, further, upon the point that, though the chairman of the light committee had no authority to purchase the blowers which are the subject-matter of this suit, the court, in our opinion erred in directing a verdict, because the ordinances of the city of West Point provide that in case of necessity purchases may be made by committeemen; and, necessarily, the question as to whether any proposed purchase is absolutely necessary, as related to the circumstances under which the purchase is to be made, must be determined by the jury.

[3] It may be conceded that the chairman of the electric committee, who made this contract, was not expressly authorized to do so; but the evidence conclusively shows that he made the purchase of the blowers, and that the blowers were received by the city, and installed in an electric plant owned and operated by the city, and that they were thus operated for a period of nine months. Certainly this evidence was of such character as would make it obligatory upon the city, whether its agent was authorized or not, to ratify the contract. In other words, under these facts the city would be estopped from setting up any want of authority to execute contract, when impliedly at least it had ratified the purchase.

The fact that the contract itself was executed by a member of the city council, who was chairman of the electric light committee, and that he was afterward elected mayor, and his correspondence with the plaintiff, disclose the fact that these blowers were installed in January, 1909, in the electric plant belonging to the city and operated by the city, and thus continued to be operated for nearly a year. Certainly such facts were pertinent to the question of ratification, regardless of the question as to whether the original purchase was authorized or not. It was the duty of the city to repudiate the contract at once, upon knowledge that it had been made, and it would be bad faith to allow the city to use the property for a longer period of time, taking the benefit of the contract, and refuse to pay for the fruits. Municipalities, as well as individuals, should be held to good faith.

[4] The question raised in the case of City of Conyers v. Kirk, supra, as to the nonliability of the city, upon the ground that the creation of a debt was involved, is not here presented, and cannot be, because the record shows that the parties intended that if, after 30 days' trial, the blowers were satisfactory, they should be paid for; if unsatisfactory, they were to be returned. The 30 days was solely for testing purposes. This made a cash transaction. If the blowers were not satisfactory, they were to be returned. The failure to return them made a debt; but the debt originated, not by virtue of the contract, but by breaking it. As was said by Chief Justice Bleckley in that case: "Surely there never can be and never will be any law against paying a debt which arises from default in making a cash payment at the time the debtor ought to have made it; the cash sufficient for the purpose being then in the debtor's treasury." It is not contended here that the city did not have the cash on hand to pay for the blowers, but the contention is rather that the party who purchased the blowers was not authorized to make a cash contract.

We do not mean to hold that the city of West Point is precluded from showing that there was a failure of consideration as to the blowers, but we do mean to hold that the evidence in the present record does not show that it was wholly valueless, and certainly, if a jury should find that the contract was ratified, the city could not claim anything more than an abatement of the purchase price proportionate to the degree of the blowers' failure to perform the functions guaranteed.

Judgment reversed.

2. COURTS (§ 189*)—MUNICIPAL COURTS—PROCEDURE.

Under the provisions of section 1 of the act amending the act creating the city court of Douglas, approved August 14, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 135), the presiding judge of that court did not err in entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff, against the defendant and his sureties, upon a demand which, as pleaded, was a liquidated demand.

3. VENUE (§ 22*)—DOMICILE OF PARTIES—CO-DEFENDANTS.

The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, and by proper legal service obtained jurisdiction over the persons of the defendants; and the judgment was not void for the reason stated in the case of Jordan v. Callaway, 138 Ga. 209, 75 S. E. 101. Under the amendatory act as to the city court of Douglas, above referred to, the judge of that court is authorized to enter judgment at the appearance term, even upon an account, if no defense is interposed.

Error from City Court of Douglas; W. C. Lankford, Judge.

Action by A. D. Williams against W. L. Harrell and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Williams brought suit in the city court of Douglas, returnable in the May term, 1911, of that court; and at the appearance term, there being no defense filed, the court, on motion, granted a judgment by default, for the principal, interest, and attorney's fees sued for. After the judgment had been granted, and during the same term of the court, the defendants paid the costs and filed a written motion to vacate the judgment, treating the case as being in default, and asking that the default be opened, and that they be permitted to file the defense attached to the motion. The motion complied with the requirement that it should allege a meritorious defense and announce ready for trial. The motion was not heard until October 30, 1911, when the motion was overruled and denied.

The motion to open the default rested upon the grounds: (1) That three of the defendants had not been served personally, but, as appeared from the officer's return, were served by leaving copies of the petition at their most notorious place of abode; (2) that it appears from the petition and the exhibits that the plaintiff's cause of action is not such a liquidated demand as would authorize the plaintiff to take a judgment against the defendants by default at the first term of the court, because the plaintiff undertook arbitrarily to fix the amount of the account, without any agreement with the defendants; and (3) that, under the act of the General Assembly creating the city court of Douglas, judgments by default can only be rendered at the first term of that court upon liquidated demands, unconditional contracts in writing, and accounts properly pleaded, and it affirmatively appears from the plaintiff's petition that his demand is neither an unconditional contract in writing, nor a liquidated demand, nor such an account as is contemplated by the act above recited, for the reason that it affirmatively appears from the petition and the exhibits that the sum sued for was fixed without the knowledge or consent of the defendants, and without first having been agreed upon or liquidated.

The petition sets out a breach of a bond of W. L. Harrell, as principal, and other defendants, as sureties. The bond was executed in accordance with the terms of a contract (set out in the petition) which was formally entered into by the defendant Harrell and the plaintiff. In the bond the principal and the sureties, jointly and severally, agreed to pay Williams all moneys that had been advanced by him to Harrell under the terms of the contract and bond, and also to pay Williams for nursery stock sold by him to Harrell according to the terms of the bond and contract. The petition alleges that the sums of money advanced are evidenced by promissory notes, copies of which are attached. Items of the amounts due for nursery stock are shown by exhibits. It is alleged that Harrell refused to pay the moneys advanced to him, and refused to pay in full for the nursery stock, and that by such refusal the obligation of the bond was breached.

Rogers & Heath, of Douglas, for plaintiffs in error. Ohastain & Henson, of Douglas, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. As appears from the record the plaintiffs in error treated the motion to vacate the judgment as a motion to open a default, for they offered to plead instanter, and presented a plea, which they alleged presented a meritorious defense. They perhaps pursued the wrong remedy, but we will deal only with the case made. It would perhaps suffice to say that the judge did not err in denying the motion to open the default, if for no other reason than that the motion presented no sufficient reason why a defense was not filed at the proper time. Granting that the plaintiffs in error had properly conceived the judgment to be such a one as that it might be set aside upon a motion to open the default and an offer to plead, still in such a case as that it would not have been abuse of discretion on the part of the court to have declined to consider such a motion. When a party, without any reason except his own laches, fails to pursue his remedy or invoke a defense, as the case may be, neither law nor equity will relieve him.

[3] 2. In view of the fact, however, that it is insisted that some of the defendants were not properly served, it may be contended that the failure to serve these defendants was itself cause for not filing an answer in time, and that the statement that they were not served is itself a declaration of a sufficient reason to have invoked the discretion of the court to open the default. We will therefore consider the ground of the motion which asserts that some of the defendants were not legally served. This contention rests upon the fact (as appears from the entries of service as to these defendants) that in each case service was perfected by leaving copies at the defendant's most notorious place of abode, and that at that time each of these defendants resided without the limits of the county in which the suit was filed. If such service were, as contended, ineffectual and nugatory, it might afford a good reason why the judgment of default should have been set aside as to them, not only because the court should have used discretion to give all parties their day in court, but also because, if the defendants had not been served, the judgment as to them would be void, and should have been so treated by the court, under the ruling of the Supreme Court in Jordan v. Callaway, 138 Ga. 209, 75 S. E. 101. But we hold the service good. The decision of the question rests upon the fact that, in our judgment, the defendants were not guarantors for the debt of the principal, W. L. Harrell, but were sureties with him upon a joint and several bond. If they were sureties, it is manifest that they could be sued with Harrell in the county of his domicile (Civil Code, §§ 5529, 6541), and the pe-tion and service show him to have been a resident of Coffee county.

[2] 3. The plaintiffs in error further insist that the judgment was erroneous, because the city court of Douglas, being required to operate under the rules of the superior court, could not, from the very nature of the action, have rendered a lawful judgment at the appearance term. Construing the action to be (as we hold it to be) a suit upon a bond jointly executed by Harrell and his codefendants, the plaintiffs in error contend that the damages sought to be recovered are not liquidated, that this fact is apparent from the petition and the exhibits, and that therefore the judgment was void, and should have been set aside. Waiving the point (which to us seems to be one of insuperable difficulty to the plaintiffs in error) that the judge was not required to set aside a judgment upon a mere motion to reopen a default, and treating the motion as proper, we are still unable to agree to the proposition that the petition and exhibits evidenced the total invalidity of the judgment, as contended. Under the first section of the act to amend an act creating the city court of Douglas, approved August 14, 1908 (Acts of 1908, p. 135), the judge of the city court of Douglas was authorized in all suits on unconditional contracts, on liquidated demands or on account, to render judgment where no defense was filed, at the appearance term. In the present case the decision of the question must be controlled by the special act regulating practice in the city court of Douglas. The plaintiff had the right to recover, in the absence of any plea having been filed by the defendants, whatever amounts were properly pleaded as the constituent elements measuring the defendants' default in performing their obligation. Certainly, with the stipulation in the contract which provides that the defendants shall be sureties for whatever sums of money are advanced to Harrell, together with the undenied statement that these moneys are evidenced by notes, and the exhibition of the copies of these notes, the demand for the money advanced would appear to have been liquidated.

As to the fruit trees sold Harrell, numerous itemized statements of fruit trees furnished him at stated prices were attached to the petition. The petition alleged that these were sold and delivered to him as shown upon the several statements. In the absence of any denial of these accounts, which were properly pleaded, the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment in his favor under the peculiar verbiage of the act to which we have referred.

We have not overlooked the contention of the plaintiffs in error as to the "June buds," to the effect that this item of the account cannot be said to be liquidated, because the contract shows the price was to be agreed upon later, and therefore the price had not been fixed at the time the contract was made; nor their insistence that several items of the account are for buds or budded stock. We think it can safely be assumed (under the general rule that every presumption is to be taken in favor of the validity of a judgment) that there was an agreement as to the price of the budded stock, and that this item, too, is shown to have been liquidated, because the contract was made in January, and the budded stock was not supplied until 10 months thereafter. But, if we are wrong in this, the act of 1908 is so extremely broad as to include "an account," and it would seem, where a party is legally served with a petition in an action, even upon an unliquidated account, in the city court of Douglas, judgment may be rendered by default if the defendant does not defend the action, or if, having filed his defense, it is adjudged by the court to be insufficient in law. In section 1 the following language is used: "In all cases when suit is brought for a liquidated demand or an account, and there has been legal service of such declaration and no defense is filed thereto, or if such defense as is filed is stricken, or adjudged to be insufficient in law, either in form or substance, it shall be the duty of the court at such term to give judgment thereon without the intervention of the jury."

Where an action is brought upon a bond, the proof upon the measure of liability is not required to be different or stronger than it would be required to be if the action were brought upon the collateral matter originally. In other words, the plaintiff in the present case is not required to establish the existence of the several items of liability against the defendant, and the consequent liability of the sureties therefor, with any better proof than if he were proceeding against the principal alone, and it is apparent that, under the act creating the city court of Douglas, he could recover against the principal obligor upon a properly pleaded account, in the absence of any plea setting up a good defense; and he is not required to do any more in the case of the sureties than the law requires him to do in order to fix liability upon the principal obligor.

Judgment affirmed.

SHEPPARD v. DANIEL MILLER CO. (No. 3,545.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FORMER DECISION CONTROLLING.

So far as the pleas of the defendant relate to the original liability of the guarantor, the decision of the trial judge, in striking the defendant's answer, was authorized by the ruling of this court in Sheppard v. Daniel Miller Company, 7 Ga. App. 760, 68 S. E. 451.

2. GUARANTY (§ 59*)—ACTION AGAINST GUARANTOR—ABATEMENT OF LIABILITY.

Nor did the trial judge err in striking that portion of the defendant's answer in which it was insisted that the guarantor was entitled to an abatement or diminution of his liability in the amount which the creditor received as his distributive share from the assets of the bankrupt. There was no allegation that the guarantor had complied with his contract of guaranty; and his remedy was to pay the debt, and, by thus becoming a creditor of the bankrupt, become entitled to prove a claim as a creditor, and, as such, share in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 69; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 36*)—ANSWER—ADMISSIONS—EFFECT.

Construed as a whole, the answer of the defendant (except in so far as it denied liability for attorney's fees) was a practical admission of indebtedness, because the denials contained in it were entirely inconsistent with the admissions made in the same connection, and, under a well-settled rule in such cases, the admissions, and not the denials, must prevail. It being undisputed that the proper notice in regard to the attorney's fees was served, the court did not err in directing the verdict.

4. GUARANTY (§ 86*)—ACTION AGAINST GUARANTOR—PLEADING.

Where a contract of guaranty, stating on its face that it was a continuing contract, was attached to the petition, and defendant did not deny the execution of the contract, its denial that the contract was a continuing one failed to set up a defense.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the Daniel Miller Company against E. S. Sheppard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Pottle and C. L. Glessner, both of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. Smith & Miller, of Edison, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] 1. This case has heretofore been before this court. 7 Ga. App. 760, 68 S. E. 451. In ruling upon the demurrers at that time, we held that the measure of the guarantor's liability was fixed by his contract, and that it was no concern of his if the creditor extended credit for a larger amount than that which he guaranteed would be paid. His liability would not be increased beyond the precise limits of his contract, and certainly it would not be diminished if the creditor himself saw fit to take the risk of an unsecured debt greater in amount than that which the guarantor undertook to secure. So far as the answer of the defendant is concerned, it may well be said that the admissions outweigh the denials, and for that reason the court did not err in striking all of the answer, except the paragraph which denied that notice of the claim for attorney's fees had been duly given, as required by law.

[4] To the plaintiff's petition was attached a copy of the contract, in which the defendant undertook to guarantee payment to the amount of $1,500 on any goods sold or to be sold by the plaintiff to Fain & Weaver. On its face it stated that it was a continuing contract, and certainly, under its terms, it would be a continuing contract, at least until the plaintiff was notified by the guarantor that no further credit was to be extended to Fain & Weaver. Therefore the defendant's denial of the second paragraph of the petition was entirely nugatory, unless the answer specifically denied the execution of the contract and amounted to a plea of non est factum. As the defendant did not deny the execution of the contract, or that the articles of merchandise set forth in the bill of particulars were furnished to Fain & Weaver, he in legal effect admitted his execution of the contract and the plaintiff's compliance therewith. Likewise, for the reason that there is no denial of the execution of the contract, those paragraphs in which it is insisted that the contract was not a continuous one fail to set up any issuable defense; and as there was an admission in the answer that an even larger amount of goods than that guaranteed by the defendant had been supplied by the plaintiff to Fain & Weaver, the court properly disregarded the qualified denial to the effect that the goods had not been delivered in accordance with the contract. The ruling of the trial judge upon that portion of the answer which attempted to set up that the liability of the guarantor was affected by reason of the fact that the creditor has sold Fain & Weaver upwards of $3,000 worth of merchandise, when he had only contracted to guarantee the payment of $1,500, was in accord with the ruling of this court in our prior adjudication upon the demurrers.

[2] 2. The trial judge did not err in striking that portion of the defendant's answer in which it was insisted that the guarantor was entitled to an abatement or diminution of his liability, in the amount which the creditor received as his distributive share from the assets of the bankrupt. There was no allegation that the guarantor had complied with his contract of guaranty; and the remedy of the guarantor was to pay the debt, and, by thus becoming a creditor of the bankrupt, thereby become entitled to prove a claim as a creditor, and, as such, share in the distribution of the bankrupt's estate. In fact, the ruling in the present case is controlled by the prior decision of this court, except in so far as the defendant's answer sought to set up the fact that the creditor had received $300.28 from the bankrupt's estate in partial payment of his debt, and claimed this amount as a set-off. As the guarantor had not complied with his contract, he was not a creditor of the bankrupt so far as the subject-matter of the present litigation is concerned. He had not paid out any amount for which the bankrupt was liable to him. Therefore he was not entitled, primarily, to participate in a division of the fund arising from the bankrupt's estate. And the plea was without merit in so far as the answer sought to set up as a defense that his liability to the plaintiff should be diminished at least in proportion to the amount received by the plaintiff from the bankrupt's estate, because his obligation bound him to secure the plaintiff against loss in the sale of goods to Fain & Weaver to the extent of $1,500, and, if Fain & Weaver owed a larger sum than the amount guaranteed, it was immaterial whether their creditors collected all or any portion of it in addition to the amount which the guarantor obligated himself to see paid. There was only one way in which the guarantor could have qualified himself to ask that a portion of the assets of the bankrupt should be applied to reduce his liability, and this was by paying the amount which he undertook to guarantee, and thereby subrogating himself to the rights of the original creditor, by himself becoming a creditor of the bankrupt. The fact that the plaintiff received a dividend from the bankrupt could not affect the guarantor, until the plaintiff had received a sufficient dividend to reduce the debt to less than $1,500. The guarantor was responsible for that sum. The plaintiff in the present case was not a secured creditor, because it does not appear that it had any security upon the property of the bankrupt, and if the guarantor had paid the plaintiff the $1,500 for Fain & Weaver, he would himself have become a creditor of Fain & Weaver and been entitled to prove his claim. Remington on Bankruptcy, p. 386, § 635. But if the creditor fails to prove his claim, and refuses to permit the surety to have the instrument to file with proof of claim, as required by law, the surety nevertheless is not released. His remedy is to pay the debt. Remington on Bankruptcy, p. 904, § 1517. As well said by Remington (Id. p. 384, § 544), "a surety, when he assumes the relation, becomes contingently the creditor of the debtor and the debtor of the creditor."

[3] 3. The court did not err in striking the paragraphs of the defendant's answer concerning which complaint is made. Taken as a whole, the formal denial of liability was rendered wholly ineffectual by the admission of such material facts as necessarily established a legal liability. Beddingfield v. Bates Advertising Co., 2 Ga. App. 107, 58 S. E. 320. Upon the issue raised by the answer of the defendant as to attorney's fees, the evidence was not contradicted that the requisite legal notice was properly and timely given; and for this reason there was no error in directing the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 35*)—LIMITATIONS APPLICABLE—PENAL ACTIONS.

An action brought under section 2 of the act approved August 23, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 120), to recover against a railroad company the sum fixed by rule of the Railroad Commission for failing to furnish cars on demand, is so far penal in its nature as to be barred, under the provisions of section 4370 of the Civil Code of 1910, after one year from the date upon which the cause of action arose.

Actions by Inman, Akers & Inman against the Southern Railway Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

McDaniel & Black and E. A. Neely, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hill & Wright, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. These were actions brought in 1910 under the provisions of the act approved August 23, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 120), to recover from the railway company for its failure to promptly furnish cars ordered at various times during the years 1906 and 1907. The point is made that the actions were barred by the statute of limitations, and, as we have reached the conclusion that this point is well taken, no other question need be dealt with.

[1] A consideration of the question upon which the case turns renders it necessary to classify the nature of the recovery authorized by section 2 of the act of 1905 and storage rule 9 of the Railroad Commission. The announced purpose of the act, as set forth in its title, was to further extend the powers of the Railroad Commission of this state, and to confer upon the Commission, among other things, the power "to provide a penalty for noncompliance with any and all reasonable rules, regulations and orders prescribed by the said Commission in the execution of these powers." Section 2 of the act required that the Commission "shall, by reasonable rules and regulations, provide the time within which said car or cars shall be furnished after being ordered as aforesaid, and the penalty per day per car to be paid by said railroad company in the event such car or cars are not furnished as ordered, and provided, further, that in order for any shipper or consignor to avail himself of the penalties provided by the rules and regulations of said Railroad Commission, such shipper or consignor shall likewise be subject, under proper rules to be fixed by said Commission, to the orders, rules and regulations of said Railroad Commission." Section 3 provides that, before any railroad company "is subjected to the penalties" provided by the act, the company shall be required to show cause before the Commission and be by it adjudged liable. The Commission, by rule, fixed one dollar per car, for each day of delay after four days, as the sum which a defaulting company should pay. The cause of action arises immediately upon the company's default, and the question is: Within what time must the action be brought?

Section 4370 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides: "All actions by informers, to recover any fine, forfeiture, or penalty, shall be commenced within one year from the time the defendant's liability thereto was discovered, or by reasonable diligence could have been discovered." This statute was held to be applicable to a suit against a telegraph company, brought under the act of 1887 (Acts 1887, p. 111), to recover the sum fixed by that act to be paid by the defaulting company. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Nannally, 86 Ga. 503, 12 S. E. 578. That decision settles for us two propositions, viz.: First, that the sum recoverable under the act of 1887 was a penalty for breach of a public duty; and, secondly, that the suing plaintiff was an informer within the meaning of the statute, now codified in section 4370 of the Code of 1910, notwithstanding he obtained the entire recovery. After considering the history and origin of this statute, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, delivering the opinion, said: "We have no doubt that the Code intended to sum up all cases provided for in these two previous statutes, and treat them as cases brought by informers. If this construction is not sustainable, then the Code prescribed no limitation whatever for such an action as the one now under consideration, unless it falls within section 2916, which is in these words: 'All suits for the enforcement of rights accruing to individuals under statutes, acts of incorporation, or by operation of law, shall be brought within twenty years after the right of action accrues.' We think it incredible that actions for penalties should have been limited to one year when brought by an informer, and to twenty years when brought by others, not falling within the strict, literal description of informers. There is every reason why the omission of a telegraphic company to deliver a message with due promptness should not be left open to suit for twenty years. If any penalty whatever ought to be prosecuted for speedily, it would be one of this nature. To leave the company exposed to suit for the almost innumerable transactions of this kind for twenty years would be simply absurd." In Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Huson, 5 Ga. App. 529, 63 S. E. 597, this court held that section 4370 of the Code was applicable to a suit brought against a common carrier, under section 2770 of the Code, to recover double the amount of an overcharge or in overpayment of freight.

[2] Were it not for previous decisions, both of this court and of the Supreme Court, we would have no difficulty in holding that so much of the act of 1905 as relates to the recovery of what has been denominated "reciprocal demurrage" is purely penal in its nature, and was intended by the General Assembly as a punishment for the breach of a public duty. A penalty is often imposed by the exaction of a sum of money for the infraction of a civil right. For example, it has been said that a penalty is: "A punishment inflicted by a law for its violation." "A sum of money imposed by statute, to be paid as a punishment for the commission of a certain act." "A penalty is a punishment imposed by law or contract for doing or failing to do something that it was the duty of a party to do." "A penalty is in the nature of punishment for the nonperformance of an act, or for the performance of an unlawful act. It involves the idea of punishment, whether enforced by civil or criminal procedure." "The word 'penalty' and the word 'forfeiture,' as used in statutes, are generally used synonymously. A statute properly designated as penal is one which inflicts a forfeiture of money or goods by way of penalty for breach of its provisions." Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5272, 5273. The very purpose of the act was stated in the title "to provide a penalty for noncompliance with the rules and regulations of the Commission." By section 2 certain things are required of a shipper before he can avail himself of the "forfeitures or penalties" prescribed by the Commission, and it is expressly provided that the Commission shall fix the penalty per day per car to be paid by the carrier. By section 3 it was provided that, before a carrier could be "subjected to the penalties" of the act, it should have an opportunity to be heard before the Commission. All of the things required of the carrier by the act were owing by it to the public generally. They were public duties, and for their breach the penalties named in the act were imposed. The sum recovered by the shipper may or may not be compensatory. He may have sustained no damage. He need not show that he has. He makes out his case by proving the default and a compliance by him with the conditions precedent prescribed by the act. Again, his damage may be far in excess of the amount of the penalty. It is plain to us that the General Assembly intended to provide a punishment for the carrier's breach of its public duty as a means of compelling the performance of that duty. The conclusion that the act was intended to be at least mainly penal seems to be irresistible, when we consider that while this court held that the remedy afforded by the act was exclusive (Pennington v. Douglas Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 665 [3], 60 S. E. 485), the Supreme Court later took a different view, and held that, notwithstanding the act of 1905, suit might be brought for the actual damages which a shipper had sustained from the carrier's failure to promptly furnish cars. Southern Ry. Co. v. Moore, 133 Ga. 806, 67 S. E. 85, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851.

This brings us to a consideration of the several decisions construing the act. In none of them was the question now being dealt with presented, nor is there any authoritative language which requires a conclusion contrary to that which we have reached. In the Pennington Case, supra, Judge Russell spoke of the sum recoverable for failure of the carrier to furnish cars as "the liquidated damages provided for by the Steed bill (which are denominated as a penalty)." But that language must be considered in the light of the fact that the court's opinion that the remedy offered by the Steed bill was exclusive of an action for damages was subsequently held by the Supreme Court to be erroneous. In Smith Lumber Co. v. L. & N. R. Co., 4 Ga. App. 714, 62 S. E. 472, the Chief Judge characterized an action under the act as one "for damages arising from a breach of a public duty imposed upon the defendants by a rule of the Railroad Commission, and to recover the amount of damages fixed by the Commission for the violation of the rule." That case was likewise decided before the decision of the Supreme Court that the remedy under the act was not exclusive. In Southern Ry. Co. v. Melton, 133 Ga. 277, 65 S. E. 665, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, the main question dealt with was as to the power of the General Assembly to delegate to the Railroad Commission the authority to impose punishment for breach of a public duty. It was held, in substance, that as the General Assembly itself, in the act, declared that a penalty should be imposed, and had simply left to the Commission the power to investigate and declare by rule a reasonable sum to be exacted from the carrier, the act would be upheld. In characterizing the sum to be recovered the court said: "A consideration of the terms of the act of 1905 will show that the word 'penalty,' in the second section, was not employed in its strict sense, but as meaning a reasonable amount, to be fixed by the rule of the Commission, recoverable by the shipper on account of a failure to furnish cars to carry his freight within a reasonable time named in the rule." In Southern Ry. Co. v. Atlanta Sand & Supply Co., 135 Ga. 35, 68 S. E. 807, it was held that storage rule No. 9 of the Railroad Commission, properly construed, was reasonable, and did not violate any of the constitutional rights of the carrier. The nature of the recovery allowed by the rule was not discussed; it being simply referred to in the language of the act as a forfeiture or penalty. The matter was considered by this court in Zuber v. Southern Ry. Co., 9 Ga. App. 539, 71 S. E. 937, where Judge Powell thus states the conclusion of the court: "The exact nature of this liability, which attaches against the carrier and in favor of the shipper on account of a violation of these rules of the Railroad Commission, and which in the second section of the act of 1905 is called a penalty, has never been judicially declared. Some progress towards a definition has been made in the cases of Southern Ry. Co. v. Melton, 133 Ga. 277, 65 S. E. 665, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, and of Southern Ry. v. Moore, 133 Ga. 806, 67 S. E. 85, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, in the first of which it was held not to be a penalty in the sense in which that word is used to express the notion of criminal punishment for wrong, and in the other of which it was held not to be such liquidated damages as to preclude the shipper from resorting to his common-law remedy at his election. See, also, Southern Ry. Co. v. Atlanta Sand Co., 135 Ga. 35, 68 S. E. 807. Giving due effect to all of these cases, it may be said that these rules fix a liquidated sum in the nature of civil punitive damages which an offended shipper may recover from a delinquent carrier by pursuing the course mentioned in the act, but that the remedy thus given is not exclusive, and the shipper may nevertheless at his election bring his common-law action, in which event he must prove his damages and leave to the jury the assessment of the amount."

For the purposes of this decision we think it immaterial whether we speak of the recovery as "civil punitive damages," or as a strict statutory penalty, or what other name may be given it. Certain it is that the amount recoverable was not the exclusive substitute for the shipper's damage; certain it is that it is not strictly compensatory; and equally certain is it that no proof of damage is necessary to recover. What we hold is that the action is so far penal in its nature as that the suit must be brought within one year after the cause of action arises. It is immaterial that the person suing receives the whole of the recovery; for, as Judge Bleckley said in the Nunnally Case, supra, he, "if not literally an informer, is designated by statute to take the fruits of an action brought for the violation of a public penal law." Our conclusion is that the defendant's demurrer should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

CITY OF ALBANY v. LINDSEY. (No. 3,800.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 15*)—PERSONS IN LOCO PARENTIS.

One who, having accepted the gift of a child from its mother (the father being dead), thereafter duly performs the offices of a parent to the child, stands in loco parentis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 160-164; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 7*)—LOSS OF SERVICES OF CHILD—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The relationship created by acceptance from a mother of the gift of her fatherless infant, and by due performance of parental duties toward the child, raises a corresponding and correlative duty on the part of the child to render, in behalf of the person thus standing in loco parentis, such service of value as the child may be able to perform until it reaches its majority. And one who thus sustains the parental relation has a right of action against one who tortiously deprives him of the service of the child, for any loss of the service of the child, prior to its majority, which is due to the act of the tort-feasor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-99; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. DEATH (§ 18*)—ACTION FOR DEATH OF CHILD—LOSS OF SERVICES.

Though one who, by virtue of the gift of a child, followed by the acceptance of the gift and the performance of the duties of a parent towards it, is not entitled, under the provisions of section 4424 of the Civil Code of 1910, to recover the value of the life of the child, still, in an action predicated upon the tortious homicide of the child, he may recover for the loss of its services, upon proper proof that the child was able to render services, and of their value, as if the relation were that of master and servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

Error from City Court of Albany; D. F. Crosland, Judge.

Action by Maude Lindsey against the City of Albany. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. Tift Mann, of Albany, for plaintiff in error. Pope & Bennet, of Albany, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The ruling upon the demurrer, to which exception is taken, raises only one question, and, so far as we have been able to find, the precise point has never been decided in this state. It may be said that two questions are developed by the record: (1) Does the acceptance of the gift of a child from the mother, as its sole surviving parent, followed by the performance of parental duties on the part of the donee, create such a relation as that the latter stands to such child in loco parentis? (2) Does the relation created by the facts above stated give the donee the right to maintain an action to recover for loss of services of the child, caused by and based upon its tortious homicide?

[1] The question as to whether one who is not a parent, but merely stands in loco parentis, can recover for the full value of the life of the child is not involved in this case, and, if it were, we are inclined to the opinion that this right, being dependent upon a statute in derogation of the common law and penal in its nature, cannot appertain to one who is not an actual parent. It seems to us, however, that one who sustains to an orphan child the de facto relationship of a parent—cares for, protects, and ministers to its necessities, expending for the child his care and thought and money as if it were his own, thus performing all the duties of a parent, without objection from any source—would have created in his behalf a relationship from which the law would imply correlative filial duties (among them the rendering to the person thus standing in loco parentis of such services of value as the child might be able to perform, or should properly be required to perform, under the circumstances) until the child attains its majority.

The petition alleges that the child involved in the present case was given to the plaintiff by its mother while on her deathbed, and that she was the only surviving parent; that she knew that the child, shortly to be orphaned, would be left without any means of support, and gave him to the plaintiff, relinquishing to the plaintiff all right to the custody, control, and services of her infant boy, in consideration of the plaintiff's agreeing to accept the child and to maintain and educate him until he should be 21 years of age. The child was at that time about 6 months old. It is alleged in the petition that from the time of the gift the plaintiff maintained and educated the child, and performed all the duties of a parent toward him, and in doing so incurred an expense averaging about $100 per year, amounting to more than $1,000. The child, having been sent on an errand by its foster parent, was killed by coming in contact with an electric light wire belonging to the city of Albany, and the action is brought to recover the value of the child's services until he would have attained his majority.

We need not refer to any phase of the case, except to the question of the plaintiff's right to maintain the action, because the petition is not for any reason demurrable, unless it be upon the ground that this plaintiff is not entitled to recover for the tort, which is well pleaded. If the present plaintiff cannot maintain the action, no one can. In that view of the case, the question presented to us becomes both interesting and important, especially so when every humanitarian consideration impels all of us to encourage the care and protection of helpless orphan infants, who would be dependent upon charity, oftentimes too cold, unless the law recognizes that he who, in the kindness of his heart, performs for these helpless ones the tender offices of a parent is also entitled to parental rights. In fact, in such a case as is now before us, if the injured child had not died, but were living, maimed for life, the parental obligation of protecting the child during minority could not be performed, unless the person exercising the parental duties were given the right to ask for compensation and obtain redress for the injury done to his infant charge. This statement is only illustrative of what we have in mind, for, of course, it can be suggested that an action could be maintained by his next friend for an injury done to an infant; but the point we have in mind is that, for the very protection of the child himself in a case like the present (in which, according to the allegations of the plaintiff, the death of the child is due to the inexcusable negligence of a third person, and yet there can be no recovery unless the existence of a quasi parental relation is recognized), it should follow, as matter of law, that, if the relationship imposes the bearing of burdens, it also confers the rights usually inherent thereto.

We think that under the spirit of the rulings in Eaves v. Fears, 131 Ga. 820 (2), 64 S. E. 260, Howard v. Randolph, 134 Ga. 691, 68 S. E. 586, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 294, 20 Ann. Cas. 892, and Hicks v. Williams, 135 Ga.

433, 69 S. E. 547, it is perfectly sound to hold that one who accepts the gift of a child and, in pursuance of the gift, performs all the parental duties towards it, stands in loco parentis to the child. It is true that in the Hicks Case and in the Eaves Case the gift was made by the father, and therefore these cases fall squarely under the provisions of section 3021 of the Civil Code of 1910, and that the case of Howard v. Randolph, supra, was one in which the child sought to maintain an action to recover for service rendered to the person who had occupied the parental relation; but the controlling reason underlying all these rulings is the same, and therefore the ruling in a case where the gift was made by the mother as sole surviving parent should be the same as that which applies where the gift is made by the father, although the relinquishment of parental rights in the case of the father, and the subsequent rights of the donee, are fixed by the Code, and even though it is true that under section 3022 the rights of the mother, upon the death of the father, are limited to the possession of the child "until his arrival at such age as his education requires a guardian to take possession of him," and there is no expression of any means by which she can transfer her right to another, or substitute any one else in her place. It is also true that section 3022, in defining the obligation of a parent (following the common law), refers to the father, and makes no reference to the mother, and it is insisted that a manifest difference between the rights of the mother and the rights of the father is evidenced by the provision that a minor whose father is dead may, upon attaining the age of 14 years, select as his guardian some person other than his mother (section 3035).

All of these considerations depend upon the fact that at common law a legitimate child was largely the child of his father, and but very little the child of his mother, no matter what the circumstances. A reference to two decisions of the Supreme Court at least shows a gradual recognition of greater maternal rights, and the enactment of section 4424 (which is statutory in its original) indicates a similar legislative policy. In Ansley v. Jordan, 61 Ga. 488 (6), the Supreme Court declined to decide whether a mother had the right to the service of her son during his minority, and placed its ruling, upholding the refusal of a nonsuit, upon the ground that it was competent for the plaintiff to consent to be hired out by his mother and to represent her as her agent in making the contract upon which the action was based. In McElmurray v. Turner, 86 Ga. 219 (3) 12 S. E. 359, Mr. Justice Simmons sustained the right of the mother to foreclose a special lien on certain crops, not only for her own labor, but that of her minor children, upon the theory that as the mother was a widow, and entitled to the possession of her minor children, she was entitled to their labor and their earnings. In the McElmurray Case it does not appear what was the age of the children, but Mr. Justice Simmons says: "Being entitled, under the law, to the possession of the children, she was entitled to their labor and earnings. If she had hired those minor children to the landlord, she could have recovered in an action against him for their hire. This being true, what rule is there in law, or what reason is there in common sense, which would prevent her from suing out a laborer's lien in her own name for the labor of her minor children, as well as her own labor?"

Even if rulings in this state go no further than to hold that one may stand in loco parentis by virtue of the father's relinquishment of his parental control, we think that, upon reason and principle, the gift of a mother (in a case in which the mother is the sole surviving parent) can create the same relation. The principle is well recognized in other jurisdictions. In Whitaker v. Warren, 60 N. H. 20, 49 Am. Rep. 302, it is held that, where an infant dies by the negligence of another, one standing in loco parentis may recover from him for medical expenses and future loss of service up to the time of death. The New Hampshire court did not express any opinion as to whether the plaintiff could have recovered for loss of service after the death and for the period of its infancy, for no such recovery was sought. In the Whitaker Case the action was brought for nursing and care after the injury, and for medicines and medical attendance; but the court was compelled to rule, and did rule, upon the general nature of the relationship under a state of facts practically identical with those now before us, and as to this it held that "the facts stated are evidence tending to show that the plaintiff stood in loco parentis to the child, and while this relation existed the plaintiff was entitled to all the rights of a parent," citing Freto v. Brown, 4 Mass. 675, Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 812, 53 Am. Dec. 301, and Cooley on Torts, 235. The ruling of the New Hampshire court is recognized as sound in the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure (29 Cyc. 1672), in which the principle is broadly stated that "a person in loco parentis may recover, against a wrongdoer who is responsible for the injury to the child, for the resulting expense and loss of services." In Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 812, 53 Am. Dec. 301, it was held that "persons standing in loco parentis are entitled to the rights and subject to the liabilities of an actual parent, though not legally compelled to assume that relation." We conclude, therefore, that one who, having accepted the gift of a child from its mother (its father being dead), thereafter duly performs the offices of a parent to the child, stands in loco parentis.

[2] 2. Having ruled that the plaintiff stood in loco parentis, her right to recover is clearly established by numerous adjudications of the Supreme Court. As an actual parent the plaintiff could sue for loss of service caused by the death of a minor child, even at common law and without any statute; the right being assumed to rest upon the same rule which entitles a master to recover for injuries to his servant. See Shields v. Yonge, 15 Ga. 349, 60 Am. Dec. 698; Chick v. Southwestern R. R. Co., 57 Ga. 357. In McDowell v. Georgia R. R. Co., 60 Ga. 320, the Supreme Court, while holding that a father could not recover for the homicide of his minor daughter, ruled that he might recover for the loss of her service to the time of her majority. The right of a father to recover for the loss of service resultant upon the homicide of his child, from the time of his injury until the child would have been 21 years of age, is also recognized in Augusta Factory v. Davis, 87 Ga. 648-650, 13 S. E. 577, Frazier v. Georgia R. R. Co., 101 Ga. 70, 28 S. E. 684, King v. Southern Ry. Co., 126 Ga. 794, 55 S. E. 965, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 544, Southern Ry. Co. v. Flemister, 120 Ga. 524 (5), 48 S. E. 160, and Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 93 Ga. 742 (1), 21 S. E. 157. Though one who, by virtue of the gift of a child, followed by acceptance of the gift and performance of the duties of a parent towards it, is not entitled to recover the value of the life of the child in an action predicated upon the tortious homicide of the child (this because section 4424 of the Civil Code is penal in its nature, and the rights conferred must be limited to those only who are expressly mentioned), still he may recover for the loss of its services, upon proper proof that the child was able to render services, and of their value, as if the relation were that of master and servant.

[3] 3. The learned counsel for the plaintiff in error argues that under the ruling in Bell v. Central R. Co., 73 Ga. 520, the plaintiff's declaration is demurrable, even if the alleged gift and acceptance be construed as a legal adoption, because section 4412 is declaratory of the common law. Granting that the section cited is declaratory of the common law, it cannot be said that the adoption of children (which was unknown to the common law of England) exists only in this state by special statute. The ruling in the Eaves Case, supra, is proof to the contrary; and if it be conceded that a surviving mother should have the same rights to the parental control and the services of a minor child as the father would have, if he were in life, then there can be no question about this plaintiff's right to recover, unless her right is precluded by the provisions of section 3025 of the Civil Code, which gives a minor above the age of 14 the privilege of selecting a guardian, and we do not think that the bare possibility of such a contingency, which might never have occurred, should deprive one who has for years discharged the obligations of a parent of his reasonable expectancy that the object of his benefaction would, under the influence of natural gratitude, make such return in service as would reasonably have been expected if the orphan had been his actual child.

We find no error in the judgment overruling the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 101*)—CONFLICTING JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSES.

The Legislature may by law provide that cases pending in a city court, which is to be abolished, shall be transferred and stand for trial in the superior court of the county in which the city court is located, and may include in the transfer accusations charging misdemeanors. As to misdemeanors there is no constitutional guaranty that the accused shall be first indicted or presented by a grand jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CONTEMPT (§ 66*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PUNISH—WRIT OF ERROR—PARTIES.

The state is a necessary party defendant in error to a bill of exceptions complaining of a judgment and sentence against the plaintiff in error for a criminal contempt, instituted for the purpose of vindicating the court's authority, and not for the purpose of enforcing a civil right of an aggrieved party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 213-215, 223-237; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

Error from City Court of Douglas; W. D. Bule, Judge.

Action between the Auto Highball Company and others and W. F. Sibbett and another. From the judgment, the Auto High-ball Company and others bring error. Dismissed.

Scott & Davis, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Rogers & Heath, Chastain & Henson, J. W. Quincey, and Lawson Kelley, all of Douglas, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. The writ of error was dismissed because the bill of exceptions appeared not to have been filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court within the time required by law. A motion to reinstate the writ of error was made by the plaintiff in error, upon the ground that while, from the date of filing entered on the bill of exceptions, it appeared that that document was not filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court within the time required by law, yet as a matter of fact it was filed within due time, and the date of the filing indorsed on the bill of exceptions by the clerk was erroneous. Upon a consideration of this motion, this court directed the clerk of the trial court to further certify with reference to the date upon which the bill of exceptions was actually filed in his office. The clerk has certified that the bill of exceptions was filed in his office on March 12, 1912, and, in accordance with the direction of this court the date of filing has been changed on the bill of exceptions, so as to read, "Filed in office March 12, 1912." But the motion to reinstate the writ of error will not be granted, because the writ of error must be dismissed for the reason hereinafter indicated.

A motion to dismiss the writ of error was made on the ground that there were no proper parties defendant in error named in the bill of exceptions, and upon whom service was perfected. Contempts are both civil and criminal. Where the object of the contempt proceeding is the obtaining of relief by a complaining party, such as the payment of damages for the violation of an injunction order and the like, the proceeding is civil in its nature. Gompers v. Buck Stove Range Co., 221 U. S. 418, 31 Sup. Ct. 492, 55 L. Ed. 797, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874; Howard v. Durand, 36 Ga. 346, 91 Am. Dec. 767; Ball v. Wright, 115 Ga. 729, 42 S. E. 32; Warner v. Martin 124 Ga. 387, 52 S. E. 446, 4 Ann. Cas. 180. Where, however the proceeding is brought solely for the purpose of vindicating the authority of the court, and not for the relief of an aggrieved party, the proceeding is criminal in its nature. Bradley v. State, 111 Ga. 168, 36 S. E. 630, 50 L. R. A. 691, 78 Am. St. Rep. 157; State v. Steele, 112 Ga. 39, 42, 37 S. E. 174. In a criminal prosecution for contempt, the state is a proper party; and if exception is taken to a judgment attaching a party for criminal contempt, the state must be made a party defendant in error in the reviewing court. In the present bill of exceptions no defendant in error is specifically named. Apparently the plaintiff in error sought to make the parties in the original case, out of which the contempt grew, parties to the writ of error, because service of the bill of exceptions was acknowledged by counsel for both parties in the main case. It is true that service of the bill of exceptions was also acknowledged by the solicitor of the city court of Douglas; but since the state was not a party in the court below, and nowhere mentioned in the bill of exceptions as a party, mere service upon the solicitor would not have the effect of making the state a party in the Court of Appeals, even if such solicitor was the party to acknowledge service for the state. We are quite clear that we have no jurisdiction of the writ of error, and the bill of exceptions will therefore be dismissed for want of a proper party defendant in error.

We, however, express our views upon the merits of the case, since the question will likely arise again. The judgment entered for contempt by the judge of the state court was clearly void. It appears that a subpoena duces tecum, regularly issued by the city court of Douglas, was served upon the Auto Highball Company and J. H. Walton, who was described in the caption of the subpoena as "secretary and treasurer." No response was made to this subpoena, and a rule nisi for contempt was regularly issued, calling upon him and the Auto Highball Company to show cause why they should not be dealt with as in contempt of court. At the time fixed for the return of the rule the respondents did not appear, either in person or by counsel, or offer to show cause why they should not be attached for contempt. Thereupon the rule nisi was made absolute, and a judgment was entered against J. H. Walton and the Auto Highball Company that they be imprisoned in the common jail of Coffee county, but that the imprisonment might be relieved by the payment at any time of the sum of $25. Of course, the sentence against the corporation was void, because a corporation cannot be attached for contempt. Simmons v. Georgia Iron & Coal Co., 117 Ga. 305, 319, 43 S. E. 780, 61 L. R. A. 739. We think it was likewise void as to Walton. This being a criminal prosecution, the judge had no power to impose sentence in the absence of the respondent. The proper course to have pursued would have been to have issued an attachment for the person who had failed to respond to the rule nisi for contempt, have him arrested and brought into court, and have dealt with him in the manner provided by law. The sentence of the court, imposed upon the respondent in his absence, was absolutely void, and cannot be enforced against him. This does not mean that the court is still without power to issue an attachment and have the contumacious witness brought before it to be dealt with. When the respondent is regularly brought before the court, it will then be time to determine whether or not such facts exist as will justify punishment as for contempt.

Writ of error dismissed.

ÆTNA LIFE INS. CO. v. CONWAY.

(No. 3,705.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 30, 1912.)

INSURANCE (§§ 256, 258, 261, 291*) — AVOIDANCE—MISREPRESENTATIONS OF INSURED.

An applicant for life insurance must act "in the utmost good faith" in disclosing to the insurer all things material to the risk about which information is sought. A misrepresentation in reference to any matter which materially affects the nature, extent, or character of the risk will void the policy; and the willful concealment of a material fact will have the same effect. Where an applicant for life insurance willfully conceals from the insurer the fact of a previous illness, such concealment will avoid the policy, if the disease was of such a character as to enhance the risk. The fact that the insured may have died a short while after the policy was issued, from a disease with which he was not afflicted when the policy was issued, does not conclusively show that the fact of the previous illness was not material, within the meaning of the rule above announced.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by E. B. Conway against the Ætna Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hill & Wright, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. On February 4, 1909, William O. Conway made written application to the plaintiff in error for a policy of life insurance on his own life. The applicant was examined as to the condition of his health by the company's physician, and on February 8, 1909, the policy was issued in favor of the wife of the insured as beneficiary. A few days after the policy was issued the company received information which aroused its suspicions in reference to the physical condition of the insured, and in May, after several efforts had been made by the company's physician to obtain another examination, the insured was finally again examined by the physician in May. From this examination it developed that the insured was suffering with Bright's disease, from which he died in September, 1909. As soon as the company ascertained that the insured had Bright's disease, it tendered back the premium and demanded the surrender of the policy for cancellation. The insured refused to comply with this demand, and after his death his widow brought suit upon the policy. The company defended upon the ground that the insured had made material misrepresentations in his application, and had willfully concealed material facts which enhanced the risk, and that for these reasons the policy was void.

The application was copied in and made a part of the contract of insurance. The policy contained the following stipulation: "All statements made by the insured shall, in the absence of fraud, be deemed representations, and not warranties, and no such statement shall avoid the policy, or be used in defense to a claim under it, unless it is contained in the written application for this policy and copied hereon." The following representations were made by the insured in his application: "I do hereby declare that I am in sound health, and have no disease or ailment not fully set forth herein; that the statements and answers herein made (including those on the second page hereof) and signed by me are complete and true, and I agree that they shall form a part of the contract or policy issued by said company upon my life." In the application the insured was asked to give the names and addresses of all the physicians whom he had consulted within the last five years. He answered that he had consulted none, except Dr. J. B. Benson and Dr. G. W. Willett. He was further asked to state the particulars of each illness he had had during the last seven years, with the names of the attending physicians. His reply was as follows: "Jaundice 7 years ago, one month. Colic one day. (No gall stone or kidney stone.) Diabetic." The insured was also asked: "Have you had any of the following diseases? Answer 'yes' or 'no' opposite each." To each of which the insured answered, "No," as follows, to wit: "Habitual headache, No; liver complaint, No; neuralgia, No." It is undisputed that during the summer of 1907 the insured was ill for several weeks. He was examined and treated by one physician, who diagnosed the disease as probably acute Bright's disease. The symptoms were severe pains in the back, followed by fever, severe headache, and the swelling of the eyes, face, and ankles, and other parts of the body, and a loss of 25 pounds in weight. It is further undisputed that the statement of the insured that he had consulted no physician other than Drs. J. B. Benson and G. W. Willett, was untrue, and that he had in fact consulted and been treated by four or five other physicians at various times. It was also shown that the answer of the insured, that he had never had habitual headache, liver complaint, and neuralgia, were untrue; that as a matter of fact, not a great while before the policy was issued, he had been treated by one physician for habitual headache, and that at other times he had also been treated for liver complaint and neuralgia.

The testimony of the experts indicates that these disorders are symptomatic of Bright's disease. He was treated for habitual headache by Dr. Willett in 1908, and, while this physician was not positive that the insured had Bright's disease at the time, the condition of the insured was such as to indicate auto-intoxication, a symptom of kidney disease and an indication of Bright's disease. Neither did the examination of this physician, nor the examination of Dr. Todd, the company's physician, in 1909, disclose the presence of albumen in the urine; but the evidence is conclusive that a man might have Bright's disease, and the presence of albumen not be discovered upon an examination of the urine. In May, 1909, when Dr. Todd again examined the insured, he was in an advanced stage of Bright's disease. There was testimony of expert physicians that this disease might develop within a few weeks, and there was also evidence of nonexperts to the effect that at the time the policy was issued the insured was a robust man and apparently in sound health. While the evidence as a whole strongly points to the conclusion that the insured had Bright's disease at the time the policy was issued, and probably for some time before, there was perhaps enough evidence for the jury to find that he was in sound health at the time of the issuance of the policy. The case was submitted to the jury, and they found for the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The law applicable to the issues raised in the case is found in the following sections of the Code of 1910:

"Sec. 2479. Every application for insurance must be made in the utmost good faith, and the representations contained in such application are considered as covenanted to be true by the applicant. Any variation by which the nature, or extent, or character of the risk is changed will void the policy.

"Sec. 2480. Any verbal or written representations of facts by the assured to induce the acceptance of the risk, if material, must be true, or the policy is void. If, however, the party has no knowledge, but states on the representation of others, bona fide, and so informs the insurer, the falsity of the information does not void the policy.

"Sec. 2481. A failure to state a material fact, if not done fraudulently, does not void; but the willful concealment of such a fact, which would enhance the risk, will void the policy."

"Sec. 2483. Willful misrepresentation by the assured, or his agent, as to the interest of the assured, or as to other insurance, or as to any other material inquiry made, will void the policy."

It is immaterial whether the statements made by the applicant for insurance were representations or warranties, since the effect of such statements must be determined by the provisions of these sections of the Code, without reference to whether the statements may be regarded technically as representations or as warranties. If the representations were untrue, and the nature or extent or the character of the risk was changed by the representations, the policy was void under the express terms of section 2479. Any statement or representation, whether verbal or written, made to induce the acceptance of the risk, if material to the risk, must be true, or the policy is void under the express terms of section 2480, unless the applicant informs the company that the statements are made upon hearsay and are also made in good faith. The willful concealment of a material fact which tends to enhance the risk voids the policy, under the express terms of section 2481; and, under section 2483, a willful misrepresentation in reference to any material inquiry will void the policy. In the case of a representation the important inquiries are: (1) Was the representation false? (2) If false, was it made in reference to a matter material to the risk? In the case of a concealment of a fact, the important inquiries are: (1) Was the concealment willful? (2) Did it relate to a matter material to the risk?

The insured stated unequivocally that he was in sound health. If this was untrue, and if he in fact was suffering from a serious disorder, which made him an undesirable risk, the policy would be void. Sou. Life Ins. Co. v. Hill, 8 Ga. App. 857, 70 S. E. 186. We do not mean to say that if an applicant for insurance acts in the utmost good faith, and fairly discloses to the company all of the information in his possession which would throw any light upon the condition of his health and the desirability of the risk, the policy would be void, even though it developed that he suffered from a disorder as to which he had no knowledge, and the existence of which was not ascertained by the examining physicians. But fraud voids all contracts, and there is nothing in the law relating to insurance contracts which alters this universal principle. Indeed, as if to emphasize the doctrine, section 2479 of the Code provides that every application for insurance must be made in the "utmost good faith," and any variation which changes the nature, the extent, or the character of the risk will void the policy. The question of the materiality of a representation or of a fact concealed is primarily one for the jury.

The position assumed by counsel for the defendant in error is that the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff should not be disturbed, because they could have found that the insured did not have Bright's disease at the time the policy was issued, and that if the disease developed afterwards, and from causes which did not exist at the time the policy was issued, none of the representations made by the insured in reference to his previous illness and in reference to the physicians whom he had consulted and by whom he had been treated could have materially affected the risk. We do not believe that this is the exclusive test of the materiality of a representation. When an application for insurance is made, the attitude of the company is that if, in the opinion of its officers, the applicant is a desirable risk, his application will be accepted and the policy issued upon payment of the premium required. It is purely a matter of voluntary contract. The company is not bound to issue the policy, and may refuse to do so without giving any reason for its action. The question, therefore, is, if the applicant had dealt "in the utmost good faith," and disclosed the nature and extent of his previous illness, and disclosed the names of the physicians by whom he had been treated, would he still have been a desirable risk, and would the company have accepted him as such? "In general, it may be said that the test, in determining whether questions contained in an application for insurance are material, is whether the knowledge or ignorance of the facts sought to be elicited thereby would materially influence the action of the insurer." Cooley, Briefs on the Law of Insurance, III, p. 1953.

If the applicant in the present case had truthfully answered the questions propounded to him, inquiry from the physicians by whom he had been treated, and a consideration of the symptoms which developed during the progress of the illness from which he had suffered, would have disclosed a condition which one of the physicians diagnosed as the beginning of Bright's disease. As explained by the company's agent in the testimony: "The reason for making inquiry of an applicant for insurance as to the sickness that he has previously had and the physicians who waited upon him is with a view of ascertaining if there has been any sickness that would materially affect the applicant's longevity and to make further inquiry about the sickness referred to in the application. That is with a view of getting the details, detailed information regarding any sickness that may look suspicious to them, from those doctors." The company's physician, Dr. Todd, testified that, if a man suffered with the disorders which the insured had during 1907 and 1908, he would be a very doubtful insurance risk; that "it would impair the risk very much, knowing of those things, especially with the neuralgia, as that is a symptom of Bright's disease, and headaches are also a symptom." And again he says: "Had I known those things, I would certainly have examined him a time or two. I would not have passed him on one examination, and I would certainly have made inquiry about it." And further: "If at the time I examined him first I had been told that he had neuralgic influenza, enlargement of the liver, congestion about the brain, I would not have reported him to the company until further examination; assuredly, I would not. I would have inquired about those things."

It is suggested that there is nothing to show that the insured acted in bad faith; that, so far as appears, he may have forgotten about the physicians he consulted and whose names he withheld from the company; that he may have honestly overlooked the fact that he was ill in 1907 for about eight weeks, during which time he was treated by two or three physicians for disorders which were symptoms of Bright's disease. It appears, from the evidence, that after this protracted illness in 1907 the accused brought suit against an indemnity company to recover for this very illness. The suit was filed October 22, 1907, the petition was verified by the affidavit of the insured, and in it he alleged that he was taken ill on April 13, 1907, and was continuously sick until May 14, 1907, and, after being up for 3 days, was again taken ill, and remained so until the 8th day of July, 1907; that during this period he was confined in the house, and wholly disabled and prevented from performing any and every duty pertaining to his occupation and business for the period of 12 weeks and 3 days. It is inconceivable that the insured could have been acting in good faith when he concealed the existence of this protracted illness from the company, after having brought suit in reference to it, and when he concealed the names of the physicians who treated him for it; and, while the question of bona fides in a case of this character is primarily one for the jury, the evidence in this record demands the finding that the insured had not acted in good faith, and that the representations made by him and the concealment of the fact that he had suffered from a long and protracted illness, and had been treated for other disorders which were symptomatic of Bright's disease, were material to the risk and avoided the policy. The evidence further disclosed that the company had no knowledge in reference to this misrepresentation until after the policy was issued, and that promptly upon discovery of fraud it offered to restore the premium and cancel the policy.

Under the facts appearing in this record, the evidence demanded a verdict in favor of the company, and the court should have granted a new trial upon this ground, without reference to the special assignments of error therein contained. D. R. WILDER MFG. CO. v. CORN PRODUCTS REFINING CO. (No. 3,771.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MONOPOLIES (§ 23*)—COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE—EFFECT ON VALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

Suit was brought upon a contract to recover the purchase price of goods sold and delivered. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was an unlawful combination and conspiracy, formed for the purpose of restraining interstate trade, in violation of the acts of Congress; that through a system of contracts with various purchasers it had secured a monopoly of the business; and that the defendant was forced to purchase the commodity from the plaintiff upon whatever terms could be made. The contract of sale was in writing, and provided that the seller would set aside, out of its profits from the manufacture and sale of the commodity for a certain period, an amount equal to 10 cents per hundred pounds on all purchases of the commodity which should be made by the plaintiff during a certain period. It was agreed that this rebate or discount should be paid to the defendant at the end of the year next succeeding the period above mentioned, on condition that for the remainder of the previous year and during the whole of the next year the defendant should have purchased the commodity exclusively from the plaintiff. It was averred, in the answer, that under the working of this system of contracts each purchaser was placed and kept in a situation whereby, if any competing firm entered into the business, the purchaser, by dealing with such competing firm, would sacrifice a large rebate on the last year's purchases of goods. It was further averred that the entire system of contracts was designed for the purpose of preventing competition, and did in fact prevent competition. It was further averred that the prices charged by the plaintiff were unreasonable; and that each order for goods bought by the defendant contained a clause reciting that the goods were for consumption by the defendant only, and not for resale. It was further averred that the original combination, the series of contracts referred to in the answer, the stipulation against resale and the individual sales, all constituted elements of a general plan or design which, in its entirety, constituted a combination or conspiracy intended and having the effect to restrain and monopolize interstate trade and commerce, in violation of the Sherman anti-trust act of July 2, 1890 (Act July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3200]); and that the account upon which the suit was brought was made up, in the knowledge of both the defendant and the plaintiff, with direct reference to the agreement heretofore referred to. Held, that the facts set forth in the answer constituted no defense to the action, and that the answer was properly stricken, on motion in the nature of a general demurrer. The case of Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Voight, 212 U. S. 227, 29 Sup. Ct. 280, 53 L. Ed. 486, is distinguishable from the present case, which falls within the principle announced in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 540, 22 Sup. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Corn Products Refining Company against the D. R. Wilder Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Corn Products Refining Company brought its action against the D. R. Wilder Manufacturing Company upon an open account for goods sold and delivered. The defendant filed an answer, admitting the purchase of the goods at the price stated in the account, but set up the following defense:

"The defendant further shows to the court that the plaintiff is an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade, being a corporation formed by the consolidation of the Glucose Refining Co., the American Glucose Co., the United States Sugar Refining Co., the Pope Glucose Co., the Illinois Sugar Refining Co., the National Starch Co., the United Starch Co., the Corn Products Co., the Warner Sugar Refining Co., the St. Louis Syrup & Preserving Co., the New York Glucose Co., and many other firms and corporations which, before the formation of the plaintiff company, were independent and competing manufacturing concerns, manufacturing and selling goods of the kind sued for in the plaintiff's complaint. Said combination was for the purpose of monopolizing and restraining interstate trade in the products handled by the plaintiff, and did result in a monopoly of interstate trade, and in greatly advancing the price at which said commodities were sold, and constituted a combination or conspiracy, in violation of the federal statute. Shortly after said combination was effectuated, and while the plaintiff controlled an absolute monopoly of the glucose and grape sugar industry, the plaintiff inaugurated a system of contracts with its purchasers, which it referred to as its 'profit-sharing plan.' Under said system of contracts, it agreed to give to its purchasers a rebate of some certain amount per hundred pounds upon all purchases of glucose or grape sugar during any years, provided and upon the condition that the said purchaser, during the following year, gave to the said Corn Products Refining Co. its exclusive patronage. All of said contracts were substantially similar, except that the amount of the rebate varied from year to year. The defendant attaches hereto, as Exhibit A, a copy of the contract relative to the rebate on its 1906 business, under which it was agreed to give the defendant a rebate of 10 cents per hundred pounds on all shipments of glucose purchased by it from the plaintiff during 1906, provided it gave to the plaintiff its exclusive trade during the year 1907. A substantially similar contract was entered into relative to trades in 1907, and relative to trades in 1908 and 1909, with this difference, relative to the two latter years, viz., that the rebate was advanced from 10 cents to 15 cents per hundred pounds. The defendant alleges that substantially similar contracts were given to practically all consumers of glucose and grape sugar in the United States. The defendant alleges that at the time said so-called 'profit-sharing plan' was originated, the plaintiff was the sole firm or corporation in the United States manufacturing and selling glucose and grape sugar, having absorbed all independent and competing concerns; and this defendant and the other manufacturing plants which consumed glucose or grape sugar in the United States were forced to purchase from the plaintiff upon whatever terms could be made, a part of which terms are embraced in this so-called 'profit-sharing plan.'

"Under the working of said system of contracts, each purchaser of glucose or grape sugar was placed and kept in a situation whereby, if any independent or competing firm or corporation entered into the business of manufacturing or selling glucose or grape sugar, such purchaser, by dealing with such independent or competing firm, would sacrifice a large rebate on the previous year's business by giving his trade to such independent or competing concern. The entire system of contracts herein outlined, and the contracts hereinafter referred to, were designed for the purpose of preventing competition from arising in the business which had previously been monopolized by the plaintiff company, and did, in fact, have such effect to a large extent. Defendant alleges that the plaintiff advanced the price of glucose and grape sugar to such exorbitant extent that a few independent concerns have been created, and are now attempting to compete with the plaintiff, and are offering lower prices than those asked by the plaintiff, but are having great difficulty in doing so, because of the fact that the plaintiff has heretofore obtained a hold upon so large a part of the consumers through the working of the system of contracts heretofore described as the so-called 'profit-sharing plan.' The plaintiff is claiming that any consumer who now trades with the said independent concerns forfeits to the plaintiff the rebate on the 1908 business, and is thereby coercing a large number of consumers into buying from the plaintiff at its advanced prices. The defendant alleges that the prices charged by the plaintiff, even after deducting the rebates, are in excess of the prices charged by the independent firms that are now attempting to compete with the plaintiff, and the prices heretofore charged for glucose and grape sugar prior to organization of the plaintiff company, but that the immediate sacrifice claimed by the plaintiff against any consumer who trades with independent concerns, as heretofore described, is so great, and so many consumers are uncertain that said independent concerns will continue to do business, that the plaintiff is able to control and coerce a large part of the trade, and still controls a partial monopoly of the trade.

"The defendant shows that each purchase made by it, and by other purchasers, from the Corn Products Refining Co. contained the following clause in the contract of purchase: 'The goods herein sold are for your own consumption only, and not for resale.' The defendant shows that the sales for the purchase price of which suit is brought were made under the system of contracts herein outlined. The defendant shows that the original combination, the series of contracts known as the 'profit-sharing plan,' the provision heretofore referred to in the contracts of sale, and the individual sales, all constituted elements of one general plan or design, which, in its entirety, constitutes a combination or conspiracy intended and having the effect directly to restrain and monopolize interstate trade and commerce, in violation of the federal anti-trust act of July 2, 1890. The defendant alleges that the account on which suit is brought was made up, within the knowledge of both it and the plaintiff, with direct reference to and in execution of the agreement heretofore referred to; and that there cannot be a recovery upon said account. Defendant avers that under its contract with the plaintiff for 1908 the plaintiff agreed to allow the defendant a rebate of 15 cents per hundred pounds on all purchases of glucose and grape sugar during the year 1908, upon the conditions heretofore set out. The defendant avers that 15 cents per hundred pounds upon all of its purchases for 1908 amounts to the sum of seventeen hundred and ninety-seven dollars and one cent ($1,797.01). The defendant alleges that the limitation or condition in said contract that it should trade only with the plaintiff is illegal, being in restraint of interstate trade, in violation of the federal anti-trust act, as heretofore alleged, and is therefore not binding upon this defendant; and that this defendant is entitled to said amount, notwithstanding its failure to comply with said condition. The defendant therefore prays that said amount be allowed as a counterclaim against the plaintiff; and that it may have judgment for said amount."

The contract between the parties, evidencing what is termed in the answer the "profit-sharing plan," was in the form of a letter, as follows (addressed to the defendant company and signed by the plaintiffs): "This company, recognizing the fact that its own prosperity, in a great measure, is interwoven with the good will and co-operation of its patrons, has decided to adopt a liberal plan of profit sharing with you, in case you shall in the future continue to give us your exclusive patronage. This company inaugurates such a policy of profit sharing by announcing that it will set aside, out of its profits from the manufacture and sale of glucose and grape sugar for the last six months of 1906, an amount equal to ten cents per hundred pounds on all shipments of glucose and grape sugar (Warner's anhydrous and bread sugar excepted) which shall have been made to you by this company from July 1st to December 31, 1906. This amount will be paid to you or your successors on Dec. 31, 1907, on condition that for the remainder of the year 1906 and the entire year 1907 you or your successors shall have purchased exclusively from this company or its successors all the glucose and grape sugar required for use in your establishment. With the assurance of steadfast co-operation of its customers, given in reciprocation for the benefits conferred upon them, this company confidently anticipates a continuance of such profit-sharing distribution annually to the full extent that its earnings may warrant."

The plaintiff moved to strike the answer, and the motion was sustained. The opinion of the trial judge was thus expressed in his order: "This motion is sustained, and the defendant's plea is stricken. The defendant never having made any contract to buy exclusively from the plaintiff, this case does not, in my opinion, come within the decision in the case of Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Voight, 212 U. S. 227 [29 Sup. Ct. 280, 53 L. Ed. 486]." The plaintiff excepted.

Smith, Hastings & Ransom, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Austin, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. We do not find it necessary to discuss at any great length the question whether, conceding the facts alleged in the answer to be true, the plaintiff is an unlawful combination, within the meaning of the federal anti-trust act. The answer was clearly subject to special demurrer. The allegation that the plaintiff is an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade, and was formed for the purpose of monopolizing and restraining trade, is clearly a conclusion of the pleader; and no sufficient facts seem to be alleged to support this conclusion and bring the case within the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, and United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 31 Sup. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663. But, in view of the fact that there was no special demurrer to the answer, but only a general motion to strike made at the trial term, it may be that, under the practice prevailing in this state, the general averment that the plaintiff corporation was an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade, formed for the purpose of monopolizing such trade, and did, in fact, result in a monopoly of interstate trade and in greatly advancing the price at which the commodities controlled by the plaintiff were sold, are sufficient to show that the plaintiff is an illegal combination, under the federal anti-trust act. However, as stated above, we make no express ruling on this question.

For the purposes of this case, we may concede that the plaintiff is such an illegal combination and conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade as that it would be subject to the penalties imposed by the Sherman anti-trust act. It by no means follows, however, that the defendant can avoid paying for the goods sold by the plaintiff and consumed by the defendant. In the case of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 540, 22 Sup. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679, it was expressly ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States that a violation of the Sherman anti-trust act by a combination in restraint of trade, by which a penalty is incurred under the statute, does not prevent the company from recovering under a contract for the purchase price of goods. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court in that case, saying, among other things: "If the contract between the plaintiff corporation and the other named corporations, persons, and companies, or the combination thereby formed, was illegal under the act of Congress, then all those, whether persons, corporations, or associations, directly connected therewith became subject to the penalties prescribed by Congress. But the act does not declare illegal or void any sale made by such combination, or by its agents, of property it acquired, or which came into its possession for the purpose of being sold; such property not being at the time in the course of transportation from one state to another, or to a foreign country. The buyer could not refuse to comply with his contract of purchase, upon the ground that the seller was an illegal combination which might be restrained or suppressed in the mode prescribed by the act of Congress; for Congress did not declare that a combination illegally formed under the act of 1890 should not, in the conduct of its business, become the owner of property which it might sell to whomsoever wished to buy it. So that there is no necessary legal connection here between the sale of pipe to the defendants by the plaintiff corporation and the alleged arrangement made by it with other corporations, companies, and firms. The contracts under which the pipe in question was sold were, as already said, collateral to the arrangement for the combination referred to, and this is not an action to enforce the terms of such arrangement. That combination may have been illegal, and yet the sale to the defendants was valid."

The plaintiff in error relies upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Voight, 212 U. S. 227, 29 Sup. Ct. 280, 53 L. Ed. 486. In that case the Continental Wall Paper Company brought suit upon an open account to recover the agreed price of goods sold to the defendant. The defense relied upon was that the plaintiff was an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade, in violation of the Sherman anti-trust act, and facts are set forth in great detail in support of this allegation. It appeared that the plaintiff was a combination of a number of smaller companies which had been engaged in the manufacture and sale of wall paper, and that these several companies entered into a written agreement with the Continental Wall Paper Company which the Supreme Court construed to constitute a conspiracy to restrain interstate trade and form a monopoly for the purpose of controlling the manufacture and sale of wall paper, in violation of the anti-trust act. It appeared that it was part of the agreement actually entered into between these various companies that all jobbers and other wholesalers of wall paper should be forced to sign an agreement binding themselves to purchase their entire stock of wall paper nominally either from the plaintiff, or from the corporations or firms which had combined to form the large corporation, at the prices fixed by the combination; and that the jobbers and wholesalers should sell only at prices fixed by the seller, under penalty, which the combination of all of the corporations and firms enabled them to enforce, that such jobbers or wholesalers, in case of a refusal to accede to the terms so imposed, or in case of a violation thereof, should be unable to buy wall paper, should be driven out of business, and should sacrifice the good will and capital therein invested. It further appeared that the defendant and every other purchaser of wall paper from the combination, or from any one of its constituent companies, was required to enter into a written agreement, the substantial terms of which were as follows: The company agreed to sell subject to such credit limitation as it might impose, and the jobber agreed to purchase the entire stock required in his business of selling wall paper, to the amount of a certain gross value, without discounts; the jobber reserving to himself the right to purchase such merchandise as he might need in excess of this amount from others. The jobber was allowed certain discounts at rates shown in a schedule accompanying the agreement and made a part thereof.

Attached to the agreement was a schedule of "road" prices at which the company agreed to sell its goods for the term embraced in the contract to dealers other than jobbers, and also a statement of discounts allowed to such customers, other than jobbers, for quantity purchases, together with the terms of credit and freight allowance to which such customers were entitled. The agreement further provided: "It is an essential condition of this agreement that the jobber will not, directly or indirectly, sell or offer for sale any of the merchandise purchased from the company hereunder at lower prices or upon better or more favorable terms than those shown in schedule B, the intent hereof being to assure the company against the use by the jobbers of this agreement to undersell the company." The prompt performance by the jobber of all the terms of the agreement was made a condition precedent to the exaction of the continuous performance of the agreement by the company. With each order for goods the purchaser was required to sign an agreement "not to sell any of such goods to others on terms better or more favorable than those specified in the above schedule nor lower than said list prices, and our faithful performance of this agreement is a condition precedent to the filling of our order. The intent hereof is to protect you fully against being undersold by us among customers to whom you do allow quantity discounts."

The view of the Supreme Court in that case may best be gathered from the following excerpts from the opinion of the majority, written by Mr. Justice Harlan: "The present case is plainly distinguishable from the Connolly Case. In that case the defendant, who sought to avoid payment for the goods purchased by him under contract, had no connection with the general business or operations of the alleged illegal corporation that sold the goods. He had nothing whatever to do with the formation of that corporation, and could not participate in the profits of its business. His contract was to take certain goods at an agreed price, nothing more, and was not in itself illegal, nor part of, nor in execution of, any general plan or scheme that the law condemned. The contract of purchase was wholly collateral to and independent of the agreement under which the combination had been previously formed by others in Ohio. It was the case simply of a corporation that dealt with an entire stranger to its management and operations and sold goods that it owned to one who wished to buy them. In short, the defense in the Connolly Case was that the plaintiff corporation, although owning the pipe in question and having authority to sell and pass title to the property, was precluded by reason alone of its illegal character from having a judgment against the purchaser. We held that the defense could not be sustained, either upon the principles of the common law, or under the anti-trust act of Congress. The case now before us is an entirely different one. The Continental Wall Paper Company seeks, in legal effect, the aid of the court to enforce a contract for the sale and purchase of goods which, it is admitted by the demurrer, was in fact, and was intended by the parties to be, based upon agreements that were and are essential parts of an illegal scheme. We state the matter in this way, because the plaintiff, by its demurrer, admits, for the purposes of this case, the truth of all the facts alleged in the third defense. It is admitted by the demurrer to that defense that the account sued on has been made up in execution of the agreements that constituted or out of which came the illegal combination formed for the purpose and with effect of both restraining and monopolizing trade and commerce among the several states. The present suit is not based upon an implied contract of the defendant company to pay a reasonable price for goods that it purchased, but upon agreements to which both the plaintiff and the defendant were parties, and pursuant to which the accounts sued on were made out, and which had for their object, and which it is admitted had directly the effect, to accomplish the illegal ends for which the Continental Wall Paper Company was organized. If judgment be given for the plaintiff, the result, beyond all question, will be to give the aid of the court in making effective the illegal agreements that constituted the forbidden combination. These considerations make it evident that the present case is different from the Connolly Case. In that case the court regarded the record as presenting the question whether a voluntary purchaser of goods at stipulated prices, under a collateral, independent contract, can escape an obligation to pay for them upon the ground merely that the seller, which owned the goods, was an illegal combination or trust. We held that he could not; and nothing more touching that question was decided, or intended to be decided, in the Connolly Case. The question here is whether the plaintiff company can have judgment upon an account which, it is admitted by demurrer, was made up, with the knowledge of both seller and buyer, with direct reference to and in execution of certain agreements under which an illegal combination, represented by the seller, was organized. Stated shortly, the present case is this: The plaintiff comes into court admitting that it is an illegal combination whose operations restrain and monopolize commerce and trade among the states, and asks a judgment that will give effect, as far as it goes, to agreements that constituted that combination, and by means of which the combination proposes to accomplish forbidden ends. We hold that such a judgment cannot be granted without departing from the statutory rule, long established in the jurisprudence of both this country and England, that a court will not lend its aid, in any way, to a party seeking to realize the fruits of an agreement that appears to be tainted with illegality, although the result of applying that rule may sometimes be to shield one who has got something for which, as between man and man, he ought, perhaps, to pay, but for which he is unwilling to pay."

The present Chief Justice and Justices Holmes, Brewer, and Peckham dissented, being of the opinion that the case fell within the principle of the decision in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co.; Mr. Justice Brewer being also of the opinion that the defense was not well founded for the additional reason that, where a statute created a new offense and denounced the penalty, or gave a new right and declared the remedy, the punishment or the remedy could be only that which the statute prescribed. His view as to this point was thus tersely expressed: "Now, the remedies given in the anti-trust act are three in number: First, a criminal prosecution; second, a forfeiture of property; and, third, an action by any person injured to recover threefold the damages by him sustained. These, being the remedies prescribed, are exclusive. The defendant sought neither of these remedies. It was not so anxious for the public welfare as to make complaint and secure criminal proceedings. There was no property to be forfeited. It did not seek to recover threefold the damage it had sustained, but only to avoid paying for the property it had purchased."

This court yields ready assent to any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States involving the construction and effect of a federal statute. We will give to the decision of that court in the case last mentioned above full scope and effect; but at the same time we cannot bring our minds to agree to the opinion of the majority in that case. On the contrary, we believe that the opinion expressed by the dissenting justices is the sounder and better view of the law. The federal courts have exclusive power to decree illegal a combination formed in violation of the anti-trust act. The illegality of such a combination should be determined by a direct proceeding brought for that purpose in the federal court, in accordance with the procedure and practice in that court, where the corporation assailed has full opportunity to be heard. It ought not to be open to collateral attack in every minor state court where it may bring an action to enforce one of its contracts of sale. In view of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Standard Oil Company, and American Tobacco Company Cases, it is very doubtful whether that court as now constituted will follow this decision. In the Standard Oil Company Case the court, in construing the Sherman act, expressed the following view: "The statute under this view evidenced the intent, not to restrain the right to make and enforce contracts, whether resulting from combinations or otherwise, which did not unduly restrain interstate or foreign commerce, but to protect that commerce from being restrained by methods, whether old or new, which would constitute an interference; that is, undue restraint. * * * Thus not specifying, but indubitably contemplating and requiring, a standard, it follows that it was intended that the standard of reason which had been applied at the common law and in this country in dealing with subjects of the character embraced by the statute was intended to be the measure used for the purpose of determining whether, in a given case, a particular act had or had not brought about the wrong against which the statute provided."

Under this decision the question of the illegality of the combination under the anti-trust act becomes a mixed question of law and fact. It involves a consideration of the details of the business of the alleged unlawful combination, the purposes for which it was formed, the manner in which its business is conducted, and more frequently involves a consideration of complicated facts which ought not to be considered by a jury in a state court, impaneled only to try the question whether a purchaser of goods from a combination should pay for the goods which he has bought and consumed. Suppose, for instance, that the jury impaneled in the case now for decision should determine that the plaintiff is an illegal combination and conspiracy, and that the contract of sale sued on was illegal and void. Another jury, impaneled to pass upon exactly the same issue in a suit of exactly the same kind, might reach an exactly opposite conclusion. Thus the plaintiff would be in a helpless condition, with its very business life in the balance, and compelled to try the issue of its right to exist before every jury impaneled to try the question of its right to recover for goods which it had sold and delivered. We do not believe this to be the law, and we are of the opinion that every consideration of sound public policy and the settled principle of law compel a contrary conclusion. But let us see what the scope and effect of the decision in the case of Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Voight is, and then determine whether the decision reached by the majority of the court in that case compels us to hold that the facts set forth in the defendant's answer in the present case show that the contract sued on is illegal and incapable of enforcement.

In the Continental Wall Paper Company Case the defendants were virtually compelled to sign a jobber's agreement which, in effect, bound them to buy from the plaintiff all the wall paper needed in their business at certain fixed prices, and not to sell at lower prices, or upon better terms, than those upon which the plaintiff itself sold to dealers other than jobbers. It appeared that the prices thus agreed on were unreasonable; that the plaintiff had practically a monopoly of the manufacture and sale of wall paper; and that the account was made up, "within the knowledge of both buyer and seller, with direct reference to and in execution of the agreements which constituted the illegal combination." The court held, in effect, that the defendants in that case were particeps criminis; that by their contracts they became a part of the illegal combination and conspiracy; that they entered into these contracts for the purpose of furthering the conspiracy; that they knowingly and intentionally became parties to an agreement executed in violation of the anti-trust law. There is no such situation in the case now in hand, and it is clearly distinguishable from that case. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant in the present case contains but one feature which differentiates it from the ordinary contract of sale. This feature is called the "profit-sharing plan." It is simply nothing more nor less than an agreement on the part of the seller to divide its profit with the purchaser, provided the purchaser will give to the seller his exclusive trade. We do not see how there can be any legal objection to a contract of this nature. Certainly it is not illegal to allow the purchaser a rebate upon the purchase price on condition that he give the seller his exclusive business. See In re Corning (D. C.) 51 Fed. 205; In re Greene (C. C.) 52 Fed. 105 (7). We see no objection from a legal standpoint to a manufacturer of goods offering an inducement of this sort, in order to build up his business and secure the exclusive trade of a purchaser. The purchaser is not compelled to buy, and, if he buys, he does so either because he obtains better terms, or because he cannot get the character of goods he desires elsewhere. If he violates his agreement and fails to obtain a rebate or discount, he simply pays for the goods what everybody else does who enters into a similar arrangement. While the great object of the Sherman act was undoubtedly to encourage competition, it never was designed to prevent the execution of legitimate contracts made to increase the business of a manufacturer. Indeed, it is very clear, from the latest expressions of opinion by the Supreme Court of the United States, that, even though a manufacturer should, by the application of legitimate business methods, secure practically the exclusive sale of a commodity, this alone would not make it obnoxious to the anti-trust act. Certain it is therefore, that this contract, made with this defendant, standing alone, is not illegal under any principle of law to which we have been referred.

Nor do we think there is anything in the answer which makes the contract illegal. It is alleged that at the time this system of profit-sharing contracts was inaugurated the plaintiff was the sole corporation in the United States manufacturing glucose and grape sugar, having absorbed all independent and competing concerns. As we have seen, this allegation does not make the contract illegal. It is further averred that the defendants were forced to purchase from the plaintiff glucose or grape sugar upon whatever terms could be made. This allegation does not help the defendant's case. As we have said above, the mere fact that the plaintiff was the exclusive manufacturer of this commodity, and that the defendants were for this reason forced to purchase from the plaintiff, would not render the contract illegal. The main contention of the defendant seems to be that it was compelled to purchase from the plaintiff for each succeeding year, under penalty of losing the discount allowed under the contract of purchases of the previous year; and that under this system the plaintiff was enabled to maintain a monopoly of the business. We do not understand how this kind of contractual compulsion is obnoxious to the anti-trust act. At the expiration of any contract, the defendants were free not to enter into another; they were free not to make further purchases from the plaintiff; and the fact that their refusal to make further purchases simply entailed a loss of the discount, offered upon condition that they would make further purchases, does not render the contract illegal. It is alleged generally in the answer that these contracts were designed for the purpose of preventing competition, and did in fact have such an effect. Suppose they did. If their terms were legitimate—and there is nothing in the contracts which would make them illegal—the fact that they may have resulted in building up the plaintiff's business to such an extent as to enable it to practically control the sale of a commodity would not render the contracts unenforceable. Indeed, the answer of the defendant in this very case shows that competition has arisen, and that the defendant can purchase the commodity from other concerns; but the defendant alleges it cannot do so, because it would forfeit the discount for the period of one year allowed by the plaintiff. The defendant is at perfect liberty to purchase from these other concerns; and the presumption is that if it does not do so it is because it can secure more favorable terms from the plaintiff. The contracts of the plaintiff in this case may have the effect of lessening or even destroying competition; but, if the methods employed to bring this about are legitimate and not obnoxious to the law, the contracts are not subject to be set aside.

It is further alleged in the answer that each order for goods bought by the defendant contained a clause reciting that the goods are sold "for your own consumption only, and not for resale." A covenant by the buyer of property not to use the same in competition with the business retained by the seller has been held to be valid. United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 85 Fed. 271, 29 O. C. A. 141, 46 L. Ed. 122, citing Hitchcock v. Anthony, 83 Fed. 799, 28 C. C. A. 80, and American Strawboard Co. v. Haldeman Paper Co., 83 Fed. 619, 27 C. C. A. 634. If not valid, it is incapable of enforcement, and does not restrain the purchaser from reselling the goods at his pleasure. Moreover, there is another very clear distinction between this case and the Con- mental Paper Company Case. In that case written agreements between the combining corporations and firms were executed, and showed as clear a case of conspiracy to restrain interstate trade as it would be possible to conceive. And the Supreme Court of the United States held that the contract of sale in that case was made with direct reference to and in execution of the agreements which constituted the illegal combination. No such agreements are alleged in the present case. It is simply averred that the plaintiff was made up by a combination of a number of manufacturers which were independent competing concerns, and was formed for the purpose of monopolizing and restraining interstate trade. The answer does not set forth any conspiracy agreement; nor does it appear that there was in fact any conspiracy among these constituent companies to restrain interstate trade. But, even if such illegal agreements had been entered into by the companies which combined to form the plaintiff corporation, the defendant was no party to such an arrangement; it took part in no conspiracy to restrain interstate trade; and there is nothing in the contract of sale executed by it which shows that it was made for the purpose, and as a part of, an unlawful conspiracy to restrain interstate trade or commerce. We are quite clear that the trial judge committed no error in striking the defendant's answer in the present case, upon the ground that it set forth no defense to the action. The answer having admitted the purchase of the goods at the price stated in the contract, it was properly stricken and judgment entered in behalf of the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). I think the case is fully controlled by the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Voight, supra, and that the court erred in striking the defendant's answer.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. DAUGHDRILL
(No. 3,772.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 264*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

A common carrier, who undertakes and agrees to convey a passenger by a definite route and under certain conditions, must comply with its contract or be liable for any damages consequent upon its breach. If, after full explanation of the peculiar circumstances and with full knowledge of the reasons why the proposed purchaser of the ticket desires the information, the ticket agent of a common carrier contracts with a passenger to convey him by a particular route, or under certain specified conditions as to connections, the contract must be performed, notwithstanding the performance of the contract may require the carrier to change, for a time, a rule usually followed in the operation of its trains, provided the change is not in violation of law or of any rule of the Railroad Commission, or upon breach of the contract the passenger may recover any damages he may have sustained by reason of the breach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1037-1039; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

The evidence authorized a recovery for pain and suffering, and the instructions of the court upon that point are not subject to exception or criticism.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1082-1084; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The evidence authorized a finding in favor of the plaintiff, and, after the verdict was voluntarily reduced by her, there was no error in refusing a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3944-3947; Dec. Dig. § 1004.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. CARRIERS (§ 254*)—TICKETS—"CONTINUOUS PASSAGE."

Where an agent of a carrier assured the purchaser of a ticket that his wife could take a certain designated train and be conveyed to her home without inconvenience, other than in merely changing cars with a wait of only a few minutes, the words on the ticket, "continuous passage," do not import an agreement that the passenger shall be carried without any stop or change of cars, but indicate that the agent might have had the authority to issue a ticket for such a passage as he assured the purchaser could be had.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1020-1026; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 56*)—"PROXIMATE CAUSE."

When an injury can be traced directly to a tortious act, and but for this tortious act it could not reasonably be supposed that the injury would have resulted, this essentially antecedent act may be said to be the "proximate cause" of the injury.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by L. M. Daughdrill against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hewlett & Dennis, of Atlanta, and I. F. Mundy, of Rockmart, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in error brought a suit against the Southern Railway Company, alleging that on April 28, 1910, she purchased from the carrier a continuous trip ticket from Gainesville to Rockmart, Georgia; that when she reached Atlanta and prepared to change cars, the agent of the plaintiff in error refused to allow her to take its train, which left Atlanta at 5:10 p. m., and insisted that she could not take that train, because it did not stop at Rockmart. The petition alleged that before the ticket was purchased the plaintiff's husband informed the company's agent at Gainesville that his wife was not at all well, and that if she had to wait in Atlanta he would accompany her. After the agent of the railroad company in Atlanta told her that she could not take the train, she became very much excited and humiliated. She was in a strange city, without friends, acquaintances, or money to pay hotel bills or other expenses. The agent informed her that perhaps she could catch the Seaboard Air Line train, which left the Union Station in five minutes' time. She caught a cab, and went to the Union Station, and caught this train; but when she had gotten upon the Seaboard Air Line train she virtually collapsed from the excitement and shock to her nerves. She went to bed immediately upon her arrival at Rockmart, and was confined to her bed for a week, and continued to suffer for almost a year, from the effect of her excitement and nervousness.

The plaintiff proved her case substantially as laid. The evidence of her husband was that he and his wife were in Gainesville, and she intended to go to Rockmart. She was in very bad health, very nervous, and easily excited. He went to the agent of the Southern Railway Company at Gainesville and inquired what connections could be made going from Gainesville to Rockmart. He explained fully to the agent why he wanted to know, and that, if his wife was subject to a "lay-over" in Atlanta, he would come as far as Atlanta with her, if she were to be delayed for any length of time. The agent told him that his wife could take the evening train (she had first intended to go on the morning train), and go right on through to Rockmart; that she would have only a few minutes to wait in Atlanta, and would be transferred in the same car shed. He thereupon told the agent that his wife would wait until the evening train and that he would not go with her. The witness testified that he told the agent that his wife was not well, and that if she had to lay over in Atlanta, or if she had to make any transfer across town, or anything of that kind, he would come with her; and after the agent's assurance that his wife would only have to wait a few minutes and be transferred in the same car shed, he communicated these facts to his wife. The plaintiff testified that her husband told her she would make a continuous trip; that she would only have to wait a few minutes in Atlanta; that upon her arrival in Atlanta she went to the information window and asked what time she could get a train out to Rockmart. The agent told her there would be a train passing along in a few minutes, but that this train did not stop at Rockmart, and that she could not get on it. She told him she was sick and wanted to get to Rockmart, and he informed her that she would then have to go to the Seaboard Air Line Railway and go down on its train, and that she only had five minutes to catch the train, but possibly it might be late. He asked to see her ticket, and, after looking at it, said "this is a continuous ticket, but you cannot go there until about 12 o'clock to-night." The plaintiff testified that the agent's statement frightened her and made her very nervous, because she had no money. She was sick, and knew she had no money to pay hotel fare or have a doctor, and thought she was going to be obliged to stay there; that she had no funds at all, and knew no one at all in the city of Atlanta. She further testified that she had traveled but little by herself; that she usually traveled with her husband. Upon the agent's statement that, while she had only five minutes to catch the Seaboard Air Line train, perhaps she could get a hack and catch the train, because it might be late, she got a hack and went over to the other depot. She was not really able to be up, but she had to be up, because she knew she had to go somewhere. She testified that as a result of the excitement she was prostrated when she boarded the Seaboard Air Line train; that she went home and went to bed, and was in bed the rest of the week. She suffered from a cessation of her menstruation, and was weak and nervous for a long time. There was testimony to the effect that the plaintiff's usual weight was from 140 to 148 pounds, and that, as a result of the nervous prostration to which she testified, she lost 20 pounds in weight. Another witness testified that she was in a very nervous condition when she came from the train to her house in Rockmart, and that she was greatly nauseated. The attending physician testified that, when he called to see her, she was very restless and nervous; that she was affected with excessive menstruation, and apparently suffering pain; and he testified as an expert that the excitement caused by the circumstances related by the plaintiff would naturally be injurious to a woman suffering from the sickness by which she was affected.

The verdict was for $1,000, but the plaintiff voluntarily wrote off a half of the recovery. The defendant excepted to the refusal of a new trial. The motion for new trial contained the general grounds, and the ground that the verdict was excessive, and excepted to the charge of the court to the jury upon the subject of pain and suffering, alleging that there was no evidence warranting the instruction.

[1] 1. Undoubtedly the plaintiff had a right of action, whether she was entitled to recover for pain and suffering as an element of her damages or not, and whether the amount awarded her by the jury is excessive or not. The case at bar is not unlike that of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Stephens, 75 S. E. 841, and is practically identical in principle with the case of Southern Ry. Co. v. Flanagan, 10 Ga. App. 745, 74 S. E. 85. The only question presented on this feature of the case is whether or not a carrier is to be held to its contracts as natural persons are held to be bound by theirs—whether, if a railroad company agrees to carry a passenger by a certain route, or within a definite time, or under definite conditions as to connections, it is not bound to comply with this contract, and is not liable for any damages which may result from its breach. It will not do to say that the company is not liable for the acts or statements of its agent in selling a ticket (if the person who sells the ticket is the duly authorized ticket agent), for a corporation can only act through its agents. They are its head and arms and legs.

At the time of the purchase of the ticket involved in this case the plaintiff was a woman in bad health, suffering from extreme nervousness, caused by very irregular menstruation. She wished to go to Rockmart, to be at home and to receive medical treatment. According to some of the testimony, her nervous condition was such that it would not be prudent or proper for her to be subject to a nervous strain, or to attempt any unusual inconvenience without the assistance of an escort. Her case was not an unusual one, when considered in relation to the large class of unfortunately diseased females. Her husband, as was natural and proper, would have gone with her if he had known that she would have to meet the ordinary luck of travelers; but he was informed by the defendant's agent, who sold him the ticket, that his wife could take a certain designated train and be conveyed to her home without inconvenience other than in merely changing cars in the same car shed, and that she would have to lie over only a few moments. Upon this assurance and understanding he bought the ticket, which provided for a continuous passage and expired at midnight of the day of its purchase.

[4] We do not attach any importance to the words "good for a continuous passage" on the ticket, further than in so far as it shows that the parol agreement was not in conflict with the written contract. Of course, the words "continuous passage," when used on a railroad ticket, do not import an agreement that the passenger shall be carried without any stop. It does not imply that there may not be a lay-over or a necessary change of cars; but the use of that language indicates to the purchaser that the agent might have had the authority to issue a ticket in this particular instance for such a passage as he assured the purchaser could be had. In other words, there was nothing in the ticket to put the purchaser on notice that his wife could not make the trip, just as the agent assured him she could make it. On the assurance of the agent the ticket was bought. It makes no difference that the agent (as it turns out) did not have authority to give the assurance. Presumably he did have the authority, and if he did not have it, and any injury resulted from his misrepresentation, it must be that his principal, and not the purchaser of the ticket, shall be the sufferer as a consequence.

A common carrier, who undertakes and agrees to convey a passenger by a definite route and under certain conditions, must comply with the contract, or be liable for any damage consequent upon its breach. If after full explanation of the peculiar circumstances, and with full knowledge of the reasons why the proposed purchaser of the ticket desires the information, the ticket agent of a common carrier contracts with a passenger to convey him by a particular route, or under specified conditions as to connections, the contract must be performed, notwithstanding the performance of the contract may require the carrier to change, for a time, a rule usually followed in the operation of its trains, provided the change is not in violation of the law or of any rule of the Railroad Commission, and on breach of the contract the passenger may recover for any damage he may have sustained by reason of the breach. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon the breach of the contract, if the agent had the authority to make the contract set up by the plaintiff, or upon the breach of public duty in not giving correct information as to the connections of its trains, if the agent did not have authority to make the contract.

[2] 2. But it is insisted that the evidence did not authorize a recovery for pain and suffering, and that the court erred in charging the jury at all upon that point. We think the evidence upon this point required that the jury be instructed with reference to the rights of one who has suffered physical pain as a result of an injury. The testimony of the plaintiff may seem to be somewhat exaggerated, and yet we cannot say that it is. We certainly cannot say that it is unreasonable. She testified that, as a result of the nervousness, she suffered a long illness and a year's weakness. The plaintiff in error insists that, this sickness being caused by the nervousness, and the nervousness being caused by the breach of public duty, and the sickness, if caused by the occurrences in Atlanta, not being directly consequent upon the alleged tort, the injury to the plaintiff is too remote to be the basis of a recovery. We may concede that the plaintiff would not have been sick, except for the nervousness, and that she was made nervous by the discovery that she was obliged to lay over in Atlanta without any acquaintances, friends, or money, and that she allowed herself to become excessively excited, and went rapidly in a hack to catch the train of another railroad company, when she could have remained in the depot of the plaintiff in error and reached her home on the mid-night train. We may concede all that, and still the prime cause of the injury was the act of the company in selling the plaintiff a ticket different from that which she desired and different from what it was represented to be.

[5] Although the act of the plaintiff herself intervened between the defendant's wrong and the injury suffered, and concurred in producing the damage for which she seeks to recover, the company would not be relieved, if the intervening act was the natural result, or was induced by, the previous tortious act of the defendant. See Rollestone v. Cassirer, 3 Ga. App. 161, 59 S. E. 442, in which we held that "the rule is the same where, though the plaintiff's act may not in strictness have been caused or induced by the defendant's act or omission, yet the latter caused or created a negligent and dangerous condition, upon which the plaintiff's act, harmless and innocent in itself, and of a nature which might have been anticipated, operated to produce the injuries received." In Godwin v. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, 120 Ga. 747, 48 S. E. 139, it is said by Mr. Justice Lamar, delivering the opinion of the court: "In discussing legal causation, the phrase 'proximate cause' does not necessarily mean that which is nearest, but refers rather to the efficient cause, and in this sense is sometimes referred to as the 'immediate and direct cause' as opposed to 'remote.'" In Southern Rail- way Company v. Tankersley, 3 Ga. App. 548, 60 S. E. 297, we held that "by proximate cause is not meant the last act or cause, or the nearest act to the injury, but such act wanting in ordinary care as actively aided in producing the injury as a direct and existing cause."

We think that when an injury can be traced directly to the tortious act (though there be several paths in the track which lead back to this act), and but for this tortious act it could not reasonably be supposed that the injury would have resulted, this essentially antecedent act may be said to be the proximate cause of the injury. This court will not extend the ruling in the case of Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, and in similar cases, beyond their particular facts, and it is not necessary to discuss the matter of a recovery for mental suffering, because it plainly appears in this case that the plaintiff, perhaps as a result of mental suffering, did actually suffer physical pain for which she was entitled to recover. The judge was right in charging upon this subject, and his instructions are so clear and pertinent as to be free from criticism.

[3] 3. This court has no power to declare excessive a recovery for pain and suffering. The Code leaves the amount of damages recoverable for pain and suffering to the single tribunal of the enlightened conscience of the impartial jury, and as the trial judge was satisfied with the amount of the verdict as reduced by the plaintiff herself, there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

CATON v. TOLER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINIONS.

The statement, in an action for fire which broke out on plaintiff's land after some low lightwood stumps in defendant's clearing had been burning and smoldering for 24 hours, of witnesses having personal knowledge of the facts and attendant circumstances, and shown to be qualified by observation and experience, that "smoldering lightwood stumps were not dangerous about sparks, and not likely to carry them any distance," is admissible as a statement of fact relevant to the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 206, 237*)—REVIEW—OBJECTION—UNRESPONSIVE ANSWER.

Complaint may not be made of the part of the testimony going beyond the import of the question; there having been no objection to the answer and no motion to strike out the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1283-1289, 1386-1388; Dec. Dig. §§ 206, 237.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

The effect of the statement of witness, that in his opinion such stumps were not likely to carry fire 44 yards, the distance of the nearest of such stumps on defendant's land from the origin of the fire on plaintiff's land, was nullified by his immediately saying he had seen sparks go that far.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 21*)—FIRES—ESCAPE TO PROPERTY OF ANOTHER.

Where defendant set fire on land he was clearing, and not to his "woods," to which latter case only Revisal 1905, § 3346, applies, he is not under absolute obligation to prevent escape of the fire, but is held only to the ordinary care of a reasonable and prudent man under conditions as they existed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by L. B. Caton against Daniel Toler for damages for alleged burning of plaintiff's land and timber by negligence of defendant. From a judgment on a verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. L. Ward and D. E. Henderson, both of New Bern, for appellant. H. O. Whitehurst and R. E. Whitehurst, both of New Bern, for appellee.

HOKE, J. There was evidence tending to show that defendant had been engaged in clearing a new ground, burning it off and preparing the same for cultivation, and the fire complained of broke out on plaintiff's land after some low lightwood stumps in the clearing had been burning and smoldering for 24 hours, and same originated on plaintiff's land as far as 44 yards from the nearest of these stumps.

[1] Objection was made that several witnesses were allowed to express the opinion that lightwood stumps, under conditions indicated, were not dangerous about sparks, and not likely to throw them any distance. The witnesses had personal knowledge of the facts and attendant circumstances involved in the statement, and were shown to be qualified by observation and experience to give an opinion that would aid the jury to a correct conclusion; and we think the ruling of his honor admitting the testimony is sustained by several decisions of the court, as in Murdock v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 159 N. C. —, 74 S. E. 887; Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 217, 65 S. E. 920; Wilkinson v. Dunbar, 149 N. C. 20, 28, 62 S. E. 748; Tire Setter Co. v. Whitehurst, 148 N. C. 446, 62 S. E. 523; McKelvey on Evidence, pp. 230, 231; 1 Elliott, § 675. McKelvey refers to this kind of testimony as follows: "Expert testimony as to facts is nothing more than ordinary testimony as to facts, given by witnesses specially qualified by observation and experience to give it." And again on page 231: "There are two classes of witnesses who are ordinarily spoken of as experts. The one embraces those persons who, by reason of special opportunities for observation, are in a position to judge of the nature and effect of certain matters better than persons who have not had opportunity for like observations. For example, one who has had opportunity to observe the running of railroad trains may testify as to the speed of an ordinary train. Such witnesses are really not experts in the strict sense of the term; they are only specially qualified witnesses." And further (page 232): "Expert testimony as to facts really is no exception to the rule which excludes opinion evidence." And in this instance presented, while expressed in the form of opinion, the statement of these witnesses "that smoldering lightwood stumps were not dangerous about sparks, and not likely to carry them any distance," is the statement of a fact relevant to the inquiry.

[2, 3] The only part of the testimony here which has caused us any perplexity is that of the witness J. E. Whitford, who, going beyond the import of the general question, gave it as his opinion that such stumps were not likely to carry fire the 44 yards, the distance from the nearest stump to the origin of the fire on plaintiff's land. If this were objectionable, however, and this we do not decide, it should not be held for reversible error (1) because, as stated, going beyond the import of the question, there was no objection to the answer and no motion to strike out the testimony; (2) because the witness immediately nullified the effect of his statement by saying that he had seen sparks go that far. In Lumber Co. v. Railroad, supra, the evidence was not received; but the case recognized the general principle adverted to, and the evidence was excluded because the witnesses were not cognizant of all the facts involved in the proposed statement. And in Deppes Case, 154 N. C. 523, 70 S. E. 622, the answer sought was a deduction of the witnesses from facts in evidence and involving clearly an opinion of the witness on the very question the jury were called on to decide.

[4] It was further objected that, in preventing the escape of fire from his new ground, his honor only held defendant to the ordinary care of a reasonable and prudent person under the circumstances as they existed; plaintiff contending that in this respect defendant was under the absolute obligation to see that the fires were extinguished. It may be well to note that on the facts in evidence the action cannot be sustained under section 3346 of the Revisal, giving a right of action when an owner sets out fire in his woods without giving written notice to adjoining proprietors. See Averitt v. Murrill, 49 N. C. 322. This being true, we think the position insisted upon by plaintiff is entirely too exigent for the ordinary transactions of everyday life, and that the correct standard of duty is that adopted by the wise and learned judge who presided at the trial—the standard of a “reasonable and prudent man under conditions as they existed.”

There is no error, and the judgment on the verdict is affirmed.

No error.

POISSON et al. v. PETTEWAY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 14*)—NATURE AND COURSE IN GENERAL—SOURCE OF TITLE.

The fourth canon of descents provides that on failure of lineal descendants, where the inheritance has been transmitted by descent from an ancestor, or by devise from an ancestor to whom the devisee would have been one of the heirs, the inheritance shall descend to the next collateral relations of the person last seised of the blood of the ancestor. Held that, where a father devised land to his daughter, who devised it to her brother, it would descend on the death of the brother only to his collateral relations of the blood of the father, since it is settled that, when an estate goes through a series of descents to a person who dies without issue, it results back to those of his collateral relations who would be heirs of the ancestor from whom it originally descended, and the statute of this state puts devisees between such parties on the same footing with descents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-99; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Carter, Judge.

Action to try title to land by Fred C. Poisson and others against Elizabeth M. Pette-way and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. McClammy and E. K. Bryan, both of Wilmington, for appellants. B. G. Emple and Louis J. Poisson, both of Wilmington, for appellees.

BROWN, J. Jehu Poisson purchased the lot in controversy, and died in 1873, devising it in fee to his daughter Sarah, who died in 1906, devising it in fee to her brother and only heir at law, James Dickson Poisson. He died in 1910 intestate, seised of the property, never having married, leaving no brother or sister, or issue of such. The plaintiffs are the nearest collateral relatives of James D. and Sarah Poisson, of the blood of their father, Jehu Poisson. The defendants are equally related to James Dickson and Sarah through their mother, the wife of Jehu Poisson, but are not of the blood of the latter.

The fourth canon of descents reads as follows: “On failure of lineal descendants, and where the inheritance has been transmitted by descent from an ancestor, or has been derived by gift, devise or settlement from an ancestor, to whom the person thus advanced would in the event of such ancestor's death have been the heir or one of the heirs, the inheritance shall descend to the next collateral relations, capable of inheriting, of the person last seised, who were of the blood of such ancestor, subject to the two preceding rules.” At common law a devisee, who takes the same quality and nature of estate under the will as he would have taken by descent had the testator died intestate, takes by descent, owing to the preference of the common law for the title of descent. Our statute puts a similar devise between such parties on the same footing with the descent.

The only question presented for our consideration is as to whether the heirs at law of James Dickson Poisson must be of the blood of Jehu Poisson, or whether only of the blood of Sarah. The counsel for the defendant contends that the clause in the canon of descents looks only to the proximate and immediate descent; the counsel for the plaintiff, that it looks to the origin of the title in the first purchaser, and requires that the party claiming as heir should be of the blood of the first purchaser, through whatever intermediate devolutions by descent, gift, or devise it may have passed, and however remote may be the first ancestor.

Ever since 1842 we think that it has been settled substantially that when an estate goes to a person through a series of descents or settlements, and that person dies without issue, it results back to those of his collateral relations who would be heirs of the ancestor from whom it originally descended, or by whom it was originally settled. Wilkinson v. Bracken, 24 N. C. 315. The question is very fully discussed in that case by Chief Justice Ruffin, who says: “Although our attention has not been particularly directed to this point in any previous case, yet it has not been entirely unperceived. The general impression made, at least to my mind, from reading the act, without any special reference to this question, cannot fail to be seen in the opinion delivered in Burgwyn v. Devereux, 23 N. C. 583. I take it for granted that an inheritance which has descended, no matter when, and I might have added no matter from whom, or from how many, shall descend to the blood of the ancestor from whom it did descend, which, of course, includes the ancestor from whom it first descended."

This seems to have been the impression made on Judge Henderson's mind, as plainly expressed, if not fully decided, in Bell v. Dozier, 12 N. C. 333. In a note to the case of Wilkerson v. Bracken, supra, is given the report of Judge Gaston from the committee of the House of Commons, December 8, 1808, reporting the fourth canon of descent as above quoted. In it Judge Gaston says: "The fourth rule has for its principal object the securing to the family of the man, by whose industry the property was acquired, the enjoyment of such property in preference to those who have no consanguinity with him."

It is true that this identical question was passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gardner v. Collins, 2 Pet. 58, 7 L. Ed. 347, construing a statute of Rhode Island similar to ours. In that case a very elaborate and interesting opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Story, and a conclusion reached that the words of the canon meant an immediate descent, gift, or devise, and make the immediate ancestor, donor, or devisor, sole stock of descent. A different rule, as we have shown, has prevailed, and now prevails, in this state.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

AMAN v. ROWLAND LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 165*)—MOTION FOR NONSUIT—EVIDENCE.

The court, on defendant's motion for nonsuit, must consider the evidence in its most favorable light for plaintiff, and take, as established, every fact which it proves or tends to prove.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 373, 374; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 21*)—FIRES—LIABILITY.

Where the operator of a steam logging skidder for the removal of saw logs from his woods allowed dry and combustible material to accumulate on his land in such close proximity to the engine as to expose adjacent property to unnecessary peril, and a fire was caused by sparks from the engine, a prima facie case of negligence was established, authorizing a recovery for the destruction of adjacent property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-30; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 21*)—FIRES—LIABILITY.

Where fire escaped from an engine used in operating a logging skidder for the removal of saw logs, but the engine was in proper condition, equipped with a proper spark arrester and was operated in a careful manner, and the fire first started on adjacent property, the owner of the engine was not liable for the destruction of the adjacent property, because there was no negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-30; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 21*)—FIRES—LIABILITY.

Where fire escapes from an engine in proper condition, operated in a careful way, and catches on the right of way maintained by the owner in a negligent condition, and spread to adjacent premises, the owner is liable for the destruction by fire of the adjacent premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-30; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 21*)—FIRES—LIABILITY.

Where fire escapes from a defective engine or from a proper engine not operated in a careful manner, the owner of the engine is liable for the destruction by fire of adjacent property, whether the fire first started on the right of way or on the adjacent property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-30; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUISITES—CONSTRUCTION.

The court in determining the correctness of the instructions must view them as a whole, and, when the instructions so viewed correctly state the law, they are sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 481*)—FIRES—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the destruction of property by fire caused by sparks from an engine operating a logging skidder for the removal of saw logs, it was competent to show that the engine had emitted sparks the day before, and that coals which had come from the engine were lying on the log deck, as bearing on the defective condition of the engine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1717-1729; Dec. Dig. § 481.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

It is not error to exclude the testimony of a witness to a fact, where the witness had just before testified substantially to the same fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4195, 4200-4206; Dec. Dig. § 1058.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Carter, Judge.

Action by H. S. Aman against the Rowland Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover damages for the burning of plaintiff's timber, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence in permitting sparks to escape from its engine. Defendant was engaged in operating a steam logging skidder, for the purpose of removing saw logs from its woods, to be carried over its tramroad to the mill. In order to operate the skidder, defendant had cleared a space adjoining it, and known as a "log deck," by removing the trees and some of the undergrowth, and piling them 30 or 40 feet away from the skidder. The fire started in the tree tops, which had become very dry and combustible during a long period of drought and warm weather. Some of the witnesses had seen sparks on the day before the fire coming from the defendant's engine at the skidder, and there were coals on the ground near the skidder. The log deck or right of way, as it is called in the record, was covered with dry and inflammable grass and leaves, though one of the witnesses stated that the fire did not originate there, but in the tree tops at the edge of the log deck. It also appeared that defendant ran a dummy engine on its tramroad, near the place where the fire started, though no one saw any sparks emitting from it. There was no fire in the vicinity except the fires in the two engines. There was evidence that the fire broke out during the dinner hour, when the logging engine was shut down and its fires banked so that it could not emit any sparks, but one witness testified that the fire may have been set out before the engine was stopped, as it was only from 20 to 40 minutes from the time the draft of the engine was shut off until the fire was first seen in the tree tops. There was other evidence not necessary to be stated. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, a judgment being entered thereon, defendant appealed.

A. McL. Graham and G. E. Butler, both of Clinton, for appellant. Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The defendant asked for a judgment of nonsuit, and its refusal presents the main question in the case.

[1] The familiar rule is that the evidence upon such a motion should be considered in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, and every fact which it proves, or tends to prove, should be taken as established. With this guide before us, we are led unhesitatingly to the conclusion that the ruling of the court was correct. It is true the fire did not originate within the log deck, but on its edge, where the defendant had caused very inflammable material to be piled, and the fire started in this brush heap only 30 feet from the skidder, as the jury might well have found; there being circumstantial evidence that it was communicated from the engine of the skidder.

[2] The jury were fully instructed as to the law of the case, and they were told that if defendant allowed dry and combustible matter to accumulate on its land, in such close proximity to its engine that it exposed adjacent property to unnecessary peril, and the fire was caused by sparks or coals from the engine, a prima facie case of negligence was made out, and in this view the case was properly submitted to the jury, upon all the evidence, to find the fact whether the brush heap was fired by sparks from a negligently constructed or operated engine.

[3] If the fire was not caused by the engine, or, if so caused, the engine was properly constructed and operated, the defendant is not liable, because, in that event, there has been no breach of a duty owing to the plaintiff. The best constructed engines may sometimes emit live sparks. If there was negligence in the construction or operation of the engine, and the fire proximately resulted therefrom, the liability of the defendant from the consequent danger is apparent. All this was correctly stated and explained to the jury by the learned judge who presided at the trial, and the charge of the court, when properly construed, was in perfect conformity with our decisions. It can make no difference whether the sparks lighted on or off the right of way. If it kindled the fire and destroyed plaintiff's trees, there was a sufficient case of prima facie negligence for submission to the jury upon the whole evidence to find the ultimate fact of negligence.

[4, 5] This court has been most pronounced in its opinion upon this subject, and has adhered steadily and strictly, without the shadow of turning, to the just rules which have heretofore been promulgated. We repeat them here once more: "(1) If fire escapes from an engine in proper condition, having a proper spark arrester, and operated in a careful way by a skillful and competent engineer, and the fire catches off the right of way, the defendant is not liable, for there is no negligence. (2) If fire escapes from an engine in proper condition, with a proper spark arrester, and operated in a careful way by a skillful and competent engineer, but the fire catches on the right of way, which is in a foul and negligent condition, and thence spreads to the plaintiff's premises, the defendant is liable. Moore v. R. R., 124 N. C. 341 [32 S. E. 710]; Phillips v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 12 [50 S. E. 462, 3 Ann. Cas. 384]. (3) If fire escapes from a defective engine, or defective spark arrester, or from a good engine not operated in a careful way or not by a skillful engineer, whether the fire catches off or on the right of way and causes damage, the defendant is liable." Williams v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 623, 53 S. E. 448. These rules have been approved for a very long period and in numerous cases. Ellis v. Railroad, 24 N. C. 138; Chaffin v. Lawrance, 50 N. C. 179; Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 321; Craft v. Timber Co., 132 N. C. 151, 43 S. E. 597; Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; Knott v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 238, 55 S. E. 150; Cox v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 117, 62 S. E. 834; Deppe v. Railroad, 152 N. C. 79, 67 S. E. 262; Kornegay v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731; Currie v. Railroad, 156 N. C. 419, 72 S. E. 488; Mizzell v. Manufacturing Co., 158 N. C. 265, 73 S. E. 802; Hardy

v. Hines Lumber Co., 75 S. E. 855, at this term. Where the fire is caused by sparks falling from the engine on a foul right of way, the railroad is liable for the ensuing damage to others, as it is per se negligence to keep such a right of way which would constantly expose their property to the risk of fire. Where the act of negligence is charged to be a defective engine, it can make no material difference whether the spark lights within or without the right of way, and the following rule must prevail: "The decided weight of authority and of reason is in favor of holding that, the origin of the fire being fixed upon the railroad company, it is presumptively chargeable with negligence, and must assume the burden of proving that it had used all those precautions for confining sparks or cinders (as the case may be) which have already been mentioned as necessary." Sherman & Redf. on Negligence, § 876. The liability is fixed, first, if the fire was ignited on a foul right of way; and, second, if not on the right of way, then if the engine was negligently constructed or operated, the fact also being found that the fire originated from the engine and was the proximate cause of the damage, an event reasonably foreseeable as the natural and probable result of the negligent act. Hardy v. Hines Lumber Co., supra. But in this case the tree tops had been piled by the defendant, for its own purpose and convenience, so near the engine, and had become so parched and inflammable by the effect of the dry weather upon it, that it easily ignited from the sparks and was carried by the strong north wind, which had already set in that direction, to the plaintiff's adjoining land and timber, and thereby caused the damage of which he complains. This is what the jury evidently found under the evidence and the charge of the judge, and it made out, at least, a case of actionable negligence against the defendant.

[8] The criticism of the charge by defendant's counsel might be just and the exception to it well taken, if it could be restricted to the detached portion thereof which is the object of attack, as it is not quite explicit, perhaps, as it should have been, but when these isolated sentences or extracts are construed with the other parts of the charge, and viewing the latter in its entirety and thus reading it as a whole, as we are required to do (State v. Exum, 128 N. C. 500, 50 S. E. 283; State v. Lance, 149 N. C. 551, 63 S. E. 198), the meaning of the judge could not well have been misunderstood by an intelligent jury. We have recently said that "the charge is to be considered as a whole in the same connected way in which it was given, and upon the presumption that the jury did not overlook any portion of it. If, when so construed, it presents the law fairly and correctly to the jury, it will afford no ground for reversing the judgment, though some of the expressions, when standing alone, might be regarded as erroneous." Kornegay v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731; Thompson on Trials, § 2407. This case is much like Craft v. Timber Co., supra, where we held that piling dry tree tops or other combustible matter so near its track as to expose adjacent property to the danger of being destroyed or injured by sparks from one of its passing engines was an act of negligence, and, if the proximate cause of the injury, was actionable. It does not appear in this case what was the precise extent of defendant's right of way—so called—but, whatever it was, the fact remains that defendant accumulated dangerously inflammable material on its own premises, so near its skidder as to be ignited by a spark from the engine, and thereby communicated fire to plaintiff's trees, and the law, ancient and modern, requires that he should be recompensed for his loss. "If fire break out and catch in thorns, so that the stacks of corn, or the standing corn, or the field, be consumed therewith, he that kindleth the fire shall surely make restitution," was the Mosaic doctrine, and "so use your own as not to injure another" ("sic utere tuo ut non alienum lædas") is that of the common law, which also recognizes and enforces the law of compensation.

[7] The other exceptions require little, if any, comment. The testimony of the witnesses, Hobbs and the Hargroves, was competent to show that the engine had emitted sparks the day before, as bearing upon its defective condition, and the fact that coals which had come from the engine were lying on the log deck was also a relevant fact for the same reason. Knott v. Railroad, supra.

[8] The exclusion of Hefty's testimony was not error. The judge might well have admitted it, but we think that the witness had just before testified substantially to the same fact.

We have carefully examined all the assignments of error, but have failed to discover any ground for a reversal.

No error.

STEPHENS v. JNO. L. ROPER LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1912.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 102*)—IMPLIED POWER OF AGENT.

It is not within the implied power of the superintendent of a lumber company's plant to contract with an employé that he shall be dropped from the company's pay roll for an indefinite time, cease all regular work, and take no other employment, but hold himself in readiness to resume work when notified; he to be paid during the time he is unemployed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Justice, Judge.

Action by A. H. Stephens against the Jno. L. Roper Lumber Company to recover $1,400 alleged to be due by contract. From a judgment of nonsuit on motion at the close of plaintiff's evidence, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. D. Ward and D. L. Ward, both of New Bern, for appellant. Moore & Dunn, of New Bern, for appellee.

HOKE, J. Plaintiff, a witness, in support of his demand, testified in effect as follows: That in November or December of 1907, a short while after the panic, he was an employé of defendant company, and in charge of a logging squad in connection with the plant of said company at Oriental, N. C.; that the superintendent of defendant plant at that place was one W. J. Moore, in general charge of same, having power to make contracts, employ and discharge hands, etc.; that the general offices of the company were at Norfolk, Va., the general superintendent of defendant lumbering business being one Harriss, and that the employés of defendant company were paid off monthly according to a pay roll sent to the general offices; that on or about the date specified (November or December, 1907) plaintiff and W. J. Moore, as superintendent of defendant's plant at Oriental, entered into the contract sued on, by the terms of which plaintiff was to be dropped from the company's pay roll for an indefinite period, and cease all regular work for the company, and was to be paid during such time as he was unemployed the sum of $100 per month, and meantime was not to take other employment, but hold himself in readiness to resume work when notified; that pursuant to this agreement plaintiff remained practically idle for 14 months, when he was again given active employment as a boss of the company's logging force at $75 per month; that not long after plaintiff resumed work Moore, the local superintendent, was discharged by the company, and soon thereafter plaintiff was discharged; that shortly after Moore was discharged plaintiff mentioned his claim for $1,400 against the company to ——— Harriss, general superintendent, and same was repudiated and denied by the company, and after his own discharge the suit was instituted.

Plaintiff, repelling the suggestion that it was any part of his motive or inducement for entering into the contract, testified further that W. J. Moore told him, at or about the time the same was made, that the company wanted him as a witness in a lawsuit, and that he would be dropped from the pay roll on that account. Plaintiff admitted that he had been paid for all the work actually done for the company, but said that nothing had been paid on the present claim; that the general superintendent was frequently around the works at Oriental; and that plaintiff had never mentioned the subject to him until after the discharge of Moore, but had frequently mentioned the matter to Moore while he was superintendent at Oriental, and was told by Moore not to be uneasy that he would get his money.

If it be conceded that the evidence was sufficient to establish the contract, and, further, that the reprehensible purpose to impose plaintiff on the court as an entirely disinterested witness, when he was in fact an employé of the company, was not sufficiently shown as an inducement to the contract on the part of plaintiff to vitiate it (Martin v. McMillan, 63 N. C. 486; Phillips v. Hooker, 62 N. C. 193) we are of opinion that the judgment of nonsuit has been properly rendered. It is not claimed that there was any direct authority from the company to make this particular contract; nor is there any evidence of special instructions limiting the powers of defendant's agent incident to his position. This being true, the real and apparent authority of such agent should be held one and the same, and the right of plaintiff to recover in this case depends upon whether the contract declared on was within the scope of W. J. Moore's powers as general superintendent of defendant's lumbering business at Oriental. Gooding v. Moore, 150 N. C. 195, 63 S. E. 895; Tiffany on Agency, p. 180.

By virtue of his position, then, this superintendent had general power to do what was usual and necessary to carry on the business intrusted to him, and in furtherance of his employer's interest to make all such contracts as were reasonable and appropriate to that end; but this authority is not without limitations. Such an officer is by no means a universal agent, but is restricted, as stated, to "those acts and contracts usually exercised by other agents in the same line of business under similar circumstances, and must conduct the particular business of the principal in the manner usually employed by other agents of the same kind." 1 Clark & Skyles on the Law of Agency, § 203, p. 475.

Again, it is well recognized that a third person dealing with one known to be an agent is not relieved of all obligation in the matter, but is held to the exercise of reasonable prudence; and if an agent, though a general one, departing from legitimate effort in his employer's interests tenders a contract so unusual and remarkable as to arouse the inquiry of a man of average business prudence, the third party is not allowed to act upon assumptions which ordinarily obtain. He is put upon notice, and must ascertain if actual authority has been conferred. 1 Clark & Skyles, p. 509; Mechem on Agency, §§ 289, 290; 31 Cyc. p. 1340-1346.

In 31 Cyc. it is said: "A general agent, unless he act under special and limited authority, impliedly has power to do whatever is usual and proper to effect such a purpose as is the subject of his employment. Hence, in the absence of known limitations, third persons dealing with such a general agent have a right to presume that the scope and character of the business he is employed to transact is the extent of his authority. This rule, as already stated, does not apply when limitations upon the authority of the agent have been brought home to the knowledge of the third person dealing with him, nor when the third person fails to make such inquiry as conditions demand, especially if the facts and circumstances are such as to suggest inquiry. Furthermore, the implied power of any agent, however general, must be limited to such acts as are proper for an agent to do, and cannot extend to acts clearly adverse to the interests of the principal, or for the benefit of the agent personally. And an agent has no implied authority to do acts not usually done by agents in that sort of transaction, nor to do them in other than the customary manner. The most general authority is limited to the business or purpose for which the agency was created."

And in Mechem, supra: "Third persons must act in good faith. It is evident that these rules are established for the protection of third persons who act in good faith. As has been stated, every person dealing with an agent is bound to ascertain the nature and extent of his authority. He must not trust to the mere presumption of authority, nor to any mere assumption of authority, by the agent. He must at all times be able to trace the authority home to its source. Keeping within the scope of that authority, he is safe, and cannot be affected by secret instructions of which he was ignorant. But if he had knowledge of the instructions, or notice sufficient to put him upon an inquiry by which they might have been discovered, he will be held bound by them." And further (section 290): "The person dealing with the agent must also act with ordinary prudence and reasonable diligence. If the character assumed by the agent is of such a suspicious or unreasonable nature, or if the authority which he seeks to exercise is of such an unusual or improbable character, as would suffice to put an ordinarily prudent man upon his guard, the party dealing with him may not shut his eyes to the real state of the case, but should either refuse to deal with the agent at all, or should ascertain from the principal the true condition of affairs."

The wholesome principles embodied in these citations and numerous authoritative decisions here and elsewhere, applying the same, are in condemnation of this alleged contract, and fully sustain the position denying plaintiff recovery thereon. Bank v. Hay, 143 N. C. 328, 55 S. E. 811; Williams and Wife v. Johnston, 92 N. C. 532, 53 Am. Rep. 428; Williams v. Whiting, 92 N. C. 683; Bank v. Armstrong, 152 U. S. 346, 14 Sup. Ct. 572, 38 L. Ed. 470; Bank of Macon v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 95 Am. Dec. 400; Craig Silver Co. v. Smith, 163 Mass. 262, 39 N. E. 1116; Upton v. Suffolk Co. Mills, 65 Mass. 586, 59 Am. Dec. 163; Nephew v. Mich. Central, 128 Mich. 599, 87 N. W. 753; Friedman & Sons v. Kelly, 126 Mo. App. 279, 102 S. W. 1066; Skene, Jr., v. Casualty Co., 91 Mo. App. 121.

In Williams v. Johnston, supra, Chief Justice Smith, delivering the opinion, said: "An agency, however comprehensive in its scope, nothing else appearing, contemplates the exercise of the powers conferred for the benefit of the principal. It implies a trust and confidence that the delegated authority will be employed in the honest and faithful discharge of the duties appertaining to the fiduciary relation thus established."

In Upton v. Suffolk Co. Mills, it was held "that a general selling agent has no authority to depart from the usual manner of accomplishing what he is employed to effect."

In Friedman & Sons v. Kelly, supra, a well-reasoned case and sustained by abundant authority, the court held: "Where an agent, such as a traveling salesman, assumes, in the conduct of the sale of goods, authority which he did not in fact have, and of such extraordinary character as would put a reasonably prudent man upon his inquiry, such party dealing with him cannot in that case hold his principal on the ground of apparent authority. Where a traveling salesman selling ladies' cloaks for his principal agreed with a purchaser that he might retain the cloaks until after the season was over and then return such as were not satisfactory, this was an agreement so unusual and extraordinary that the purchaser should have taken notice that the agent had no authority to make it; and the purchaser could not claim the right to return the cloaks, on the ground that the agreement was within the apparent scope of the agent's authority, especially where the evidence showed that he knew the proposition was extraordinary."

This contract, by which the plaintiff, to use his own language, "was put on the loafing list for 14 months, doing practically nothing for the company's benefit," and where there was nothing, either in the pay rolls or elsewhere, to put the company or its general officer on notice of its existence or its terms, is so very remarkable and unusual, and altogether comes in such questionable shape and circumstance, that his honor was clearly right in holding that no recovery should be allowed thereon in a court of justice.

There is no error, and the judgment of nonsuit is affirmed.

FLANNER v. FLANNER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 191*)—REVOCATION—SUBSEQUENT BIRTH OF CHILD.

At common law as prevailing in North Carolina, the subsequent birth of child did not of itself amount to revocation of his father's will.

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 47*)—EFFECT OF WILL.

Revisal 1905, § 3145, providing that children born after the making of the parent's will, and where parents shall die without making any provision for them, shall be entitled to such share of the parent's estate as if he or she had died intestate, applies only when the omission to provide for an after-born child results from inadvertence or mistake; and, unless the will in express terms shows that the omission is intentional, or unless provision is made for the child, either under the will, or by gift or settlement otherwise, the after-born child takes his share, and the statute applies whether there is one or more children.

3. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 47*)—CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS—STATUTORY REGULATIONS.

The right of a married woman to make a will, granted by Const. art. 10, § 6, providing that the property of a married woman shall remain her sole estate and may be devised and bequeathed as if she were unmarried, removes the common-law restriction on the right of a married woman to dispose of her property by will, but the right is subject to legislative regulation; and Revisal 1905, § 3145, providing that children born after the making of the parent's will shall be entitled to the share of the parent's estate as if he or she had died intestate, is not invalid as conflicting with the constitutional right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Whedbee, Judge.

Controversy without action between Wm. B. Flanner, Jr., by his next friend, J. A. Patterson, and Wm. B. Flanner. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The facts agreed upon and formally presented are as follows:

"(1) That William B. Flanner, Sr., and Lizzie H. Flanner, were husband and wife, but without children, on the 16th day of May, 1891.

"(2) That on said day Lizzie H. Flanner duly executed her last will and testament in words and figures as follows: 'In the name of God, Amen. I, Lizzie H. Flanner, being of sound mind and memory, do make this my last will and testament. I give, grant and devise to my beloved husband, William B. Flanner, all my property of every kind, real personal and mixed. Witness my hand and seal, May 16th, 1891. Lizzie H. Flanner. [Seal.]'

"(3) That thereafter, to wit, on the 7th day of February, 1892, the plaintiff, William B. Flanner, Jr., was born unto said Wm. B. Flanner, Sr., and his said wife, Lizzie H. Flanner.

"(4) That thereafter said Lizzie H. Flanner died seised and possessed of a valuable tract of land lying situate in Craven county, N. C., containing 440 acres, more or less, and being the same land described in the deed of J. F. Clark and wife to W. B. Flanner, dated November 24, 1886, and registered in the office of the register of deeds of Craven county, in Book 95, p. 114; also an undivided one-sixth part of the whole of certain lands situate in Mecklenburg, N. C.

"(5) That said William B. Flanner, Jr., was and is the only child of said Lizzie H. Flanner.

"(6) That said will was probated on the 13th of November, 1893, and registered in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Craven county in record of wills, Book F, p. 102."

Upon said facts the court entered judgment: "This case coming on to be heard before me, by consent of all parties, upon an agreed statement of facts filed in the record, and upon said statement of facts the court being of the opinion that the plaintiff, William B. Flanner, Jr., is the owner of the real estate fully described and set out in said agreed state of facts, subject to the life estate of his father, William B. Flanner, Sr., it is therefore, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the said William B. Flanner, Jr., is the owner in fee, subject to the life estate of his father, William B. Flanner, Sr., of the entire real estate described in said agreed state of facts aforesaid." Defendant excepted and appealed.

HOKE, J. [1] Under the principles of the common law as understood and allowed to prevail in this state, the subsequent birth of child did not of itself amount to revocation of a testator's will. McCay v. McCay, 5 N. C. 447.

[2] That case, presented at nisi prius in Rowan county at October term, 1808, seems to have attracted the attention of the Legislature, and at the November session following a statute was enacted, regulating the subject, and in terms substantially similar to the provision as it now appears in Revisal 1905, § 3145, to wit: "Section 3145. Void as to after-born children. Children born after the making of the parent's will and where parent shall die without making any provision for them, shall be entitled to such share and proportion of such parent's estate as if he or she had died intestate and the rights of any such after-born child shall be a lien on every part of the parent's estate until his several share thereof is set apart," etc. Construing this and other statutes of like purport, the courts have generally held that they were not designed to control a parent as to the provision he should make for his child; but the correct interpretation should proceed on the theory that the law was only intended to apply when the omission to provide for an after-born child was from inadvertence or mistake, and this position should be allowed to prevail, unless the will in express terms showed that the omission was intentional, or unless, as contemplated by the statute, provision was made for the child by the parent, either under the will, or by gift or settlement ultra, "whether before, contemporaneous with, or after the making of the will." Thomason v. Julian, 133 N. C. 309, 45 S. E. 636; Meares v. Meares, 26 N. C. 192; Chace v. Chace, 6 R. I. 407, 78 Am. Dec. 446; Gay v. Gay, 84 Ala. 38, 4 South. 42; concurring opinion, Somerville, J., 84 Ala. 47, 4 South. 45. In our opinion, the spirit and proper meaning of the law both require that its beneficent provisions should apply, whether there be one or more children; and we may not approve the position contended for by defendant that the statute was not intended to control where, as in this case, there was only one child. In the original statute of 1808, the terms were "child or children," and the word "child" was dropped in the enactment of 1868-69, c. 113, § 62, no doubt because the word "children" was considered sufficiently comprehensive to include the one case or the other; and the subsequent terms of the section were only so expressed in order to make the claim of after-born children efficient in cases where there should be more than one.

[3] It was further urged for defendant that the statute cannot be upheld, in that it deprives a married woman of the right to dispose of her property by will, pursuant to article 10, § 6, of our state Constitution; but the position involves a misconception of the meaning of this provision as applied to the facts of the present case. The section referred to, after providing that the property of a married woman acquired before marriage, and all to which she may become entitled to afterwards, shall remain her sole and separate estate, etc., continues as follows: "And may be devised and bequeathed and with the written assent of her husband conveyed by her as if she were unmarried." This right to dispose of property by will is a conventional, rather than an inherent, right, and its regulation rests largely with the Legislature, except where and to the extent that same is restricted by constitutional inhibition. Thomason v. Julian, supra; Underhill on Wills, p. 1; 2 Blackstone, Comm. pp. 488-492.

Being properly advertent to this principle, a perusal of the section relied upon will disclose that its principal purpose, in this connection, was to remove, to the extent stated, the common-law restrictions on the right of married women to convey their property and dispose of same by will, and was not intended to confer on them the right to make wills freed from any and all legislative regulation. The right conferred is not absolute, but qualified. She may "devise and bequeath her property and with the written assent of her husband convey the same as if she were unmarried," and not otherwise. The laws on this subject presented in the appeal vary somewhat in the different states, and at times require differing interpretations; but in statutes like ours authority here and elsewhere is to the effect that when they apply they do not amount to a revocation of the will in toto, but only render the same inoperative as to the after-born child for which no provision has been made, and that such child takes, not under the will, but rather against it, and holds by descent or under the statute of distribution, according to the nature of the property; and from this it follows that the probate of the will works no estoppel against the claimant, and on the facts presented defendant is entitled to an estate as tenant by curtesy—the interest awarded to him in the judgment. Thomason v. Julian, supra; Doane v. Lake, 32 Me. 268, 52 Am. Dec. 654; Lorleux v. Keller, 5 Iowa, 196, 68 Am. Dec. 696; Pritchard on Wills, §§ 299, 300; Underhill on Wills, § 241.

There is no error in the judgment, and the same is affirmed as rendered.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

PLEDGES (§ 19*) — COLLATERAL SECURITY — DEBT SECURED — "LIABILITY" — "AGREEMENT" — "CLAIM."

Decedent executed a demand note to defendant, agreeing that the proceeds of certain policies of life insurance, which he had deposited with defendant as collateral to secure the note, should be applied to the payment thereof, and that, if he should come under any other liability or enter into any other agreement with defendant while it was the holder of such obligation, then any excess of collaterals should be applied to such other note or claim, and, in case of any exchange of the collaterals, the provisions of the note should extend to the new collaterals. Decedent thereafter executed a new note to defendant's cashier for a debt owing to defendant, which note was, in fact, for defendant's benefit. When decedent died, he was also a member of a firm which was indebted to defendant for insurance premiums collected and unpaid. At this time all but $181.50 of the original debt had been paid, for which amount a renewal note had been given which was due and unpaid. Held, that the words "liability," "agreement" and "claim," used in the collateral agreement, were sufficient to cover every conceivable obligation, and that the surplus due on the policies was therefore liable, not only for the balance of the original debt, but also for the note made payable to defendant's cashier, and for the firm's liability for the unpaid premiums.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Carter, Judge.

Action by James M. Norfleet, as administrator of the estate of Leon A. Williams, deceased, against the Pamlico Insurance & Banking Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This case was submitted upon a case agreed, the material facts of which are as follows: On March 5, 1905, Leon A. Williams executed a note to the defendant for $3,000, payable on demand, and in the body of the same he agreed that the proceeds of certain policies of insurance on his life, payable to his estate, which he had deposited with defendant, as collateral, to secure his said note, should be applied to the payment of the note, and any surplus should be held by the defendant upon the following terms and conditions, which we copy from the note: "If I shall come under any other liability, or enter into any other agreement with said bank, while it is the holder of this obligation, it is hereby agreed and understood that any excess of collaterals upon this note shall be applicable to such other note or claim held by the said Pamlico Insurance & Banking Company against said Leon A. Williams, and, in case of any exchange of the collaterals above named, the provisions of this note shall extend to such new collaterals." Leon A. Williams on November 16, 1909, executed to one Job Cobb, in his own name, though as cashier of defendant bank and for it, his note for $44.64; the consideration being a debt which he owed the bank. The original debt of $3,000 has been paid, except the sum of $181.50, for which a renewal note was given by Williams, which is now due and unpaid. On October 1, 1909, the firm of Williams, Weddell & Co., of which Leon A. Williams was a member, had been engaged in the insurance business as agents of defendant, and on said date were indebted to defendant, as its agents, in the sum of $828.30, for premiums collected and not paid to defendant. This debt is now due; no part thereof having been paid. The firm is insolvent. Leon A. Williams died insolvent on October 24, 1911, and plaintiff is his administrator. Defendant, after demand, made a statement to plaintiff of its administration of the said collaterals, showing the total proceeds of the policies in its hands to be $1,985, and it was thereupon agreed that defendant should retain so much of the said proceeds as is legally applicable to its claims, the same to be determined by the court under the submission, and pay the balance to the plaintiff. It was admitted, as part of the facts, that defendant, by its cashier, demanded of Leon A. Williams October 1, 1909, the payment of the open account due by Williams, Weddell & Co., to which Williams replied: "You have, to secure it, everything I possess now, and I can do nothing for you." The balance due on the original debt ($181.50) is not in controversy. The court held upon the admitted facts that defendant had a lien on the proceeds of the policies, under its contract with Leon A. Williams, for the debts of $44.64 and $828.30, and adjudged that said amounts and the costs be retained by defendant out of said proceeds, and the balance paid to plaintiff, who appealed from the judgment.

Jas. M. Norfleet, of Tarboro, for appellant.
G. M. T. Fountain & Son and Marshall C. Staton, all of Tarboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff contends that, as the liability of Leon A. Williams for the open account is not of the same kind as that upon his note for which the policies were deposited as collateral, the former is not within the terms of the contract; one being an individual and the other a firm. But we are unable to accept this view, as we think the words of the contract are sufficiently broad and comprehensive to embrace an express, and, if not expressed, then an implied, promise to pay the bank the amount of the premiums collected by his firm as insurance agents for it. Partners are liable on their obligations to creditors jointly and severally. It is the undertaking or promise of the partnership, as well as of each of its members. But, apart from this, the debt for premiums collected by the firm, and not paid over, is within the very terms of the agreement as to the collaterals. This case is so much like that of Hallowell v. Bank, 154 Mass. 359, 28 N. E. 281, 13 L. R. A. (O. S.) 315, and the reasoning of the court in that case so strongly commends itself to us, that we might content ourselves with a bare reference to it, were it not for the zeal and confidence with which the contrary view was urged upon us. The clause of the collateral note construed in that case was as follows: "On the non-performance of this promise [a demand note for $25,000], said bank applying the net proceeds [of the collaterals, being shares of stock] to the payment of this note and accounting to me for the surplus, if any; and it is hereby agreed that such surplus, or any excess of collaterals upon this note, shall be applicable to any other note or claim against me held by said bank." After disposing of a preliminary question, as to whether the surplus proceeds of the collaterals were applicable to the payment of a firm debt until there was a final default in the payment of the original note, the court says: "The question remains whether the bank is entitled to hold the security for the bills, which were accepted by Smith's firm and not by him individually. It cannot be denied that the acceptances were claims against him, and that the words used in his note were broad enough to embrace firm acceptances, unless there is some reason in the contract, the circumstances, or mercantile practice to give them a narrower meaning. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Allen, 122 Mass. 467; Chuck v. Freen, Mood & M. 259. The clause pledging the property for any other claim against the debtor is not inserted with a view to certain specific debts, but as a dragnet to make sure that whatever comes to the creditor's hands shall be held by the latter until its claims are satisfied. Corey on Accounts and Lindley on Partnership have made it popular to refer to a mercantile distinction between the firm and its members. But we have no doubt that our merchants are perfectly aware that claims against their firms are claims against them, and when a merchant gives security for any claim against him, and there is nothing to cut down the literal meaning of the words, he must be taken to include claims against him as partner."

This principle is affirmed in 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 871; 31 Cyc. 821c and 822c, and notes, where the cases are collected. While such an agreement will be construed so as to execute the intention of the parties and to give effect to every part thereof, yet it will be construed strictly, so as not to extend the obligation beyond the meaning contemplated. This is not unlike contracts generally, which must be so interpreted as to ascertain from the context what the parties intended, so as to enforce the undertaking according to their understanding of it. The language of the contract in this case is exceedingly broad, and the contract is sufficient to include, according to its terms and by its very words, "any other liability" or obligation arising out of "any other agreement of Leon A. Williams with the bank," and also "any other note or claim." We can hardly think of any more certain language that could have been employed by the parties to embrace this particular kind of obligation, if they had in mind, and intended at the time, to secure it by the deposit of the collaterals. It was not intended to confine the securities merely to a liability in the form of a note, but to any kind of liability evidenced by note or created by agreement, or in the shape of a claim, and the language was broadened by the use of the words "liability," "agreement," and "claim," in order to extend the operation of the contract to almost every conceivable obligation. Chief Justice Marshall in Barry v. Foyles, 1 Pet. 311, 7 L. Ed. 157, said: "This suit is brought on a partnership transaction against one of the partners. The declaration states a contract with the partner who is sued, and gives no notice that it was made by him with another. Will evidence of a joint assumpsit support such a declaration? Although it has been held from the St. 36 Hen. VI, c. 38, that a suit against one of several joint obligors might be sustained, unless the matter was pleaded in abatement, yet with respect to joint contracts, either in writing or by parol, a different rule was formerly adopted, upon the ground of a supposed variance between the contract laid and that which was proved. This distinction was overruled by Lord Mansfield in the case of Rice v. Shute, 5 Burn, 2611. The same point was afterwards adjudged in Abbott v. Smith, 2 W. Black, 695, and has been ever since invariably maintained. The principle is that a contract made by copartners is several, as well as joint, and the assumpsit is made by all and by each. It is obligatory on all, and on each of the partners." It was accordingly held that evidence of a joint assumpsit may be given at common law to support a declaration against one of the partners upon his several liability. We are of the opinion that the defendant is entitled to retain a sufficient amount from the proceeds of the collaterals to pay the firm debt, and we entertain the same view in regard to the note of $44.64, given by Leon A. Williams to Job Cobb for the bank; Cobb being at the time its cashier. Under the old procedure suit upon this note would have been in the name of Job Cobb to the use of the bank, as he is the holder of the legal title, but now it would be brought in the name of the bank, the beneficial owner of the note. It can make no difference that the note is payable to Job Cobb, when it is admitted to be the property of the bank and to have been given for a debt due to it; the amount of the note having been credited to Williams on the books of the bank at the time it was given.

We have not brought to our aid, in construing the contract, the interpretation which Leon A. Williams himself put upon it, when in reply to a demand from the bank for payment of the firm indebtedness he said: "You have, to secure it, everything I possess now, and I can do nothing further for you." It was not necessary that we should lay any stress upon his own construction of his agreement with the bank, as his intention is clearly manifested to us without this additional light. We have carefully examined the authorities cited by the plaintiff's counsel, and do not think they apply to this case, or that they should influence our decision in any degree. They are cases in which it was attempted to divert the proceeds of collaterals deposited to secure a specific debt, to the discharge of some other obligation of the pledgor not mentioned in the agreement of the parties, or to his general indebtedness. The case of Bank v. Scott, 123 N. C. 540, 31

S. E. 819, was of this kind, and the court held that the collaterals could not be applied to the payment of debts with which the pledgors were not connected, but should be used only in discharge of the debts, specified in the collateral agreement, upon which they were liable as principals, indorsers, or sureties. The two cases are not exactly alike in their facts, but the principle upon which Bank v. Scott was decided is applicable to the case at bar, and sustains our view of the law.

Our opinion, on the whole case, being with the defendant, we affirm the judgment entered by the court upon the case agreed.

HARDISON v. DUNN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—CONTRACT FOR SALE OF TIMBER—BREACH—WARRANTY.

Where a contract for the sale of timber, on land described as containing 140 acres, but which in fact contained only 109 acres, did not warrant that the tract contained any specific number of acres, or that there was any certain number of feet of standing timber of the required dimensions on the land, but only required plaintiff to pay $2,000 on the removal of every 600,000 feet within a specified time, plaintiff could not recover damages because of the shortage in acreage, or because there was not sufficient timber of the contract size on the property to cut 1,800,000 feet.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.* Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 890.]

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—TIMBER CONTRACTS—RECOVERY OF PAYMENTS.

Where plaintiff voluntarily made two payments of $2,000 each on a timber contract, he was not entitled to recover any part of such amount because of a shortage of timber or acreage, in the absence of a warranty, or any claim of fraud, misrepresentation, or deceit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALES—LIABILITY FOR PRICE.

Where a timber contract provided for payments of $2,000 when 600,000 feet of timber had been cut, not later than specified dates, and two payments had been received for, the landowner was not entitled to a third payment until the third cut of 600,000 feet had been accomplished; and, it appearing that the remaining timber was only sufficient to cut 387,000 feet, plaintiff could only be required to pay the value of that amount, measured by the purchase price of the entire tract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Cooke, Judge.

Action by W. H. Hardison against J. R. Dunn and another. Judgment for defendants on their counterclaim, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The land upon which the timber grew is described as containing 140 acres, and the metes and bounds are set out with particularity. After commencement of this action survey was made, and the land found to contain 109 acres only. The defendant set up a counterclaim for $2,000, unpaid purchase money (being the last payment) on timber. Upon the pleadings, and admission that the tract of land conveyed only 109 acres, his honor adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing by his writ, and that defendants recover $2,000 and interest on their counterclaim. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

E. B. Grantham, of Rocky Mount, and Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant. Bunn & Spruill, of Rocky Mount, for appellees.

BROWN, J. [1] We agree with the superior court that the plaintiff has no cause of action against defendants. There is no warranty in the timber contract that the tract of land contains any specific number of acres, or that there is a certain number of feet of standing timber of the required dimension. There is nothing in the paper which indicates that the defendants guaranteed either the acreage of land or quantity of timber. The payments for the timber are provided for in the following clause: "The said W. H. Hardison is to pay $2,000 before any of the timber is cut, $2,000 when 600,000 feet have been cut, not later than July 15, 1910, $2,000 when 600,000 feet more have been cut, not later than January 15, 1911, this payment completing all payments."

[2] The plaintiff voluntarily made the first two payments, and is not entitled to recover any part of them back. When plaintiff made the second payment, he was given this receipt: "Received of W. H. Hardison $2,000 in full for the second payment on timber contract, and in full for second payment of 600 M. feet. [Signed] J. R. Dunn, Agent." In the absence of a warranty, and any allegation of fraud, misrepresentation, and deceit, we fail to see that plaintiff has any cause of action against defendants, either for damages or to recover any part of the money paid.

[3] We are of opinion, however, that the court erred in rendering judgment upon the pleadings in favor of the defendants upon their counterclaim for the entire third payment of $2,000. The payments provided for in this contract are conditional, and are not to be made until the condition has been performed. The second payment was made, and is acknowledged to be in full for "600 M. feet" of timber admitted to have been cut. Before the plaintiff can be required to make the third payment of $2,000, he must cut 600,000 more feet of timber, for the payment is to be made only when that quantity has been cut, and plaintiff must either cut it, or pay for it, by January 15, 1911. It turns out that plaintiff cannot cut the second 600,000 feet, because it is not on the land to cut.

He is entitled to 600,000 feet for the second payment, and to same quantity additional (1,200,000 feet in all) before he can be required to make the third payment. We find nothing in the contract to sustain plaintiff's contention that defendants undertook to sell him 1,800,000 feet.

The plaintiff admits in his complaint that he has cut 600,000 feet and paid for it, and received the receipt above recited. He avers that immediately after paying the second $2,000, and receiving said receipt, he proceeded to cut under the third installment, and cut only 387,000 feet, when the timber on the tract gave out. This being so, the plaintiff could only be required to pay the value of the 387,000 feet, measured by the purchase price of the entire tract, and not the entire payment of $2,000, as adjudged by his honor.

On the next trial either party can offer evidence as to the quantity of timber cut.

TAYLOR v. WHITE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

1. MARRIAGE (§ 60*)—ANNULMENT—PRIOR EXISTING MARRIAGE—NATURE OF ACTION.

An action to annul a marriage on account of defendant's prior existing marriage is not technically an action for divorce, though alimony pendente lite may be allowed; and hence Revisal 1905, § 1563, which limits the time within which a complaint for divorce may be filed, is inapplicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 125-135; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. MARRIAGE (§ 58*)—VALIDITY—EFFECT ON SUBSEQUENT MARRIAGE.

A former marriage, which has been decreed to have been void because induced under duress, was void ab initio, and hence does not afford ground for annulment of a later marriage between one of the parties and a third person, though such decree was rendered after the second marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 115-123; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. MARRIAGE (§ 67*)—ANNULMENT—DECREE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A decree annulling a marriage on the ground that it was entered into under duress is conclusive upon the parties, unless impeached in a direct proceeding for fraud or collusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. § 140; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Lucy Taylor against N. D. White. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George E. Butler, of Clinton, and N. D. White, for appellant. Fowler & Crumpler, of Clinton, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff in her maiden name for the annulment of her marriage to the defendant, upon the ground that it was void because the defendant at the time of the ceremony had a living wife.

[1] This is not technically an action for divorce, though in a general way it comes under that heading to the extent that alimony pendente lite may be allowed. Lea v. Lea, 104 N. C. 603, 10 S. E. 488, 17 Am. St. Rep. 692. We must deny the motion made by the defendant to dismiss for failure to give the affidavit required by section 1563, Revisal 1905, for that applies strictly to divorces; for the requirement that the facts must "have existed to the plaintiff's knowledge at least six months prior to the filing of the complaint," and that on "failure to file a petition for divorce within ninety days after the expiration of that time" the plaintiff shall forfeit the right of action, is intended to prevent hasty action for divorce, and to give the parties opportunity for reconciliation, and to prevent bad faith and collusion. Holloman v. Holloman, 127 N. C. 15, 37 S. E. 68; Nichols v. Nichols, 128 N. C. 108, 38 S. E. 296. Those reasons do not apply to a void marriage. It is true that such action for annulment and declaring a marriage void ab initio under Revisal, § 1560, comes under the general head of "Divorce" in the Code (chapter 31), and is so styled in Johnson v. Kincaide, 37 N. C. 470, yet it has broad features of difference from the general action of divorce, which, technically speaking, is based upon a valid marriage.

[2] In this case the ground for annulment is the allegation that the defendant, at the date of his marriage to the plaintiff in December, 1910, was the husband of one Georgia A. White. The judgment roll of the superior court of Edgecombe county at September term, 1911, was placed in evidence, showing that in a properly constituted action between said N. D. White and his alleged former wife, Georgia A. White, upon issues submitted to the jury, it was found that said N. D. White had been "compelled to marry the defendant, Georgia A. White, against his will, that said marriage was void, and that he had never lived with her as her husband after said alleged marriage," and thereupon judgment was entered that "the marriage ceremony performed by which N. D. White and Georgia A. White were declared man and wife is and was absolutely void, and that said bonds of matrimony are hereby annulled and declared null and void ab initio. G. W. Ward, Judge presiding."

[3] It is true that said decree was entered subsequently to the marriage of N. D. White to this plaintiff; but, as the decree decides and cannot be controverted, there was never any valid marriage between N. D. White and Georgia A. White, and he was a single man at the time of his marriage to this plaintiff. While this plaintiff was not a party to that action, the decree declaring the status of the parties to that action is conclusive, unless impeached by a direct proceeding for fraud or collusion. "All marriages procured by force or fraud, or involving palpable error, are void; for here the element of mutual consent is wanting so essential to every contract. The law treats a matrimonial union of this kind as absolutely void ab initio, and permits its validity to be questioned in any court, at the option, however, of the injured party." Schouler, Dom. Rel. (3d Ed.) 38. The marriage between the defendant and Georgia A. White being void, he was free to marry the plaintiff; for "a void marriage imposes no legal restraint upon the party imposed upon from contracting another." Patterson v. Gaines, 6 How. 591, 12 L. Ed. 553.

Though the decree of annulment of defendant's first marriage was rendered after his marriage to the plaintiff, he had always treated the first marriage as void, and the decree declared it void ab initio. Though it was voidable, and not void, he did not ratify it, and it was therefore void ab initio by the decree. "A marriage is voidable on the ground of fraud, duress, or error, and not absolutely void; but it is voidable by the acts of the party without the necessity for a decree of nullity." Tiffany, Dom. Rel. 14, 35. "A decree annulling a marriage is final and conclusive, and not open to collateral impeachment, although it may be vacated or set aside for good cause on proper application. Its effect is to make the supposed or pretended marriage as if it had never existed, and hence it restores both parties to their former status, and to all rights of property as before the marriage. Hence, also, its effect is to make any children of the marriage illegitimate, unless illegitimacy is saved by a statute, as is now the case in several states." 26 Cyc. 920. Such is the case in this state. Rev. § 1569; State v. Setzer, 97 N. C. 252, 1 S. E. 553, 2 Am. St. Rep. 290; Sims v. Sims, 121 N. C. 297, 28 S. E. 407, 40 L. R. A. 737, 61 Am. St. Rep. 665.

The position of the plaintiff is inconsistent. She asks to have her own marriage declared void ab initio, but wishes to deny that effect to a decree of the court declaring her husband's marriage to Georgia A. White also void ab initio. It is true that her ground is the allegation that her husband was incapacitated to marry by reason of an existing marriage; but the ground of the decree obtained by him is that he never entered into the marriage, having been forced into it by duress. In neither case was there a valid marriage, if the allegations were found to be true. The subsequent assent of the husband would have made his voidable marriage valid; but, as that was not given, it was void ab initio, and imposed no obligation on him. The alleged marriage of the defendant with Georgia A. White, not being ratified by him, was never a de facto marriage, as plaintiff's attorneys claim, while that of the plaintiff and defendant was a de facto marriage, if that term can be applied to a marriage at all. There was no legal impediment on defendant at the time of his marriage to plaintiff, and their marriage is valid.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 451, making it unlawful for any person or corporation to carry on the business of hauling logs over the roads of any road district without first having obtained a license therefor, and fixing the license fee, includes any person or corporation engaged in the business, and does not conflict with Const. art. 5, § 3, requiring taxation by uniform rule, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Cooke, Judge.

Orren Bullock was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was convicted in the Superior court of Nash county, upon appeal from a justice of the peace, upon a warrant charging that he had carried on the business of hauling logs, etc., without obtaining a license therefor, in violation of the provisions of chapter 451, Laws 1911. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment, for that the indictment and judgment in this action are based upon a statute which violates the Constitution of North Carolina and the Constitution of the United States, and is invalid. Constitution of North Carolina, art. 5, § 3; article 1, § 7; article 1, § 17; Const. U. S. Amend. 14. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Jas. H. Pou and Murray Allen, both of Raleigh, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett and T. H. Calvert, of Raleigh, for the State.

ALLEN, J. [1-3] The statute under which the defendant was convicted (chapter 451, § 39, of Public Local Laws of 1911) reads as follows: "That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation to carry on the business of hauling logs, timber or lumber over the roads of any one of the road districts above laid out and created, without first having obtained a license therefor; and any person or corporation carrying on the business of hauling logs, timber or lumber as aforesaid, without having first obtained license, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than fifty dollars. Said license shall be issued by the road commissioners of the road district or township over the roads of which the wagon or wagons are driven, and will be signed by the chairman and countersigned by the clerk of said road commission. The license tax which said road commission in each township is to collect is as follows, to wit: for each one-horse wagon, five dollars for each year or part of a year; for each two-horse wagon, ten dollars for each year or part of a year; for each three-horse wagon and four-horse wagon, fifteen dollars for each year or part of a year; for each wagon drawn by more than four horses or mules, twenty dollars for each year or part of a year. The money thus collected from license taxes as aforesaid shall be paid over to the treasurer of the county of Nash by the road commissioner collecting the same, to be held to the credit of the township or road district so collecting. Any district or township in which wagons are operated shall be entitled to collect the license tax without respect to its having been collected by any other township."

If this statute is compared with the one under consideration in State v. Holloman, 139 N. C. 642, 52 S. E. 408, and the one in Road Trustees v. Brown, 159 N. C. 75, 75 S. E. 40, it will be found to be in all material respects like the one sustained by a unanimous court in the first, and that it meets the objections of the justices dissenting in the second. In the Holloman Case the statute was as follows: "That any person, firm or corporation desiring to use any of the public roads of a township for carrying on his or its business of hauling mill logs or timber or other heavy material with log wagons, log carts or other heavy vehicles, shall first obtain a license for this purpose from the board of supervisors of the township in which he or they may desire to operate and make use of the roads, by paying an annual license tax of fifteen dollars for each wagon or cart or vehicle of the kind above described to be used, which tax shall be paid to the treasurer of the board fund and placed to the credit of the board of supervisors of the township, to be used by the board as other funds for said township. Any person violating this section shall be guilty of a crime and liable to a penalty of fifty dollars, to be recovered in an action by the board of supervisors of roads of the township where the offense took place, for the benefit of the road fund of that township." And the court held the statute constitutional; the only difference between the statute in that case and the one in this being that in one the license was to be paid by any person, corporation, etc., carrying on the business of hauling "logs, timber or lumber," while in the other it was to be paid by any person, corporation, etc., carrying on the business of hauling "mill logs or timber or other heavy material."

In the case of Trustees v. Brown the following statute was approved: "That any lumber company, corporation, person or persons engaged in the lumber business and desiring to use any of the public roads of any of the townships of Macon county, for the purpose of carrying on its or their business of hauling, either by it or themselves, or by hiring or contracting with other persons, mill logs, lumber, or other heavy material with log wagons, log carts, or other heavy vehicles, shall pay a license or other privilege tax of two (2) cents per mile on each 1,000 feet of mill logs, lumber, or other heavy material so hauled." Two of the justices dissented from the opinion of the court in the last case, upon the ground that the statute did not apply to all who hauled logs, heavy material, etc., but only to those who were engaged in the lumber business, and that this was a discrimination not permitted by law. The statute before us is not subject to this objection, as it includes any person, corporation, etc., engaged in the business of hauling logs, etc.

We therefore hold that the two cases cited are decisive of this, and that there is no error.

No error.

ASHFORD v. PITTMAN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 8, 1912.)

1. BAILMENT (§ 14*)—BAILEE FOR HIRE—LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

A bailee for hire is liable for failure to use ordinary care in keeping the bailed property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bailment, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-56; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. LIVERY STABLE KEEPERS (§ 7*)—NEGLECT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action against a bailee of a horse for its loss in a fire, evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on a question whether the bailee was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Livery Stable Keepers, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. LIVERY STABLE KEEPERS (§ 7*)—EVIDENCE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where plaintiff sued to recover for the death of his horse, burned in defendant's stable, by the alleged negligence of defendant as bailee, evidence that on the day of the fire defendant built a fire around a pot to heat water for hog killing, within 30 feet of the stable, is admissible on the issue of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Livery Stable Keepers, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Ouslow County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by T. P. Ashford against John A. Pittman. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. New trial granted.

D. E. Henderson, of New Bern, for appellant. D. L. Ward, of New Bern, and Frank Thompson, of Jacksonville, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff's horse was stabled with the defendant for safe-keeping as a bailee for hire. The defendant's stables were on his premises in the town of Swansboro, and in them the defendant had been keeping horses for stabling and feeding, for pay, for the plaintiff and others. On the 13th of December, 1910, the stables were burned, and the plaintiff's horse was destroyed by fire, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendant.

[1] The liability of a bailee for hire for the failure to use ordinary care in the keeping of the property committed to his charge is too well settled to need the citation of authority. Jones on Bailments, 5; 8 A. & E. Ency. 742. The only assignment of error presents the question as to whether there is any evidence of negligence.

[2] The evidence tends to prove that on the morning when the stables were burned the defendant caused to be built a large fire around a pot to heat water for hog killing; that this fire was built within 30 feet of the stables in which the defendant had stored a large quantity of hay and other combustible matters; that a strong wind was blowing at the time very nearly in the direction of the stables, so that sparks from the fire could easily reach them; that there was no other fire around or near the stables, except the one built around the pot; that immediately after building the fire the defendant went away and left it unprotected and unguarded; that after the defendant went into his house in some little while the cry of "Fire" was heard, and the defendant ran out and found the stables on fire. The plaintiff's horse was burned to death in the stables.

No evidence is offered which tends in the least to explain or throw any light upon the cause of the fire, unless it caught from the fire around the pot, built within 30 feet of the stables. It is true that the evidence does not prove conclusively that the stables caught from the fire built so near them; but we think the evidence is of such circumstantial character that it should be submitted to the jury, to be determined whether the building the fire around the pot caused the burning of the stables.

[3] Circumstantial evidence has frequently been allowed to determine matters of much greater consequence, both criminal and civil. There are a number of cases in our reports where the evidence of circumstances has been allowed to go to the jury as bearing upon the origin of a fire. McMillan v. Railroad, 126

N. C. 725, 36 S. E. 129; Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 327; Simpson v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 101, 45 S. E. 469.

If the jury shall determine that the building of the fire around the pot was the cause of the burning of the stables and the plaintiff's horse, then it will be a question, under the peculiar circumstances and facts of this case, for the jury to say whether a man of ordinary prudence would have built such a fire in such a place and under such circumstances.

CLARK MILLINERY CO., Inc., v. NATIONAL UNION FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 3, 1912.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 623*)—ACTION ON POLICY—TIME—DENIAL OF LIABILITY.

Where a fire insurance company through its adjuster denied all liability soon after the appraisers' award had been filed, it thereby waived a provision that suit should not be brought until a specified period had elapsed after the filing of satisfactory proofs of loss, or an award of appraisers when appraisal has been required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1543, 1551-1553; Dec. Dig. § 623.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 623*)—ACTION ON POLICY—TIME.

A clause in an insurance policy for delay of suit is inserted for the sole benefit of the insurer to permit time for investigation; and hence the insurer may waive the same by an unequivocal denial of liability, and this notwithstanding an agreement that the submission and appraisal should not waive any right of either party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1543, 1551-1553; Dec. Dig. § 623.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 622*)—FIRE POLICY—ACTIONS—TIME—COMMENCEMENT BY RECEIVER.

Insured's affairs having been placed in the hands of a receiver, he brought an action in insured's name on the policy in question within the time limited therein, and, after such time had expired, became a party plaintiff to it himself as receiver. Held, that plaintiff receiver was entitled to sue in the name of the corporation for which he was acting, and that the action did not lose its identity by his joining as a party plaintiff in his official capacity, so as to make it a new suit brought without the contract limitation period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1544-1556; Dec. Dig. § 622.*]

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 80*)—CONSTRUCTION.

Everything will be intended in favor of an award as far as possible consistent with the law, but nothing will be intended against it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-427; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

5. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 65*)—CONFORMITY TO SUBMISSION.

Though an award must conform strictly to the submission, it may be good as to a part and void as to the remainder, if the parts are separable, in case the arbitrators have acted in excess of their authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 328-332; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

6. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 80*)—AMBIGUITY.

Any ambiguity in the words of an award should be settled in the way which will best coincide with the apparent intention of the arbitrators, and the court by intendment will restrain general terms to apply to particular words in the submission, so as to connect the particular thing awarded with such general words.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-427; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

7. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 60*)—REQUISITES OF AWARD—"CERTAINTY."

The certainty required in an award is certainty to a common intent, not to a certain intent in general, or in every particular, but certainty which is attained by giving to the words their ordinary sense; not excluding, however, any meaning derived from fair argument or inference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 298-309; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1028, 1029.]

8. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 60*)—FORM OF AWARD—CERTAINTY.

While certainty is an essential element of a good award and one of its chief characteristics, it is not necessary that it should be written with such technical and critical nicety that subtle examinations and forced constructions cannot discover a doubt, difficulty, or a double meaning in any part of it; reasonable certainty being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 298-309; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

9. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 88*)—PAROL PROOF.

An award of arbitrators cannot be altered by parol, nor is parol evidence admissible to prove the understanding or meaning of the arbitrators, different from that warranted by the terms of the award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 514-518; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

10. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 52*)—FORM OF AWARD.

An award of arbitrators need not assign reasons, but is sufficient if it consists of a simple announcement of their decision, or the result of their investigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 261-266; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

11. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 29*)—BASIS OF ARBITRATION.

Arbitrators are not bound to decide according to law when acting within the scope of their authority, but may make an award according to their notions of justice on principles of equity and good conscience.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 147-154; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

12. INSURANCE (§ 574*)—CONSTRUCTION OF AWARD—UNCERTAINTY.

Where an award of arbitrators, with reference to a loss under a policy, stated that the total amount of the award was $4,872.62 and the damaged stock, it was not rendered fatally defective for uncertainty because the arbitrators evidently misunderstood the insurance company's blank on which the award was written, and placed certain of the figures in the wrong column.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1430-1432, 1434; Dec. Dig. § 574.*]

13. INSURANCE (§ 574*)—ACTION ON AWARD—CHANGE.

Where an award of arbitrators allowed $4,872.62 and the damaged stock for loss under a policy, a verdict fixing the value of the damaged goods at $257 did not authorize the court to deduct that sum from the amount found due by the arbitrators, as such deduction amounted to a change of the award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1430-1432, 1434; Dec. Dig. § 574.*]

14. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—PREJUDICE—RIGHT TO ALLEGE ERROR.

In an action on an insurance award, the insurance company was not prejudiced by, and could not complain of, an erroneous deduction of the value found by a jury to represent the damaged goods, which the arbitrators had directed should be delivered to plaintiff as of no value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4052-4062; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

15. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 82*)—CHANGE OF AWARD—FRAUD—MISTAKE.

It is not competent to change an award in any way which will change the meaning appearing on its face, in the absence of proof of fraud or mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 440-450; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Justice, Judge.

Action by the Clark Millinery Company, Incorporated, against the National Union Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action brought in the superior court by the Millinery Company to recover on certain fire insurance policies issued to it by the defendants. The complainant, F. S. Hassell, was appointed receiver of the Millinery Company, a corporation which had become insolvent, and made a party to the action at his own request. The property destroyed by fire was a stock of merchandise, consisting chiefly of millinery and notions and store furniture and fixtures. The parties agreed to submit to arbitration the ascertainment of "the sound value of said property and the loss and damage," and a certain method was prescribed for doing so. The agreement of reference to arbitrators contained what is called a "nonwaiver clause," by which it was stipulated that the submission and appraisal "shall not waive or invalidate any rights of either party to the agreement under the said policy or policies, or any provisions or conditions thereof." The arbitrators met and appointed an umpire, as they were authorized to do by the terms of the submission, and the three returned the following award:

"We, the undersigned, pursuant to the within appointment, do hereby certify that we have truly and conscientiously performed the duties assigned us in accordance with the foregoing stipulations, and have appraised and determined the actual cash value of said property on the — day of —, 190—, and the actual loss and damages there- by the fire which occurred on that day, to be as follows:

	Sound Value.	Loss and Dam- age.
On	$6,039.53
On	$4,872.62	$1,168.91
On furniture and fixtures..	$ 460.80	$ 178.08

"Total amount of award, $4,872.62 and the damaged stock.

"Witness our hands this 10th day of March, 1910.

"Agree as to furniture and fixtures only.

"J. I. Thomason,

"Q. E. Rawls,

"Appraisers.

"J. T. Williams,

"Umpire."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Has there been an appraisal and award, as provided in the policies, as to the amount of damages to which plaintiff is entitled under the policies of insurance attached to the complaint? Answer: Yes (by consent).

"(2) Did the plaintiff bring this action within less than 60 days from the date of the making of the award by the appraisers? Answer: Yes (by consent).

"(3) Did Jordon S. Thomas, adjuster, subsequent to said award and while acting as representative of defendant companies, by words, acts, or conduct, deny all liability under said award? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Did more than one year elapse after the date of the award made by the appraisers and the date that the plaintiff F. S. Hassell, receiver of the Clark Millinery Company, was made a party to this action? Answer: Yes (by consent).

"(5) In what amount are the defendants indebted unto the plaintiffs by reason of the said fire and under the policies of insurance set forth in the complaint, and by virtue of the said award? Answer: Three thousand, four hundred and sixty-one dollars, and seventy-three cents, with interest from May 10, 1910, on stock, and (by consent) $178.08 damage to the furniture and fixtures, with interest from May 10, 1910.

"(6) What was the value of the insured property saved from the fire? Answer: $257."

The plaintiffs allege, in the seventh section of their complaint, that the fire occurred on the 1st day of January, 1910, and "practically destroyed the entire stock" of the Millinery Company, and this allegation is admitted in the answer. There was no dispute as to the insurance and award, so far as they related to the furniture and fixtures, and that matter is eliminated from the case.

The policies contained the following clauses:

"(1) The loss shall not be payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of loss herein required have been received by this company, including an award by appraisers when appraisal has been required.

"(2) No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured of all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve (12) months next after the fire."

There was a judgment upon the verdict, and the defendant appealed, after reserving certain exceptions, to be hereafter noted.

Connor & Connor, of Wilson, for appellant. Woodard & Hassell, of Wilson, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendants resist recovery upon three grounds.

[1] First. That the action was prematurely brought. It was found by the jury that the company soon after the award was filed denied its liability thereunder, through its adjuster, and the finding is fully supported by the evidence. The adjuster, after examining the award, refused to allow the arbitrators to rearrange the figures and place them in their proper columns, and in reply to a request that he permit this change to be made, so that it might appear clearly what was intended, he said: "It is no good. I demand another appraisal. We are not liable for one cent under that award. You cannot hold us for one cent." This language was a strong and unequivocal denial of all liability, and made inapplicable the stipulation for the six weeks' extension of time for payment. That clause evidently refers to a proof of loss or an award, the validity of which and the correctness of the amount due thereunder are admitted. The agreement is that the company shall be allowed six weeks to pay, and not six weeks if it has refused to pay and denied liability. Why require plaintiff to wait six weeks to sue for a debt which is disputed, or, to put it in other words, to wait six weeks for payment, when the defendant has emphatically said that it will not pay at the end of the time? It was intended to be merely an extension of credit upon an admitted debt. And so are the authorities. It will be observed that the provision for an allowance of six weeks indulgence is the same as to proof of loss and the award, and we have held in Higson v. Insurance Co., 152 N. C. 206, 67 S. E. 509, that a denial of liability will dispense with proofs of loss, and to the same effect are the following cases: Gerring-er v. Insurance Co., 133 N. C. 407, 45 S. E. 773;

Jordan v. Insurance Co., 151 N. C. 341, 66 S. E. 206; Parker v. Insurance Co., 143 N. C. 339, 55 S. E. 717; Insurance Co. v. Edmundson, 104 Va. 486, 52 S. E. 350; 19 Cyc. 857, § 2, and other authorities cited in Higson v. Insurance Co., supra. In State Insurance Co. v. Maackens, 38 N. J. Law, at page 571, the same doctrine is stated, and supported by the citation of many cases: "A denial of all liability on the policy and peremptory refusal to pay under any circumstances is also a waiver of the right of the company to have the stipulated time before any suit is commenced. Upon such denial of liability, and refusal to pay, an action may be commenced at once. Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co. v. Western Mass. Ins. Co. [Fed. Cas. No. 10,363] 6 Blatchf. C. C. R. 241; s. c., 34 Conn. 561 [Fed. Cas. No. 10,363]; Allgre v. Maryland Ins. Co., 6 Har. & J. [Md.] 408 [12 Am. Dec. 289]; Phillips v. Protection Ins. Co., 14 Mo. 220; Baltimore Fire Ins. Co. v. Loney, 20 Md. 20; Aetna Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Ill. 342; Cobb v. Ins. Co., 11 Kan. 93." The court in Insurance Co. v. Gracey, 15 Colo. 70, 24 Pac. 577, 22 Am. St. Rep. 376, said that the clause was inserted to give the company an opportunity for making arrangements to pay the debt, and when liability is denied, since payment is in no event to be made, preparation therefor becomes a matter of no importance whatever. It therefore held that the condition was waived by the denial. The simple way to put it is that the clause has failed of its purpose. Time was allowed upon the assumption that the company would act in good faith and pay the claim, and not attempt to use the indulgence for the mere purpose of delay. What is said in Insurance Co. v. Cary, 83 Ill. 453, is still more to the point: "What reason can be assigned for extending to the company the benefit of the limitation clause in the policy as to the bringing of an action for a loss which its officers have decided upon full examination not to pay at any time nor under any circumstances? The time given in which to make payment of the loss was of no value to the company, for it did not intend to pay at all, and the assured was at liberty to bring her action at once." The same court said, in Insurance Co. v. Maguire, 51 Ill. 342: "The fair understanding of this condition of the policy seems to us to be that when the company agrees to pay the loss, or are undecided what they will do, no suit can be brought until after the expiration of sixty days from the time proof of loss is furnished, but it cannot apply, nor would it be just that it should, to a case where a company peremptorily refused to pay, as was this case."

[2] The cases uniformly state that the object of this clause, inserted for the sole benefit of the insurer, is to allow time for investigation in the case of the requirement as to proof of loss and of preparation in the case of an adjustment. Proofs would be of no avail when there is a denial of liability, and it would be unreasonable to insist upon the extension of time to pay a claim, a mere favor, if it did not intend to pay it. "The denial of liability is inconsistent with such a claim and a waiver of it." Insurance Co. v. Gibson, 53 Ark. 494, 14 S. W. 672. The authorities sustaining this view are very numerous. Biddle on Insurance, § 1145; 4 Joyce on Insurance, § 3211; 19 Cyc. 903 (c), and note 57; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 374; Insurance Co. v. Hancock, 106 Tenn. 513, 62 S. W. 145, 52 L. R. A. 665; Massell v. Insurance Co., 19 R. I. 569, 35 Atl. 209; Assurance Co. v. Hanna, 60 Neb. 29, 82 N. W. 97; Insurance Co. v. Sylvester, 25 Ind. App. 207, 57 N. E. 991; Landis v. Insurance Co., 56 Mo. 591; Insurance Co. v. Wickham, 110 Ga. 129, 35 S. E. 287. The suggestion that an adjusted claim under a policy is analogous to a promissory note, where a mere denial of liability would not affect the operation of the statute of limitations, is fully answered in Insurance Co. v. Wickham, supra, citing Brewer, J., in Cobb v. Insurance Co., 11 Kan. 93. The nonwaiver agreement does not change the result. The denial of liability was something that occurred after the adjustment, and not during its progress. Strause v. Insurance Co., 123 N. C. 64, 38 S. E. 256; Dibble v. Insurance Co., 110 N. C. 193, 14 S. E. 783, 28 Am. St. Rep. 678. Besides, in this case, the defendant ratifies the agent's denial of liability, and still insists upon it. Modlin v. Insurance Co., 151 N. C. 35, 65 S. E. 605. The very terms of the nonwaiver agreement confine its immunity and protection to things said and done while engaged in ascertaining and adjusting the loss, and not to anything said or done ex post facto. This exception, therefore, is overruled.

[3] Second. But defendant says that, if the action was not brought too soon, it was brought too late, as there is a clause requiring suit to be brought within 12 months next after the fire. The fire occurred in January, 1910, and this action was commenced by the Millinery Company on May 4, 1910, but at the time the affairs of that company had been placed in the hands of Mr. F. S. Hassell, as receiver, who originally brought this suit in the name of the corporation, which he had a clear right to do. Pell's Revisal, §§ 1219, 1203, and 847, and notes. It is so held in Smathers v. Bank, 135 N. C. 410, 47 S. E. 893, and Davis v. Manufacturing Co., 114 N. C. 321, 19 S. E. 371, 23 L. R. A. 322, in which Justice Burwell, approving what was decided in Gray v. Lewis, 94 N. C. 392, says: "As well because of the change in the system of our courts, as because of the statutes, the receiver may sue either in his own name or that of the corporation. In whatever name he may elect to bring the action, it is essentially a suit by the corporation, prosecuted by order of the court, for the collection of the assets." And Justice Connor says in Smathers v. Bank, supra, that "whatever may have been the law in respect to the right of the receiver to prosecute actions for the recovery of the assets of the corporation, prior to the change in our judicial system, blending legal and equitable jurisdiction and remedies and power into one tribunal and providing for one form of action, it is well settled that a receiver can now sue either way." A receiver is only the officer of the court, its custodian, and the title to the assets remains in the original owner. He is the arm of the court to collect and administer the assets, and acquires no beneficial interest in them. It is clear that he may use the name of the insolvent corporation, or his own, or both, at his election. High on Receivers, §§ 209, 211. He did not change the nature of the suit by becoming a party to it more than one year after the fire. The action has not lost its identity. It is the same as it was in the beginning. He brought it in the name of the insolvent company, and, if this had not been so and the corporation had itself brought it, he adopted it as his own by having himself made a party afterwards. But the very point as to the limitation has been decided in Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Railroad, 42 N. J. Eq. 591, 8 Atl. 648. In that case, an action at law had been brought in due time, against the corporation, while in the hands of a receiver, for damages arising from negligence of defendant. Summons amended by substituting receiver as defendant, who pleaded the statute of limitations. He was enjoined by the court of equity from setting it up in the court of law, upon the ground that it was the same action and record in law, notwithstanding the amendment. The court said: "If, therefore, the proceedings were in this court for this recovery, and the proceedings had been amended as they have been in the Supreme Court, this court would say that the statute is no bar, for it had not commenced to run at the time of the institution of the suit, although the pleadings have been very materially amended by striking out the name of the only defendant, and inserting the name of another, yet it is the same suit, a suit which was begun before the statute began to run. There is sound reason for this, and I think excellent authority"—citing cases. And this, we think, disposes of the second exception.

Third. The defendant attacks the award upon the ground that its terms are conflicting and, if not, then uncertain, and it cannot, therefore, be enforced, and, if enforceable at all, it is only partially so, and to the extent of holding it good only as an award for $1,166.91.

[4] The question is not by any means free from difficulty, and may require us to consider carefully the nature in law of an award under a submission by the parties. Anciently the construction of awards often turned on nice and subtle distinctions, and much refinement will be found in the books of that time on the subject, but a more liberal and sensible method has been introduced, and the judges have invariably laid it down that the courts will intend everything to support awards, if possible, and will always give effect to them, if it can be done consistently with law, and nothing will be intended against them.

[5] An award must be made strictly in pursuance and in uniformity with the submission, which must not, in its terms, be exceeded, and the arbitrators should regularly award as to all things referred to them though an award may be good as to part and void as to the remainder if the parts are separable, where the arbitrators have acted in excess of authority. Watson on Arbitration and Award, marg. p. 176 (59 Law Library, 111); Stevens v. Brown, 82 N. C. 460. It must be certain and final as to all matters submitted (Gibbs v. Berry, 35 N. C. 388), and it will be taken to be so, unless the contrary expressly appears on its face, the law indulging every fair presumption in its favor, and not leaning to a construction which would destroy it, but putting one consistent sense on all the terms. Wood v. Griffith (Lord Eldon) 1 Swanst. 43; Ballard v. Mitchell, 53 N. C. 153.

[6] Any ambiguity in the words should be settled in the way which will best coincide with the apparent intention of the arbitrators, and the court will, by intendment, restrain the general terms in an award to apply to particular words in the submission; so it will connect the particular thing awarded with the general words of the submission. Watson, supra. We have said the award must be certain, for the object of the parties in submitting their disputes to arbitration is to make an end of litigation, and uncertainty in it would only produce a fresh source of dispute between them.

[7] The certainty required in an award is certainty to a common intent (Watson, marg. p. 204; Carter v. Sams, 20 N. C. 321), not to a certain intent in general or in every particular. It is the certainty which is attained by giving to the words their ordinary sense, but not excluding any other meaning derived from fair argument or inference. Black's Dict. p. 186. Lord Mansfield said that awards are now considered with greater latitude and less strictness than they were formerly. And it is right that they should be liberally construed, because they are made by judges of the parties' own choosing. And this is often (as it is here) in cases of small consequence, where the play is not worth the candle. Indeed, they must have these two properties—to be certain and final. But the certainty may be judged of according to a common intent, and consistent with fair and probable presumption. Hawkins v. Colclonch, 1 Burr. 274-277.

[8] While certainty is an essential of a good award and one of its chief characteristics, it is not necessary that it should be written with such technical and critical nicety that subtle examinations and forced constructions cannot discover a doubt, or a difficulty, or a double meaning, in any part of it. Reasonable certainty of meaning is sufficient, for it will be construed in a fair and liberal spirit and favorably, with a view to support it as far as a sensible interpretation will allow. Borretts v. Patterson & Taylor, 1 N. C. 126, 1 Am. Dec. 576; Stevens v. Brown, 82 N. C. 460. If it be expressed in such language that plain men, acquainted with the subject-matter, can understand it, that is enough, no matter how short and elliptical it is. The degree of uncertainty, to avoid an award, should be such as would avoid any other contract such as would leave the meaning of the arbitrators wholly in doubt. Morse on Arbitration and Award, pp. 408, 409, and cases cited in notes; Osborne v. Calvert, 83 N. C. 366.

[9] The award generally speaks for itself, and cannot be altered any more than the verdict of a jury. It is not open to proof of any understanding or meaning of the arbitrators, different from that it carries with it and warranted by its terms. Scott v. Green, 89 N. C. 278.

[10] Arbitrators need not go into particulars or assign reasons, and their duty is best discharged by a simple announcement of their decision, or the result of their investigation. Patton v. Baird, 42 N. C. 255.

[11] They are not bound to decide according to law, when acting within the scope of their authority, being the chosen judges of the parties and a law unto themselves, but may award according to their notions of justice and without assigning any reason. Jones v. Frazier, 8 N. C. 379; Leach v. Harris, 69 N. C. 532; Robbins v. Killebrew, 95 N. C. 19; Ezzell v. Lumber Co., 130 N. C. 205, 41 S. E. 99. They may decide upon principles of equity and good conscience, and make their award ex sequo et bono. 3 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1454; Johnson v. Nobor, 13 N. H. 286, 38 Am. Dec. 487. The policy of the law favors settlements by arbitration, and therefore leans liberally and partially towards them, extending its favor in support of this amicable method of settlement. Robbins v. Killebrew, supra. Parol evidence is competent in order to show what matters the arbitrators acted on. Brown v. Brown, 49 N. C. 123; Walker v. Walker, 60 N. C. 259; Osborne v. Calvert, supra.

[12] With these well-settled principles kept in mind, we must determine whether this award is invalid for uncertainty or inconsistency, or whether we can adopt the view of defendant that, if valid, the arbitrators have awarded only $1,166.91, to be paid to plaintiff. As to the last position, we think that it is utterly inadmissible, as the arbitrators have in so many words awarded the sum of $4,872.62 and the damaged stock to the plaintiff, and we cannot, therefore, decide that $1,166.91 is the amount due. If these two findings are in hopeless conflict, the award is void for uncertainty. Unfortunately the arbitrators have been a little obscure in the form of stating their conclusion. We have no doubt that they performed their duty intelligently and knew exactly what they intended to decide, but were misled by a lack of familiarity with insurance methods and terms, and by not knowing in which column of defendant's form or blank to place the figures. The evidence discloses this fact. They have unwittingly run into a mere inaccuracy of expression, and that is all. Where the intention is clear or free from reasonable doubt, we should not try to test an award by the strict rules of grammar, arithmetic, or bookkeeping, but look at the instrument with favor, and take a common-sense view of it, allowing for the deficiencies of the layman, or those not skilled in legal forms or methods. We may examine the submission, in connection with the award, in order to explain or construe the latter, for they naturally and legally go together. The arbitrators were directed by it to ascertain the sound value of the stock in the first instance, and unless we adopt the amount, $4,872.62, as this value, there is nothing in the award to stand for it. We have seen that parol evidence may be heard to show what the arbitrators did; that is, what they acted upon, and that they kept within the terms of the submission. This they say was done by following its instructions and deducting the necessary items from the cost price to get the actual "sound value" on the day of the fire and just before it occurred. Brown v. Brown, supra. The amount, $4,872.62, is put in the column headed "Sound Value," and it is very evident that it was arrived at by deducting $1,166.91 from it, and the latter figures were manifestly placed in the wrong column. This is made more apparent when we consider that the arbitrators actually awarded $4,872.62 as the loss on the stock, or the amount due under the policies. But the award sheds still more light upon itself, so that we can readily and safely read its meaning. It must be remembered that the statement preceding the actual award was an "appraisal and determination" of values—merely a statement of the process by which they came to their conclusion. The pith of the award, the final adjudication of the arbitrators, is contained in the words, "Total amount of award, $4,872.62 and the damaged stock." This clearly implies, to the exclusion of any reasonable doubt, that they regarded the loss as total, and included the debris with the pecuniary award, because they decided it was worth nothing. Excluding from our consideration all oral testimony admitted by the court, as to what the arbitrators meant and as to how they awarded, we can call to our aid a very significant admission of the defendant in the pleadings to confirm our construction of the award. Plaintiff alleged that the fire practically destroyed the entire stock, and this is admitted in the answer. If this be so, how could the amount of the loss be $1,160.91, only one-fourth of the sound value of the goods? The defendant admitted, and the arbitrators found, a total loss, and for that reason added to their award of money, $4,872.62, "the damaged stock." The giving of the stock to plaintiff is entirely inconsistent with the claim of defendant that the arbitrators intended to award only $1,160.91, or any other amount than the one they did give, to wit, $4,872.62, which was the sound value of the stock, the loss being practically total, as they and the parties thought, and the debris or damaged goods being worth nothing, as the arbitrators evidently decided. The arbitrators could not have made the award without having decided that the loss was total and the debris of no value, because the insured could not fairly and equitably be entitled to the debris upon any other theory. This is not only a "fair and reasonable presumption," but a clear implication from the terms of the award and its context, and such a presumption and implication may be summoned to the aid of an instrument, which, without some such assistance, would have to be condemned as too uncertain (Watson on Arb. pp. 411 and 414), and for that reason incapable of enforcement. [13, 14] It is true that the jury have found that the damaged goods were worth $257, which was deducted by the court from the amount found due by the arbitrators; but while we think this ruling was erroneous, as changing the award, it was in favor of defendant, who cannot, therefore, complain, and, the plaintiff not having appealed, it must stand. We have considered the case, without reference to the extrinsic evidence, showing what was the intention of the arbitrators.

[15] We have said it is not competent to change the award in any way that will change its meaning, as that appears upon its face, in the absence of proper allegations and proof of fraud or mistake. We must accept it as we find it. Scott v. Green, 1 Enc. of Law & Ev. p. 964.

There is no error in the case.
No error.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 8, 1912.)

ANIMALS (§ 44*)—KILLING ANIMALS—LIABILITY OF OFFICER.

A police officer, who shot off his pistol merely to frighten a fugitive into submission to arrest, was not liable for the killing of a horse belonging to plaintiff, on which the fugitive was riding, by another person, who shot the horse without justification, on the officer's call to arrest the fugitive, but not to shoot.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by S. A. Haynes against P. W. Sullivan and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Sullivan appeals. Reversed.

Hood & Sullivan, of Anderson, for appellant. A. H. Dagnall, of Anderson, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the magistrate's court against the defendants Sullivan and Martin for damages for shooting his horse. On appeal by Sullivan to the circuit court, the judgment was affirmed. Sullivan alone appeals to this court; his main contention being that the proof was conclusive that he did not shoot the horse, nor induce any one else to do so.

Sullivan, acting as a police officer in the town of Honea Path, undertook to arrest a negro named George Jones, who was riding the horse, in the belief that he was transporting contraband liquor. To prevent Jones from getting away, and to frighten him into submission and arrest, Sullivan shot his pistol in the air, making no effort whatever to hit Jones or the horse. The shot did not hit Jones, and Sullivan called out, "Arrest the negro, but don't shoot." The defendant Martin, who was some distance off, shot twice, and the horse was found to be struck. We think it is evident that a police officer, who shoots off his pistol merely for the purpose of frightening a fugitive into submission to arrest, is not responsible for injuries inflicted by others, who shoot without justification, on the officer's call to arrest the fugitive, but not to shoot. There was no evidence that Sullivan and Martin were acting in concert or even that Martin heard Sullivan's shot, and was influenced by that to shoot the horse.

Reversed.

SPIRES v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. (two cases).

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 8, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 284*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—MISCONDUCT OF OTHER PASSENGERS—CARRIER'S LIABILITY.

Where plaintiff was shot and injured by another passenger while on an excursion train operated by defendant, and there was evidence that the officers in charge of the train had strong reason to apprehend assault on passengers from riotous fellow passengers, and from the person who did the shooting in particular, but made no effort to quell the riot by calling peace officers, or otherwise, defendant was liable for the injury so sustained.

Where a carrier operates an excursion train for its own profit, it is its duty to provide a police force adequate to protect passengers from any disturbance which due precaution requires that it should anticipate.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; W. B. De Loach, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Separate actions by James S. Spires and by J. Addie Spires against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harley & Best, of Barnwell, for appellant. Wolfe & Berry, of Orangeburg, and R. C. Holman, of Barnwell, for respondents.

WOODS, J. On an excursion train run by the defendant from Augusta, Ga., to Sumter, S. C., the plaintiff James S. Spires was stabbed, and the plaintiff J. Addie Spires was shot by Dukes, a fellow passenger. Separate actions were brought for damages against the defendant railroad company; each of the complaints alleging: "That such injuries, damages, and suffering were caused by the willfulness, wantonness, recklessness, carelessness, and negligence of the defendant in the following particulars, to wit: (a) In allowing drunken, riotous, and disorderly persons to enter and come upon its said train at Augusta, Ga., well knowing their condition and the danger therefrom to the plaintiff and its other passengers thereon; (b) In allowing drunken, disorderly, and riotous persons to remain upon its said train from Augusta, Ga., to Denmark, S. C., well knowing their condition and the danger therefrom to the plaintiff and its other passengers thereon; (c) in failing to provide any, or a sufficient, number of officers or trainmen to preserve order and protect the plaintiff and its other passengers on its said train from violence and injury, well knowing that there were a number of drunken, riotous, and disorderly persons thereon whose manner, conduct, and acts were a menace to the plaintiff and its other passengers on such train; and (d) in utterly failing to preserve order upon its said train, or to protect the plaintiff and its passengers from the insults, abuses, assaults, and batteries made upon the plaintiff and certain of its other passengers thereon by a number of drunken, riotous, and disorderly persons then and there upon its aforesaid train." The plaintiffs recovered separate judgments for actual damages; the claim for punitive damages having been withdrawn.

The appeal depends upon the proposition of defendant's counsel that the circuit judge should have ordered a nonsuit or directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the attacks on the plaintiffs were the sudden attacks of another passenger, which the defendant had no reason to expect, and therefore no reason to guard against.

[1, 2] The evidence from both sides showed these conditions: There was a large and turbulent crowd at the Augusta station, and a number of arrests were made by the police. Just after the train crossed the Savannah river, demonstrations of drunkenness, vulgarity, and violence on the part of at least seven or eight of the passengers began and increased until the condition of riot was reached. The train, made up of nine or ten coaches, was crowded, and the train crew consisted of a conductor and assistant, a special agent of the railroad company, the engineer, fireman, and flagman. There was evidence that some of the passengers appealed to the conductor to put down the disorder, and offered to assist in ejecting the rioters. The conductor and other train officers testified that an attempt to quell the disturbance and to eject the rioters by force, in their opinion, would have increased the disorder and the danger to the passengers, and that they used their utmost efforts, short of the exercise of force, to remove and placate the disorderly persons. There was testimony on behalf of the defendant that Dukes had not participated in the disorder up to the time he stabbed one of the plaintiffs, without provocation, and shot the other; but eyewitnesses on behalf of the plaintiff testified that he was the leader in the violent and vulgar demonstrations. The evidence is convincing that the officers in charge of the train had the strongest possible reason to apprehend assault on passengers from riotous fellow passengers; and it was their duty, after being put on notice, to use every available means to prevent such assaults by having the riot quelled and the rioters ejected. There was, it is true, strong reason for them to conclude that an effort by the small train crew to enforce order would have been ineffectual, and would have increased the danger. But when the riot commenced the train was very near Augusta, and it would have been easy to run the train back and summon the city police. The train passed through Barnwell and other considerable towns in this state, and yet no effort was made to perform the obvious duty of demanding the assistance of sheriffs and other law officers in these places. Besides, it is a matter of common knowledge that disorder is to be anticipated on excursion trains such as this was; and when a railroad company chooses to run such a train for its own profit it is its duty to provide a police force adequate to protect passengers from any disturbance which due precaution requires that it should anticipate.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[3] The law on the subject is too well established to require discussion. It is the duty of a carrier to use the highest degree of care to protect a passenger from the attacks of a fellow passenger, when the carrier has knowledge of the existence of danger from this cause, or of facts from which the danger may be reasonably anticipated. Franklin v. Atlantic Ry., 74 S. C. 340, 54 S. E. 578; Anderson v. S. C. & G. R. R. Co., 77 S. C. 434, 58 S. E. 149, 122 Am. St. Rep. 591; Norris v. Southern Ry., 84 S. C. 15, 65 S. E. 958. The evidence shows, beyond dispute, that the railway company in this case had reason to anticipate injury to its passengers from any of the rioters on the train; and there was evidence from which the jury could reasonably infer that Dukes, who inflicted the injury, was conspicuous among the rioters, and that the servants of the defendant in charge of the train were negligent in not using all available means to quell the riot and protect the plaintiffs and other passengers.

It follows that there was no error in refusing to order a nonsuit, or to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Affirmed.

CARTER v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al†
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 2, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 398*)—DEATH OF PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian on a railroad track, struck by a train, evidence held, by equally divided court, to support a verdict of actionable negligence and freedom from contributory negligence, authorizing a recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1356-1363; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 358*)—INJURIES—LICENSEES ON TRACK—LIABILITY.

A licensee on a railroad track by express permission to use it, or by implied acquiescence in its use, is entitled to ordinary care on the part of trainmen to prevent injury to him; and he may recover for injuries due to mere negligence on the part of the trainmen, unless guilty of contributory negligence.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 239*)—PAMTIES.

Where an action for the death of a pedestrian on a railroad track, struck by a train, was brought against the company and the engineer, and the jury rendered a verdict against the company in favor of plaintiff, and in favor of the engineer, a judgment for plaintiff on the verdict held, by equally divided court, authorized under the evidence.

Woods and Hydrick, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Mary J. Carter, as administratrix of J. T. Carter, deceased, against the Southern Railway Company and another: From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant named, it appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions:

"(1) Because his honor erred in refusing to grant the motion for a nonsuit and to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant upon the first ground, which was 'that there is no evidence in the case tending to show any breach of duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff's intestate, and no evidence of any negligence whatever upon the part of the defendant company that was the proximate cause of his death.' The error being that the undisputed evidence shows that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant company, its servants or agents, that was the proximate cause of the death of plaintiff's intestate.

"(2) Because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a nonsuit and to direct a verdict upon the second ground urged, which was 'that the undisputed evidence shows that at the time of his death the deceased was a trespasser upon the track of the defendant company, and there is no evidence of any recklessness, wantonness, or willfulness on the part of the defendant, after he was discovered to be on the track, that was the proximate cause of his death.' The error being that, under the undisputed facts and law applicable thereto, the plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser upon the track of the defendant company at the time of his death; and, there being no evidence of recklessness, wantonness, or willfulness shown, after he was discovered to be on the track, his honor, therefore should have granted the motions for a nonsuit, and for the direction of a verdict.

"(3) Because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a nonsuit, and to direct a verdict upon the third ground, which was 'that there is no evidence that this was a traveled place in the legal sense, and no evidence of negligence in striking the plaintiff at a traveled place, which was the proximate cause of his death.' The error being that, the complaint having alleged that the plaintiff's intestate was walking on the track of the defendant company 'at a traveled place,' and there being no testimony in law to support such allegation, and no evidence of negligence in striking the plaintiff at a 'traveled place,' his honor should have granted said motions.

"(4) Because his honor erred in refusing the motion for a nonsuit and to direct a verdict upon the fourth ground, which was 'that, if the evidence shows that deceased was a licensee upon the track of the defendant company, then there is no evidence of any negligence on the part of the defendant company, or of a breach of any duty that the defendant owed plaintiff's intestate, if he was a licensee; there being no evidence of any lack of care on the part of the defendant company that was the proximate cause of his death.' The error being that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant company, its servants and agents, even if the plaintiff's intestate was a licensee; but, as the testimony clearly showed, under the law, that the plaintiff's intestate could not be a licensee upon the track of the defendant company at the point where he was struck and killed, there was absolutely no evidence of any breach of duty that the defendant owed the plaintiff's intestate, as there was no evidence of any lack of care on the part of the defendant company after it discovered plaintiff's intestate on the track.

"(5) Because his honor erred in not granting the motion for a nonsuit and for direction of a verdict upon the fifth ground, which was 'that the undisputed evidence shows that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, which was the proximate cause of his death.' The error being that the undisputed evidence, from which no other reasonable inference can be drawn, clearly shows that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

"(6) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, I charge you as a matter of law that, if the public generally are permitted by a railroad company to travel on their railroad track openly, notoriously, adversely, and continuously for 20 years or more, then that makes them licensees. If the railroad company know that they are using their track and traveling over it—that is, the public generally—for 20 years or more, openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely, against their claim, or against their exclusive right to use it themselves, and they acquiesce in that and permit it, and do not order them off, and do not prevent their doing it, then the law says the public generally acquires a right or license to travel up and down that road, to use it as a thoroughfare for the purposes of walking on it.' The Court: 'Is the law 20 or 10 years?' Mr. McDonald: 'For adverse possession? Ten years, adverse possession; 20 years, presumption of the grant.' The Court: 'If the railroad company permits the public generally to use their railroad track for a thoroughfare, people to walk on it, and use it as a passway or anything of that sort, openly, notoriously, adversely, and continuously for 10 years or more, and they acquiesced in it, and consent to it, or do not raise any row over it, and permit it, if that goes on for 10 or more years openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely, then that gives them a permissive right or a license to use the track for that purpose. It does not mean that one man can use it for that length of time. It means the public generally, who go up and down the railroad track. The jury must be satisfied that the public generally have continuously, openly, notoriously, and adversely for 10 years or more traveled the road as a matter of right, and not as a matter of permission, and that the railroad has acquiesced in that, or that they had knowledge of it and permitted it. When that is the case, they are called licensees; that is, the public generally has a license to walk up and down the railroad track.' The error being that neither an individual nor the public, by use of a railroad track for any length of time, can acquire an adverse use thereof, so as to ripen into a right to its use, either as licensee or otherwise; and it was error in his honor to hold and charge otherwise.

"(7) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If in this case the railroad company was negligent and careless—that is, if the agents and servants of the company failed to observe due care and due precaution so as not to injure plaintiff's intestate in this case (that is, Carter) if Carter was a licensee (that is, the public had acquired a right to walk up and down this railroad track under the law, as I have given it to you)—and that carelessness and negligence on their part was the cause of the injury to Carter, and Carter did not, by any act of negligence or carelessness on his part, contribute to the direct and proximate cause of his injury, then, under circumstances of that sort, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover such actual damages sustained proportionate to the injury sustained.' The error being that plaintiff's intestate could not acquire a right to the use of defendant's track at the point where he was killed by adverse use or otherwise, as a matter of law; and the defendant company, its agents and servants, did not owe to him due care as a licensee, and it was error to charge the jury as above set forth.

"(8) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, I charge you further, as a matter of law, that a railroad company in running its cars over its track has a right to assume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, or any proof to the contrary, that when a person is walking on its track, and they see or hear the approach of a train, or if they give the necessary signals and everything of that sort, they have a right to assume that the party walking on the track will get off the track and get out of the way of the approaching train. At the same time the law requires the engineer, the party in charge of the train, the locomotive running it, to observe due care and due precaution not to inflict injury to any person that is on the track. They must observe due care and due precaution, exercise the ordinary care, do what an ordinary prudent person would do, under similar circumstances, not to inflict any injury on any person on the track, and give the necessary signals, and they do not get off, and there is any reasonable way whereby he can stop the train and prevent the injury, and he does not observe due care and due precaution, but is careless and negligent, and does not observe due care and due precaution, and injures any one under circumstances of that sort, and the party injured does not, by any act of carelessness and negligence on his part, in any manner contribute to the direct and proximate cause of his injury, then the party injured, or the party suing for him, would have a right to recover such actual damages as sustained, proportionate to the injury sustained.' The error being that such large was confusing to the jury, inasmuch as his honor failed to distinguish between the duty owed a licensee and a trespasser, and thus charged the jury that, even if, under the facts, the jury should find that plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser, still the defendant company would be liable if it failed to observe due care and due precaution, or failed to exercise ordinary care; whereas the law is that if he was a trespasser the mere failure to observe due care or ordinary care would not render the defendant liable.

"(9) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If you think one defendant was careless and negligent and the other was not, or the agents and servants of the other were not, then your verdict can be against one of the defendants. You can say, "We find for the plaintiff against the Southern Railway Company so many dollars damages," sign your name as foreman; or, "We find against the defendant, Herring," and sign your name as foreman.' The error being that there could be no verdict against the defendant railway company, unless its codefendant, Herring, was guilty of negligence; and his honor should have charged the jury that there could be no separate verdict against the defendant Southern Railway Company if the jury concluded that defendant Herring was not guilty of negligence.

"(10) Because his honor erred in not granting a new trial upon the first ground, which was 'that the evidence in this case shows that plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser upon the railroad track at the time he was killed, as he was not injured at a public crossing, street, or traveled way, nor in a populous community, where he had acquired a license to be upon the track; and there is no evidence of willfulness, wantonness, or recklessness on the part of the defendant, its agents and servants.' The error being that the undisputed evidence showed that plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser; and there was no evidence of willfulness, wantonness, or recklessness on the part of the defendant, its agents and servants, that was the proximate cause of his death."

"(12) Because his honor erred in refusing motion for new trial upon the second ground, which was 'that, even if, under the facts and the law, plaintiff's intestate was a licensee on the track of the defendant company, there is no evidence of any negligence on the part of the defendant company, or any breach of duty that it owed to plaintiff's intestate, as there was no evidence of any lack of ordinary care on the part of the defendant company or its agents, after discovering him on the track; and the positive testimony shows that the station signal was blown, and the danger signals were given in ample time for plaintiff's intestate to have stepped off the track; and the evidence further shows that defendant's agents and servants used every reasonable measure and precaution, by applying the emergency brakes, to avoid injury to plaintiff's intestate, after discovering him on the track.' The error being that, even if plaintiff's intestate was a licensee, there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant company; but, on the contrary, the undisputed evidence showed that every reasonable measure and precaution to prevent injury to plaintiff's intestate was observed by defendant's agents and servants, after discovering him on the track and that he failed to heed the danger signals.

"(13) Because his honor erred in refusing motion for a new trial on the third ground, which was 'that, whether plaintiff's intestate be considered a trespasser or a licensee upon defendant's track, the undisputed testimony shows that he was guilty of contributory negligence, he having gotten upon the track at a time when he knew that defendant's train was about due, knowing that he was deaf, walking with his back towards the coming train, and failing to look behind him, or to adopt any other means to discover the approaching train; and such contributory negligence on his part was a proximate cause of his death.' The error being that, whether plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser or a licensee upon the track, the undisputed evidence showed that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; and such contributory negligence was the proximate cause of his death."

B. L. Abney, of Columbia, and McDonald & McDonald, of Winnsboro, for appellant. A. S. & W. D. Douglas, of Winnsboro, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This was an action for punitive and actual damages, brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix, for the wrongful killing of her husband by the defendants.

The defendant J. H. Herring was the engineer operating the train that killed the deceased. The verdict was against the railway company alone, and was for $12,500. This verdict was reduced to $9,000 by an order of Hon. R. C. Watts and the acceptance by the plaintiff. Judgment was entered for $9,000 and costs. From this judgment, the defendant railway appealed on the grounds set out in the exceptions, which will be reported.

It seems that the deceased lived near Blackstock, in Fairfield county, and was going to said town to his business on the morning of the 6th of June, 1910, and walked on the railway track, and not on the public highway that adjoined the track. The deceased had been deaf and dumb, but he had learned to talk, but was still deaf. The complaint alleged that the deceased was traveling on the track where the public had been accustomed to walk for more than 20 years, and the deceased had the right to walk there. The defendant claimed that the deceased was a trespasser, and, being deaf, was guilty of contributory negligence in walking on a railroad track, especially when he ought to have known that the train that killed him was due, and walked in the same direction as the approaching train, with his back to it.

The defendant moved for a nonsuit, for the direction of a verdict, and for a new trial, all of which were refused, except the partial relief of a new trial nisi.

The exceptions raise four questions: (1) Was there any evidence to go to the jury on the question of negligence of the defendants? (2) Did the defendants owe to the deceased due care? (3) When the complaint alleged the joint negligence of the two defendants, could judgment be given against one? (4) Was there indisputable evidence of contributory negligence?

[1] 1. Was there any evidence to go to the jury on the question of negligence of the defendants?

There was evidence that the whistle sounded at the whistle post, over 1,000 feet away, but that the deceased did not get off the track; that from that point the deceased was in full view of those on the engine, and it was a question on the nonsuit as to whether they did see him or not. If they did see him, then the question is answered by Haltiwanger v. Railroad Co., 64 S. C. 23, 41 S. E. 810: " * * * An examination of the 'case' shows that there was some testimony tending to show that the engineer did see the deceased on the track, and, as a person walking on a railroad track in front of an approaching train is always 'in a position of apparent danger,' we think there was, at least, some evidence tending to show that the engineer running the train saw that the deceased was in a position of apparent danger; and therefore we are of opinion that there was no error in refusing the motion for a nonsuit upon either of the grounds upon which such motion was based."

The testimony for the defendants shows that, as a matter of fact, both the engineer and fireman saw him. The testimony further shows that for more than 1,000 feet the fireman said nothing to the engineer about it, until the engineer had reached for the brake and whistle. He said: "Mr. Herring blew the whistle before I said anything. He reached up to the whistle. I said: 'We are going to hit him. Hold it.' The conductor said: 'About the time the brakes went down, we struck him.'" Thus it seems that there was evidence that no effort was made to stop the train or give the danger signal until it was apparent that the deceased would be struck.

Again, the flagman said: "Well, I heard the engineer sound the danger signal, and about the same time felt the brakes go on in emergency, and I looked out of the window right quick on the right-hand side and saw the man fly out to one side."

The answer to this question is: There was evidence of negligence.

[2] 2. Did the defendants owe the deceased due care?

It is true his honor erred in charging that the public could acquire a right to travel the road; but the practical question is: When the agents of the defendant saw the deceased in a position of danger, did they owe him and to humanity due care? This question is answered by Sanders v. Railway, 90 S. C. 335, 73 S. E. 357: "Plaintiff's testimony tended to show that he was struck while walking alongside of defendant's track in a well-beaten path at a place where the general public had been accustomed to walk for many years, without any objection from defendant; that the train which struck him was running backwards at a rate of from 12 to 20 miles an hour, through a populous section of the city of Charleston, at a place where men, women, and children were constantly passing and repassing along defendant's right of way and upon and near its tracks; that the train ran upon him from behind, without any signal or warning of its approach being given. We think this testimony made out a prima facie case for plaintiff. From it the jury might reasonably have inferred that the use of its right of way by the public was known to and acquiesced in by defendant; and therefore that plaintiff was a licensee and entitled to ordinary care on the part of defendant to prevent injury to him; and also, from the frequency of the use by the general public, that defendant should have anticipated the presence of persons on or near its tracks at that place, and should have exercised due care to prevent injury to them. Jones v. Railway, 61 S. C. 556, 39 S. E. 758; Matthews v. Railway, 67 S. C. 499, 46 S. E. 335 [65 L. R. A. 286]; McKeown v. Railroad Co., 68 S. C. 483, 47 S. E. 713; Goodwin v. Railroad Co., 82 S. C. 321, 64 S. E. 242; Bamberg v. Railroad Co., 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988; Lamb v. Railroad Co., 86 S. C. 106, 67 S. E. 958 [138 Am. St. Rep. 1030]."

The testimony here showed that the railroad track to Blackstock had been used for more than 20 years by pedestrians, without objection, and a great many people used it. But if the deceased had been a trespasser, then, in Jones v. Railway, 61 S. C. 559, 39 S. E. 759, it is said: "It is the trespasser's duty to look out for himself, and to give the railway company a clear track by getting out of the way. If, however, the servants of the railroad company should discover a trespasser upon the track, and should then fail to use ordinary care, under the circumstances, to avoid running him down, this would be evidence from which a jury might infer that the injury was the result, not of mere inadvertence, but of a conscious failure to observe due care, or of wantonness or willfulness."

It may be said that wantonness and willfulness had been eliminated from the case. As a foundation for punitive damages, they were eliminated from the case; but the defendant was still required to make out its affirmative defense of contributory negligence, and if the facts subsequently proven showed willfulness the plea could not prevail.

[3] 3. When the complaint alleged the joint negligence of the two defendants, could judgment be given against one?

This question is answered by several comparatively recent cases, and the answer is that it can. Ruddell v. Railway, 75 S. C. 293, 294, 55 S. E. 529: "In the next place, it is insisted the verdict should have been set aside, because the fact that the finding was against the railroad company, and not against its agent, who was directly responsible for the digging and proper guarding of the hole, shows that the verdict was due to prejudice or partiality; the evidence of negligence and wantonness being much stronger against him than against the railroad company. There was no error of law in refusing the motion on this ground, because the liability of the railway company and Brinkley, its agents and codefendant, was joint and several. Schumpert v. Railway and Hutchinson, 65 S. C. 332, 43 S. E. 813 [95 Am. St. Rep. 802]; Gardner v. Railway Co. and Pierson, 65 S. C. 341, 43 S. E. 816; Carson v. Railway, Arwood, and Miller, 68 S. C. 55, 46 S. E. 525."

The testimony was not clear as to what the engineer could see on the left of the center of the track. The jury may have thought that the engineer's view was obstructed by the boiler, and that the fireman, the agent of the defendant company, who was on the left side of the engine, was at fault in not notifying him of the danger in time.

4. Was there indisputable evidence of contributory negligence?

The deceased had been warned not to go on the railroad track, and he replied "that an automobile had brushed his clothes, and it looked as if there was no place for him to walk on the railroad or public road."

There was evidence that when his employer desired to attract the attention of the deceased he stamped the floor, and the deceased, feeling the vibrations of the floor, gave attention. The deceased seems to have depended on the telephonic message of a coming train transmitted along the railroad irons and perceived through his feet. The deceased had considered the matter, and seemed to have considered the railroad the safer place. He had considered the matter, and it was for the jury to say whether his conclusion was negligently found, or was simply an error of judgment.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

GARY, C. J., concurs. WATTS, J., disqualified.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). In this action against the Southern Railway Company and J. H. Herring, one of its engineers, the plaintiff, as administratrix, recovered judgment against the defendant railway company on a complaint containing the following allegations attributing the death of J. T. Carter, plaintiff's intestate, to the actionable negligence of the defendants: "That on the morning of the 6th day of June, A. D. 1910, the said J. T. Carter, since deceased, was walking along the track of the said Southern Railway from his home, situate a short distance south of the town of Blackstock, in the state aforesaid, a station on defendant Southern Railway Company's railroad, on his way to engage in lawful business in said town, when said track, on and along which plaintiff's intestate was walking, had been used by the public as a traveled place for 20 years or more last past before said 6th day of June, A. D. 1910; and while said intestate was on said traveled place, as aforesaid, he was negligently, recklessly, wantonly, unexpectedly approached from his rear, he being totally deaf, by one of the defendant Southern Railway Company's locomotives, operated by the defendant J. H. Herring, as engineer thereon, drawing a train of cars, at a very high rate of speed, and without due and reasonable precaution, and through the joint and concurrent negligence, recklessness, and wantonness of said defendants, as aforesaid, caused said locomotive drawing said train of cars to strike said intestate, and so injured him that he then and there died."

The main question to be decided is whether the circuit judge should have granted a nonsuit on the evidence offered by the plaintiff, or should have directed a verdict in favor of defendant at the close of the evidence on both sides, on the grounds, first, that the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff did not tend to prove that Carter's death was due to the negligence of the defendant, but, on the contrary, admitted of no other inference than that the fatality was due solely to his own negligence; and, second, that if the testimony admitted of an inference of negligence against the defendants it showed conclusively that intestate was guilty of contributory negligence.

Though railroad companies are held to the exercise of great care in running trains through the country at high speed, the established right of railroads to the use of their tracks, and the right of the public to require of railroads prompt and efficient service, should not be sacrificed or impaired in favor of pedestrians who, for their own convenience, recklessly take the risk of walking the track in the face of obvious danger.

The general rules of reason applied by this court, and by courts generally, may be thus stated:

(1) Due care requires that those in charge of such a dangerous instrumentality as a railroad train should keep a lookout ahead; and failure to keep such a lookout may be evidence of negligence, or willfulness, or wantonness, according to the circumstances.

(2) Persons who use a railroad track as a walkway without a license, either express or implied, are trespassers, and those in charge of a railroad train owe them no duty, except not to injure them willfully or wantonly. Hence, if the failure to keep a lookout is found to be merely negligent, and not a wanton or willful disregard of duty, such trespassers cannot complain or avail themselves of the failure.

(3) When a railroad servant charged with the duty of keeping a lookout sees a trespasser on the track, he may assume that he is aware of the danger and will get off; but if he has reason to infer from appearances that the trespasser has not heard the train the duty arises to signal him, and failure to signal in such circumstances may be some evidence of willfulness and wantonness.

(4) If, by a wanton or willful disregard of the duty to keep a lookout, the employé in charge of the engine fails to see even a trespasser helpless on the track, or if such employé fails to stop when he observes the trespasser to be helpless, the trespasser is not precluded by his own mere negligence from recovering for the resulting injuries.

(5) When the failure to keep a lookout, or to signal, or to observe one helpless on the track, or to stop the train to rescue such helpless person, is due to mere negligence, a trespasser who receives injuries cannot recover; but one who is a licensee on the track, either by express permission to use it, or by implied acquiescence in its use, may recover for injuries due to mere negligence in the particulars mentioned, unless he has himself been guilty of contributory negligence.

(6) A railroad servant in charge of a train discharges his duty when he duly signals even a licensee on the track of the approach of the train, unless from appearances or otherwise he, as a reasonable man, ought to have observed that the person on the track was oblivious of the danger, notwithstanding the noise and the signals, or was unable to get off the track.

Taking the testimony for the plaintiff as true, the circumstances of the killing were as follows: The deceased, J. T. Carter, was an intelligent deaf man, who had been educated and taught to speak at the Cedar Springs Institute. He was 39 years old, and was living with his wife, also deaf, and his children near the line of the Southern Railway, between the stations Blackstock and Woodward. He was learning bookkeeping at Blackstock, and had occasion to go there frequently. There was a public road running parallel with the railroad; but the railroad was used to a large extent by pedestrians, as it furnished better walking than the public road. There were several curves in the track. On June 6, 1910, Carter was walking on the track, going from his home to Blackstock, and was seen by Herring, the engineman of defendant's train which passed about 7:20 o'clock in the morning, in time to stop the train and go forward and move Carter off; but the whistle had been blown for the station a few hundred yards away, and there was nothing to prevent the signal and the noise of the train from being heard, so that it was impossible that a man who could hear would not have heard and known that the train was very near. When within 20 or 30 yards of Carter, the engineman gave one or more short, warning blasts of the whistle and stopped the train very quickly; but Carter remained on the track, and the stop was not quick enough to prevent the engine from striking and killing him. There was no evidence that the train was not equipped with approved air brakes, or that the engineman could have stopped it more quickly after he gave the alarm.

I think it by no means clear that there was evidence to go to the jury tending to show that the use of the track where deceased was walking was so general, constant, and unusual, by the people of a populous community, as to put the railroad company on notice of such use, and to require it either to actively forbid it, or to treat those who used the track as licensees, with the right to have their probable presence on the track taken into special consideration in the running of trains. On the contrary, it seems to me that the proof shows nothing more than the usual unbidden use of a railroad track by the people of an ordinary country neighborhood, at their own risk—such a use as imposed no special duty on the railroad company with respect to them. There were few families living in the vicinity, and what the witnesses said of the use of the track could be said of the use by almost every average community adjacent to a railroad. The doctrine that such an average or ordinary use implies acquiescence or license by the railroad company is without judicial sanction, and has never been announced in this state, as will be seen by the careful distinction made in Sanders v. Southern Ry. Co., 90 S. C. 331, 73 S. E. 356, and the cases therein cited.

But laying aside that question with the assumption that the deceased was entitled to have the defendant exercise ordinary care for his protection from injury while walking on the track, we next inquire, Was there evidence of the lack of such care? The rule is well established that those in charge of a railroad train may presume that a pedestrian will get off the track after they have given a signal sufficient to put him on notice, and that they need not stop the train for his sake, unless there is notice from appearances, or otherwise, that the person on the track has not heard the train or is not able to take care of himself. Smalley v. Southern Ry., 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 459; Sentell v. Southern Ry., 70 S. C. 183, 49 S. E. 215. In the open country, where there is nothing to prevent the pedestrian from stepping off, even if the railroad has acquiesced in the use of its track by others, surely a licensee under no infirmity can demand nothing more than that he shall have warning of the approach of the train. The authorities are clear on this subject. Drawdy v. Railroad, 78 S. C. 374, 58 S. E. 980; Griskell v. Railway, 81 S. C. 193, 62 S. E. 205; N. & W. R. R. v. Harmans, Adm'r, 83 Va. 553, 8 S. E. 251; McAdoo v. Railroad, 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316; Meredith v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137; High v. Railroad, 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. 79; Tyler v. Sites, Adm'r, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. 174; Beach v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 153, 61 S. E. 664. In this case the station signal had been blown, there was nothing to prevent the hearing of the noise of the train, and the deceased was walking erect, with every appearance of ability to make himself safe by leaving the track. There was nothing to put the engineman on notice, when he first saw him, that he did not hear the station signal, or would not leave the track in time. But I think there was a question of fact made by the evidence whether the engineer or fireman, having the deceased in sight, should not have inferred from his conduct that he had not heard the signal and was not aware of the approach of the train, and should have endeavored to stop the train before it was within 20 or 30 feet of him.

Continuing the assumption that Carter was entitled to ordinary care on the part of those in charge of the railroad company's trains, and assuming, further, that the engineer and fireman should have taken notice, before they did, that the deceased would not get off the track, and that the engineman was negligent in failing to stop his train in time to prevent striking deceased, the evidence offered by the plaintiff proved conclusively that the death of her husband would not have occurred but for his own gross, contributory negligence. He was entirely destitute of the sense of hearing. As an intelligent man, he certainly knew that he could not expect the employés of the railroad company to know and take account of his infirmity; and, in fact, it was not known to the engineman or fireman of this train. The train by which he was killed had been running by his house on the same schedule for several years, and was about on time on this occasion. Carter had therefore the strongest reason to expect that it would come up behind him, and that he would be entirely oblivious of its approach. He had been expressly warned of the danger of walking on the railroad by one friend; and another had, on a previous occasion, gone to him and gotten him off the track in time. The case is altogether different in its facts from McKeown v. Railroad, 68 S. C. 483, 47 S. E. 713, relied on by the plaintiff's counsel. In that case the court held that there was evidence of willfulness and wantonness in running the train at night without lights, and for this reason, even if there had been conclusive evidence of contributory negligence, it would not have been available on a motion for a nonsuit. In this case all charges of willfulness were withdrawn; and if negligence be imputed to the engineman for failing, by a second or two, to realize Carter's danger in time to stop the train and avert his death, beyond all doubt contributory negligence must be imputed to Carter when he went on the railroad in reckless disregard of danger, which was imminent and obvious. In Lamb v. Southern Railway, 86 S. C. 106, 67 S. E. 958, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1030, the court held that a person in full possession of his senses, who undertook to walk across a railroad bridge over a river, undertook a peril so obvious that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

A deaf man, who deliberately chooses to take his course on a railroad track, takes a still more obvious peril. His only hope of escape from a train coming up behind is the chance that those in charge of the train may possibly discover his infirmity in time to stop the train and take him off. It would be difficult to mark out a course of conduct more grossly negligent. The courts have held that it is contributory negligence for a deaf man to take such an obvious risk. Schexnadre v. Railroad, 46 La. Ann. 248, 14 South. 513, 49 Am. St. Rep. 321; Johnson v. L. & N. R. R., 91 Ky. 651, 25 S. W. 754; International, G. & G. N. R. R. v. Garcia, 75 Tex. 583, 18 S. W. 223.

In Central R. R. & B. Co. v. Smith, 78 Ga. 698, 3 S. E. 398, the plaintiff was injured, while walking on the railroad track at night, by a train running at an excessive rate of speed, but carrying a headlight. Chief Justice Bleckley, in holding that there could be no recovery, said: "As matter of fact, to walk along the middle of a railroad track between crossings when it is dark, and without knowing and remembering whether a train is due or not, and without looking out in both directions for trains that may be due, and without listening attentively and anxiously for the roar and rattle of machinery, as well as for the sound of bell or whistle, is gross negligence."

The deceased in this case was still more negligent; for he chose to walk on the track knowing that it was impossible for those in charge of the train to give him warning of its approach. I cannot escape the conclusion that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and that a nonsuit should have been granted.

It seems to me that there were other errors in the charge, also, in failing to distinguish between the duties owed by the railroad to a trespasser and a licensee, and in giving the instruction that the public might acquire a right to use the railroad as a foot-path by its continuous use for 10 years; but I do not think further discussion necessary. Matthews v. Railway, 67 S. C. 499, 46 S. E. 335, 65 L. R. A. 286.

The position that a verdict against the railroad company, and not against the engineman, is contradictory is unsound, and is disposed of by the case of Ruddell v. Railway, 75 S. C. 290, 55 S. E. 528, and the cases there cited.

I think there should be a reversal.

REARDON v. AVERBUCK.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 8, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENT—DISCRETION OF COURT—AMENDMENT AT TRIAL.

The denial of a motion for leave to amend an answer at the trial was not an abuse of discretion, where defendant had had nearly a year after the commencement of the action in which to acquaint his counsel with his defenses, and the only excuse for the delay was that defendant was a foreigner, speaking English so imperfectly that his counsel did not understand him as to the allegations of the proposed amendment until the morning of the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 601; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 150*)—REPAIRS—DUTY TO MAKE.

A lease which is silent on the subject of repairs implies no obligation on the part of either the lessor or lessee to repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 536-557; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL TO VARY WRITING—MATTERS NOT INCLUDED IN WRITING.

A written lease making no reference to repairs does not prevent the proving of a distinct and separate agreement by the lessor to repair.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 188*)—ACTIONS FOR RENT—DEFENSES—FAILURE TO REPAIR.

In an action on a mortgage to secure the payment of rent, given by the lessee on the day he vacated the premises, because, as he claimed, the building leaked and injured his goods, evidence of an agreement by the landlord, made some time prior thereto, to repair was not admissible, since, by renewing his promise to pay the rent after the landlord's failure to repair, the tenant waived his right to set up a breach as a defense to the mortgage.

5. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTIONS AS TO FACTS.

In claim and delivery, it was not error to charge that plaintiff had demanded possession of the property, where defendant's counsel, during the course of the charge, admitted that such demand had been made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 432-434; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

6. REPLEVIN (§ 95*)—VERDICT—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to recover possession of a stock of goods covered by a mortgage, where no other goods were referred to in the pleadings or evidence, a verdict for "the recovery of the possession of the goods or the sum of $200" sufficiently identified the property.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERROR FAVORABLE TO PARTY COMPLAINING.

Appeal from Common Pleas, Circuit Court of Sumter County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by George W. Reardon against Nathan Averbuck. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, of Sumter, for appellant. Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Sumter, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this appeal, in an action of claim and delivery, from a judgment against the defendant, the exceptions assign errors in these particulars: First, in refusing to allow an amendment to the answer; second, in excluding testimony tending to show that the plaintiff had agreed to repair the store for the rent of which the mortgage was given; third, in charging that the plaintiff had demanded possession of the property; and, fourth, in refusing a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was not in proper form.

The foundation of the action was a mortgage on a stock of goods, executed by the defendant to secure several notes given to the plaintiff for the rent of a storehouse. The defense set up in the original answer was that the store was in a dilapidated condition; that the notes were given for rent in advance; that the plaintiff had promised, when they were given, to repair the store, and had refused to do so; and that defendant's goods were so injured by leaks in the roof that he was forced to move his goods and carry on his business in another store. The rent contract was made on September 7, 1906, for the rent of the store from September 1, 1906, to September 1, 1907, for $300, and contains no agreement as to repairs. The mortgage was not executed until January 16, 1907.

[1] When the cause was called for trial, the defendant's counsel made a motion to amend by alleging that the defendant signed the mortgage, which was not read to him, under the representation by the plaintiff that it was a paper giving him the right to move, and under the duress of threats of bodily harm at the hands of the plaintiff. As an excuse for not putting this defense in the original answer, counsel for defendant stated that defendant was a foreigner, speaking English so imperfectly that he had not understood him as to the allegations of the proposed amendment until the morning of the trial. The contention that there was abuse of discretion in not allowing the amendment cannot be sustained. The amendment proposed would have introduced on the eve of the trial an entirely new issue. The defendant had had nearly 12 months after the commencement of the action to acquaint counsel with his defenses; and there was good reason for the court to hold that if he had used due diligence and care the defense would have been set up before the call of the case. As there was no error in refusing the amendment, it follows the testimony offered to support it was properly excluded.

[2, 3] As to the second point, it is true, as defendant contends, that a lease silent on the subject of repairs implies no obligation on the part of either lessor or lessee to repair; and, as the written lease in this case made no reference to repairs, it was no obstacle to setting up and proving a distinct and separate agreement by Reardon, the plaintiff, to put the house in repair. Williams v. Salmond, 79 S. C. 459, 61 S. E. 70.

[4] But there is a valid reason for the exclusion of the evidence. The answer alleges that the contract to repair was made on September 7, 1906, the day on which the lease was signed. It is impossible that the payment of the rent could have been conditional on the making of the repairs; for the mortgage to secure the rent for the entire year was given on January 16, 1907, the day that defendant moved out of the store, for the reason, as he alleged, that it leaked and injured his goods. This clearly showed a promise to pay the rent, notwithstanding the failure of the plaintiff to repair. The defendant might have had a separate action, or might have set up a counterclaim for damages for breach of the alleged separate contract to repair; but he could not avail himself of such alleged breach as a defense to this action on the mortgage, for by renewing his promise to pay the rent in the face of plaintiff's failure to repair he waived the right to set up the breach as a defense to the mortgage. Rouse v. Sarratt, 74 S. C. 575, 54 S. E. 757.

[5] There is no foundation for the third assignment of error; for the admission of defendant's counsel in the course of the charge could not be construed as less than an admission of a demand for the possession of the property.

[6] The verdict was in this form: "We find for the plaintiff the recovery of the possession of the goods or the sum of $200." This sufficiently identified the property, as there were no goods referred to in the pleadings or the evidence, except the stock of goods covered by the mortgage. Bossard v. Vaughn, 68 S. C. 96, 46 S. E. 523; Phoenix Co. v. Jaudon, 75 S. C. 229, 55 S. E. 308.

[7] The defendant cannot complain that the jury placed the value at $200, instead of $1,000, the alleged real value. The defendant was wrongfully in possession; and it was to his advantage that the jury should assess the property at less than its value in finding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from him the property, or its value, if it could not be recovered.

Affirmed.

WALKER et al. v. DES PORTES.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 2, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 681*)—DECREE—CONCLUSIVE—NESS.

A decree providing for the sale of certain land in partition was not binding on certain contingent remaindermen who were not made parties to the proceeding, and their interests would not follow the purchase money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1202; Dec. Dig. § 681.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 111*)—SALE—PROCEEDS—REPUTATION—SURRENDER OF BENEFITS.

Where contingent remaindermen were not made parties to a partition suit, but the share belonging to the holder of the precedent estate with a contingent remainder at her death was paid to a trustee, who invested it in certain Georgia land, the contingent remaindermen as a condition to their right to repudiate the sale were bound to return not only the amount so invested, with interest, but the present value of the investment of such share; such value being the proportion of the present value of the land in which the money was invested which the original investment bore to the entire investment made by the trustee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 401-418; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 111*)—SALE—PROCEEDS—REPUTATION—SURRENDER OF BENEFITS.

Where contingent remaindermen were not made parties to a partition suit, and the court ordered $1,000 of the share of one of the holders of the precedent estate to be used in the improvement of the family dwelling situated on the lands assigned to her in the original division made by the executors and held by her under testator's will, the remaindermen entitled to such property were not bound by such investment, but, it being impossible to ascertain to what extent the land was increased in value by the improvement, they were only bound to return the sum so invested with interest as a condition to their right to recover their interest in the land partitioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 401-418; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

4. PARTITION (§ 109*)—SALE OF LAND—INVALIDITY—IMPROVEMENTS.

Where a purchaser of land under a partition decree invalid as against contingent remaindermen cut timber and brought more of the land under cultivation, but added nothing to its value by so doing, no allowance could be made to her for such alleged improvements in an accounting between her and the contingent remaindermen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 375-397; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

5. PARTITION (§ 77*)—SALE—DESIRABILITY.

Where the shares of many of the parties interested in land sought to be partitioned were very small, and it appeared impossible to adjust equities without a sale, it was properly ordered.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Alice B. Walker and others against Sarah W. Des Portes. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified and remanded.

Glenn W. Ragsdale and McCants & McCants, all of Winnsboro, for appellant. A. S. & W. D. Douglas, McDonald & McDonald and Hanahan & Traylor, all of Winnsboro, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The facts are clearly stated in the circuit decree, and will not be stated in detail here.

When Jemima Harrison, one of the children of Osmond Woodward, died without issue living, the land which had been assigned to her by the executors of the will of Osmond Woodward under authority of the will vested in her sisters, with contingent remainders to their issue. The sisters, by an action for partition in the court of common pleas, procured a sale of the Harrison land without making the children, the contingent remaindermen in esse, parties. When Regina Dadsden, Sarah Cook, Rebecca Buchanan, and Lucy A. Keller, the sisters of Jemima Harrison, died, the interests of certain of the contingent remaindermen in the lands originally assigned to her became vested, and this action was brought to recover their interests in the lands as if no sale had been made. The defendant Sarah W. Des Portes is in possession, claiming through the purchase at the partition sale. She is also the owner by purchase of the one-fourth interest in remainder of the children of Regina Gadsden. It is admitted that the issue of Lucy A. Keller are entitled to recover one-fourth interest in the land.

The defense to the claim of the issue of Mrs. Sarah S. Cook and Mrs. Rebecca Buchanan are (1) that they intervened in the partition suit, and that by the intervention they became parties and are bound by the sale made in that suit; (2) that the sale was made for full value, and that the shares in the proceeds of the sale of the contingent remaindermen mentioned were invested for their benefit, and that they still retain the property in which the funds were invested. The record does not show that the issue of Mrs. Cook and Mrs. Buchanan were made parties to the partition suit by intervention or otherwise. But Thomas W. Woodward was appointed trustee for the share of Mrs. Cook, and as such received $2,250 from the proceeds of the sale. In another proceeding instituted by Mrs. Cook and her husband, to which her only child was made a party, the court ordered the lands assigned to Mrs. Cook in the original division made by the executors to be sold. The proceeds of this sale and also the share of Mrs. Cook and her child in the proceeds of the sale of the lands originally assigned to her sister, Jemima Harrison, were paid to the trustee, and by him invested in lands in Georgia. The issue of Mrs. Cook, who are now claiming one-fourth of the lands originally assigned to Jemima Harrison, are still in the possession and enjoyment of the Georgia lands. It does not appear that the payment to the trustee of the share of the proceeds of the sale of the Jemima Harrison lands, the lands now in controversy, was ever authorized by an order of the court in any proceedings to which the contingent remaindermen are parties.

[1] The contingent remaindermen not being parties to the proceedings under which the Jemima Harrison tract of land was sold, the circuit court correctly held that they were not bound by the order of sale made therein. Moseley v. Hankinson, 22 S. C. 323.

But it was supposed at the time of the sale that the purchaser would get a good title, and that the interests of the contingent remaindermen would attach to the purchase money.

[2] It was under this mistake that the purchaser paid a full price, that $2,250, the one-fourth share of the proceeds which it was supposed would go to Mrs. Cook with a contingent remainder over at her death, was paid to Thomas W. Woodward as trustee, and that the trustee invested the $2,250 in the Georgia lands now representing that fund and in the possession of Mrs. Cook's issue. The Georgia lands have increased greatly in value. The circuit judge, we think, was in error in holding that the issue of Mrs. Cook, while holding the Georgia lands, could treat as a nullity the sale of the Harrison lands, and recover their one-fourth interest therein by paying back only the sum received by the trustee and invested in the Georgia land, with interest from the death of Mrs. Cook. Equity requires that, when they repudiate the sale of the Harrison land, they must surrender or account for every benefit they hold thereunder. Bailey v. Boyce, 4 Strob. Eq. 84. Inasmuch as other trust funds were also invested in the Georgia lands, it was not practicable for the issue of Mrs. Cook to separate the property representing the $2,250 received from the sale of the Harrison lands, and on the death of Mrs. Cook repudiate ownership of it. For that reason, the general rule that the retention of the purchase money operates as an affirmation of the sale does not apply. For the same reason, it is not practicable for the court to require that the land representing the $2,250 trust fund be surrendered as a condition of the recovery of the interest in the Harrison land, but the issue of Mrs. Cook should pay or account to Mrs. Des Portes for the present value of the investment made by the trustee of Mrs. Cook's share of the proceeds of the sale of the Harrison lands as a condition of their recovery of their one-fourth interest in those lands. The value of that interest is the proportion of the present value of the Georgia land which $2,250 bears to the entire investment made by the trustee.

[3] The investment of the share of Mrs. Buchanan stands on a different footing. The court ordered $1,000 of Mrs. Buchanan's share of the proceeds of the sale of the Harrison land to be used in the improvement of the family dwelling situated on the lands assigned to her in the original division made by the executors and held by her under the limitation of the will of Osmond Woodward. The issue of Mrs. Buchanan are now in possession of this property, but they were not bound by the order for the investment. It is manifestly impossible now to ascertain to what extent the land was increased in value by the improvement. The only available measure of benefit is the amount of the money expended under the order of the court, and the utmost that a court of equity can do is to require that the issue of Mrs. Buchanan pay back that sum with interest as a condition of their recovery of their one-fourth interest in the land, as decreed by the circuit judge.

[4] Careful examination of the evidence confirms the conclusion of the circuit court that the value of the land was not improved by cutting the timber, and thus bringing more of it under cultivation. As nothing was added to the value of the land, no allowance can be made to Mrs. Des Portes for the alleged improvements. Civil Code, § 3202.

[5] The objection that there was nothing before the court tending to show that partition in kind was not practicable is not well founded. The entire record shows the advisability of a sale. The share of many of the parties is very small, and it seems impossible to adjust the equities of the parties without a sale of the land.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified, and that the cause be remanded for such proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the conclusion herein expressed.

S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3160]), making it a misdemeanor to obtain by false billing, or otherwise, transportation of property at less than the regular established rates, from a carrier subject to such act, is not violated, with a consequent loss of right to recover of the carrier in case of loss of the goods by one delivering to the express company, for transportation, a package of jewelry of the value of $700, marked "value $400," and paying a rate on such declared value.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by B. Visanaka against the Southern Express Company. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Modified.

Barron, Moore, Barron & McKay, of Columbia, for Southern Express Co. Weston & Aycock, of Columbia, for B. Visanaka.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff, a jewelry merchant, delivered to the defendant express company at Columbia on March 31, 1909, a package containing diamonds and other jewelry of the value of $877.01, for shipment to M. Visanaka, in the city of New York. When the package was received by the consignee, two rings of the aggregate value of $131.50 were missing. The defense to this action to recover the value of the lost rings rests on the allegations that the plaintiff falsely billed the goods shipped, in violation of the federal statute which forbids and declares to be a crime "false billing" by a consignor. The plaintiff indorsed on the package "value $400," and obtained transportation for 95 cents, under a contract of shipment which contained this stipulation: "In consideration of the rate of charges for carrying said property, which is regulated by the valuation and classification thereof, and is based upon a valuation not exceeding fifty and 00-100 ($50.00) dollars, unless a greater value is declared, and the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than fifty and 00-100 ($50.00) dollars, unless a greater value is stated therein, and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than the value so stated." On the 31st day of March, 1909, the regular schedule of express rates from Columbia to New York for carriage of goods, duly filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission as required by law, showed that the rates of defendant were regulated by the valuation and classification thereof, and based upon a valuation not exceeding $50 in case of each shipment, unless a greater valuation was declared, and that, when value in excess of $50 was so declared, an additional charge was made, which for jewelry was 15 cents for every hundred dollars, or fraction thereof. Paragraph 3 of section 10 of the Interstate Commerce Commission Law provides: "Any person and any officer or agent of any corporation or company who shall deliver property for transportation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or for whom, as consignor or consignee, any such carrier shall transport property, who shall knowingly and wilfully, by false billing, false classification, false weighing, false representation of the contents of the package, or false report of weight, or by any device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its agent or agents, obtain transportation for such property at less than the regular rates then established and in force on the line of transportation, shall be deemed guilty of fraud, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, within the district in which such offense was committed, be subject for each offense to a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court." A jury trial having been waived, the circuit judge made a decree in favor of the plaintiff for $77.69, the proportion of the loss that the value indorsed by the plaintiff on the package, $400, bore to the real value, $877.01. Both parties appeal.

[1] We do not think the shipper was guilty of any violation of the federal statute. The statute is directed against and covers every device or means which a shipper may adopt to obtain an advantage over other shippers or the carrier. It does not expressly prohibit undervaluation, and undervaluation under such a contract of shipment as the plaintiff made gives the shipper no advantage over the carrier or over other shippers who make the same contract and take the same risk. The contract of carriage shows that the carrier based his charge entirely on valuation—that is, on the measure of his responsibility in case of loss. The recovery in case of loss being limited to the value as stated by the shipper, that, and not the actual value, was the measure of responsibility. Since the charges of the carrier and its responsibility are regulated by the value as stated by the shipper and not the actual value, the failure to state the actual value is not false billing or a device to obtain transportation "at less than the regular rates then established."

The defendant relies on the case of Ellison v. Adams Express Co., 245 Ill. 410, 92 N. E. 277, as holding that such a shipment as this was in violation of the federal statute. In that case the shipper made the same contract of carriage as was made by the plaintiff in this case, but he intentionally failed to state any value and paid for the shipment on the basis of a valuation of $50 for each package, thus accepting the stipulation of the contract that he had agreed that the value was not more than $50, and that the company should not be liable for a greater sum. The property was lost, and the shipper sued for the entire value of the property. The express company admitted liability for $50, the agreed value of each package according to the contract, and tendered and paid into court $100 in discharge of its liability. The court held that the plaintiff could not recover the full value after contracting for the valuation of $50 and paying the charges on that basis, and that his recovery must be limited to the value contracted for and by which the charges had been measured. It is true that, in the course of its reasoning, the court does seem to hold that the failure to give the true value was an unlawful device for obtaining transportation of the goods at less than the regular charge, but that conclusion we think was not necessary to the decision of the case and was not sound. It would be sound and applicable under a law forbidding that the value stated by the shipper instead of the real value should be the measure of the liability of the carrier. As there was no violation of the federal statute, there is no obstacle to plaintiff's recovery.

[2] Since the decision in Huguelet v. Warfield, 84 S. C. 87, 65 S. E. 985, it cannot be doubted that under a contract of shipment fixing the value and limiting the liability of the carrier to that value, in case of loss of a part of the shipment, the shipper may recover the real value of the property lost, not exceeding, however, the limit of the liability stipulated in the contract of shipment.

It follows that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $131.50, the value of the articles lost, and the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified accordingly.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 2, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 139*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where there is any testimony at all or where more than one inference can be drawn, the case must go to the jury to be determined by them; and to grant a nonsuit or direct a verdict under such a state of facts would be error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 832, 833, 338-341, 365; Dec. Dig. § 139.* Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries to car repairer, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether it was practicable for him to obtain a blue flag required by the rules of the railroad company, and whether he was directed by a superior officer to proceed with the work, knowing he had no flag.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1001, 1008, 1010-1050; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

The object of a blue flag required by the rules of a railroad company to be exposed while the car is being inspected or repaired, being to give notice and warning to the trains, if a conductor had actual notice that a car repairer was under a car, and, with such notice, ran back against the car and caused his injury, the railroad company would be liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 269, 270, 273, 274, 277, 278; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 285*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT.

In an action for injuries to a car repairer, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether the negligence of defendant was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTION FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries to a car repairer, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether he was in any manner negligent and contributed to the proximate cause of his injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTION FOR JURY—WANTONNESS OF FELLOW SERVANT.

In an action for injuries to a car repairer, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether there was wantonness or a conscious advertent failure of the conductor who ran against the car under which plaintiff was working to observe due care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1051-1067; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EMERGENCY.

In an action for injuries to a car repairer, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether the work to be done was an emergency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 226*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE.

For a master to escape liability on the ground of negligence of a fellow servant, the master must not have been negligent at all as to any of the proximate causes of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 659-667; Dec. Dig. § 226.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 284*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—JOINT LIABILITY.

In an action for injuries to a car repairer in a yard owned by two railroad companies, evidence held to present a question for the jury as to the joint liability of the two companies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master & Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1000-1132; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1062*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—SUBMISSION OF QUESTIONS TO JURY.

Any error in submitting to the jury the question of punitive damages is immaterial where the jury found only actual damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4212-4218; Dec. Dig. § 1062.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Colleton County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by J. B. Pinckney against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

At the conclusion of the testimony of both plaintiffs and defendants, the defendants made a motion to direct a verdict upon the following grounds: "First. There is no evidence tending to support the allegations of punitive damages against either defendant. Second. There is no evidence tending to establish actionable negligence against either defendant. Third. The entire evidence shows that the injury to the plaintiff was the result of his own negligence. Fourth. The entire evidence shows that the injury to plaintiff was the result of his contributory negligence as a proximate cause, and without which it would not have happened. Fifth. The entire evidence shows that the injury to plaintiff was the result of the act of a fellow servant, combining with plaintiff's negligence as a proximate cause. In addition to the grounds for the direction of a verdict already presented, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company asks your honor to direct a verdict so far as it is concerned, for the reason that the testimony shows that the plaintiff in this case worked for both roads, and that at the time of his injury he was working for the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company upon a car of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, was injured by a train and officials of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company had no part whatever in the infliction of the alleged injury to the plaintiff." The court refused the motion as to both defendants.

The exceptions on appeal were as follows:

"I. It was error in his honor to refuse the motion of the defendants to direct a verdict for the defendants on the fourth ground submitted in this behalf, to wit: 'The entire evidence shows that the injury to plaintiff was the result of his contributory negligence as a proximate cause and without which it would not have happened'—the error being:

"(a) Assuming that the testimony tended to establish actionable negligence as against the defendants or either of them in the matters complained of, which, however, defendants do not admit as a fact, the testimony shows conclusively that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in undertaking to repair the car in the manner and way in which he did. It appears clearly from the testimony that there was no emergency, that plaintiff had the option to choose his own time within which to make the repairs, that the repairs to be made were of little consequence, which was well known to plaintiff before he undertook to make the same; that he did not undertake to provide himself with a blue flag before entering on the work and did not call to the attention of the chief car inspector, Mr. Rabb, that he was going about the work in violation of the blue flag rule, and did not ask at the time for a blue flag, and made no effort whatever of any kind to procure a blue flag; that he knew the work was dangerous, and knew the blue flag rule which absolutely required him to display the flag before going under the car, and knew that he was violating the rule, and admits that he knew it was a most dangerous thing to do.

"(b) Even if it be assumed that plaintiff's testimony was true that most of his flags were broken, yet the testimony shows that at least one flag was not broken, but was placed in the office where they were kept a day or so before the accident, and, further, that at least some of the flags which he claims were broken were in condition to be used, the same having been torn in half, and the testimony clearly showing that the same could be used in this condition by placing them at the end of the car or on a stick in the center of the track, yet, notwithstanding this, plaintiff made no effort whatever to find the flag which had been left in the office, and made no effort whatever to use the flags that were broken, and did not before undertaking the work ask Mr. Rabb whether a supply of flags had been received and were then available for use; it being respectfully submitted that it was the duty of the plaintiff to comply with this rule if by the exercise of reasonable care on his part he could have complied.

"(c) Taking the most favorable view to plaintiff of his testimony, it appears that several days before the accident he had requested Rabb to order a new supply of flags; that ample time had elapsed within which to receive the same, and yet on the morning of the accident, before undertaking the work of repairing the car, he did not ascertain and made no effort to ascertain whether the flags had arrived, but, without exercising any care whatever in undertaking to find out whether there were flags available, undertook the work with full knowledge of its dangers and of the perils likely to follow, relying for his protection on an alleged conversation with the conductor whom he does not advise, however, that he intended in doing the work to violate the blue flag rule and rely on the protection to be given him by his fellow servant, Freeman, substituting and relying on said conversation and Freeman for the protection afforded by the blue flag.

"(d) The testimony shows that the blue flags were available and could have been used, but instead of making use thereof, and complying with the blue flag rule, plaintiff deliberately and of his own free will violated defendants' rule, and substituted therefor his fellow servant Freeman and his alleged conversation with Conductor Partain.

"(e) Plaintiff, failing to procure a blue flag, should have refused to do the work, and should not have gone under the car without the protection of a blue flag. He knew the danger, and knew the rule absolutely requiring the blue flag to be displayed before going under a car, and with full knowledge of these conditions on his part, and with full knowledge of the almost certain danger that would follow his violation of the rule, and there being no emergency, was as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence, and his honor should have so held.

"II. His honor committed error in not directing a verdict in favor of the defendants on the fifth ground submitted in this behalf, to wit: 'The entire evidence shows that the injury to the plaintiff was the result of the act of his fellow servant combined with plaintiff's negligence as a proximate cause'—the error being:

"(a) The evidence shows that Freeman was a fellow servant of plaintiff engaged in the same work as the plaintiff and on the same piece of work at the time of the accident, and in the same department of labor. It shows that plaintiff relied on Freeman to warn him of the approach of any train while he was under the car engaged in making repairs, that Freeman failed to notify him of the approaching car in time to enable him to escape without injury, and his honor should on this ground have directed a verdict for the defendants.

"(b) There is no testimony whatever tending to show that the injury to plaintiff was caused by the combined negligence of the master and fellow servant. There is no allegation in the complaint charging a failure to furnish sufficient appliances, but even if it be assumed that the complaint embraces this, and even if it be assumed that there is evidence tending to show a failure on the part of the defendants to furnish sufficient flags, and, further, that the conductor was told by plaintiff of his intention to repair the car, still it is respectfully submitted that there is nothing in this upon which to predicate any charge of combined negligence as causing the injury. The conductor was not told by plaintiff that he was without a flag, or that he intended to rely upon the notice given to the conductor as a substitute for the blue flag rule. He was not advised that the blue flags were not available and had no notice or any information from which notice can be legally inferred or charged against the company that the flags could not be had, and that Pinckney intended in making the repairs to do so in violation of the blue flag rule, and it is therefore respectfully submitted that, even if it be held by this court that there is some evidence tending to establish negligence against the company in either or both of these particulars, still it cannot logically be said that the injury was the result of such negligence combined with the negligence of Freeman, a fellow servant. Each is entirely independent of the other, and there is no element of combination, and, in fact, no connection whatever, between the alleged negligence of the master and the admitted negligence of Freeman, the fellow servant.

"(c) In order for plaintiff to avail himself of the doctrine of combined negligence of the master and fellow servant, it must appear that the same was the proximate cause of his injury. If the proximate cause was the negligence of the fellow servant, then plaintiff cannot recover, and it is respectfully submitted in this case that it appears absolutely and to a mathematical demonstration that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of plaintiff in relying on his fellow servant, Freeman, and the negligence of his fellow servant in failing to notify him of the approach of the engine in time to escape from under the car.

"III. It is respectfully submitted that his honor committed error in charging the jury as follows: 'Therefore, when you are measuring and investigating the conduct of any person to a transaction, you will ask yourselves did he measure up to that standard, to wit, Did he do that which a man of ordinary prudence and care would have done? If he did, then he can not be said to be guilty of negligence'—the error being:

"(a) His honor in so instructing the jury charged in respect to matters of fact in violation of section 28, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895.

"(b) What a man of ordinary prudence and care would have done in any given circumstances is, at most, only evidence to go to the jury on the question of negligence, but is not a conclusive test whether due care has been exercised and his honor in so instructing the jury as he did in the language complained of committed error of law.

"IV. It is respectfully submitted that his honor committed error in charging the jury as follows: 'So, gentlemen, when you come to the question of negligence, you will ask yourselves when you are taking up the question of the negligence of the defendants, their agents, and servants, you will ask yourselves this question, did the agents, servants, and employes of the defendants on this occasion observe the care that a man of ordinary prudence and care would have observed under all the circumstances and the conditions then and there surrounding them, if you will find that they did then the plaintiff cannot recover. If you find that they did not measure up to the standard of a man of ordinary prudence and care then you would find that they were negligent, then take the conduct of the plaintiff and ask yourselves the question, Would a man of ordinary prudence and care have acted as you find he acted on this occasion? If you find that he did that, then he could not be said to be guilty of negligence. If you find that he did, or left undone anything that a man of ordinary prudence and care would not have done or left undone, then you will find and deem him to be guilty of negligence—the error being:

“(a) In instructing the jury that, if the agents and servants of the defendants did not measure up to the standard of a man of ordinary prudence and care, the jury should find that the defendants were negligent, his honor charged on the facts in violation of section 26, art. 5 of the Constitution of 1895.

“(b) His honor plainly instructed the jury what facts would constitute negligence.

“(c) The agents and servants of the defendants may not have measured up to the standard of a man of ordinary prudence and care, and yet in the circumstances of this case acted as careful men should have acted.

“(d) In instructing the jury that, in order to determine the question of plaintiff's negligence that they should ask themselves the question, would a man of ordinary prudence and care have acted as plaintiff acted on the occasion in question, and, if it was found that plaintiff did, that then they could not say that plaintiff was guilty of negligence, his honor charged on the facts in violation of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution of 1895, and told the jury what facts would constitute negligence.

“(e) A prudent and careful man may and frequently does act in a careless and negligent way, and his honor in instructing the jury in the language complained of in this particular gave the jury an entirely erroneous and illegal test. Instead of giving the jury a definition of negligence, his honor instructed them what facts would constitute negligence, and told the jury that if it should conclude that plaintiff acted on the occasion as the jury might think a man of ordinary prudence and care would have acted that they could not and must not find plaintiff negligent, whereas it is submitted that the usual and customary way that a man of ordinary prudence and care would perform a certain act is not a conclusive test as to whether due care was exercised therein. It is merely evidence which should go to the jury along with other evidence in the case, leaving it to the jury to determine from all of it whether as a fact due care was exercised.

“V. It is respectfully submitted that his honor was in error in instructing the jury as follows, in reference to the negligence of a fellow servant, to wit: ‘Now on the subject of that very doctrine there is a different rule and a different law applicable to railroads, different from other parties’—and in this connection reading to the jury as applicable to this case article 9 of the Constitution of 1895; the error being:

“(a) That in telling the jury that the law of fellow servant as applied to railroads is different from that which obtains as to other parties was wholly misleading and erroneous when applied to the facts of this case because the only principle of law the jury could consider in this case was as to the combined negligence of the master and fellow servant, it being an admitted fact that plaintiff and Freeman were fellow servants, and that the negligence of Freeman, if a proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, would defeat his recovery. Therefore, in telling the jury that a different rule of law applied, his honor confused and misled the jury as to the point before it for determination.

“(b) Article 9 of the Constitution, which his honor read to the jury, in no wise changed or modified the general principles of law applicable to the question before the jury, and had absolutely no bearing whatever on the question, and could only tend to confuse the jury in its deliberation.

“VI. His honor committed error in instructing the jury in the language of plaintiff's third request as follows, to wit:

“‘That if the jury find as a further fact that the defendants failed and omitted to furnish plaintiff with a blue flag, plaintiff having exercised due diligence in bringing such failure to the attention of his superior officer, and that the plaintiff notwithstanding such failure on the part of the defendants and such notice on the part of the plaintiff, was instructed by his superior officer to repair the car, as alleged in the complaint, and that the plaintiff before engaging in inspecting and repairing the same, gave notice to Conductor Partain of his purpose, as alleged in the complaint, and was given assurance by the said conductor that he was through on the yard, and that the plaintiff could go to work on the said car without molestation by the said conductor, as alleged in the complaint, and that the plaintiff was injured by the negligent or willful act of the said conductor, as alleged in the complaint, then the jury will find for the plaintiff.’” I charge you that, provided you find that the plaintiff's conduct towards Conductor Partain under all the circumstances was the exercising of due care and was not negligence'—the error being:

"(a) In saying, 'plaintiff having exercised due diligence in bringing such failure to the attention of his superior officer,' his honor charged on the facts of the case in violation of section 28, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895.

"(b) The entire request could only be regarded by the jury as an instruction as to the existence of certain facts, to wit, the exercise of due diligence on the part of plaintiff and the giving of notice by plaintiff to the conductor and being assured by the conductor that he was through on the yard and might proceed with the work without molestation, and, if not a violation of the strict letter of section 28 and article 5 of the Constitution, is certainly a clear violation of its intent and spirit and within the meaning of its terms a charge on the facts.

"(c) In telling the jury, 'I charge you that provided you find that plaintiff's conduct towards the conductor was the exercise of due care and not negligence,' his honor assumed as a fact that there was some conversation with plaintiff and the conductor bearing on the material facts of this case, and thereby charged on the facts of the case in violation of the constitutional provision in this behalf (section 28, art. 5).

"VII. It is respectfully submitted that his honor committed error in not charging as submitted the defendants' first request, and in modifying the same as follows, to wit: "If you find from the testimony in this case that the plaintiff could by the exercise of due care have secured a blue flag and failed to do so and use it, then I charge you as a matter of law that he cannot recover a verdict at your hands in this case." I charge you that, provided the defendants, their agents, and servants were not guilty of willfulness and that willfulness was the proximate cause of his injury—the error being:

"(a) As modified by his honor the request was entirely emasculated.

"(b) The request as submitted contains a sound principle of law, to wit, that, if plaintiff's injury was due to his own negligence, he could not recover, and in modifying this his honor confused the jury by making it appear that this request was intended to cover contributory negligence by the plaintiff.

"(c) In any view of the matter, the modification was wrong, erroneous, and misleading, because it is an admitted fact that defendants did move the car which was a willful act in the sense that it was a voluntary act on behalf of the defendants. The jury, therefore, were instructed by his honor that if the car was moved deliberately and of the defendants' own volition and intention that plaintiff could recover, although it might also appear that his injury was due to his own negligent conduct in not making use of the blue flag.

"(d) The modification must be construed with reference to the facts of this case, and, when so considered, the effect thereof is to absolutely destroy the proposition of law contained in the request and in effect and law amounts to a refusal to charge the said request.

"VIII. His honor it is respectfully submitted committed error of law in modifying the second request of the defendants, as follows, to wit: "In this case the Supreme Court has held that 'if the plaintiff disregarded the blue flag rule so essential to his own safety as well as the safety of other employes and the general public, when he could have complied with it by reasonable effort on his part, then he is not entitled to recover.' And I charge you in this case if it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff could have complied with this rule by reasonable effort on his part, and failed to do so, that he cannot recover and your verdict must be for the defendant companies." I charge you that, provided that you do not find that the defendants, their agents, servants, and employes were guilty of wantonness and willfulness, and that that wantonness and willfulness was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff—the error being:

"(a) That the request contains a sound proposition of law vitally applicable to this case, and should have been charged without modifications.

"(b) There was not the slightest evidence of willfulness or wantonness in the case and the continued iteration and reiteration of this by his honor to the jury was misleading and impressed upon the minds of the jury the idea of his honor that there was willfulness shown by the testimony, and deprived the defendants of a fair consideration by the jury of the propositions of law applicable to the case.

"IX. His honor committed error in refusing to charge the defendants' fifth request as follows, to wit: "If you find in this case from the testimony that the plaintiff failed to afford himself the protection of the blue flag, but relied on Freeman as a substitute for the blue flag rule, he cannot recover." I cannot charge you that. I have got to modify all these charges. I think these charges must have been based on the ground that I would not submit to you the question of willfulness; that is, I cannot charge you that proposition as stated because there are other elements that the jury must take into consideration—the error being:

"(a) The request contains a sound proposition of law vitally applicable to this case and the refusal of his honor to so charge was, in effect, the direction of a verdict against the defendants and in favor of the plaintiff.

"(b) The charge of his honor in this behalf deprived the defendants of the defense of negligence of a fellow servant as the proximate cause of the injury, and it is submitted that the testimony fairly considered abundantly establishes the fact that plaintiff's injury was due to the negligence of his fellow servant, Freeman, and that plaintiff relied on Freeman as a substitute for the blue flag rule.

"(c) His honor does not undertake to modify this request, but states that he is going to modify all the requests to charge, and states to the jury that there are other elements which they must take into consideration, and, if this language be taken as a modification, then it was error in his honor for the reason that he thereby told the jury that they must consider the question of willfulness and wantonness in considering this request, and in effect in so doing told the jury to disregard the request.

"(d) If plaintiff was injured by reason of his substituting his fellow servant for the protection of the blue flag, then it is submitted that willfulness could not be, and should not be, considered by the jury because it would preclude the idea of his injury having been occasioned by any act of the defendants.

"X. It is respectfully submitted that his honor committed error in refusing to charge the jury the defendants' request as follows, to wit: "You are further instructed that if you find that the plaintiff in this case did not observe the blue flag rule, and could have done so, but, instead, relied on his conversation with Conductor Partain as a substitute for the blue flag rule then he cannot recover." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) That this request contains a correct proposition of law vitally applicable to this case.

"(b) If plaintiff failed to observe the blue flag rule when he could have done so, but relied on his conversation with the conductor then, as a matter of law, he could not be entitled to a verdict, and it was error in his honor to refuse this request.

"XI. It was error in his honor to refuse to charge the jury the defendants' seventh request as follows, to wit: "If you find from the evidence as a matter of fact that the plaintiff did tell the conductor that he intended to work under the car and should further find that the conductor negligently caused the car under which the plaintiff was working to be moved to his injury, still plaintiff could not recover if you should further find that, by the exercise of reasonable care, he could have procured a blue flag, and thereby could have given himself the protection of the blue flag rule. In other words, if the plaintiff by the use of reasonable care could have made use of the blue flag as required by the rules, he cannot recover in this case simply because the conductor failed to remember his statement that he would be at work under the car." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) That the request contains a sound proposition of law applicable to this case.

"(b) In refusing this charge his honor permitted a recovery on behalf of plaintiff, although as a matter of law he was guilty of contributory negligence as the direct and proximate cause of his injury.

"XII. His honor committed error of law in refusing to charge defendants' eighth request as follows, to wit: "If it is a fact established by the testimony in this case that the plaintiff did not have a blue flag, and could not by reasonable effort secure a blue flag, it was his duty in this situation to have advised the conductor that he had no flag, and that in going under the car he could not as a consequence observe the blue flag rule. It was not sufficient for him to have simply told the conductor he expected to work under a car, but he should have gone further and notified the conductor that he was unable to comply with the blue flag rule." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) That the request contains a sound proposition of law applicable to the case and should have been charged.

"(b) It was the duty of plaintiff, if he intended to rely on the conversation with the conductor, to have advised the conductor that he was unable to comply with the blue flag rule.

"XIII. It was error in his honor to refuse the defendants' ninth request as follows, to wit: "There is no evidence whatever in this case even tending to establish a waiver of the blue flag rule." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) There is not a particle of evidence in this entire record tending to show a waiver of the blue flag rule, and his honor should have so instructed the jury.

"XIV. His honor committed error in refusing to charge defendants' tenth request, as follows, to wit: "Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the defendant could waive the blue flag rule, and that there was evidence in this case tending to show a waiver of the rule, but I charge you that there is no evidence tending to establish a waiver of this rule in this case." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) That there was no evidence in this case tending to establish a waiver of the blue flag rule and his honor in refusing this request permitted the jury to consider a question of this kind, vitally important to the case, upon the mere argument of plaintiff's counsel and without any evidence whatever.

"XV. His honor committed error in refusing to charge the jury defendants' eleventh request as follows, to wit: "The jury are further instructed that the conductor of the freight train, to wit, Conductor Partain, had no power, and could not as a matter of law waive the blue flag rule in so far as the plaintiff in this case is concerned." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) That the mere conductor on a freight train has no right whatever in law to waive a rule of the defendants intended for the protection of employes in an entirely different department of labor, and in no wise connected with the said conductor, and over whom he had no control whatever.

"(b) The conductor had no right or power to waive the blue flag rule in favor of the plaintiff in this case.

"XVI. His honor committed error of law in not charging defendants' thirteenth request to charge as follows, to wit: "I charge you that the rule as to the use of the blue flag cannot be violated by an employe, and, if he is injured because he violated it or contributed to his injury by not observing it, he cannot recover." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) This request contains a correct proposition of law vitally important to this case, and should have been charged as given.

"(b) If an employe violates a rule of the company, and is injured by reason of his violation thereof, or if his failure to observe the rule contributes to his injury, then as a matter of law he cannot recover, and his honor should have so charged.

"XVII. His honor committed error in refusing defendants' fifteenth request to charge, to wit: "I charge you that, where there was no blue flag furnished the employe, he should have refused to work under a car, which is extra dangerous work, until the blue flag was furnished him, unless in a case of an emergency." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) That the admitted evidence shows that plaintiff knew it was extra dangerous to go under the car without displaying a blue flag, and the evidence further shows that there was no emergency requiring him to do so. It is therefore submitted that plaintiff should have refused to go under the car in violation of the rule.

"(b) Where an employe knows that it is dangerous to violate a rule of the master, and there is no emergency which requires him to violate it, if he deliberately does so, he cannot recover as a matter of law against the master.

"XVIII. His honor committed error of law in not charging defendants' sixteenth request as follows, to wit: "I charge you that the testimony in this case does not show any emergency justifying the violation of the rule." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) There is not a particle of testimony in this whole case suggesting any emergency in repairing this car, or tending to show any emergency to justify a violation of the blue flag rule, and his honor should have so instructed the jury as requested.

"(b) Where there is no testimony in a case tending to establish any material fact, it is the duty of the court on request to so instruct the jury.

"XIX. His honor committed error in refusing to instruct the jury in the language of plaintiff's seventeenth request, as follows, to wit: "I charge you that, in order to recover because a blue flag was not at hand for the use of plaintiff, the plaintiff would have to show that at the time he was ordered to do the work he demanded a blue flag for use in the work and the defendants refused to furnish him." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) This request contains a sound proposition of law, and should have been charged.

"(b) It was the duty imposed on plaintiff to exercise some reasonable effort to procure a blue flag, and his honor should have instructed the jury as requested that it was his duty to demand a flag at the time he was ordered to do the work, and that defendants refused to furnish the same.

"(c) If plaintiff by the exercise of reasonable care could have procured a flag, it was his duty to have done so, and his failure so to do would not justify his violation of the blue flag rule.

"XX. His honor committed error in not charging defendants' nineteenth request, as follows, to wit: "I charge you that, if a car repairer or inspector of a railroad company complies with the blue flag rule, he gives notice to every employe of the railroad company not to move the car while he is working under it, and the company is liable for injury to him caused by any of its employes in moving the car. I charge you, further, that the plaintiff in this case cannot set aside this rule made for his protection by giving verbal notice to one employe, say a conductor, if another employe such as an engineer without such notice took part in moving the car." I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) This request contains a sound proposition of law applicable to this case.

"(b) Verbal notice to one employe certainly could not be said to imply notice to another employe. If the engineer without notice moved the car to the injury of plaintiff who had not observed the blue flag rule, he should not be permitted to recover.

"(c) The blue flag rule was intended to give notice to every employe of the company not to move the car, and the company is certainly liable for an injury caused by moving a car where the rule has been observed, and his honor should certainly have so instructed the jury, and in failing so to do he left the jury wholly uninstructed as to the true purpose and meaning of the blue flag rule, and wholly uninstructed as to the liability of the defendants in cases where an employe had complied with this rule, thereby leaving with the jury the impression that defendant might not be liable, even if the blue flag rule had been observed.

"(d) It was important to a proper trial of this case that the jury should clearly understand that if the blue flag rule was observed that the company was absolutely liable, that if it was not observed when it could have been that the defendant was not liable that verbal notice to one employé that plaintiff intended to set aside the rule could not possibly be notice to another employé of this fact, and, where another employé in the absence of such notice took part in the movement of the car, plaintiff should not be permitted to recover.

"XXI. His honor committed error in not charging defendants' twentieth request to charge as follows, to wit: 'I charge you that the plaintiff cannot change the blue flag rule by relying on the protection of the conductor because the company not being a party to the change of the rule, unless the conductor has been appointed as a representative of the master to change this rule, of which there is no evidence in this case. If the plaintiff instead of placing the blue flag as required by the rules, relies on the notice given to the conductor he thereby constitutes the conductor his agent for protection, and cannot hold the defendants liable for failure of the conductor to protect him. The conductor in such case does not represent the master so as to give him protection, which protection the company has adequately provided for otherwise by the rule.' I refuse to charge you that—the error being:

"(a) It is respectfully submitted that this request contains a sound proposition of law applicable to this case.

"(b) If plaintiff, instead of complying with the rule, undertook to rely on the conductor as a protection, he certainly in law would constitute the conductor his agent, and could not recover for a failure of the conductor to protect him. The conductor in no sense could represent the master for the purpose of waiving the rule or for the purpose of giving him protection in violation of the rule; it being respectfully submitted that the rule is binding on the conductor as well as all other employés, and could not be waived without express authority so to do, and there was no evidence in this case tending to establish any such authority.

"(c) Plaintiff certainly could not change the blue flag rule by substituting verbal notice to the conductor, and it was error in his honor not to so instruct the jury as he was requested to do.

"XXII. His honor committed error in not charging the defendants' twenty-first request as follows, to wit: 'I charge you that, if you find that the plaintiff told the conductor that he was going to work under the car, this did not relieve him of the duty to place the blue flags. That the conductor had the right to assume, unless notified to the contrary, that he would place a blue flag as required by the blue flag rule.' I refuse to charge you that—it being respectfully submitted:

"(a) That this request contains a sound proposition of law, and should have been charged.

"(b) It is submitted that as a matter of law and logic notice to a conductor that a car repairer intends to do some work on a car will not imply notice or knowledge that in doing so he intends to violate the blue flag rule.

"(c) All employés have the right to assume that other employés will observe the rules of the company in the absence of notice to the contrary, and in this case there is not a particle of testimony tending to show that plaintiff told the conductor that he was not going to observe the rule. All that he claims that he told him was that he was going to work on the car.

"XXIII. It was error in his honor to submit to the jury in this case the question of punitive damages, when there was not a particle of testimony in the entire case to indicate anything going to establish wanton or willful conduct on the part of the defendants or anything to entitle plaintiff in any view of the matter to punitive damages.

"XXIV. It was error in his honor not to direct a verdict for the defendants on the cause of action for punitive damages; the error being:

"(a) That there was no testimony tending to establish such cause of action.

"XXV. The Constitution of South Carolina requires and directs that judges shall in the trial of jury cases declare the law; that is, that they shall instruct the jury as to the principles of law which shall govern in the trial of the said case. It is respectfully submitted that the charge of his honor considered as a whole or in parts does not correctly instruct the jury as to the law applicable to this case, but, on the contrary, gave to the jury a wholly incorrect idea as to the law which should govern in the trial of this case. His honor refused outright most of the requests of the defendants and so modified the others as to entirely emasculate the same, and iterated and reiterated to the jury the idea of punitive damages when the decision in this case which was the law of the case eliminated that question from further consideration, and when the testimony wholly failed to even suggest any consideration of punitive damages or wanton or willful conduct. His honor's theory of this case was clearly impressed on the jury, and that theory was that plaintiff was entitled to recover a verdict both for punitive and actual damages, regardless of the fact that plaintiff violated the blue flag rule and without regard to the fact that he knew it was dangerous so to do and without regard to the fact that he admitted having made no effort at the time of undertaking the work to procure a blue flag, and regardless of the fact that he admits that he relied on Freeman, his fellow servant, as a substitute for the blue flag rule, and his alleged conversation with the conductor in which it is not even claimed that he told the conductor that he was not going to comply with the rule. His honor was clearly of the opinion that the mere conversation with the conductor testified to by plaintiff of his intention to repair his car was sufficient in law to give to plaintiff a cause of action both for actual and punitive damages, and it is respectfully submitted that the entire charge is capable of this construction and this construction only, and in so charging the jury his honor committed prejudicial error.

"XXVI. His honor committed error in submitting to the jury the question of wanton and willful misconduct of the defendants or either of them, because there was no testimony in the entire record tending to establish any wanton or willful conduct on the part of either defendant.

"XXVII. His honor committed error in his refusal to grant a new trial on the first ground submitted, to wit, that there is no testimony whatever tending to support the verdict; the error being:

"(a) There is no testimony in this case, it is respectfully submitted, tending to support the verdict.

"XXVIII. His honor committed error in refusing to grant a new trial on the sixth ground submitted for a new trial, to wit: 'Because the evidence is that plaintiff was the author of his own injury, in that he knowingly and unnecessarily violated the blue flag rule without the presence of any emergency so to do, and without notifying the officers and employees in charge of the train that he intended to violate such rule, which rule was enacted for and vital to his own safety'—the error being:

"(a) That there was no emergency whatever requiring plaintiff to do this work in violation of the rule, and the testimony shows that he knowingly and unnecessarily violated the blue flag rule to his injury.

"XXIX. His honor committed error in not granting a new trial on the seventh ground submitted, to wit: 'Because the only inference to be drawn from the evidence is that, if plaintiff's negligence was not the sole cause, it was at least a contributory proximate cause of his injury, in that he violated an important rule, to wit, the blue flag rule, promulgated for and essential to his safety, without notifying the conductor of the train of his intention to violate such rule'—the error being:

"(a) That the entire testimony shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a proximate cause of his injury.

"XXX. His honor committed error in not granting a new trial on the eighth and ninth grounds submitted as follows, to wit: 'In charging the first and second requests to charge and in charging plaintiff's third request with the modification as charged.' 'In modifying the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth requests of defendants, and in refusing the remaining requests of defendants. It is submitted said requests each contained in themselves correct principles of law applicable to their respective parts of the case as made'—the error being:

"(a) In reference to the eighth ground as assigned and specified hereinabove.

"(b) In reference to the ninth ground as specified hereinabove, and for the further reason that the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth requests of the defendants contained sound propositions of law which should have been given to the jury in this case.

"XXXI. His honor committed error in holding in his order refusing motion for a new trial that there was some evidence of conscious failure to observe due care, whereas it is respectfully submitted that the testimony does not tend to establish such a conclusion of fact.

"In addition to the foregoing exception made on behalf of both defendants, the defendant, Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, takes the following exceptions:

"XXXII. The circuit judge erred in overruling the motion to direct a verdict so far as that company was concerned, for the reason that the testimony shows that, although plaintiff at times worked for both roads, yet at the time of his injury he was working for the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, upon a car of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, situated on the siding of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, and that he was injured by a train of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company operated by officials and employees of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, and that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company had no part or responsibility whatever in the infliction of the alleged injury to the plaintiff and could in no way be held liable therefor under the pleadings and proof.

"XXXIII. The circuit judge erred in refusing the twenty-second request to charge, viz: 'I charge you that in this case you cannot find a verdict against the defendant the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company for the reason that there is no evidence that the injury received was the result of any negligence on the part of that defendant, its officers, agents or employees.' It is submitted there was no evidence that the injury complained of resulted from any negligence or wrongful act of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and that defendant was entitled to have this request charged.

"XXXIV. The circuit judge erred in refusing the motion of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to set aside the verdict upon the eighth ground of its motion, viz: '8) Because there was no evidence to support the verdict so far as the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company is concerned.' It is submitted there was no evidence to support a verdict against that defendant, and therefore, in the absence of such evidence, it was error to refuse to set aside the verdict as to that defendant. We earnestly submit that the mere fact that two railroad companies at a junctional point at times employ the services of the same employé or employés and arrange between themselves as to the method of payment of his or their wages cannot in law make one of such railroad companies responsible for negligent or wrongful act of the other railroad company to such employé or employés while such employé is working for such other company.

"XXXV. In refusing to set aside the verdict as to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, the circuit judge said: 'Especially does counsel for the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company insist that there is no testimony to sustain a verdict against it. * * * The Supreme Court has held that in this case there was some evidence tending to show negligence on the part of defendants'. We submit the circuit judge erred in so holding; that he erred in holding that the Supreme Court had done or could do anything more upon the last appeal in this case than pass upon the specific exceptions and the questions raised by them; that he erred in holding that the separate nonliability of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was raised by these exceptions or consequently decided on that appeal; that he erred in holding that the question of the liability of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company on appeal from a nonsuit in one trial can be held as conclusive and decisive of a motion for nonsuit upon a new trial where more or less evidence is or may be introduced; that he erred in holding the question res adjudicata, when upon a new trial a different question is necessarily presented depending upon the proof offered and he erred in holding that in this last trial there was any evidence tending to establish liability of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company."

James E. Peurifoy, of Walterboro, W. H. Fitz Simons, of Charleston, P. A. Wilcox, of Florence, and F. B. Grier, of Greenwood, for appellants. W. A. Holman, of Charleston, and Howell & Gruber, of Walterboro, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action by plaintiff against defendant for personal injuries received while he was engaged at work as car repairer in the employ of defendant at Yemassee, S. C., on May 25, 1907. The cause was first tried in March, 1911, before Judge Ernest Gary, and resulted in a nonsuit. Plaintiff appealed, and the judgment of the circuit court was reversed and a new trial ordered. The case is reported in 89 S. C. 525, 72 S. E. 394. The cause was then tried before Hon. Thos. S. Sease and a jury at the November term, 1911, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants for the sum of $13,000 actual damages. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendants made a motion for a nonsuit on the grounds which are set out in the case, and which should be reported in the case. This motion was refused at the conclusion of the testimony of both plaintiff and defendants. The defendants made a motion to direct a verdict on grounds that should be reported in the case, and which was refused by the court. After verdict motion for a new trial was made and overruled. Defendants then appealed, and by 35 exceptions allege error on the part of the trial judge. These exceptions should be set out in the report of the case, and may be divided into three heads: First. In refusing to direct a verdict and to grant a new trial on the ground that the evidence showed plaintiff's negligence was the sole cause of his injury, or that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, or that he was injured through the negligence of a fellow servant. Second error. In the judge's charge in charging certain propositions of law, and in refusing to charge certain propositions of law as requested. The exceptions of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company which are 32, 33, 34, and 35, which raise the exceptions that the testimony nowhere shows any liability on their part for any injury inflicted on the plaintiff.

[1] The law is so well settled in this state, at least, that where there is any testimony at all, or where more than one inference can be drawn, that the case must go to the jury to be determined by them, and to grant a nonsuit or direct a verdict under such a state of facts would be error, that no question of authority is necessary. In the former appeal in this case in 89 S. C. 529, 72 S. E. 395, this court held in reference to the negligence of the plaintiff: "There was no conclusive evidence that the blue flags were not used on this occasion, but, even if there had been, we are unable to agree that a nonsuit was proper without allowing the plaintiff to testify as to the condition of the flags furnished him, for it might have appeared that they were so broken as to be useless and that he was unable to procure others. * * * We think the evidence required that these issues and the issue of contributory negligence growing out of the rule requiring the use of a blue flag should be submitted to the jury."

[2] The rule, No. 989, introduced in evidence, provides: "They will make no inspection or repairs to cars, either in trains or where liable to be moved, except under the protection of the signal prescribed in rule No. 26." Rule 26 is the blue flag rule, and requires that the workman shall display a blue flag by day and a blue light at night, and that, when a car is thus protected, it must not be coupled to or moved. The same workmen who place the flag are alone authorized to remove it. Other cars are not allowed to be placed on the same track so as to obstruct the view of the blue signal without first notifying the workman.

[3] It seems to us that there was sufficient testimony in this case to carry the case to the jury as to whether or not it was practicable for the plaintiff to obtain a blue flag, and whether or not at that time he was directed by a superior officer to proceed with the work, knowing he had no flag, and, inasmuch as the object of the blue flag is to give notice and warning to the trains, and if Conductor Partain had actual notice that plaintiff was under this car, and, with such notice, ran back against the car and caused his injuries, then the company would be liable. There was testimony that the plaintiff was 19 years old, and had been in the employ of the company about 2 months, and knew the rules in reference to the blue flag; that previous to the occasion of his injury flags, 6 in number, had been furnished by the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to the workman, and while repairing a car 10 or 15 days before the injury, with two flags displayed as required by rule of the company, a train was run against the car and one of the flags broken and torn to pieces, and the other carried away, and never seen by plaintiff afterwards. Two days before the injury to plaintiff, while at work with both flags displayed, he was again run into, and both flags broken, and he narrowly escaped serious injury on that occasion. His request to the chief car inspector to report the conductor for this was refused. Shortly before plaintiff's injury, he was again run into while at work, and the remaining two flags broken. There being no flags at all, and Rabb having full knowledge of this, directed the plaintiff on the morning of the injury to repair a car on the siding. At that time there was one train on the yard, a local freight, in charge of Conductor Partain. This train was on the main line headed for Augusta, then taking water at the tank. Plaintiff before going to work told Conductor Partain what he was about to do. The following is the testimony: "Q. After receiving instructions from Mr. Rabb to repair this car, what did you do next? A. I met the conductor going to the car. Q. How did you happen to meet him? A. I went down the yard to inspect a car after Mr. Rabb sent me to inspect this one, just a minute, and came back. On my way back to get the tools, I met this conductor as he was going to his train to take it to opposite side of main line. I went over and inspected that car, and came straight back to Mr. Rabb to get the tools, and get Mr. Freeman to help me with this car, and on my way back to the shanty I met the conductor at about half-way between the car and the depot, and told him that I had this car to repair and told him what place, and all about the car, showed him the car." Before going to work on this car, there is evidence to show that the plaintiff placed Freeman, a repairer, to watch for other trains. We find the following testimony: "Q. Did you put out the flag? A. We had none to put out. Q. I asked you if you put it out? A. No, sir. Q. When Freeman came out, you went under? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you ask him to do for you? A. I asked him to look out and see if any other trains arrived on the yard. He could give the alarm." Later we find: "Q. In going to work under the car, had you no blue flag to display? A. No, sir. Q. What did you rely on for your protection? A. What I relied on was the conversation I had with the conductor, relying on his not coming back in there. I merely put Mr. Freeman back, you might say, as a second precaution, mostly against other trains that might come in, extras."

[4, 5] Here we have evidence that plaintiff, notwithstanding the rule requiring the use of flags for his protection, had used them on three different occasions, and narrowly escaped death or serious injury previous to his injury. The flags had failed to accomplish the purpose they were intended to serve, and had been destroyed. There was none on hand to use the time he was actually injured, and he took the extra precaution to notify and warn the conductor of the only train there that he was going to inspect the car, and pointed out to the conductor the particular car he intended to inspect, and put out a person to watch for, and warn him against other trains, and went to inspect the car under orders of his superior, who was present and gave the orders to him. It was clearly competent for the jury to determine under all of the evidence and circumstances of the case whether it was the negligence of the defendants which was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, and whether he, by his acts, was in any manner negligent and contributed to the proximate cause of his injury.

[6] It was also for the jury to say, under the testimony as given, whether there was wantonness or a conscious advertent failure on the part of Conductor Partain to observe due care under the particular circumstances of the case. Could the placing of the blue flag have told the conductor more than what the plaintiff had told him? Plaintiff had given him explicit notice of what he intended to do, and in less than 10 minutes after the notice the conductor, without any notice to plaintiff, ran his car into him, and caused the injuries complained of. Plaintiff not only gave notice to the conductor as to what he intended to do, pointing out the car, but was assured by the conductor that he was going to pull out for Augusta, and plaintiff could safely go to work on the car without molestation.

[7] Whether the work to be done was an emergency case was for the jury. There was evidence that it was broken down, and plaintiff was ordered to repair it by his superior, who had the right to give the order. It was his duty to obey. There is testimony that the superior knew the work would be done without the flags, and that plaintiff had made an effort to obtain flags and failed; that he had called for locks to lock switches and failed to get them. "If a master or superior orders an inferior into a situation of danger, the law will not charge him with assumption of risk, unless the danger is so glaring that no prudent man would have entered into it." 14 Eng. Law, 357, cited and approved in New v. Railway Co., 55 S. C. 102, 32 S. E. 832. "Whether the matter of assumption of risk by an employé is to be tested by the law of waiver (Hooper v. Railroad, 21 S. C. 541, 53 Am. Rep. 691), or the law of negligence (Bussey v. Railroad, 52 S. C. 438, 30 S. E. 477), is a question of fact for the jury." Mew v. Railway Co., 55 S. C. 103, 32 S. E. 828. His honor committed no error in refusing the motion made by the defendants for a nonsuit or to direct a verdict, and the exceptions raising these questions are overruled.

As to the second group of exceptions, which allege error in the judge's charge, a careful reading of the exceptions and the judge's charge as a whole will show that he has committed no error. Every question raised by these exceptions was virtually raised and decided in the case of Carson v. Southern Railway Co., 68 S. C. 55, 46 S. E. 525, in the full, elaborated, and able opinion of Chief Justice Pope, and reaffirmed in the cases of Wilson v. Railroad, 73 S. C. 481, 53 S. E. 968; Stephens v. Railroad, 82 S. C. 542, 64 S. E. 601. In the case of Moore v. St. Louis & P. R. R. Company (Mo.) 21 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 509, the pleadings and facts of that case show that it was a case very similar to the case at bar. Dealing with the legal principles involved, the court, at pages 513-514, say: "The defendant's refused instructions asserted the following general propositions, viz.: That, although plaintiff and Kestler were not fellow servants, Kestler was not authorized by the company to make the promise alleged to protect plaintiff while under the car, and that, notwithstanding such a promise, yet plaintiff could not recover if he failed to set out the red flag as required by the rule, or to set some one to watch for the approach of engines and trains. It being conceded, as it must be, that the company owed a duty to the men under the car to provide for their safety, can it be that the foreman had no authority in an emergency to use any other means than those adopted by the company—that the red flag, and nothing but the red flag, was the means he was to employ? If for any reason that would clearly in a given case have been insufficient as a warning, can it be possible that the foreman would be restricted to the use of red flags? or, if in such case he had had the red flag set up, and one of the men was injured in consequence of its insufficiency to give the warning, that the company would not be liable to the injured party? Has it discharged its duty by simply adopting a means of protection ordinarily sufficient when the person in charge of the work knows that in the particular case it is not a sufficient warning? If the foreman has authority in such an emergency, that authority results from his general authority to perform the duty of the company in protecting the employés under his control in the performance of a dangerous work for the company, and he was authorized to make the promise to plaintiff for the company, and undertook to set out the red flag in his possession, or to adopt any other means necessary to secure the safety of the men, thereby absolving them from the duty of setting out the flag or setting the watch. As to the latter, there was no proof of a rule requiring one man to watch while the others worked; and it was in the proof that, while the work in question could possibly have been done by one man, it could not be conveniently or promptly done by less than two. It being the duty of the company to provide for the safety of the men while engaged in its dangerous service, if it delegates such authority as to the employment of men and their control and management to an agent, will the law, in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect, declare that such agent is under no obligation, and has no power, as the representative of the company, to provide means for the safety of servants whom he sends in a place of danger to work? If so, the duty of the company to provide such security may be easily evaded by having no one on hand to perform it. And by simply adopting reasonable rules, the observance of which will ordinarily afford protection, although in a given instance the observance of such regulation would afford no protection whatever, and the person representing the company in the direction of the work and the control of the hands knew the fact, such abdication of duty can certainly find no support either in reason or authority."

[8] As to the contention that the injury was the result of the combined contributory negligence of the plaintiff and the negligence of a fellow servant, Freeman, this court in the former decision in this case said: "If the negligence of Freeman, the fellow servant, was the sole proximate cause, or one of the proximate causes, the negligence of the plaintiff being the other, then the plaintiff could not recover, but if the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the defendants combined with the negligence of Freeman, the fellow servant, the plaintiff would not be precluded from recovery. Elms v. Sou. Power Co., 79 S. C. 502, 60 S. E. 1110; Roberts v. Virginia C. C. Co., 84 S. C. 283, 66 S. E. 298. We think the evidence required that these issues and the issues of contributory negligence growing out of the rule requiring the use of a blue flag should be submitted to the jury." It will be seen that it was decided in this case, reaffirming the rule as laid down in Elms v. Sou. Power Co., 79 S. C. 502, 60 S. E. 1110, and a long line of decisions, that the plaintiff would not be precluded in recovering if the defendants were negligent, because of the negligence of plaintiff's fellow servant, Freeman, if the negligence of the master, the defendants, combined and commingled with the negligence of such fellow servant. In order to escape liability on the ground of negligence of a fellow servant, it must appear that the master was not negligent at all as to any of the proximate causes of plaintiff's injury. It was for the jury to say under the evidence and what weight it would give to it that the act of the conductor in running his train back and striking the cars on the siding under the circumstances was negligence or not on the part of the defendants. There was ample testimony to go to the jury on the question of waiver of the blue flag rule, and we will not further discuss the testimony on this line, being content with what has already been said in reference to why they were not used on this occasion. As to these exceptions in reference to the judge's charge, the exceptions are overruled.

[8] As to exceptions 32, 33, 34, and 35, which are the exceptions of the defendant Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict against it on any view of the facts proved, the evidence conclusively shows that both of the defendants at the time of plaintiff's injury owned and jointly operated the yard at Yemassee, S. C., a station on the line of both defendants' roads, and that plaintiff was employed by both of the defendants to work as car repairer in their yard at Yemassee. There was evidence to show that he was paid by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company; that the flags were furnished by this defendant, through Rabb, the chief car inspector, under whom plaintiff worked. It was not for plaintiff to inquire which road he was working for. It was his duty to obey the reasonable orders given him by his superior in the due course and within the scope of his employment, and he had every reason to assume that his superior would not require him to work for a road that it was not his duty to work for, and it was not expected of him to ascertain whether he was working for one or both roads when he was directed by his superior to work. Under the peculiar facts of the case, it would be difficult for him to determine when he ceased to become the servant of one road and became the servant of the other. As to that, possibly some of the higher officials of the two roads knew what the agreement in reference to this was, but that secret was locked up with them, and may be would not be made known until it was to their interest to divulge it. He took the situation as he found it, and obeyed the orders of his superior. There was some evidence to show that both roads, by some agreement among themselves, jointly used this union yard at Yemassee, and there was sufficient evidence to infer that each furnished their proportionate share of machinery and men necessary to operate the same, and, if plaintiff was entitled to recover, he had the right to recover against one or both, and they can settle among themselves according to their agreement, if they have any. With that plaintiff is not concerned. This view is sustained by the cases of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 66 Tex. 148, 18 S. W. 444; Vary v. Railroad Co., 42 Iowa, 246; Wisconsin Railroad v. Ross, 142 Ill. 9, 31 N. E. 413, 34 Am. St. Rep. 49; 2 Wood on Railroads (Minor's Ed.) 1558. These exceptions are overruled.

[10] As to the exceptions that his honor was in error in submitting to the jury the question of punitive damages: His honor instructed the jury that they were to find, if at all, separately, the actual and punitive damages and they only found actual damages; so it is immaterial now whether he was in error in submitting this question or not and this exception is overruled.

After a careful consideration of all the exceptions, it is the judgment of this court that the exceptions be overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and HYDRICK, J., concur. WOODS and FRASER, JJ., concur in the result.

WOODS, J. I concur in the result. The rules of the railroad company required car repairers, before working under cars, to put blue flags to warn those operating trains not to run on them. The court held on the former appeal: "If the plaintiff proved that he did disregard such a rule, known to him to be in force and so essential to his own safety as well as the safety of other employes and the general public, when he could have complied with it by reasonable effort on his part, and thus prevented the injury, then the nonsuit was proper." The plaintiff could not excuse his disregard of the rule on the ground that he chose to adopt the substitute of telling the conductor of the train that he was going under the car and getting his promise not to run on him. "It concerns the public safety that courts should not sanction the attempts of employes of railroad companies to waive or disregard any of the rules adopted for the protection from injury of the employes themselves, as well as passengers." Stephens v. Southern Ry., 82 S. C. 542, 548, 64 S. E. 601.

Disobedience of rules by a servant which combined with the negligence of the master proximately causes him injury will generally be held by the courts to be contributory negligence as a matter of law. Mills v. Railroad Co., 85 S. C. 463, 67 S. E. 565. This doctrine was distinctly stated in the charge, but with the correct limitation that contributory negligence of the plaintiff would not avail the defendant if the act of those in charge of the moving train, in striking the car under which the plaintiff was working, was wanton and reckless. But I think there was some evidence that the defendant did not have blue flags for plaintiff's use, and that he was, therefore, not negligent in failing to use them. For these reasons, I think there was no error in refusing a nonsuit for contributory negligence, and that there was no error in the charge.

I concur in the conclusion of Mr. Justice WATTS that there was evidence to go to the jury on the issue of the joint liability of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company.

DEMPSEY et ux. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1912.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—SERVICE MESSAGE—PLACE OF DELIVERY.

Where a telegram, sent from Y., contained a notice to "answer to M.," and the agents both at Y. and M. knew the sender lived at M., and that the telegram was not sent from there because, it being Sunday, the office was closed, it was the duty of the telegraph company, on being unable to deliver the telegram, to send its message of nondelivery to the sender at M., and not at Y.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 29, 32; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—SERVICE MESSAGE—DILIGENCE TO DELIVER.

It is as much the duty of a telegraph company to exercise diligence in the delivery of a message announcing nondelivery as to exercise diligence in the delivery of an initial message.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 29, 32; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 74*)—NONDELIVERY OF MESSAGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for damages for nondelivery of a telegram and failure to give notice of nondelivery, the petition alleged that one plaintiff was prevented thereby from being present at the bedside of her dying daughter while she was yet conscious, it was not error to modify defendant's requested instruction that, under certain circumstances, the plaintiffs could not recover damages for failure to deliver the service message by adding thereto the words, "On the allegation that she was deprived of being with her daughter while she was yet conscious," the weight of the evidence being that she was unconscious when the message was sent; the instruction, as modified, being on the issues made by the pleadings, and not confining the jury to accept either view of whether or not she would have arrived while her daughter was yet conscious.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 81*)—PROCEDURE TO PRODUCE—PRELIMINARY MOTIONS.

A motion for a new trial was properly overruled where no motion was made for a nonsuit or to direct a verdict, as required by circuit court rule 77 (73 S. E. vii).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 181; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Colleton County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by Barrie Dempsey and wife against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Feassons, of New York City, Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, of Columbia, and Peurifoy Bros., of Walterboro, for appellant. Padgett, Lemacks & Morser, of Walterboro, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This was an action by the plaintiffs against the defendant for actual and punitive damages for $1,995 for alleged negligent and willful failure to deliver a telegram, and negligent and willful failure to notify the sender of its nondelivery. The telegram was filed with defendant at Youngs Island at 9.25 a. m., Sunday, July 3, 1910, and was as follows: "7-3-10. Mrs. Barney Dempsey, Cordova, S. C., Mrs. Platt is dying. Come at once. Answer to Meggetts. J. P. Gay." Cordova is a small station in Orangeburg county, and the telegraph office is only kept open from 7 to 7:30 a. m. and from 4:30 to 5 p. m. on Sundays. The evidence shows that the message from Youngs Island to Cordova had to be relayed in Charleston, S. C., and Augusta, Ga., and was received at 4:45 p. m. by the agent at Cordova on the day sent. Plaintiffs did not live in the town of Cordova, but some seven or eight miles in the country. Cordova was not their telegraph or post office. Their post office was Cope, a distance of several miles. Mrs. Platt was a daughter of Mrs. Dempsey, and lived near Meggetts. Her husband, in going for a doctor, requested Gay, a relative, to notify plaintiff to come to her daughter. Gay lived a short distance to the telegraph office at Meggetts, and was well known to the telegraph agent there. The office at Meggetts was not open for business on Sundays, and Gay went to Youngs Island, a distance of nearly two miles, to send the telegram. He paid for the telegram and impressed upon the agent the importance of the same. The agent at Cordova, as testified, was related to plaintiff, and knew plaintiff. After receipt of the message at Cordova at 4:50 p. m. and within half an hour, the agent sent a service message to Youngs Island, as follows: "Youngs Island, S. C. Yours to Mrs. Barney Dempsey signed Gay undelivered. Party lives eight miles in the country. Cordova, S. C. July 3rd." Gay, after sending the message from Youngs Island, returned to his home at Meggetts and received no notice at all from Youngs Island or Meggetts of the nondelivery of the telegram. The agent at Youngs Island testified he knew Gay and knew where he lived. Failing either to see or hear from Mrs. Dempsey, the relatives of the sick daughter got into communication with her at her home by long-distance telephone late in the afternoon of Tuesday, July 5th, and in response to this communication Mrs. Dempsey reached her daughter's bedside on July 6th, at about 4:30 p. m. The daughter was unconscious on her arrival and never regained consciousness. The daughter died after plaintiff's arrival, Thursday, July 7th.

The cause was tried before Hon. Thomas S. Sease and a jury at November term of court 1911, and a verdict was rendered by them in favor of plaintiffs for $650 actual damages. Defendant appeals, and alleges error on 10 grounds. At the argument of the case before this court, exceptions 1 and 6 were withdrawn by appellant's counsel. The second, third and fourth exceptions are as follows:

"Because the circuit judge erred in modifying the defendant's third request as follows: 'I also charge you that if the defendant was notified that the service message was to be delivered in another place, and the plaintiff's agent or those acting for her was within that delivery, I charge you that it would be the duty of the telegraph company to take notice of that information if a person of ordinary prudence and care would have taken notice of it, and been guided by it'—the error being that the jury were instructed in effect that the defendant was required to deliver the service message at Meggetts, a different point from the sending place, and contrary to the law and the rules of the company. (1) Because the jury was instructed that they could find that it was the duty of the company to deliver a service message two miles from the place of sending, when the uncontradicted testimony showed that the rules of the company only required the delivery of the service message within half a mile of the sending office. (2) Because the jury were led to believe that the defendant was under obligation to deliver a service message at a point other than the sending station.

"Because the circuit judge erred in modifying the defendant's third request by adding the following: 'On the allegation that she was deprived of being with her daughter while she was yet conscious'—the error being that the jury was led to believe that they could find for the plaintiff on these grounds, whereas the claim for damages as set out in the complaint was based upon her alleged inability to arrive at the bedside of her daughter and minister to her while she was yet conscious, the weight of the testimony having shown that the deceased was unconscious at the time said message was sent, and remained so until the time of her death."

[1] Appellants contend that, although the telegram contained the notice "answer to Meggetts," the telegraph company was not required to notify Gay of the nondelivery of the telegram at Meggetts because the message was sent from Youngs Island, and a service message under the alleged rule of the company was not required to be delivered beyond a half mile of the sending office. We think this view not tenable. The evidence shows that Youngs Island and Meggetts were small places close together and sparsely settled, and the people knew each other; that Gay was well known to both the agent at Youngs Island and Meggetts, and it was well known to both that he lived within 100 yards of the telegraph station at Meggetts. It was well known that the office at Meggetts being closed on Sundays was the reason for sending the message from Youngs Island. Gay put the defendant on notice as to where he was to receive a reply to his telegram. There is no doubt but it was the duty of the defendant to notify Gay of the failure to deliver the telegram at Meggetts, where he had directed them to answer, and not at Youngs Island, where he had sent it from.

[2] It is as much the duty of a telegraph company to exercise diligence in the delivery of a service message as to exercise diligence in the delivery of an initial message. It has been held in numerous cases in this state, if from a lack of knowledge or other causes the company failed to exact in advance the extra charge for delivery outside the free delivery limits, it must upon ascertaining the facts of residence beyond such limits give an opportunity to pay the extra charge. Campbell v. Telegraph Co., 74 S. C. 300, 54 S. E. 571; Lyles v. Telegraph Co., 77 S. C. 174, 57 S. E. 725, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 534; Busbee v. Telegraph Co., 89 S. C. 567, 72 S. E. 499; Martin v. Telegraph Co., 81 S. C. 436, 62 S. E. 833. These exceptions are overruled.

[3] The fifth exception is as follows: "Because the circuit judge erred in modifying the defendant's fifth request by adding the following: 'On the allegation that she was deprived of being with her daughter while she was yet conscious'—the error being that the jury was led to believe that they could find for the plaintiffs on this ground, whereas the claim for damages as set out in the complaint was based upon her alleged inability to arrive at the bedside of her daughter and minister to her while she was yet conscious, the weight of the testimony having shown that the deceased was unconscious at the time the said message was sent and remained so until the time of her death." We see no error in the judge's charge. He submitted the question of fact to the jury on the issues as made by the pleadings, and did not confine them as to whether or not she would have arrived while her daughter was conscious or not. To have done so would have been error. This exception is overruled.

[4] Exceptions 7, 8, 9, and 10 allege error in refusing a motion for a new trial. In addition to the fact that there was ample testimony to sustain the verdict, the appellant made no motion for a nonsuit or to direct a verdict as required by rule 77 (73 S. E. vii), circuit court rules. These exceptions are overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Wayne County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by F. B. Gurr against M. E. Brinson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

F. B. Gurr instituted suit returnable to the November term, 1909, of the superior court, against Brinson, alleging that they became purchasers of certain electric lighting, ice, and turpentine plants, and entered into a contract to operate the same, each to receive from the earnings of the business specified amounts as monthly salary, and all of the net earnings to be turned over to the person from whom the property was bought, until the purchase money should be finally paid, when they should receive deeds to the property. Gurr alleged that the relation thus created between him and Brinson was that of partners, and that they carried on business under such arrangement for some three months, but that Brinson committed certain acts alleged to furnish grounds for dissolution of the partnership. The prayers were for injunction and receiver, dissolution of the partnership, an accounting between the parties, and general relief. The defendant's answer admitted the substantial allegations of the petition, except as to the charges relied on as grounds for dissolution, and set up specially that plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract with L. Carter, with whom they had negotiated for the purchase of the partnership property, to the effect that defendant should receive $60 per month for his services and Gurr $20, and that when the property was paid for then Carter should execute to plaintiff and defendant a deed conveying the property "under said contract; that this defendant worked upon said contract, and continued to work and run said plant and place of business, for and during the term of near three months, at and for the sum of $60, for which this defendant prays the right to recover in said case." This answer was lodged in the clerk's office for filing before the appearance term. On the 16th day of March, 1910, plaintiff's counsel, in vacation, entered an order of dismissal on the petition on file in the clerk's office. At the April term, 1911, the case was called in its order for trial, and counsel for defendant contended that the order of dismissal was ineffective, for the reason that the answer contained "a plea of set-off." Plaintiff's counsel demurred to that portion of the answer relied on as a set-off by the defendant, on the ground that it was "fatally defective and insufficient in law, because there was no allegation in said plea that plaintiff was indebted to the defendant in any sum whatever, nor was there any prayer for any judgment against plaintiff in said plea or answer, and because said plea did not allege any individual indebtedness due by plaintiff to defendant, nor did it allege that any balance had been struck between plaintiff and defendant, who were partners as shown by the pleadings, nor that plaintiff was due defendant anything on account of such balance, and because said plea did not allege that upon an accounting between the partners, and a settlement of the partnership matters, plaintiff was indebted to defendant in any sum whatever"; and upon such grounds the plaintiff moved to strike that portion of the defendant's answer, and also to dismiss the entire case. The judge overruled the motion to strike, and refused to dismiss the case. The plaintiff assigns error on these rulings.

Wilson, Bennett & Lamhdin, of Waycross, for plaintiff in error. Jas. R. Thomas, of Jesup, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). A petitioner may dismiss his petition at any time, either in term or vacation, so that he does not thereby prejudice any right of the defendant. If claims by way of set-off or otherwise have been set up by the answer, the dismissal of the petition shall not interfere with the defendant's right to a hearing and trial on such claims in that proceeding. Civil Code, § 5548. The petition, among other things, sought an accounting between the plaintiff and the defendant as partners. The plea was not as full as might have been in regard to such amount as might be due the defendant on an accounting, and might have been open to special demurrer made in due time; but it did set up in substance that the defendant was entitled to $65 from the partnership. In view of the prayer in the petition for an accounting, this cross-demand contained in the defendant's answer was not so defective as to be a proper subject for dismissal on general demurrer, or on any of the grounds contained in the motion. Accordingly the judge did not err in refusing to strike this part of the answer, or in refusing to dismiss the entire case, on motion of the plaintiff.

DAVIDSON v. BARTOW INV. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—PLEADING—PETITION.

In an action brought for the specific performance of an executory contract for the sale of land, it is essential that the contract be set forth in the petition, either in terms or in substance.

ATLANTA STEEL CO. et al. v. MYNAHAN.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 38*)—AMENDMENT TO CHARTER.

When a proposed amendment to a charter is fundamental, radical, or vital, the unanimous consent of the stockholders to its acceptance is essential. Winter v. Muscogee R. Co., 11 Ga. 438; May v. Memphis Branch R. Co., 43 Ga. 109; Snook v. Georgia Imp. Co., 83 Ga. 61, 9 S. E. 1104; Alexander v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 108 Ga. 151, 33 S. E. 866.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 119, 120, 125-127; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 38*)—CHARTER—FUNDAMENTAL AMENDMENT.

An amendment to a charter of a corporation, increasing its capital stock, whether common or preferred, is fundamental. 10 Cyc. 208; Id. 406 (g); Id. 569 (2).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 119, 120, 125-127; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 38*)—CHARTER—AMENDMENT—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

According to the allegations of the petition, the defendant corporation, the Atlanta Steel Company, pending its application for an increase of its capital stock, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff, one of the terms of which was: "The capital stock of said company shall all be common stock of the same rank and dignity, and all preferences heretofore created shall be withdrawn and revoked, no stock having been issued thereunder, and the capital stock of said company shall be increased to a total of not exceeding $750,000, all being said common stock." It further appears from the petition, and in a copy of the order allowing the amendment to the charter of the defendant corporation, attached as an exhibit to the petition, that the increase of stock was allowed, "provided all of the stockholders of said corporation had assented and do assent to said amendment." The petition further alleged that the plaintiff never assented to an amendment allowing the issuance of preferred stock, and never assented to the issuance of any preferred stock.

(a) According to the briefs filed by counsel for both parties, the real question made by the petition was whether the defendant corporation had the right to issue preferred stock, and, if not, was the plaintiff, under the allegations of the petition, entitled to have the preferred stock in the hands of the holders thereof declared illegal?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 119, 120, 125-127; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

4. GENERAL DEMURRER.

The original petition was not subject to general demurrer.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 38*)—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

Nor was it open to demurrer on the ground that it was multifarious, because the plaintiff stated that he sued for himself and others similarly situated, and relied for relief upon the contract entered into by the plaintiff and the defendant corporation, and also on the plaintiff's right as a stockholder, and because the petition so confusedly intermingled such respective rights as to make it impossible to determine which plaintiff was proceeding under, and that, therefore, he should be put to an election between his remedies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 119, 120, 125-127; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 38*)—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

In view of the allegations of the petition, it was not subject to demurrer on the ground that it failed to disclose that plaintiff as a stockholder had exhausted all means within his reach within the corporation itself, and failed to show that he had made an earnest effort with the managing body of the corporation to obtain relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 119, 120, 125-127; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

7. AMENDMENT TO PETITION.

The amendment to the petition was not demurrable, either on the ground that it added new parties, or that it added a new cause of action.

8. PLEADING (§ 8*)—PETITION—DEMURRER.

Nor was the paragraph of the amendment which alleged that the Trust Company of Georgia held the issue of $150,000 of preferred stock, issued to it in one certificate, as agent of the defendant to the action (except the Atlanta Steel Company), demurrable on the ground that it set forth a mere conclusion of the pleader.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

9. PLEADING (§ 248*)—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—DEMURRER—GROUNDS.

The petition as amended was not subject to the demurrer on the ground that it was a new and distinct application for injunction on grounds which were known, or could have been known, to the plaintiff prior to the institution of the amended application for injunction.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 249, 309*)—RAILROADS (§ 24*)—SERVICE OF PROCESS ON LEASING RAILROADS—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

The provisions for perfecting service on leasing railroads, as set forth in Civil Code, § 2801, do not contravene the state Constitution in respect to due process of law, nor the federal Constitution on the like subject, nor the latter Constitution as to the equal protection of the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 710, 929, 930; Dec. Dig. §§ 249, 309.* Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 52-56; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 22*)—JURISDICTION—TRIAL IN COUNTY OF DEFENDANT'S RESIDENCE.

The court of the county where a cause of action originated against a lessor railroad company, by reason of the tort of an agent of the lessee company, has jurisdiction of the lessor company, though it has no agent or place of business in that county, but its office and principal place of business is in a different county in this state. This ruling is not contrary to the provisions of the state Constitution that all civil cases, except those enumerated, shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by John Bennefield against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John Bennefield brought an action for damages for personal injuries against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company. The defendant company, under charter power, had leased its franchise and railroad property to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, which two companies were operating the railroad of the defendant company in the name of the Georgia Railroad. The injury for which the suit was brought was caused by an alleged tort of the conductor on one of the trains of the lessees upon which the plaintiff was a passenger, and occurred in Fulton county, where the action was instituted. The defendant conceded its liability to suit in the case under the provisions of Civil Code, § 2228, but contended that it had not been legally served, and that it was not subject to suit in Fulton county. These contentions were presented by objection to the method of service duly made, as well as by plea in abatement and plea to the jurisdiction. Service was made upon the defendant in accordance with the provisions of Civil Code, § 2801, providing for service on leasing railroads; that is, the plaintiff filed with the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county, where the action was commenced, a notice in writing, directed to the president of the company, Jacob Phinizy, at Augusta, Richmond county, Ga., informing him fully of the pendency of such suit and of its nature, which was inclosed in a stamped envelope, furnished by and at the expense of the plaintiff, which was sent by the clerk through the mail to the president of such company at his residence at least 15 days before the appearance term, and the clerk in addition delivered to the sheriff of Fulton county a copy of a writ, who served the same on the depot agent of the lessee companies, and return was made thereof as in other cases.

The defendant contended that it had no officer or representative in Fulton county, and that no agent or representative of the defendant company had been served, but that service had been perfected only upon an agent of the lessee companies, and notice merely of the pendency of the suit had been mailed to the president of the defendant company; that such service did not accord to the defendant company due process of law, and was, therefore, contrary to article 1, par. 3, of the Constitution of this state, providing that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law." It was further contended that such service, made in accordance with the Code section before referred to, tended to deprive the defendant company of its property without due process of law, and was therefore contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and was contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, declaring that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The further contention was made that such service denied the defendant the equal protection of the law, as defendant was discriminated against by this method of service, in that all other corporations in the state are required to be served through an agent, officer, or representative, and for this reason that the method of service provided for by such code section is contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it denies to the defendant company the equal protection of the law. The contention of want of jurisdiction of the superior court of Fulton county over the defendant company was based upon the fact that the defendant company had no agent or agency in such county, and did no business therein, but that its place of business was in Richmond county, and that only the courts of the latter county had jurisdiction of the case, and that an attempt to sue the defendant company in Fulton county was contrary to article 2, § 16, par. 6, of the Constitution of this state, to the effect that "all civil cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides," etc.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, of Augusta, and McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Alonzo Field, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. [1] We cannot concede the soundness of any of the contentions of the defendant company. An action for personal injuries against any railroad company must be brought in the county in which the cause of action originated, if such company has an agent in that county, and a judgment rendered in any other county is utterly void. Civil Code, § 2798. "If the company have no agent in the county in which the cause of action originated, the action may nevertheless be brought in that county; the court having power to perfect service upon the defendant." Devereux v. Atlanta R. Co., 111 Ga. 855, 36 S. E. 939; Mitchell v. Southwestern Railroad, 75 Ga. 398; Coakley v. Southern Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 960, 48 S. E. 372. See, also, Bracewell v. Southern R. Co., 184 Ga. 537, 68 S. E. 98, and authorities cited.

[2] If, where an action is brought in the county in which the cause of action originated and where the defendant company has no agent, the court has power to perfect service upon the defendant, it must be true that the Legislature may provide for perfecting service upon the defendant in such a case, as is done in Civil Code, § 2801.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LICENSES (§ 7*)—OCCUPATION TAX—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

The ordinance of the city of Atlanta imposing a tax of a fixed amount upon all of the icehouses, ice manufacturers, or agencies not employing more than five wagons for selling or delivery purposes, and for each additional wagon above the number of five an additional tax of $10, is not invalid upon the ground: (a) That it violates the constitutional provision that "all taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects"; or (b) that it is placing a tax upon a mere incident of a business already taxed; or (c) that it amounts to double taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses. Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. GROUNDS FOR INJUNCTION.

The court below did not err in refusing the injunction as prayed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by T. R. Sawtell and others against the City of Atlanta. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Payne, Little & Jones, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Sawtell and others, who are engaged in the manufacture and sale of ice within the incorporate limits of the city of Atlanta, brought their petition seeking to enjoin the city from issuing tax executions and enforcing the provisions of an ordinance undertaking to impose a license tax upon the icehouses or agencies using and employing more than five wagons for delivery or selling purposes. The ordinance is in the following language: "Icehouses or agencies using or employing not more than five wagons for selling or delivery purposes, no license to issue for less time than to June 30, 1912, fifty dollars; each additional wagon used for selling or delivery purposes, ten dollars. Ice manufacturers or agencies, each plant using or employing not more than five wagons for delivery purposes, no license to issue for less time than to June 30, 1912.

fifty dollars. Each additional wagon used for delivery or selling purposes, ten dollars. Ice wagons, each, selling or delivering ice, ten dollars."

No attack is made on the right of the city to impose the $50 license or occupation tax provided for in the ordinance; but it is insisted that the tax of $10 for each additional wagon in excess of the five wagons is illegal, void, and unenforceable, and that the portion of the ordinance providing for the imposition of this tax of $10 for each wagon in excess of five is violative of paragraph 1, § 2, art. 7, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, which provides that "all taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects"; that the portion of the ordinance attacked as void imposes upon petitioners a double tax; that the attempted classification by said ordinance for the purpose of taxation is arbitrary and unreasonable; and, moreover, that the ordinance is illegal and void, for the reason that the maintenance and use of ice wagons for delivering ice by petitioners is a mere incident or method of conducting their ice business, and, there being no tax upon the business of delivering as a business, no power is conferred upon the city to require a license for the incidents of a business or the methods by which it is carried on. The court below refused the injunction prayed for.

[1] Under the terms of an act of the General Assembly approved August 22, 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 556), entitled "An act amending an act establishing a new charter for the city of Atlanta," etc., the city of Atlanta has authority to "require any person, firm or corporation or company engaged in, prosecuting, or carrying on, or that may engage in, prosecute, or carry on any trade, business, calling, or avocation or profession, to register their names or business calling, avocation, or profession annually, and to require such person, company or association to pay for such registration and for license to engage in, prosecute, or carry on such business, calling or profession aforesaid, such fee, charge, or tax as said mayor and general council may deem expedient for the safety, benefit, convenience, and advantage of said city. Said tax, registration fee, or license herein provided for shall not exceed the sum of three hundred dollars." Section 51. In the exercise of the authority thus conferred the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta passed the ordinance set forth in the statement of facts. The effect of the ordinance complained of, which was passed in the exercise of the authority to classify different businesses and occupations for taxation, was to place icehouses and agencies, and ice manufacturers and agencies, in a class for the purpose of taxation, and to impose upon them under this classification an occupation tax. And the ordinance in its scope contained, not only a provision for the taxation of these occupations after having classified them, but also a scheme for an ascending scale of taxation according to the amount of business done. While the ordinance does not provide for a rate of taxation ascending in exact proportion to the amount of business done, it does in effect fix the tax upon that basis, or one nearly approximating it. As a starting point, it fixes an icehouse or an ice factory, or agency employing not more than five wagons as the unit of taxation, and then, in effect, for each additional wagon employed in addition to the five, imposes an additional tax of $10.

We cannot see why the legislative body of the municipality could not have selected the icehouse or ice factory employing five wagons or less as a unit for taxing this class of business, just as they could have selected an icehouse or ice factory employing only one wagon for delivery purposes as a unit, and begun the ascending scale at that point for imposing an additional tax upon each wagon used. So far as this tax ordinance affects petitioners, it is not a tax upon wagons or vehicles employed in delivering, but is a tax upon the business upon a scale adjusted, in effect, to the amount of business carried on; and, so considered, it is not an unreasonable plan of classification. In the case of Johnston v. Macon, 62 Ga. 645, it was held: "A tax on the business of drayage, scaled according to the number of drays employed, and according to the capacity of the drays, whether one or two horse, is uniform; and whether the drays be employed in general business, or be confined to the business of their owners and their customers in and about transporting goods to and from their stores, the legality of the tax is not affected. The wear and tear upon the streets and bridges is as great in the one as in the other case, and the consequent expense to the city of this business is equal." And in the case of Goodwin v. Savannah, 53 Ga. 410, 415, it was said: "When the state levies a tax on business, professions, etc., it varies the tax from $10 to $200, and has done so every year since the ad valorem or uniformity rule was first in any Constitution. This being the rule, we cannot see the objection to a tax of $50 on a business which employs 10 drays or wagons, and a tax of $25 when 5 are employed. A tax on sales varies according to the amount of sales; and, if the government protects one selling $500,000 worth, ought not that business to pay more than where only $20,000 or $50,000 worth are sold? * * * Such a tax should be apportioned according to the extent of such business, and we do not see in it any conflict with the Constitution. It is in accord with the spirit of an ad valorem and uniform tax." These cases are clearly in point, if we be correct in holding that the municipal authorities in the present case adopted a reasonable plan of classification in taking an icehouse or ice factory or agency employing not more than five wagons or vehicles as the unit of taxation and the point at which to begin the ascending scale of taxation.

[2] So far as relates to the last provision of the ordinance in question, contained entirely in the last line of the ordinance as set forth in the statement of facts, it may be said that it nowhere appears that any attempt is being made to collect taxes against these petitioners under and by virtue of this provision, and that the only charge in the bill of exceptions of a threatened illegal levy of a tax execution is "upon each and every the wagons which petitioners have and use in excess of the five wagons prescribed by the said ordinance and authorized to be used by them upon the payment of the annual tax license." Wherefore we conclude that the court did not err in refusing the injunction as prayed.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. OF AMERICA v. ADAMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—GROUNDS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

It was not cause for a new trial that the court permitted the defendant to testify to the effect that a 10 horse power engine would operate a 70-saw gin, and that the witness knew this from experience, as he had run a 70-saw gin with an engine that was rated at 10 horse power; it appearing that the plaintiff introduced expert testimony that such a gin could be run by an engine of that horse power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

2. ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

The assignments of error upon the admission of other testimony were not meritorious; nor did the court err in the instructions of which complaint is made.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

This case was before this court on a former occasion. 135 Ga. 104, 68 S. E. 1093. Subsequently to the decision then rendered, amendments were allowed to the defendant's pleas, and upon the last trial there was evidence materially different from that on the former trial.

4. REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

There was evidence to authorize the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§§ 280, 320*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED.

A street railway company may be held liable for an injury due to the failure of its motorman to exercise extraordinary care in protecting a passenger from injury; and a jury may be authorized to find that a motorman who left his car, which was operated by electricity, in such condition that the car could be easily started or set in motion by a passer-by, was guilty of culpable negligence as to passengers who were permitted to remain in the car, while awaiting the arrival of a connecting car of the same street car company on which they were to proceed to their destination.

(a) A carrier is required to use such precautions as may be necessary to prevent any danger to his passengers which can be anticipated in the use of extraordinary diligence. In the exercise of extraordinary diligence, the carrier is required to anticipate that children of tender years will not act with the prudence of maturity, and are generally inclined to be inquisitive, meddlesome, and venturesome, and it is required to foresee that a very high degree of diligence may be necessary for the safety of those who may be injured by the thoughtlessness of children.

2. CARRIERS (§§ 247, 280*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED—WHO ARE PASSENGERS.

The carrier is charged with the duty of using that extreme care and caution which every prudent and thoughtful person would use under similar circumstances. A passenger upon a street car, who has not reached his destination, and who, in order to reach his destination, must change from one car of the carrier to another car of the same carrier, and who is permitted to remain in the car while awaiting the arrival of the connecting car, is still a passenger.

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 59*)—CARRIERS (§ 320*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

The question of proximate cause depends upon the facts of each particular case, and in ascertaining in a particular case what was the proximate cause of the injury the conclusion reached depends upon whether the injury alleged was such a natural and probable consequence, under the circumstances of the case, as that it might and ought to have been foreseen by the wrongdoer as likely to ensue from his act.

The jury were authorized to find in this case that the act of the child was not a proximate cause, but that the motorman, in leaving his car in such condition that a child could set it in motion, was the prime and underlying essential and efficient cause of the injury; for "if the character of the intervening act claimed to break the connection between original wrongful act and the subsequent injury was such that its probable and natural consequences could reasonably have been anticipated, apprehended, or foreseen by the original wrongdoer, the causal connection is not broken, and the original wrongdoer is responsible for all of the consequences resulting from the intervening act." Southern Railway Co. v. Webb, 118 Ga. 152, 42 S. E. 895, 59 L. R. A. 109.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. § 59; * Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1118, 1128, 1149, 1153, 1160, 1167, 1179, 1190, 1217, 1233, 1244, 1248, 1315-1325; Dec. Dig. § 820.*]

4. DEMURRERS OVERRULED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL REFUSED.

The court did not err in overruling the defendant's demurrers, nor in refusing to award a nonsuit or direct a verdict. The evidence authorized the jury's finding, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1214*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—EFFECT IN LOWER COURT OF DECISION ON APPEAL.

Where a case has been before this court on an assignment of error as to a judgment overruling a motion for a new trial, filed by a plaintiff, to set aside a verdict rendered for the defendant, and this judgment has been reversed, because, in the opinion of this court, the verdict was contrary to law, for the reason that it was without evidence to support it, and on a second trial the evidence is substantially the same as on the first trial, and no questions of law are raised, other than those passed upon at the first trial, it was not error for the trial judge to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Jefferson; W. W. Stark, Judge.

Action by R. L. Moss & Co. against L. F. Sell. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. A. B. Mahaffey, of Jefferson, Shackelford & Shackelford, and Jno. J. & Roy M. Strickland, all of Athens, and Little & Powell, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. T. S. Mell, of Athens, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. This is the second appearance of this case before this court. On the first trial the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and on review by this court the verdict was set aside and a new trial granted on the general grounds. On the second trial the presiding judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The material facts of the case are set out in the opinion heretofore rendered. Moss v. Sell, 8 Ga. App. 589, 70 S. E. 18. Where there was no substantial difference in the evidence on the first trial and that on the second, in order to illustrate the questions now raised it is necessary to make a brief statement of the facts.

Moss & Co., at Athens, Ga., bought from L. F. Sell, at Mulberry, Ga., 50 bales of cotton. Sell delivered the cotton to the Gainesville Midland Railroad Company and took therefrom a bill of lading. He indorsed this bill of lading, attached to it a draft for the price of the cotton as agreed on, and deposited the draft, with the bill of lading attached, in the Bank of Hoschton on the morning of October 27, 1906, and the bank credited Sell with the amount of the draft. On the same day and while the cotton was still on the platform of the railroad crossing at Sell's side track, 40 bales were consumed by fire. On the 29th of October Sell called Moss & Co. over long-distance telephone and informed them of the burning of the cotton, and, according to Moss, stated that he would replace the cotton burned with new cotton and forward a new bill of lading. In compliance with this request Moss & Co., on the same day the request was made, paid the draft by giving a check for the amount on the Georgia National Bank, which check was paid on the next day, the 30th. On the previous trial the evidence was in some conflict as to whether Moss & Co. paid this draft on the 27th or the 29th of October. On the present trial the evidence indisputably showed that the draft was not paid by Moss & Co. until the 29th, and subsequently, to the time when he received the telephone message from Sell. Subsequently Sell refused to replace the cotton according to his promise, and also refused to repay the money which Moss & Co. had paid on his draft.

The defense which Sell set up on both trials was: (1) That the title to the cotton at the time of the fire was in Moss & Co., as Moss & Co. had paid the draft before the fire occurred; (2) that Moss & Co.'s remedy was by suit against the railroad company, a common carrier; and (3) that Moss & Co. carried insurance which covered the cotton. On the first trial this court held that the title to the cotton at the time of the fire was in Sell, because the evidence showed that Sell had taken from the carrier a bill of lading covering the cotton, to his own order, and attached it to the draft which he drew on Moss & Co., transmitting the draft and the bill of lading to the bank for collection, this being a declaration on the seller's part that he did not part with the title to the cotton, but retained it until acceptance and payment of the draft; this court so holding in accordance with the well-settled doctrine announced in Erwin v. Harris, 87 Ga. 333, 13 S. E. 513, and citations. And we further held that under section 4126 of the Civil Code of 1910, relating to the title to agricultural products, the cotton remained the property of Sell until paid for.

The principal reason now assigned for another trial is that the brief of evidence in the former trial was "either deficient or erroneous," and misled the court, and that the decision of the Court was based upon a material mistake of fact; that this mistake was that the record stated that the bill of lading which Sell had taken for the cotton was to his (Sell's) own order, when, instead of this being the fact, the bill of lading itself showed that it was not to his own order, but was made directly to R. L. Moss & Co., as consignee. It is contended that, this being true, it follows that when the cotton was burned the title was out of Sell and in Moss & Co., and the loss should fall on them, and not on the plaintiff. The bill of lading is as follows: "Gainesville Midland Railway Co. No. 85. Bill of Lading. Mulberry Station, October 27th, 1906. Received of L. F. Sell fifty bales of cotton, marked, numbered, and weighed as below, consigned to R. L. Moss & Co., Athens, Georgia." It will thus be seen that the letter of the bill of lading makes R. L. Moss & Co. the consignees absolutely, without any mention of order or assigns. Sell treated the bill of lading as made to his own order, for he took it to the bank, indorsed it and attached to it a draft for the price of the cotton, and had the amount of the draft placed to his credit in the Bank of Hoschton. There could not have been any other purpose in doing this than to retain the title to the cotton until payment of the draft. There was no other reason why he should have indorsed the bill of lading. This is also manifest by his subsequent conduct; for, when the cotton was consumed, he called Moss & Co. over the telephone and requested them to pay the draft, although the cotton had been burned. This conduct on the part of Sell is a clear recognition, not only of his purpose when he took the bill of lading to retain the title to the cotton until payment of the draft, but a recognition by him that the title was in him at the time of the fire. But for his promise made to Moss & Co. to replace the cotton which had been consumed, it is certainly clear that Moss & Co. would not have paid the draft. He induced the payment of his draft by his promise to replace the cotton.

We think that all these facts clearly show that Sell's intention in shipping the cotton to Moss & Co. was to retain title thereto until payment of his draft. While the general rule is well settled that a delivery of property to a carrier is a delivery to the purchaser, yet it is equally clear that any contemporaneous declaration on the part of the seller of an intention to retain title to the property until it is paid for constitutes an exception to this general rule. We conclude, therefore, that under all these facts, clearly indicating an intention on the part of Sell to retain the title to the cotton until payment of his draft, there is no substantial difference between the facts proved on the second trial and the brief of evidence in the record when the case was first here for review, which stated that the bill of lading was payable to the order of Sell. If this is not true, we think section 4136 of the Code, supra, is applicable to the facts of this case, and that under that statute the title to the cotton remained in Sell until payment for the cotton by Moss & Co.; and the draft was not paid until the 29th of October, and the cotton was consumed on the 27th. Butler, Stevens & Co. v. Georgia & Alabama Ry., 119 Ga. 959, 47 S. E. 320.

We do not think it necessary to consider any of the other questions raised by this record. The same questions were made in the previous record, and the entire evidence was in substantial accord on both trials, and as this court held on the first trial that the verdict then rendered for the defendant was without any evidence to support it, and was contrary to law, there was nothing for the trial judge to do in the present instance but to direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

DAVIS v. SAVANNAH LUMBER CO.

SAVANNAH LUMBER CO. v. DAVIS.

(Nos. 3,852, 3,853.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

I. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—RELATION OF PARTIES—VOLUNTEER.

The court erred in ordering a nonsuit. Though the evidence justifies the conclusion that the plaintiff intended to volunteer his services for the purpose of throwing off a belt and stopping the saw, which burst and injured him, still it is uncontradicted that his attempt to intervene was futile, and that the bursting of the saw was not due to, nor in any wise affected by, his act. It burst without his interfering with it in any way, and before he had time to reach the lever with which he intended to throw off the belt. To constitute one a volunteer he must do some act, and not merely intend to do something, which may contribute to his injury. Under the evidence, the presence of the plaintiff near the saw in question was authorized. He was entitled to pursue his labor in the planing mill and at the saw, and the question as to whether his going to the particular point where he was injured, at the particular time of the injury, was such contributory negligence as would diminish or defeat a recovery, was for solution by the jury, and not the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 73*)—RELATION OF PARTIES—VOLUNTEER.

Even if the plaintiff could be treated as a volunteer, the evidence in his behalf tended to show a contract by the terms of which the opposite party to the contract was bound to furnish him with the saw and keep it in good order; but the plaintiff, upon his part, was to operate it in the conduct of his own business. He, therefore, had an interest in the preservation of the saw for the promotion and continuance of his business, which authorized him to attempt to save it from injury, when he saw that the engine was "racing," by reason of the fact that the load of other machinery had been taken off, and that in consequence thereof the saw was running at such an excessive rate of speed that it might be detached or broken. One assisting the servants of another to facilitate his own business, or that of one to whom he sustains a contractual business relation, mutually beneficial, is not a volunteer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

3. FORMER CASE DISTINGUISHED.

The facts of the present case distinguish it from the case of Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810, in that in the Hixson Case it was clear that the act of Miss Allen was the proximate cause of her injury. In the present case the only real act done by the plaintiff was in moving his position from one portion of the planing mill to another, and only the jury can say whether or not the plaintiff's act in moving his position caused the injury.

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 53*)—CORPORATIONS (§ 379*)—ACTIONS—NONSUIT.

The court did not err in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground that the evidence showed that a partnership existed between the parties. While liability for losses will generally be implied from proof that the contract stipulates for a division of the profits, and a sharing of the profits may imply a partnership, still the existence of a partnership is not to be implied, where it appears indisputably from the proof that there was not a common liability for losses. Under a contract of the nature testified to by the plaintiff, there is no connection or mutuality in any possible loss which might be sustained by either party. Apparently the defendant could not lose at all as a result of the contract, because it was the plaintiff's duty to pay over to it so much for each load of wood which he sold. But, even if the defendant could not be subject to a loss in the business relation created by the contract, it could not in any event participate in any loss which might be sustained by the plaintiff; for he furnished his own teams and drivers and paid them himself, he furnished his own labor in sawing the wood, and if the expense of cutting and delivering the wood and feeding his teams amounted to more than his proceeds, the loss which would result was, under the terms of the contract, the plaintiff's individual concern.

(a) Moreover, the defendant, being a corporation, could not enter into a partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 53; Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1538; Dec. Dig. § 379.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The court did not err in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground that the evidence failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff. Under the terms of the contract relied upon, and under the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to have the court submit to the jury the question of the defendant's negligence. Under the testimony, his presence at the scene of the injury at the time it was inflicted was authorized as that of a licensee, and the bursting of the wheel was an extraordinary circumstance. The saw was in the possession of the defendant, and under the testimony it was its duty, under the contract, to exercise reasonable and ordinary diligence to keep it in good condition, so that it would not injure any one. For these reasons it was for the jury to say whether the circumstances themselves speak of negligence, and whether the evidential rule of res ipsa loquitur should be applied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

6. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The court did not err in refusing to nonsuit upon the ground that the plaintiff had equal or better opportunity than the defendant to know of the alleged defects. Under the terms of the particular contract relied upon by the plaintiff, he was not the defendant's servant, and was not charged with the same duty of knowing and observing defects in the machinery furnished for his use as a servant should be, and could be assumed to be, who undertook the duty of using the machinery. Under the terms of the contract, as proved by the plaintiff, no other duty devolved upon him than to exercise ordinary care for his own safety in using the saw; and the defendant was charged with the duty of using ordinary care and diligence in furnishing and keeping the saw in a sound, safe, and fit condition.

C. H. Williams was convicted of assault and battery, and brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff in error was convicted of assault and battery. His motion for a new trial, based upon the general grounds and others, was overruled, and he excepted. The evidence for the state was in substance as follows: The accused, a carpenter, was working on a fence in front of a dwelling house, between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when the mother of three small children living there left the house to find her husband. In a few minutes she and her husband returned together, and found the accused in one of the rooms of the house. The husband asked him what he was doing there, and he replied that he had come for a drink of water, and was tired, and was sitting down to rest. There was no water in the room; but the water was on the back veranda, on the shelf. Immediately after the mother had come into the house, one of the children—a girl five years old—ran to her from the room in which the accused was found. The mother testified: "My little girl came running to me. Her eyes were all bleared, and she was trembling and white. The child said: 'Mamma, are you going to whip me? I couldn't help it; it was him.' I said: 'Who?' I said: 'What?' And she up and told the circumstances." The child said that the accused took her hands, and made her place them upon his private parts, which he had exposed, and that, on hearing the parents coming, he shoved her out of the door.

W. A. Covington and Jas. Humphreys, both of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Wilkes, Sol. Gen., of Moultrie, for the State.

POTTLE, J. The court thinks that the evidence was insufficient to authorize the verdict. One cannot be convicted of crime upon mere hearsay testimony as to the sayings of a child, incompetent as a witness, because too young to appreciate the nature and sanctity of an oath. "Declarations are not competent as part of the res gestæ, unless there is a principal fact established by other evidence." 11 Encyc. Evidence, 291 (15). In the present case there was not a scintilla of evidence to corroborate the statement of the child as to the conduct of the accused. After the occurrence, she told her mother of it, and upon the testimony of the mother as to this hearsay statement of a child five years of age the accused was convicted. Human liberty is too sacred a thing to be taken away upon evidence so slight and inconclusive as this. We do not mean to say that, if there had been other evidence of the main occurrence, the spontaneous statement of this child might not have been admissible as a part of the res gestæ; but we are of the opinion that, without any corroborating circumstances whatever, the accused cannot be convicted upon proof merely of the declarations of the child. There is certainly nothing in the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of McMath v. State, 55 Ga. 304, nor in any other decision of that court, to demand a contrary conclusion. In the first place, what was said by the court in that case was obiter. But, beyond this, the charge in that case was assault with intent to rape, and there was conclusive evidence, apart from the declarations of the child, that the assault had been committed; and, this being true, spontaneous statements made by her immediately after the occurrence were admissible as a part of the res gestæ—that is to say, as a part of the main transaction. But the main occurrence itself cannot be proved by evidence of the mere declarations of the person who claimed to have been assaulted, in the absence of other evidence that an assault had been committed. A contrary doctrine would, in our opinion, be an extremely dangerous one.

Judgment reversed.

SIKES v. MALLONEE (No. 3,627.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 4, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§§ 129, 131*)—CONTRACT OF GUARANTY—MODIFICATION—OPERATION AND EFFECT OF STATUTE.

Lee leased in writing from Sikes certain timber lands upon certain terms and conditions. Mallonee guaranteed payment of the purchase money as set out in Lee's contract. Subsequently the terms and conditions of the contract were materially modified. As Mallonee's contract of guaranty had to be in writing (Civ. Code 1910, § 3222, par. 2), so likewise, under the general rule, any proposed modification thereof, to be effective, must also have been in writing (Southern Ry. Co. v. Smith, 106 Ga. 864, 33 S. E. 28; Miller v. Smith, 6 Ga. App. 443, 65 S. E. 292). And a contract of guaranty is no less subject to the operation of the provisions of section 3223, Civ. Code, than are other contracts therein referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 287-292; Dec. Dig. §§ 129, 131.*]

2. GUARANTY (§ 72*)—DISCHARGE OF GUARANTOR—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

Consent of a guarantor to a material modification of the contract, the performance of which he guarantees, cannot be inferred from the mere fact that he had knowledge of the modification, or that he did not dissent from such modification. Riggins v. Brown, 12 Ga. 276.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 82; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 131*)—DISCHARGE OF GUARANTOR — MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

Inasmuch as the rights and liabilities of a guarantor are stricti juris, and in this case the modification of the original contract was demanded by the obligee, and the change of the contract was for his profit and benefit, and there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that failure to perform either the original contract or the contract as changed would constitute a fraud on the part of the guarantor, unless the contract was fully performed, this case does not fall within the exception mentioned in the first headnote, and there was no error in directing the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 363*) — TRANSFER — BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

A note payable to a certain person, or order, when indorsed in writing by the payee, becomes a negotiable instrument; and a subsequent innocent purchaser before maturity and for value is protected in his title.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 362*)—TRANSFER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

A purchaser of a negotiable note, although with notice of an equity as between the maker and the original payee, is protected in his title if he purchases the note from one who had previously purchased it from the original payee without notice of any infirmity in the note.

3. BANKRUPTCY (§ 265*) — ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE—SALE OF NEGOTIABLE NOTE.

Where a negotiable promissory note is sold by a trustee in bankruptcy of the payee before the note has matured, and after it has been duly indorsed by the original payee, the sale being made under an order of the bankruptcy court, it is not necessary, in order to pass title to the purchaser at such sale, for the trustee to indorse the note. Mere delivery by the trustee to the purchaser would be sufficient to pass title.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by I. J. Elliott and others against Hardman Wade. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. D. Smith, of Tifton, for plaintiff in error. R. E. Dinsmore, of Tifton, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on a promissory note against the maker. The plaintiffs alleged, in substance, that the note was negotiable, and that they were innocent holders for value, having purchased it before maturity; that it was originally given by the defendant, payable to the Farmers' Supply Company, or order, and, before it became due, the Farmers' Supply Company was adjudicated bankrupt, and the note was sold at public sale, after due advertisement and under order of the court, and was bought by Benton, McCommons & Co., who were the highest and best bidders at the sale, and who took the note as innocent purchasers for value and before maturity, and thereafter sold and transferred it for value, to the plaintiffs, duly indorsing it. The note was indorsed by the original payee, the Farmers' Supply Company. The plea admitted the execution of the note, its indorsement by the Farmers' Supply Company, and the sale of the note by the trustee in bankruptcy of that company, under an order of the court, before the note matured, and that it was bought by Benton, McCommons & Co. and duly indorsed by them to the plaintiffs. It was denied, however, that either Benton, McCommons & Co. or the plaintiffs were innocent purchasers; it being insisted that the note was not indorsed by the trustee in bankruptcy, and that without said indorsement it did not become a negotiable instrument. On demurrer the court struck the plea as insufficient, and this is the error assigned.

[1] We think the court did not err in striking the plea. The principle is well established that a note payable to a certain person, or order, becomes negotiable only where it has been regularly indorsed in such a way that the indorsement becomes a part of the paper; and, unless it is a negotiable paper, subsequent holders thereof are not protected from any equity that may exist between the maker and the original payee. Sheffield v. Johnson County Bank, 2 Ga. App. 221, 58 S. E. 386, and citations. Here it is admitted that the note was duly indorsed by the original payee, the Farmers' Supply Company. When it was indorsed, it at once took its place in the hands of any subsequent holder, clothed with the qualities and incidents of negotiable paper, and the indorsees, Benton, McCommons & Co., subsequently indorsed it to the plaintiffs.

[2] It is specifically alleged by the amendment to the plea that the plaintiffs were not innocent purchasers, but took the note with knowledge of the equities of the maker as against the original payee. If, however, Benton, McCommons & Co. were innocent purchasers before maturity and for value, it would be wholly immaterial whether the plaintiffs were such or not; for it is well settled that if one without notice sells to one with notice the latter is protected. In other words, the purchaser with notice gets a good title from the purchaser without notice. Civil Code 1910, § 4535; Well v. Carswell, 119 Ga. 873 (1) 47 S. E. 217. The indorsement by the payee and the subsequent indorsement by Benton, McCommons & Co. are without date; but this is immaterial, because the law presumes that the holder of negotiable paper bought the same before due and for value. Civil Code 1910, § 4288; Rhodes v. Beall, 73 Ga. 641.

[3] The main point relied upon by the defendant is that there was no indorsement by the trustee in bankruptcy, and that this was necessary in order to pass title. We do not think it was necessary for the trustee in bankruptcy to indorse the note. Its negotiable character had already been determined by the indorsement of the original payee. But it is admitted in the answer that the trustee in bankruptcy sold it under order of the court and before maturity. The trustee in bankruptcy acquired no title to the note, except as the representative of the bankrupt; and, as the note was negotiable when it came into his possession as trustee, the sale by him under order of the court of the note, and delivery to the purchaser, were all that was necessary to pass the title.

Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CHattel MORTGAGES (§ 282*) — FORECLOSURE — EVIDENCE — APPLICATION OF PAYMENT.

This was a foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, to which there was a counter affidavit setting up payment. Besides the indebtedness secured by the mortgage, the mortgagor was indebted to the plaintiff on open account. It was admitted that the mortgagor had made payments on his indebtedness to the plaintiff, and the issue, under the evidence, was as to the proper application of these payments. The plaintiff applied them in payment of the account, relying upon an alleged contract with the defendant authorizing him to do so. The defendant denied the contract, and insisted that the payments should have been credited on the mortgage, and that, if this had been done, the mortgage would have been fully paid. It was not contended by the defendant that he had given to the plaintiff any express instructions as to the applications of the payments. On the controlling issue thus made the evidence was in direct and positive conflict, and the trial judge instructed the jury to the effect that if there was no agreement between the parties as to how the payments were to be applied, and if the jury should find that there had been payments sufficient to liquidate the mortgage, this would be a settlement of the mortgage, and that without such agreement the plaintiff would not have had the right to make an application of the payments to the open account. Held, the defendant could not complain of this instruction, and as no error of law was committed, and the evidence was in conflict on the controlling issue of fact, there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by A. D. Graham against E. A. Fulton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Osborne & Lawrence, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. Anderson, Cann & Cann, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This was an action of trover to recover three head of cattle, or statutory damages in lieu thereof. The plaintiff prevailed, and the defendant filed both a motion to set aside the judgment and a motion for a new trial. Both motions were overruled, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The motion to set aside the judgment was predicated upon the ground that the court was without jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, who did not reside in the county where the suit was brought, and did not waive jurisdiction, or appear and plead, either in person or by an authorized attorney. A sufficient reply to the motion in arrest is that it was filed more than three years after the rendition of the judgment. Civil Code 1910, § 4358.

[2] 2. Upon the merits the defendant showed that the plaintiff had pastured some cows with the owners of a pasture, and had failed to pay the compensation agreed on for pasturage; that the owners of the pasture had foreclosed a lien for their fees, and the lien execution had been levied upon the cattle in dispute. It further appeared that an execution had been issued upon a common-law judgment against the plaintiff as principal and the defendant as surety; that the defendant had paid off this execution and had it transferred to him; and that the property in dispute had been likewise levied on under this execution and brought to a sale, at which defendant became the purchaser. The lien execution is not in the record, nor properly accounted for, so that the defendant did not make sufficient proof of title under the lien foreclosure proceedings, though it would seem that under our Code an agister would be entitled to a lien as a bailee for services rendered in pasturing cattle. Civil Code 1910, § 3491. Wilensky v. Martin, 4 Ga. App. 187, 60 S. E. 1074; 2 Cyc. 315 et seq. But, without reference to this, the execution transferred to the defendant as surety was apparently regular and valid, and passed title into the levying officer, even if the subsequent proceedings were irregular. Though the execution emanated from a justice's court, it was not necessary to show on its face all the proceedings essential to give the court jurisdiction. Hamilton v. Moreland, 15 Ga. 343. This execution showing title outstanding in the levying officer, the prima facie case made by the plaintiff was rebutted, and the evidence demanded a verdict for the defendant. Consequently his motion for a new trial should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 690*)—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

A ground of a motion for a new trial, assigning error in permitting a witness to answer a certain question, which does not disclose the answer objected to, presents no question for determination. Southern Ry. Co. v. Wright, 6 Ga. App. 175, 64 S. E. 703; Smith v. State, 119 Ga. 113 (1), 46 S. E. 79.

2. DAMAGES (§ 158*)—EVIDENCE—AGGRAVATION—PREVIOUS INJURY.

The trial court did not err in permitting the plaintiff to testify as to the fact and the extent of a previous injury; the instant suit involving the claim that the previous injury had been aggravated by the tort for which redress was sought. "Wrongfully to cause, aggravate, or protract illness is an injury to health." Bray v. Latham, 81 Ga. 640, 8 S. E. 64.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 690*)—REVIEW—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

A ground of a motion for a new trial, assigning error in permitting the introduction in evidence of a deed, which fails to set forth the deed objected to, or otherwise describe it, so that its admissibility can be determined, will not be considered. Georgia Northern Ry. 4. DAMAGES (§ 167)—EVIDENCE—PROBABLE DURATION OF LIFE.

It is not necessary that the mortality table be introduced in evidence, in order to enable the jury to ascertain the probable duration of life, or the damages for permanent injuries, in a given case. The jury may reach a result from the evidence as to age, health, extent of injury, physical condition, habits, etc., of the particular person. *Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Co. v. (Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 10*)—CIVIL ACTION—WHEN MAINTAINABLE.

An action for the malicious use of process in a civil suit will lie, where the person of the defendant is arrested or his property attached. Woodley v. Coker, 119 Ga. 226, 46 S. E. 89. The petition in the present case set forth a cause of action of the nature above indicated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-15; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 31*)—MALICE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence of a general disregard of the right consideration of mankind, directed by chance against the individual injured, is sufficient proof of malice. Civil Code 1910, § 4451.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 64-66; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

8. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 32*)—MALICE.
Malice may be inferred from a total want of probable cause. Civil Code 1910, § 4444; Hicks v. Brantley, 102 Ga. 264, 29 S. E. 450; Lockett v. Gress Mfg. Co., 8 Ga. App. 773, 70 S. E. 255.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 67, 68; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

4. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 25*)—WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

When the circumstances show that no reasonable grounds existed for suing out the process, want of probable cause is established. The fact that the process was sued out on advice of counsel is only one of the circumstances to be considered by the jury in passing upon the question of malice and want of probable cause. Hicks v. Brantley, supra.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 56-58; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

5. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 58*)—EVIDENCE.

The action being one for the malicious use of a possessory warrant, sued out for the ostensible purpose of recovering a diamond ring, it was not error to reject evidence that the defendant was in possession of other articles of jewelry given her by the person to whom the plaintiff had loaned the ring.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 117-124; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

6. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 59*)—EVIDENCE—PROBABLE CAUSE.

Evidence was not admissible that, before the suing out of the warrant, the plaintiff therein had stated to the witness his belief that the defendant was in possession of the ring described in the warrant. Mere belief, without evidence upon which to found it, would not show probable cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 125-137; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

7. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 59*)—EVIDENCE.

It was competent to show that the plaintiff had never been in possession of the ring described in the warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 125-137; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

8. WITNESSES (§ 379*)—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

The guardian of the defendant (who was a minor when the warrant was issued) having testified that he investigated the transaction with the defendant, and reached the conclusion, and was still of the opinion, that probable cause for the issuance of the warrant existed, it was not erroneous to admit evidence of a statement, made by the guardian after the trial of the possessory warrant case, that if he had known the facts he would not have permitted his ward to sue out the warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1209, 1220-1222, 1247-1256; Dec. Dig. § 379.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 688*)—REVIEW—INSUFFICIENT RECORD.

There was no abuse of discretion in refusing to reopen the case for the purpose of allowing the defendant to testify in his own behalf, and especially will the court's discretion as to this matter not be controlled, when the record fails to show what facts the defendant would have testified to, had the case been reopened.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2894-2896; Dec. Dig. § 688.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION ON THE EVIDENCE.

The trial judge having correctly left to the jury the determination of the question of the existence of probable cause for the suing out of the process, it was not error to refuse to charge that, if the defendant had certain information which he contended had been given to him prior to the suing out of process, the jury should find that probable cause existed. Such an instruction would have been an expression of opinion upon the evidence, and in effect the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the evidence was not of such a character as to justify such a direction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 436-438; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

11. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The fact that the trial judge, in his charge, characterized the possessory warrant proceeding as a "criminal prosecution," was not sufficient cause for a new trial. The proceeding was of a quasi criminal nature, and under it the person of the defendant was arrested; but, treating it as a civil process, the instruction complained of was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

12. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 72*)—DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

It was not error to charge: "The recovery should not be confined to the actual damages sustained by the accused, but should be regulated by the circumstances of each case." Civil Code 1910, § 4443.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 163-173; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

13. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 72*)—"PROBABLE CAUSE."

The following instruction was not erroneous for any reason assigned: "Probable cause" is defined to be the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief in a reasonable mind, acting on the facts within the knowledge of the prosecutor, that the person charged was guilty of the crime for which she was prosecuted."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Prosecution, Cent. Dig. §§ 163-172; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

14. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

A clause of a will bequeathed two separate parcels of land to the daughter of the testator, and, on her death, to her heirs and to her issue if living in fee simple, otherwise, "all the real estate loaned her to be divided between" certain persons. There was no punctuation or anything to indicate that the testator intended to differentiate the two parcels of property in reference to the quantity of the estate. Held, that as "lend" may be construed as synonymous with give, devise, or bequeath, unless it is manifest that a different meaning was intended, the testator must be held to have referred to all the property devised his daughter in the residuary clause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Ejectment by Raymond Morrisey and others by their guardian J. A. Faison and another against B. C. Moore. From a judgment for plaintiffs defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rountree & Carr, of Wilmington, for appellant. Faison & Wright, of Clinton, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] The rights of these parties were properly made to depend on the construction of the will of D. G. Morrisey, deceased, more especially the fourth clause thereof, in terms as follows: "4. I give to my adopted baby Maggie L. Bass all my real estate on the south side of College street through to Bay street also all the land known as the Summerland land on the west side of the public road running out by Carlton's during her natural life and if she marries and leaves heirs from such marriage to such heirs in fee simple also one hundred dollars in money if she dies and leaves no heirs from such marriage all the real estate loaned her to be divided between Junius Chestnut son of my nephew Junius M. Chestnut and D. G. Morrisey Jr son of my nephew John M. Morrisey."

The Maggie L. Bass referred to went into possession of the land under said will, and intermarried with defendant B. C. Moore, and died on the 31st of March, 1911, without leaving child or children or lineal descendants of a marriage then living. There had been issue of the marriage born alive during coverture. Plaintiffs are the Junius Chestnut and the three children and heirs at law of the D. G. Morrisey, deceased, the ultimate devisees in said fourth item of the will, and make their claim as such, contending that Maggie L. Bass took a life estate in all the property mentioned with remainder to said claimants. Defendant B. C. Moore contends that said Maggie L. Bass took the first portion of the land in fee, and that he is entitled to hold said portion as tenant by curtesy. Upon these, the controlling facts relevant to the inquiry, we think his honor correctly ruled that plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to the present possession of the property. Under our decisions, the will conferred upon Maggie L. Bass a life estate remainder to her children, and, in case she died without children or issue of her marriage then living, all the real estate loaned to her to be divided between Junius Chestnut and D. G. Morrisey, deceased, the father of the other plaintiffs. Smith v. Lumbar Co., 155 N. C. 389, 71 S. E. 445; Sain v. Baker, 128 N. C. 256, 38 S. E. 858; Rollins v. Keel, 115 N. C. 68, 20 S. E. 209.

[2] Under the clause in question the property is treated as a whole. There is no punctuation, and nothing that gives indication that the testator intended to differentiate the one portion from the other in reference to the quantity of the estate. "The word 'lend' is not infrequently used as synonymous with give or bequeath or devise;" and this should be the interpretation, unless it is manifest that a different meaning was intended. Sessoms v. Sessoms, 144 N. C. 121, 56 S. E. 687. And, when the testator devised that in case Maggie L. Bass died leaving no heirs from her marriage "all the real estate loaned her should be divided," he clearly referred to the entire property included in the clause. On the question presented the case is not dissimilar to that of Hyman v. Williams, 34 N. C. 92, 93, and on authority as stated the judgment in plaintiffs' favor must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

YALE JEWELRY CO. v. JOYNER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

GAMING (§ 30*)—GAMING CONTRACTS—INVALIDITY.

A plaintiff shipping to defendant a lottery device to facilitate the sale of goods, and goods on consignment under a contract by which title to all the property shall remain in plaintiff, and by which defendant agrees to sell the goods for a commission and remit the proceeds of sales less the commission, may recover not only unsold goods, but also proceeds of sales in the hands of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Carter, Judge.

Action by the Yale Jewelry Company against J. A. Joyner. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. V. Cowper, of Kinston, for appellant.
G. G. Moore, of Kinston, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff shipped to the defendant a "pull board," together with a quantity of jewelry, razors, etc., on consignment under a contract by which the title to all the property remained in the plaintiff. The defendant agreed to sell the same for 20 per cent. commission, the proceeds of sale to be kept separate from the defendant's other funds, and remitted to the plaintiff, less the commission. The plaintiff brings this action to recover the unsold merchandise and $50 net proceeds of the sale. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff for the merchandise, and held that the pull board was a species of lottery or gambling device, to facilitate the sale of the goods, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover the net proceeds of sales in defendant's hands. The plaintiff excepted to the latter ruling.

It is unnecessary more particularly to describe the pull board, or to discuss the question as to whether its operation constitutes a lottery or gambling scheme within the definition given in State v. Perry, 154 N. C. 621, 70 S. E. 387. We assume for the sake of argument that it does. This is not an action by the plaintiff against a purchaser to recover the purchase price of goods obtained by means of the pull board from its agent, the defendant, but an action to recover the goods in specie and the proceeds of sales from the plaintiff's own agent. Under the contract, neither the title to the goods nor to the proceeds of sale ever vested in the defendant. On the contrary, the contract specifically requires that they be kept separate and apart from the defendant's property. In our opinion the plaintiff has as much right to recover the proceeds of sale as the specific goods.

The leading and oldest case on the subject is Terrant v. Elliott, 1 Bos. & P. 3, in which it is held that A., having received money from C. to the use of B. on an illegal contract between B. and C., shall not be allowed to set up the illegality of the contract as a defense in an action brought by B. for money had and received. In that case Eyre, C. J., said: "The question is whether he who has received money to another's use on an illegal contract can be allowed to retain it, and that not even at the desire of those who paid it to him. I think he cannot." In Farmer v. Russell, 1 Bos. & P. 296, Buller, J., said: "When it appeared that the agent had received the money to the plaintiff's use, it was immaterial whether the money was paid on a legal or illegal contract." The principle upon which the plaintiff's right to recover of his agent is recognized rests upon the ground that an indebtedness is created, from which an assumption in law arises, and on that an action on the case may be maintained. The purchaser had the undoubted right to waive the illegality of the transaction and pay the money, and when once paid to the seller either directly, or to his use to a third person, the money cannot be recalled, and the third person cannot be permitted to retain it. Lemon v. Grosskopf, 99 Am. Dec. 62, notes. A case very similar to this is to be found in Vermont—Baldwin v. Potter, 46 Vt. 403—in which it is held that a sales agent must account to his principal for money received in the course of his agency, although the sale as between principal and purchaser be illegal and void. See, also, Willson v. Owen, 30 Mich. 475; Woodworth v. Bennett, 43 N. Y. 275, 3 Am. Rep. 706.

Another reason given in some cases is that it is contrary to good policy and morals to permit an agent to retain the property of his principal, although it may be employed in an illegal business under the agent's control. As is said in 9 Cyc. p. 558: "No considerations of public policy can justify a lowering of the standard of moral honesty required of persons in those relations." The general subject is fully discussed in Electrova Co. v. Insurance Co., 156 N. C. 237, 72 S. E. 306, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1216, and Cotton Press v. Insurance Co., 151 U. S. 368, 14 Sup. Ct. 367, 38 L. Ed. 195. There are a large number of cases cited in the notes sustaining these views.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment upon the facts found for the $50, as well as the goods.

Error.

J. M. PACE MULE CO. v. SEABOARD AIR LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 529*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

An expert veterinarian, who dissected an animal alleged to have received injuries causing death while being transported by a carrier, may not give his opinion that the animal's death was caused by being jammed in the car, based on his knowledge and experience and post mortem examination, but he may testify whether the death of the animal could have been caused by being jammed in the car, as claimed by the shipper.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 555*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

The opinion of an expert must be based on facts admitted or found, or on his personal knowledge, and not on the assumption of a fact, and the questions asked him should be hypothetical in form.

3. CARRIERS (§ 230*)—INJURIES TO ANIMALS DURING TRANSPORTATION — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action by a carrier for the death of mules alleged to have been caused by injuries while being transported by a carrier, there was no proof of any intervening physical cause sufficient to account for the death, and the condition of the bodies and the internal organs of the mules, as disclosed by a post mortem examination, indicated that they had been subjected to very rough handling, the question whether the injuries could be imputed to the carrier's negligence in transportation was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 961, 962; Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Cline, Judge.

Action by the J. M. Pace Mule Company against the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Murray Allen, of Raleigh, for appellant.
S. Brown Shepherd, of Raleigh, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is an action to recover the value of two mules alleged to have been injured in the course of transportation from East St. Louis, Ill., to Raleigh, N. C., by defendant's negligence, and to have died from said injuries the day after they were delivered to plaintiff. The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was plaintiff's stock injured by the negligence of the defendant Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(2) Was the plaintiff's stock injured by the negligence of the defendant Seaboard Air Line Railway, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Did the plaintiff comply with the contract of shipment as to giving of notice to the railroad company as to his claim for damages? Answer: Yes.

"(3½) Could the plaintiff, by an examination of the mules in question before their removal from the depot, have discovered any injury to them? Answer: No.

"(4) What damages, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: Four hundred and seventy dollars."

The mules were 2 of a car load of 26 shipped to plaintiff, and were accepted and a receipt given for them, as in good condition; it appearing that the injuries were not then discoverable upon inspection. The mules were received at Raleigh from defendant on February 23, 1911, and one J. J. Womble purchased a pair of them from plaintiff, and had them driven the next day to Apex, where one of them died the night of February 24th. Plaintiff gave Womble another mule for the one that died. On February 24th another mule died from his injuries in the lot of plaintiff at Raleigh. When the mules were received at Raleigh by plaintiff, they seemed to be "tired and droopy," and their general condition was not good, though there was nothing in their appearance to indicate that there had been any permanent injury to them, and certainly none likely to result fatally. The mule sold to Womble, which died, was cut open and found to be internally injured.

[1] The other, which died in plaintiff's lot in Raleigh, was dissected and afterwards examined by Dr. McMackin, an expert veterinarian, who found, after the mule's skin had been removed, that his body was badly bruised, and his internal organs were in a state of congestion and decomposition. He was asked, substantially, the following question by plaintiff's counsel: "State your opinion as to the cause of the mule's death, if you have one, based upon your knowledge and experience and your post mortem examination of him?" He answered: "My opinion is that the mule was jammed up in the car." This evidence was improperly admitted. The question required him to testify, not only as to the condition of the mule when he examined him, which was proper, but to go further and give his opinion as to the existence of a fact, which was almost, if not quite, the equivalent of the one directly involved in the issue. It would have been competent to have asked him if the death of the mule could have been caused by being jammed in the car, or, if the jury should find from the evidence that the mule had been jammed in the car and had received no other injury, could the death, in his opinion, be attributable to the jamming as its cause; that is, was it sufficient of itself to cause the death.

[2] A question similar to the one admitted in this case by the court was asked in Summerlin v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 551, 45 S. E. 898, and excluded by the court, and we sustained the ruling upon the ground that the witness was called upon to state a fact of which he had no personal or competent knowledge, and not merely the opinion of an expert. The opinion of the witness should be based upon facts admitted or found, or upon his personal knowledge, and not upon the assumption of the fact. The question should, therefore, be hypothetical, or rather supposititious, in form, following the precedents as settled by our decisions. State v. Bowman, 78 N. C. 509; State v. Cole, 94 N. C. 958; State v. Wilcox, 132 N. C. 1120, 44 S. E. 625; Summerlin v. Railroad, supra. The court in Hitchcock v. Burgett, 38 Mich. 501, held that "a physician cannot be asked his opinion as to the cause of an injury, judging merely from the condition in which he found the patient, and without any knowledge as to how it took place." See, also, National Union v. Thomas, 10 App. D. C. 277; Carpenter v. E. T. Co., 71 N. Y. 574; Van Zandt v. M. L. B. Insurance Co., 55 N. Y. 179, 14 Am. Rep. 215; Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 151 N. C. 217, and cases cited at page 222, 85 S. E. 920. We conclude that there was error in admitting the question and answer, over the objection of the defendant, which was made in the proper way and in due time.

A question was raised as to the right of plaintiff to recover for the loss of the mule sold to Womble, and which died in his possession. The plaintiff contends that, by giving Womble another mule in the place of the one that died, it acquired the right to sue for the value of the latter, while the defendant says that the act of giving another mule to Womble was purely voluntary and conferred no new right on the plaintiff, in the absence of an assignment of the cause of action by Womble to the plaintiff. As in the verdict all the questions of fact and law, including the damages, are so blended that the error we have noted permeates the entire record, it becomes unnecessary to decide this question, which is not free from difficulty. Besides, it may be that there was some express understanding and agreement between the parties with respect thereto, which may appear at the next trial, and an opinion upon the meager facts now presented may prove to be still more unnecessary.

[3] We cannot say that there was not more than a scintilla of evidence to sustain the plaintiff's case upon the motion to nonsuit. There was no proof of any intervening physical cause sufficient to account for the death of the mules, and the condition of the bodies and the internal organs which was disclosed by the post mortem examination indicated that they must have been subjected to very rough handling in some way. It was a question for the jury whether upon all the facts and circumstances the injuries to the mules could fairly be imputed to the negligence of the carrier in their transportation.

We order a new trial for the error in regard to the testimony of Dr. McMackin, the expert witness.

New trial.

CARSON v. WOODROW.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. ATTACHMENT (§§ 145, 232*)—DISSOLUTION—DEFECTS OR IRREGULARITIES IN PROCEEDINGS.

While under Revisal 1905, § 758 et seq., authorizing a writ of attachment to issue when the requisite facts are shown to the court by affidavit of prescribed form and substance, and requiring the officer issuing it to require an undertaking, the clerk when the terms of the law are complied with is without further discretion and the issuance of the writ is a ministerial act, yet important duties are imposed on the officer issuing the writ which may not be delegated to the parties or their attorneys; and hence, where an attachment was issued in blank on the assurance of plaintiff's attorney that the undertaking would be executed and the other papers properly filled out before service, the attachment was properly dissolved on motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 403-410, 796, 797; Dec. Dig. §§ 145, 232.*]

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 146*)—AUTHORITY OR CAPACITY TO SERVE.

Revisal 1905, § 765, providing that warrants of attachment shall be directed to the sheriff, or, if issued by a justice of the peace, to the sheriff or any constable, makes a clear distinction between writs issued from a superior court and those issued by a justice of the peace, and requires that those issued by the superior court shall be addressed to a sheriff, and not to a constable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 411, 412; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

3. ATTACHMENT (§ 146*)—AUTHORITY OR CAPACITY TO SERVE.

The various statutes, such as Revisal 1905, §§ 937, 2959, authorizing town and township constables to serve ordinary court process, does not authorize such service unless addressed to such constables by their official title, and hence does not authorize constables to serve writs of attachment issued by superior courts, which, under the express provisions of section 765, cannot be so directed, but must be directed to the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 411, 412; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Merl J. Carson against O. S. Woodrow. From a judgment dissolving an attachment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

On the hearing it was made to appear that the warrant of attachment purported to issue from superior court of Nash county and to the counties of Nash and Edgecombe, and that to Edgecombe, under which the property was levied on, being addressed "To Any Constable or Other Lawful Officer of Edgecombe County, Greetings," and return made thereon: "Seized and levied on the following property," etc. "[Signed] W. G. Bullock, Constable No. 12 Township, Edgecombe Co."

The other facts relevant to the question presented and embodied in the judgment are as follows: "That on the 23d day of December, 1911, the deputy clerk of the superior court of Nash county, at the request of one of the plaintiff's attorneys, signed and delivered to him the summons since returned in this action, the same being at the time of their said delivery filled out in part only, the caption and title of the cause, the name of defendant to be summoned, and plaintiffs' undertaking for costs not having been filled out until subsequently thereto, as hereinafter set out; that at the same time said deputy clerk signed and delivered to plaintiffs said attorney the warrants of attachment thereafter issued to the counties of Nash and Edgecombe and since returned herein; that, when delivered to plaintiff's said attorney, said warrants of attachment were in blank, save the clerk's signature attached thereto, the date '23rd day of December, 1911,' appearing thereon, and the seal of court annexed to one of them, and the undertaking, justification of sureties, and affidavits annexed to said warrants of attachment were at the time of such delivery wholly in blank, the essential operative parts thereof having been subsequently filled in by plaintiff's said attorney, as hereinafter set out; that at the time of making application to and of receiving from said deputy clerk the said blank summonses, warrants of attachment, and other papers, plaintiff's said attorney informed said deputy clerk that it was his purpose to use the same in an action to be that day instituted by the plaintiff above named against the defendant above named, and of the facts involved therein, at the same time giving assurance that he would have the undertaking in attachment executed and other papers properly filled out before the service of warrant of attachment, and that as a result of such assurance said deputy clerk intrusted plaintiff's said attorney with the duty of taking bond, perfecting affidavit and filling out warrants of attachments and summonses herein, and this was thereafter done by plaintiff's said attorney, in accordance with the statement of fact made at the time aforesaid, which undertaking and affidavit are now considered sufficient by said deputy clerk; that, prior to the issuance of said warrants of attachment, no affidavit or undertaking in attachment was ever exhibited to or filed with said deputy clerk, or in the clerk's office, nor was this ever done until some time subsequent to January 3, 1912; that the warrant of attachment issued to Edgecombe county came into the hands of W. G. Bullock, constable of No. 12 township, in said county, on December 23, 1911, who, by virtue of the powers conferred upon him by his said office, proceeded to levy upon the property of the defendant thereunder, as set out in his return annexed thereto." There was judgment dissolving the attachment, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

M. V. Barnhill and E. B. Grantham, both of Rockymount, for appellant. L. V. Bassett and F. S. Spruill, both of Rockymount, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] On the facts presented, we are of the opinion that the attachment in this case was properly dissolved. Our statute on this subject (Revisal, c. 12, § 758 et seq.) in general terms provides that the writ may issue when the requisite facts are shown to the court by affidavit of prescribed form and substance and before issuing the same, the officer who issues for the purpose of indemnifying defendant shall require an undertaking with sufficient surety in a sum not less than $200, etc. While our decisions are to the effect that, when the terms of the law are duly complied with, the clerk is without further discretion in the matter, and that the issuance of the writ in most of its aspects is a ministerial act permitting performance by regular deputy, a perusal of the statute will readily disclose that, in order to a valid writ, there are important duties imposed in express terms upon the officials, and which may not be delegated to the parties or their attorneys. It is true that such a custom has been allowed to prevail as to original process, the summons, and to ordinary subpoenas for witnesses, etc. (Webster v. Sharp, 116 N. C. 468, 21 S. E. 912; Croom v. Morrissey, 63 N. C. 591); but in the case of attachments, conferring as it does the present right to seize and sequester the property of the citizen before trial or opportunity to be heard, a stricter construction is required. Thus in 4 Cyc. p. 400, it is said: "Attachment being an extraordinary and summary remedy in derogation of the common law, the courts will usually, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, construe the statute strictly in favor of those against whom the proceeding is employed, both as to the subject-matter of the attachment and the method of enforcing the remedy, and will exact of the plaintiff a strict compliance with all statutory requirements." And in 2 Lewis, Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 566, p. 1049: "A party seeking the benefit of such a statute must bring himself strictly, not within the spirit, but within the letter. He can take nothing by intendment. * * * The remedy by attachment is special and extraordinary, and the statutory provisions for it must be strictly construed, and cannot have force in cases not plainly within their terms." And our decisions are in full approval of this position. Skinner v. Moore, 19 N. C. 138-146, 30 Am. Dec. 155; Bank v. Hinton, 12 N. C. 398, 399.

[2] Again, and by reason of the same rule of construction, it must be held that a writ of attachment issuing out of the superior court on causes within that jurisdiction shall be addressed to the sheriff of the county. On this question section 765, Revisal, provides as follows: "The warrant shall be directed to the sheriff of any county in which the property of such defendant may be, or in case it be issued by a justice of the peace to such sheriff, or to any constable of such county," etc. Thus making clear distinction between writs issuing from the superior court and courts of justice of the peace, and in express terms requiring that writs of attachment from the superior courts shall as stated be addressed to the sheriff of the county.

[3] There are different statutes, general and special, conferring on town and township constables the power of serving ordinary court process, as in Revisal, §§ 937, 29-39. But the cases construing these statutes have thus far generally held that to make a valid service of process from the superior courts by constables the same should be specially addressed to such officer by his official title (McGloughan v. Mitchell, 128 N. C. 681, 36 S. E. 164; Davis v. Sanderlin, 119 N. C. 84, 25 S. E. 815), and these statutes could not apply, therefore, when, as in this case, the writ could not be so directed.

For the reason stated, we are of opinion that the attachment writ and the seizure of property under it were invalid, and the judgment of his honor discharging same must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

GRAVES v. HOWARD et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 73*)—ADMISSIBILITY—STATUTES—COVERTURE.

Under the Constitution and Revisal 1905, § 2093, by which the property of any woman acquired before marriage, or to which she may become entitled after marriage, becomes her separate property, and Laws 1899, c. 78, which removes the disability of marriage, the statute of limitations, in the absence of any exception in favor of the wife holding a claim against her husband, runs against the wife during coverture.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 205*)—ACTION BY WIFE AGAINST HUSBAND—STATUTE.

Revisal 1905, § 408, which provides that the wife may sue without joining her husband when it concerns her separate property, or when it is between herself and her husband, permits a wife to sue her husband.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 76*)—DISABILITY ACCRUING AFTER STATUTE BEGINS TO RUN—COVERTURE.

Where the statute of limitations has begun to run upon a note before it is received by the maker's wife, her coverture, even if a disability, does not stop the running of the statute.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 171*)—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—MORTGAGE OR SALE—LIMITATION OF ACTION.

Revisal 1905, § 1044, which declared that, whenever an action to foreclose a mortgage was barred by limitations, the authority to execute the power of sale obtained therein should be barred on January 1, 1907, more than five years after its enactment, was not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a power of sale executed when there was no limitation, since it goes only to the remedy, and gives a reasonable time for the execution of the power before the statute works a bar.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Ferguson, Judge.

Controversy between W. W. Graves and Thomas Howard, executor, and others, heard upon agreed facts. Judgment for Graves, and Howard appeals. Affirmed.

This controversy is heard upon the following agreed facts:

"(1) That on the 4th day of January, 1900, J. B. Stickney and his wife, Martha H. Stickney, executed and delivered unto Mrs. M. P. Morgan, of the state of Alabama, and the sister of J. B. Stickney, a mortgage deed upon certain lands lying and being in the town of Wilson, county of Wilson, N. C., containing two acres, and being the residence of the said J. B. Stickney and his wife, Martha H. Stickney, the said J. B. Stickney being the owner in fee thereof, which mortgage is duly recorded in book No. 54, at page 579, in the office of the register of deeds of Wilson county, for the purpose of securing a note given by the said J. B. Stickney to the said M. P. Morgan, for the sum of $1,000, due and payable on the 4th day of January, 1901.

"(2) That on the 17th day of January, 1903, for the purpose of securing the note given by the said J. B. Stickney to J. Alvin Clark, for $1,000, due one year after date, the said J. B. Stickney and wife, Martha H. Stickney, executed unto the said J. Alvin Clark a mortgage upon the same property described in the mortgage of J. B. Stickney and wife to M. P. Morgan, above referred to, which said mortgage was duly recorded in book No. 66 at page 207 in the office of the register of deeds of Wilson county.

"(3) That thereafter, before the 6th day of May, 1907, the said Mrs. M. P. Morgan died domiciled in the state of Alabama, having first made and published her last will and testament, which said last will and testament was duly admitted to probate in a court of competent jurisdiction, and the executor therein named duly and properly qualified under the laws of the state of Alabama.

"(4) That by the terms of her last will and testament the said M. P. Morgan bequeathed the said note to Martha H. Stickney, and the said note was thereafter duly and properly transferred and assigned to the said Martha H. Stickney by her executor.

"(5) That thereafter, to wit, on about the 1st day of November, 1908, the said Martha

H. Stickney died domicile in the county of Wilson, state of North Carolina, having first made her last will and testament, in which said last will and testament she named Thomas Howard as executor, and the said last will and testament was duly admitted to probate in the superior court of Wilson county.

"(6) That by the terms of said last will and testament all the property of the said Martha H. Stickney was given to Thomas Howard, as trustee, to be held by him upon certain uses and trusts fully set forth in the said last will and testament.

"(7) Thereafter on the ——— day of September, 1911, the said J. B. Stickney died domicile in the county of Wilson, intestate, and no administration has been taken out upon his estate, he having left no property other than the real estate described and conveyed in the mortgage above referred to, and which had been allotted to him in appropriate proceedings as a homestead. At the death of the said J. B. Stickney, he owed various mortgage indebtedness, and there were various judgments docketed against him, the aggregate of which amounts to more than the value of his said homestead.

"(8) That nothing whatever was ever paid by the said J. B. Stickney, or by any one for him, on account of the note, which he gave to the said M. P. Morgan, and which was due on the 1st day of January, 1901, and which was secured in the mortgage given by him and his wife, Martha H. Stickney, to the said M. P. Morgan, being the mortgage heretofore referred to.

"(9) That on the 31st day of October, 1911, J. Alvin Clark, pursuant to the power of sale contained in the mortgage above referred to, sold the property conveyed therein at public auction to W. W. Graves, for the sum of seven thousand and seven hundred dollars ($7,700).

"(10) That the said Thomas Howard, executor of Martha H. Stickney, has threatened to cause the said real estate to be sold pursuant to the power of sale contained in the mortgage given by J. B. Stickney and wife to M. P. Morgan, and to take all necessary steps to have the said power of sale executed.

"(11) The said W. W. Graves contends that the purchaser under such a sale would acquire no title as against him; his contention being that under the statute, more than 10 years having elapsed since the note, secured in the mortgage, fell due, and no payments having been made thereon, neither the mortgagor nor her executors or administrators can execute such power.

"(12) The said W. W. Graves has agreed to and with the said Thomas Howard, trustee and executor aforesaid, that, if the court shall be of the opinion that the power of sale contained in the mortgage aforesaid can be executed, he will pay off and discharge the indebtedness secured therein, claiming that he has a right, as such purchaser, to discharge any and all valid and existing liens.

"Wherefore it is agreed that, if upon the foregoing facts the court shall be of the opinion that the authority to execute such power of sale is inoperative and barred by the statute, the said Thomas Howard, executor aforesaid, will not demand and cause the same to be executed, but, if the court shall be of the opinion that the authority to execute such power is not inoperative and barred, the said W. W. Graves will pay off and discharge the indebtedness secured in the said mortgage, without a sale being had."

The only legal question raised on these facts is whether the right of action and the right to foreclose under the first mortgage are barred by the statute of limitations, and it is admitted that the right of action on the note is barred if the time from May 6, 1907, to November 1, 1908, during which time the note and mortgage were the property of the wife of J. B. Stickney, is counted. It is also admitted that the right to sell under the power of sale is barred if the act of 1905 is applicable and is constitutional, as applied to the facts of this case.

His Honor held that the claim of the defendant under the first mortgage and the right to sell were barred, and he excepted and appealed.

Pou & Finch, of Wilson, and Thos. W. Shelton, of Norfolk, Va., for appellant. Connor & Connor, of Wilson, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The learned counsel for the defendant referred us to the decisions of the highest courts of Indiana, New Jersey, Louisiana, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania, holding that the statute of limitations does not run in favor of the husband against a claim owned by his wife, to which we have given careful and respectful consideration. The cases from these courts rest upon the principle of the common law that the wife cannot maintain an action against her husband, because of the unity of the person, or upon the ground that the removal of the common-law disability by statute generally does not confer upon the wife the right to sue the husband, in the absence of express legislative declaration to that effect, and, as she cannot sue, the period of coverture is not counted against her. If, therefore, the disability of marriage has been removed, and, in addition the right to sue the husband has been conferred on the wife by statute in this state, it follows that the authorities relied on are not applicable, and the conclusion would seem to be inevitable, in the absence of an exception in the statute of limitations, that the period of coverture would be counted against the wife.

[1] Under our Constitution and the Revised, § 2083, the real and personal property of any female in this state, acquired before marriage, or to which, after marriage, she may become in any manner entitled, is her sole and separate estate and property, freed from any debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband, and by chapter 78, Laws of 1899, the disability of marriage was removed (Bond v. Beverly, 152 N. C. 63, 67 S. E. 55), and since then the statute of limitations runs against the wife during coverture.

[2] Revisal, § 408, further provides that the wife may maintain an action without the joinder of her husband—(1) when the action concerns her separate property, (2) when the action is between herself and her husband"; and our court has construed this section to confer upon the wife the right to maintain an action against her husband. Shuler v. Millsaps, 71 N. C. 297; McCormac v. Wiggins, 84 N. C. 279; Manning v. Manning, 79 N. C. 293, 28 Am. Rep. 324; Robinson v. Robinson, 123 N. C. 137, 31 S. E. 371; Perkins v. Brinkley, 133 N. C. 158, 45 S. E. 541. The statutes of limitations contain no exception in favor of the wife when she holds a claim against her husband. It therefore appearing that the common-law disability has been removed, that the wife may sue her husband, and that there is no exception in the statute of limitations, we are of opinion that the time from May 6, 1907, to November 1, 1908, must be counted against the defendant, and that the right of action upon the note secured by the mortgage is barred. This conclusion has been reached by other courts under statutes similar to our own. Wilson v. Wilson, 36 Cal. 447, 95 Am. Dec. 197; Estate of Deaner, 126 Iowa, 701, 102 N. W. 825, 106 Am. St. Rep. 375. The court says in the California case: "How is the wife to avail herself of the use of the property, or place it in the category of her separate estate, unless she can recover it from the debtor? The debtor claims that the statute of limitations is running against her. How is she to avoid the bar, if she cannot sue, and the debtor will not pay without suit? There is no provision to prevent the statute running in such case. * * * Section 7 of the practice act authorizes the wife to sue alone 'when the action concerns her separate property,' and also 'when the action is between herself and her husband.' There is no limitation as to the kind of actions that may be maintained 'between herself and her husband'; and section 395, as amended in 1865-66, authorizes the husband and wife to testify on their own behalf, or on behalf of each other, as witnesses in actions between themselves, except in actions of divorce. This provision contemplates that there may be actions between husband and wife other than those relating to divorces. What are they, unless relating to rights of property? Disputes with respect to property may arise between them when the separate existence of the wife, and a separate right of property, is recognized at law, as in this state, as well as other matters; and, when they do arise, there is as great necessity for a judicial determination of the questions as when they arise between other parties. A litigation of the kind between husband and wife may be unseemly and abhorrent to our ideas of propriety, but a litigation in one form can be no more so than in another, and no more so than the necessity itself which gives rise to the litigation. The present policy of the law is to recognize the separate legal and civil existence of the wife, and separate rights of property, and the very recognition by the law of such separate existence, and rights at law as well as in equity, to hold and enjoy separate property, involves a necessity for opening the doors of the judicial tribunals to her, in order that the rights guaranteed to her may be protected and enforced." And in the Iowa case: "No exception in behalf of married women of actions against their husbands is found in the statute of limitations. It provides that 'actions may be brought within the times herein limited respectively, after their causes accrue, and not afterwards, except when otherwise specially declared. * * * Those founded on written contracts * * * within 10 years.' Code, § 3447. As all exceptions not 'otherwise specially declared' are excluded, we are not permitted to insert any, even though we might think that, owing to the relation of the husband and wife, she should be relieved from the necessity of pressing her claims against her husband in order to keep them alive. That was a matter for legislative consideration, and does not constitute a reason for refusal by the courts to give effect to a specific statute to the contrary. * * * The cases cited from states where the common-law prevails—that the husband may not sue the wife—are not in point, and those resting on statutes somewhat similar to ours do not meet our approval." The case of Wilkes v. Allen, 131 N. C. 280, 42 S. E. 616, is not in conflict with this view, as it was decided before the disability of marriage was removed.

[3] If, however, the rule was otherwise, and ordinarily the statute of limitations would not run in favor of the husband upon a contract with his wife, it appears in this case that the statute had begun to run before the wife became the owner of the note and mortgage, and as was said in Cauley v. Snow, 122 N. C. 329, 29 S. E. 360: "The statute of limitations had begun to run before she received it, and her coverture did not stop it."

The appellant further contends that, although the right of action on the note is barred, there was no limitation as to the power of sale prior to the Revisal of 1905 (Menzel v. Hinton, 132 N. C. 660, 44 S. E. 385, 95 Am. St. Rep. 647), that this became a part of the contract, and that the act of the Legislature (Rev. § 1044) declaring that the power of sale in a mortgage shall be inoperative when the right of action to foreclose is barred, impairs the obligation of the contract, and is unconstitutional and void. The statute undoubtedly purports to deal with existing contracts because it says: "Whenever an action to foreclose any such mortgage or deed of trust is now barred by the statute of limitations, the authority to execute the power of sale contained therein shall be barred on the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and seven." Did the Legislature have this power?

[4] It is true that laws in force at the time a contract is made become a part of the contract, but this does not prevent a change in the remedy.

[5] The rule, with its limitations, is well stated in Cooley, Const. Lim. 402 et seq. as follows: "Citizens have no vested right in the existing general laws of the state which can preclude their amendment or repeal, and there is no implied promise on the part of the state to protect its citizens against incidental injury occasioned by changes in the law. * * * The obligation of a contract consists in its binding force on the party who makes it. This depends on the laws in existence when it is made. These are necessarily referred to in all contracts, and forming a part of them as the measure of the obligation to perform them by the one party, and the right acquired by the other. There can be no other standard by which to ascertain the extent of either than that which the terms of the contract indicate, according to their settled legal meaning. When it becomes consummated, the law defines the duty and the right, compels one party to perform the thing contracted for, and gives the other a right to enforce the performance by the remedies then in force. If any subsequent law affect to diminish the duty or to impair the right, it necessarily bears on the obligation of the contract, in favor of one party, to the injury of the other; hence any law which in its operations amounts to a denial or obstruction of the rights accruing by a contract, though professing to act only on the remedy, is directly obnoxious to the prohibition of the Constitution. It is the civil obligation of contracts which (the Constitution) is designed to reach; that is, the obligation which is recognized by, and results from, the law of the state in which it is made. * * * Such being the obligation of a contract, it is obvious that the rights of the parties in respect to it are liable to be affected in many ways by changes in the laws, which it could not have been the intention of the constitutional provision to preclude. There are few laws which govern the general police of a state, or the government of its citizens, in their intercourse with each other or with strangers, which may not in some way or other affect the contracts which they have entered into or may thereafter form. For what are laws of evidence, or which concern remedies, frauds, and perjuries, laws of registration, and those which affect landlord and tenant, sales at auction, acts of limitation, and those which limit the fees of professional men, and the charges of tavern keepers, and a multitude of others which crowd the codes of every state, but laws which may affect the validity, construction or duration, or discharge of contracts?" But the changes in these laws are not regarded as necessarily affecting the obligation of contracts. Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract; and it does not impair it, provided it leaves the parties a substantial remedy, according to the course of justice as it existed at the time the contract was made. It has accordingly been held that laws changing remedies for the enforcement of legal contracts, or abolishing one remedy where two or more existed, may be perfectly valid, even though the new or the remaining remedy be less convenient than that which was abolished, or less prompt and speedy."

The Supreme Court of the United States in Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. Ed. 365, sustained a statute as reasonable, which gave only nine months and seventeen days within which to enforce a claim, and said upon the question now before us: "This court has often decided that statutes of limitation affecting existing rights are not unconstitutional, if a reasonable time is given for the commencement of an action before the bar takes effect. Hawkins v. Barney, 5 Pet. 457, 8 L. Ed. 190; Jackson v. Lamphire, 3 Pet. 280, 7 L. Ed. 679; Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. Ed. 737; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. Ed. 529. And it is difficult to see why, if the Legislature may prescribe a limitation where none existed before, it may not change one which has already been established. The parties to a contract have no more vested interest in a particular limitation which has been fixed, than they have in an unrestricted right to sue. They have no more a vested interest in the time for the commencement of an action than they have in the form of the action to be commenced; and, as to the forms of actions or modes of remedy, it is well settled that the Legislature may change them at its discretion, provided adequate means of enforcing the right remain. We have had occasion to consider this subject at the present term, in Tennessee v. Sneed [96 U. S. 69, 24 L. Ed. 610]. In all such cases, the question is one of reasonableness, and we have, therefore, only to consider whether the time allowed in this statute is, under all the circumstances, reasonable. Of that the Legislature is primarily the judge, and we cannot overrule the decision of that department of the government, unless a palpable error has been committed. In judging of that we must place ourselves in the position of the legislators, and must measure the time of limitation in the midst of the circumstances which surrounded them, as nearly as possible; for what is reasonable in a particular case depends upon its particular facts." This case was approved in Koshkonong v. Burton, 104 U. S. 675, 26 L. Ed. 886, and in Turner v. New York, 168 U. S. 94, 18 Sup. Ct. 40, 42 L. Ed. 392; the court saying in the last case: "It is well settled that a statute shortening the period of limitation is within the constitutional power of the Legislature, provided a reasonable time, taking into consideration the nature of the case, is allowed for bringing an action after the passage of the statute and before the bar takes effect." The same doctrine has been announced by our court: "It is settled beyond controversy that, while the Legislature has the power to extend or reduce the time in which an action may be brought, this is subject to the restriction that, when the limitation is shortened, 'a reasonable time must be given for the commencement of an action before the statute works a bar.'" Strickland v. Draughan, 91 N. C. 103, and cases there cited; Cooley, Const. Lim. 450 (8th Ed.) and cases there cited." Nichols v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 498, 26 S. E. 643.

The right to sell under the power did not expire under the statute for more than five years after its enactment, which was an ample protection of the rights of the parties.

We find no error.

Affirmed.

AMERICAN STEEL & WIRE CO. v. COPELAND et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 442*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—SEPARATE ORAL CONTRACT.

In an action for the price of a car load of wire, where plaintiff claimed that there was no agreement except a written order for the car, and where defendant claimed that the entire contract was in parol, and that the order for the car was only in part execution of the contract, evidence as to what the entire contract was was admissible; the rule excluding parol evidence adding to or varying a written contract having no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1874-1897; Dec. Dig. § 442.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 243*)—ADMISSIONS—AGENT—ADMISSION AFTER EVENT.

Admissions by plaintiff's agent were inadmissible in an action for the price of goods sold, where they were made after the transaction or event.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 908-915; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 390*)—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS—DEPOSITION.

Where a deposition of a seller's agent was on file denying a contract for the sale of goods as claimed by the buyer, and the seller, in an action for the price, introduced such deposition, the declaration of such agent, admitting the making of the contract, though made after the transaction, was competent to contradict the deposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1247; Dec. Dig. § 390.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 59*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

In the exercise of its discretion, the trial court may permit the introduction of evidence out of its order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 138-140, 142, 143, 145; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 9*)—REQUISITES—CERTAINTY.

A contract must be definite and certain, or capable of being made so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 10-20; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

6. SALES (§ 22*)—CONTRACT—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

An agreement by a manufacturer to furnish a dealer all the wire he needed for his trade constitutes a continuing offer on the part of the company to sell, which, when accepted pro tanto by an order before withdrawal of the offer, becomes effective as a contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-43; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

7. SALES (§ 418*)—LOSS OF PROFITS—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where a manufacturer contracted to sell a dealer all the wire he needed to supply his customers and fixed the cost and selling prices, profits were recoverable by the dealer on a breach of contract, since they were within the contemplation of the parties, and were not difficult of ascertainment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1174-1201; Dec. Dig. § 418.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by the American Steel & Wire Company against A. S. Copeland and others, with counterclaim by defendants. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

This action was instituted to recover $610.94, as the purchase price of a car load of wire shipped by the plaintiff to the defendants. The defendants admitted the purchase of the car of wire at the price named, and set up a counterclaim for damages in the sum of $650 for breach of contract by the plaintiff, under which they allege that the plaintiff agreed to furnish the defendant wire, which contract was entered into between the plaintiff and defendants on or about the 21st day of June, 1910, and that the car load of wire, for the purchase price of which the plaintiff was suing, represented only a portion of the wire which the plaintiff was to ship the defendants under the contract. The plaintiff denied the contract set out by the defendants.

The defendants offered evidence tending to prove: That they were general farm supply merchants in the city of Kinston, N. C. That on or about the 21st day of June, 1910, McKelcan, an agent and representative of the plaintiff company, approached the de-defendants for the purpose of selling them wire. That the defendants at this time were using another brand of wire, and had a large demand for wire fences from their customers. That B. W. Canady & Son were handling the plaintiff's wire in Kinston, and on this account McKelcan stated to them that he could not ship them wire to Kinston, but would ship wire to Graingers, which is near Kinston, from which point the defendants could have it sent to Kinston. That the defendants stated to McKelcan that they would not care to purchase any wire from the plaintiff unless they could get all they wanted; that they would sell a car load a month, or at least five or six car loads a year, and probably more. That McKelcan thereupon agreed that the plaintiff would furnish the defendants all the wire that they wanted for their trade, and, in addition thereto, would help advertise this wire all through the different counties, and guaranteed to the defendants to furnish them all the wire that they would require. That in pursuance thereof, the defendants and the plaintiff's agent sent the order for the one car, for the purchase price of which this action is brought. That upon the request of the said McKelcan, the defendants furnished the plaintiff with the mailing list of their customers, containing about 500 names, to whom it appears the plaintiff wrote circular letters, which read in part as follows: "In order that you and others in your vicinity may see this fence and look into its good qualities, we have arranged that a liberal stock be carried by Copeland Brothers, Kinston, North Carolina, who will be glad to give you one of our complete catalogues." That the plaintiff also sent the defendants an electrotpe containing a photograph of the wire fences, which the defendants used in advertising in the Kinston Free Press at the rate of $25 per month. That the one car load arrived and was sold by the defendants in about two or three weeks, and the second car ordered under the contract, and the plaintiff declined to ship the second car. That the defendants were out of wire about six weeks, during which time they could have sold a car at a profit of $300 per car. This was based upon the demands made by their customers for the wire. One hundred and twenty half rolls of wire is a minimum car load lot. That the defendants could have bought some lighter wire, made by different people than the plaintiff, from L. Harvey & Son, at 5 per cent. discount, but not the same kind or grade of wire which the plaintiff should have furnished the defendants and which they were advertising as being sold by the defendants; but they could not have purchased from their competitors B. W. Canady & Son wire at any such per cent. advance. The plaintiff, by the depositions of McKelcan and Dietrich, denied that there was any contract except the order for the one car of wire, and further attempted to deny that the agent had any authority to bind the plaintiff, although Dietrich stated that McKelcan's authority "was such as is generally given to a traveling salesman." Exception was taken by the plaintiff to the admission of the evidence tending to prove that the agent of the plaintiff agreed to furnish all the wire the defendants wanted, upon the ground that the order for the car, which was shipped, constituted the contract, and that parol evidence was inadmissible to add to or vary it. The defendants were permitted to prove that they had a conversation with the agent of the plaintiff, McKelcan, after the refusal to ship the second car, and that he admitted that he agreed to furnish all the wire the defendants wanted, and the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff introduced the deposition of McKelcan, in which he denied the contract as contended for by the defendants.

His honor charged the jury on the question of damages, as follows: "You will confine the question of damages to the inquiry as to whether there was an agreement made with the defendants by the agent, approved by the plaintiff and ratified by them, by their conduct, correspondence, and if they refused to comply with the agreement, and by reason of that refusal the defendants were damaged, and, if so, in what amount they were damaged. That damages would have to be confined to such evidence as would enable you to ascertain reasonably the amount. That is to say, the defendants could not recover for what we call 'speculative damages.' He could not calculate that he might have sold large amounts of wire and make estimates upon that, but he would have to base his estimates as to what he could have sold upon the demands for wire made upon him by his customers, and such expenses as he went to preparatory to carrying out the agreement, like the advertising. The defendants cannot recover in their counterclaim more than they can show they have been damaged by advertising and by failure to be able to supply for the actual demands that were made upon them, and it was their duty to exercise care in restricting the amount of loss, if any, as much as possible, and, as I have already said, the defendants cannot recover speculative profits, nor remote profits for damage to his business, if any. I believe he is making no claim for that, nor can he recover for possible or probable profit on sales of goods, except such sales as he shows to the jury he could have made by reason of demands that were made upon them by their customers. And the burden is upon the defendants to prove by the greater weight of the evidence that they are damaged, and the amount of the damages." Plaintiff excepted.

The evidence as to damages was as to the loss of profits on one car of wire, and the jury awarded the amount claimed, $300, and from the judgment rendered the plaintiff appealed.

G. G. Moore, of Kinston, for appellant.
Rouse & Land, of Kinston, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] The contention of the defendants is that the entire contract between them and the plaintiff was in parol, and that the order given for the car of wire, which was shipped, was in part execution of the contract, while the plaintiff contends that there was no agreement outside of the written order. It was competent for both parties to introduce evidence in support of their contentions, and the rule excluding parol evidence, which adds to or varies a written contract, has no application.

[2-4] The evidence of the defendants as to the conversation with the agent of the plaintiff was not strictly competent at the time it was offered, because it was a declaration after the event, but it appears that the deposition of the agent was on file, in which he denied the contract as contended for by the defendants, and that this deposition was introduced by the plaintiff, and the declaration of the agent was competent to contradict his evidence contained in the deposition. His honor could have permitted the introduction of the evidence out of its order, in the exercise of his discretion, and, if his ruling was not on this ground, it is not reversible error, because the evidence was made competent by the introduction of the deposition.

[5, 6] This brings us to the consideration of the principal question debated between counsel, and that is whether the agreement, as proven by the defendants, is wanting in mutuality, or is so uncertain that it cannot be enforced. We have said at this term in Elks v. Insurance Co., 75 S. E. 808, that a contract must be definite and certain or capable of being made so, and the plaintiff contends that under this rule, an agreement on its part, if made, to furnish all the wire the defendants might want, would be too indefinite to create an enforceable contract. The authorities are not in harmony on this question, some sustaining in whole or in part the contention of the plaintiff, as in Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535 (Gil. 465), Tarbox v. Gotzian, 20 Minn. 139 (Gil. 122), Drake v. Vorse, 52 Iowa, 419, 3 N. W. 465, Railroad v. Bagley, 60 Kan. 425, 56 Pac. 759, Harrison v. Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 6, 45 S. E. 731; while others hold to the contrary view. A contract was sustained in Nat. Fur. Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427, to supply all the pig iron which the party should need, use, or consume in his business; in Cooper v. Lansing Wheel Co., 94 Mich. 272, 54 N. W. 39, 34 Am. St. Rep. 341, to furnish such quantity of wheels as he may require during a certain season; in Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220, to furnish all the ice they might require for two hotels for five years; in Lumber Co.

v. Coal Co., 160 Ill. 85, 43 N. E. 774, 31 L. R. A. 529, to furnish the coal company its requirements of coal for a certain season; in Dalley v. Can. Co., 128 Mich. 591, 87 N. W. 761, to furnish all the tin cans that plaintiff might use in his factory for a stated time; and in Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218, to furnish the coal needed for steamers during one year. These authorities would justify us in sustaining the agreement as a valid contract, binding between the parties, at the time the agreement was made, but it is not necessary to go so far, as it appears that, after the shipment of one car, the defendants ordered another, which the plaintiff refused to deliver, and the evidence as to the amount of damages was directed to the loss of sales from this car, and his honor restricted the recovery to the profits that would have been made on sales to customers who applied for the wire, and could not get it.

In any event, the agreement constituted a continuing offer to sell, on the part of the plaintiff, which when accepted, before the withdrawal of the offer, became effective as a contract, and the order for the second car was an acceptance of the offer pro tanto. This was decided in Railroad v. Witham, 9 C. P. 19, and is approved in Clark on Contracts, 119, 120; 1 Page, Con. § 807; Bish. Con. § 78. The case from the court of common pleas is summarized in Bishop, supra, as follows: "In one case parties agreed that one of them should supply the other during a designated period with certain stores, as the latter might order. He made an order, which was filled, then made another, which was declined; and on suit brought the defendant rested his case on the lack of mutuality in the contract, which, he contended, rendered it void. Plainly it stood, in law, as a mere continuing offer by the defendant, but, when the plaintiff made an order, he thereby accepted the offer to the extent of the order, and it was too late for the other to recede. So judgment went for the plaintiff."

[7] We are also of opinion that the defendants were entitled to recover profits. This question has been discussed so clearly and elaborately by Justice Walker in Machine Co. v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 234, 53 S. E. 885, and by Justice Hoke in Wilkinson v. Dunbar, 149 N. C. 22, 62 S. E. 748, in which the leading authorities are reviewed, that we need do no more than refer to those cases. In the first the court says: "Generally speaking, the amount that would have been received if the contract had been kept and which will completely indemnify the injured party is the true measure of damages for its breach. Where one violates his contract, he is liable for such damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, which may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract—that is, such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation—and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed. It is the rule last stated which principally raises the doubt as to whether profits of the future should be included in the estimate of damages. They may be necessary to completely indemnify the injured party and they may also answer the other requirement, in that the loss of them may naturally be expected to proximately result from a breach of the contract; but there still remains another important element to be considered, and that is whether there is any reliable standard by which they can be ascertained, for we have seen that the damages must be certain, and this certainty which is required does not refer solely to their amount, but also to the question whether they will result at all from the breach. It is clear that, whenever profits are rejected as an item in the calculation of damages, it is because they are subject to too many contingencies and are dependent upon the fluctuations of markets and the chances of business to constitute a safe criterion for an estimate of damages. * * * It will be seen, therefore, that the earlier rule which excluded profits altogether, as an element of damages, as being in their very nature too uncertain to be considered (Hale on Damages, 72), has been modified so as to permit their inclusion in the assessment if they are proximate and certain," and in the second: "It is well established that where there has been definite and absolute breach of a contract which is single and entire that all damages, both present and prospective, suffered by the injured party, may and usually must be recovered in one and the same action, and, when prospective damages are allowed, they must be such as were in reasonable contemplation of the parties, and capable of being ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty. This requirement as to the certainty of damages recoverable is frequently said to exclude the idea of profits, but this statement must be understood to refer to the profits expected by reason of collateral engagements of the parties, or the profits of a going concern to arise from current sales and bargains which are yet to be made and dependent, to a great extent, on the uncertainty of trade and fluctuations of the market. * * * But profits or advantages which are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract entered into between the parties stand upon a different footing. These are part and parcel of the contract itself, entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements, something stipulated for, the right to the enjoyment of which is just as clear and plain as to the fulfillment of any other stipulation. They are presumed to have been taken into consideration and deliberated upon before the contract was made, and formed, perhaps, the only inducement to the arrangement. The parties may indeed have entertained different opinions concerning the advantages of the bargain, each supposing and believing that he had the best of it; but this is mere matter of judgment going to the formation of the contract, for which each has shown himself willing to take the responsibility and must, therefore, abide the hazard. Such being the relative position of the contracting parties, it is difficult to comprehend why, in case one party has deprived the other of the gains or profits of the contract by refusing to perform it, this loss should not constitute a proper item in estimating the damages."

In the case before us profits were within the contemplation of the parties. The defendants were merchants and supplied their customers with wire. They had 500 customers and sent their names to the plaintiff. They were not buying for their own use, but for sale, and the plaintiff knew of these facts. Nor were the profits difficult of ascertainment, as the cost and selling prices were fixed.

It is not at all certain that his honor on all the facts would not have been warranted in submitting to the jury the question of damages on the whole agreement; but, as he did not do so, and limited the right of recovery, we find no error of which the plaintiffs can complain.

No error.

FIELDS v. COLEMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

DISCOVERY (§ 41*)—APPLICATION—MATERIALITY OF MATTERS SOUGHT.

An application by a plaintiff in an action for a conspiracy to defame for an order to examine defendants preparatory to filing a complaint which sought to elicit information concerning and to compel the production of certain letters alleged in the supporting affidavit to have been written by a defendant to a woman, and to show an immoral relationship existing between them, but which neither shows that the plaintiff does not know the charges which were made against him nor the materiality of the letters to the cause of action, disclosed nothing essential to be known before the filing of the complaint, and no discovery could be had.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Webb, Judge.

Isham Fields moved for an examination of parties defendant to discover matters necessary to the framing of a complaint. From a judgment confirming an order of the clerk revoking an order for the examination of the parties defendant and recalling subpoena duces tecum issued therewith, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an appeal confirming an order of the clerk revoking an order for the examination of parties defendant, and recalling the subpoena duces tecum that was issued with the same. The order revoked was made upon affidavit for the examination of the defendants, and with a view particularly to obtaining two certain letters alleged to have been written by defendant Coleman to one Lovie Pitts; the plaintiff alleging that knowledge of the contents of said letters was necessary to the framing of his complaint. The defendants contended that said letters were neither material nor necessary; that, the object of the examination being to discover the said alleged letters, it was neither material nor necessary that said examination should be had; and that the application for said examination and subpoena duces tecum was in bad faith.

The plaintiff filed the following affidavit, upon which his motion was based:

"(1) That this action is brought against the defendants, James H. Young and W. T. Coleman, for conspiring together to defame and injure the plaintiff in his good name, reputation, character and business.

"(2) That he expects to allege upon securing from the said Young and Coleman the facts in relation thereto that pursuant to a conspiracy entered into between the said Young and Coleman that they, the said Young and Coleman, circulated and preferred false charges against the plaintiff, and procured his expulsion from the First Baptist Church, colored, of Raleigh, N. C., and otherwise injured the plaintiff in his character, reputation, and business.

"(3) That he expects to establish by the defendant James H. Young, which will enable him to allege in his said complaint that the said Young has in his possession or under his control certain letters which were written by the defendant Coleman, who was at that time the pastor of the First Baptist Church, colored, of Raleigh, N. C., to a certain woman by the name of Lovie Pitts, which letters tend to show that there were existing between the said Coleman and the said Lovie Pitts improper relations, and that tend to show gross immorality on the part of the said Coleman.

"(4) That the plaintiff expects in the said examination of the said Young and Coleman facts that will authorize him in his said complaint to allege that the said Coleman was the pastor of the said First Baptist Church, colored, at Raleigh, that plaintiff was a member thereof, and that plaintiff had certain information in reference to the relations existing between the defendant Coleman and the said Lovie Pitts, and as to the existence of the letters hereinbefore referred to, and that the plaintiff proceeded to take certain steps and preferred charges against the said Coleman as pastor, and attempted to have the said Coleman brought to trial before the said church, on account of the letters written by the said Coleman to the said Lovie Pitts, when the said Young and Coleman conspired together to suppress said letters and other evidence against the said Coleman, and thereupon the said Young and Coleman preferred charges against plaintiff in the said church and circulated false and slanderous reports against the plaintiff, charging him with lying and with bringing false charges against the said Coleman, and, on account of said conspiracy and suppression of facts, false charges, and trickery and chicanery, procured the expulsion of the plaintiff from said church, and injured plaintiff in his reputation, character, standing, and business.

"(5) That the plaintiff demands the production of the said letters that he may set forth copies or the substance thereof in his complaint, so that he may justify himself in the action which he took in attempting to have the said First Baptist Church, of Raleigh, colored, deal with the said Coleman, and to show that said Coleman was guilty of gross immoral conduct and not a suitable person to be and remain as pastor of the said First Baptist Church, colored, and to show that said Young and Coleman suppressed said letters to shield and protect said Coleman, and to show that the suppression of the said letters and the charges against the plaintiff, which secured his expulsion from the said church, was in pursuance of the conspiracy between the said Young and Coleman and to injure the plaintiff in his good name and reputation.

"And, having thus submitted to the defendants a full and fair statement and bill of particulars, the plaintiff demands that said examination be proceeded with under the statute."

Douglass, Lyon & Douglass, of Raleigh, for appellant. Jones & Bailey, of Raleigh, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The plaintiff is not asking for an examination of the defendants, after pleadings filed, preparatory to a trial, but that he may examine them to elicit certain information to enable him to file his complaint, and as was said by Justice Walker in Bailey v. Matthews, 156 N. C. 81, 72 S. E. 93: "In a proceeding of this kind, it is of the first importance that the application for an order of examination should be under oath, stating facts which will show the nature of the cause of action, so that the relevancy of the testimony may be seen and the court may otherwise act intelligently in the matter, and it should appear in some way, or upon the facts alleged, that it is material and necessary that the examination should be had, and that the information desired is not already accessible to the applicant. It should also appear that the motion is made honestly and in good faith and not maliciously; in other words, that it is meritorious. 8 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. p. 41 et seq. Surely a clerk or judge is not bound to grant such an order if it appears to be unnecessary, or if the evidence sought to be elicited is immaterial, or the application appears to be made in bad faith. It is but just and right that the application should be made under the obligation and responsibility of an oath to protect the respondent against false and malicious accusations and vexatious proceedings. The law will not permit a party to spread a dragnet for his adversary in the suit, in order to gather facts upon which he may be sued, nor will it countenance any attempt, under the guise of a fair examination, to harass or oppress his opponent."

Tested by this principle, the ruling of the clerk revoking the order for an examination, and of his honor confirming his judgment, were in accordance with law. The affidavit of the plaintiff shows that this action is brought for that the defendants had conspired to injure his character by preferring false charges against him, and securing his exclusion from his church, and the information he is trying to procure is the production of certain letters alleged to have been written by the defendant Coleman to a woman, which he says will prove an immoral relationship existing between them. He does not allege that he does not know what charges were made against him, and it is not conceivable that he does not, and the materiality of the letters to his cause of action does not appear. If so, he has sufficient information for preparing his complaint, and the letters are not material for that purpose.

We find no error.

Affirmed.

In re JONES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. CONVICTS (§ 1*)—RESTORATION TO CIVIL RIGHTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Revisal 1905, §§ 2675, 2676, et seq., provide that a prisoner, convicted of an infamous crime and sentenced to imprisonment, may file his petition for restoration to citizenship at any time after the expiration of four years from the date of conviction. Section 2680 provides that where the judgment of the court does not include imprisonment, and pardon has been granted by the Governor, or judgment suspended on payment of the costs, and the costs have been paid, forfeited rights of citizenship may be restored upon a petition filed after the expiration of one year from such conviction. A person convicted for murder in the second degree, and sentenced to 20 years in the state's prison at the September term of one year, was pardoned and his pardon presented to the court which sentenced him at the March term of the next year, and he petitioned for restoration to citizenship at the succeeding September term. Held that, as imprisonment was a part of the judgment, the petition could not be entertained after the expiration of only one year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. CONVICTS (§ 1*)—STATUS—RESTORATION TO CIVIL RIGHTS.

Where the superior court could not entertain a petition for the restoration to citizenship of a person convicted of second-degree murder and pardoned, the court, on appeal from a judgment dismissing the petition, cannot consider the effect of the pardon in restoring his lost rights of citizenship.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Ferguson, Judge.

Petition by Jesse T. Jones, under Revisal 1905, § 2680, for restoration to citizenship. From a denial of the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Brooks, of Smithfield, for appellant.

BROWN, J. The petitioner was convicted in the superior court of Johnston county for murder in the second degree at the September term, 1911, and sentenced to 20 years in the state prison. The petitioner was pardoned by the Governor, and the same presented to the superior court of Johnston county at March term, 1912, and the prisoner was released.

[1] It is evident that the superior court had no jurisdiction to grant the prayer of the petitioner. Under chapter 64 of the Revisal of 1905 (sections 2675, 2676, et seq.) a prisoner convicted of an infamous crime and sentenced to imprisonment may file his petition for restoration to citizenship at any time after the expiration of four years from the date of conviction. Section 2680 provides that where the judgment of the court does not include imprisonment, and pardon has been granted by the Governor, or judgment suspended on payment of the costs, and the costs have been paid, such person may be restored to such forfeited rights of citizenship upon application, by petition to the judge presiding at any term of the superior court held for the county in which the conviction was had, which petition must be filed after the expiration of one year after such conviction. As imprisonment was a part of the judgment of the court in this case, this petition cannot be entertained at this time, as the prisoner was convicted and sentenced only a year ago.

[2] It is unnecessary for us to consider the effect of a pardon. It is very elaborately argued in the brief of the counsel for the petitioner. It may be, as contended, that the pardon is such an act of grace as releases the offender from the consequences of his offense to the same extent as if the offense had never been committed. This question cannot be raised in petition for restoration to the rights of citizenship under the statute, for the court has no jurisdiction to entertain it, except at the times and for the purposes named in the statute. If the petitioner is denied the right of suffrage and registration, or other rights of citizenship which he exercised before the commission of the offense, he may then, by proper legal proceedings, have the full scope and effect of his pardon determined by the courts.

The petitioner will pay the cost of this appeal. The judgment dismissing the petition is affirmed.

COHARIE LUMBER CO. v. BUHMANN et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 250*)—VACATION—FINDINGS.

The court need not state, either in an order vacating an attachment or otherwise, his findings of fact upon which the order was based, unless requested by the adverse party to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-889, 893; Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 920*)—PRESUMPTIONS—INSUFFICIENCY OF RECORD.

Where the facts upon which an order vacating an attachment are based are not in the record, it will be presumed by the Supreme Court that the judge found such facts as would support the order; error not being presumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3714-3721; Dec. Dig. § 920.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 257*)—EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY—VACATING ATTACHMENT.

Fact findings made upon a motion to vacate an order of attachment are conclusive on appeal, unless the adverse party excepts there-to upon the ground that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1494-1497; Dec. Dig. § 257.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 272*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—EXCEPTIONS TO FINDINGS.

Exceptions to findings of fact upon a motion to vacate an attachment must be made in apt time and in the proper manner to be reviewable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1611-1619; Dec. Dig. § 272.*]

5. ATTACHMENT (§ 261*)—VACATION—NECESSITY OF UNDERTAKING.

Revisal 1905, § 774, provides that defendant may apply for an order to discharge an attachment, and, if it be granted, all the proceeds of the sale of attached property, and all of the property held under the order shall be delivered to defendant and released from the attachment. Section 775 provides that, on such application, defendant shall deliver an undertaking with sureties to the effect that the sureties will pay plaintiff the amount of the judgment which may be recovered against defendant in the action, not exceeding the sum specified in the undertaking, which shall at least be double the amount claimed by plaintiff. Held, that the statute only applied where the attachment was properly issued under the statute, and an undertaking was not required if the attachment was invalid, or was improperly sued out.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 929-944; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Allen, Judge.

Action by the Coharie Lumber Company against W. C. Buhmann and another, in which attachments were issued. Judgment vacating the attachments, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. W. Little and John D. Bellamy, both of Wilmington, for appellant. Davis & Davis, of Wilmington, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This is an action to recover $3,000, the penalty of a bond given by W. C. Buhmann, as principal, and F. G. Buhmann, as surety, for the faithful performance, by W. C. Buhmann, of a certain contract between him and plaintiff, and for the further recovery of the amount of a note for $2,500, made by W. C. Buhmann and indorsed by F. G. Buhmann, and deposited with plaintiff as collateral to secure the payment of three promissory notes, each for $500, given by W. C. Buhmann to plaintiff, and of an open account for money advanced and supplies furnished by plaintiff to the said W. C. Buhmann. Warrants of attachment were issued and levied on property of defendants in this state. They were based upon affidavits which alleged that W. C. Buhmann is not a resident of the state, and that F. G. Buhmann, though alleged to be a nonresident, had secreted himself in the state with the purpose of avoiding the service of process, and had assigned, disposed of, and secreted, or was about to assign, dispose of, or secrete, his property in this state, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. The case was heard in the court below, after special appearance by defendants, upon a motion to vacate the warrants of attachment, and the affidavits filed by the parties. The court ordered that the attachments be vacated, but without setting out the facts upon which the order was based.

[1]. The judge was not required to state his findings of fact in the order or otherwise, unless requested by the plaintiff to do so. This has been thoroughly settled by the authorities, and notably in Millhiser v. Balsley, 106 N. C. 433, 11 S. E. 314. As there seems to be some misapprehension upon this subject, we reproduce what is said by Chief Justice Merrimon in that case: "It was not necessary in this case that the court should set forth in the judgment vacating the warrant of attachment its findings of facts on which the same was founded. The statute does not so require, and to do so would more or less incumber the record without serving any necessary or useful purpose, unless a party should desire to assign error. In this and like cases, it is the province of the judge in the court below to hear the evidence, usually produced before him in the form of affidavits, find the facts, and apply the law arising thereupon. Pasour v. Lineberger, 90 N. C. 159, and the cases there cited. If a party should complain that the court erred in so applying the law, then he should assign error and ask the court to state its findings of the material facts in the record, so that he might have the benefit of his exceptions on appeal to this court. In that case it would be error if the court should fail or refuse to so state its findings of fact, and the law arising upon the same. Such practice affords the complaining party reasonable opportunity to have errors of law arising in the disposition of incidental and ancillary matters in the action corrected by this court, while in very many cases it lessens the labor of the court below, expedites proceedings in the action, and saves costs." So we said in Pharr v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 418, 44 S. E. 37: "This court cannot pass upon the affidavits, but, in order to entitle the moving party to a review here of the ruling below, the facts must be found and spread upon the record, and the court must always find the facts when requested to do so"—citing Smith v. Whitten, 117 N. C. 389, 23 S. E. 320; Albertson v. Terry, 108 N. C. 75, 12 S. E. 392.

[2] Where the facts are not set out in the record, we will presume that the judge found such facts as would support the order, or judgment, as the case may be. We do not presume that error was committed by the court. It must be shown by the party alleging it. Pharr v. Railroad, supra; State v. Taylor, 118 N. C. 1262, 24 S. E. 526; Albertson v. Terry, supra.

[3] Likewise the findings of fact upon such a motion are not reviewable here, but are conclusive upon us. Hale v. Richardson, 89 N. C. 62; Taylor v. Pope, 106 N. C. 267, 11 S. E. 257, 19 Am. St. Rep. 530; Burke v. Turner, 85 N. C. 500; Harriss v. Sneed, 101 N. C. 273, 7 S. E. 801; Love v. Moody, 68 N. C. 200; Travers v. Deaton, 107 N. C. 502, 12 S. E. 373.

[4] This rule, of course, is subject to the qualification that a party may except to the findings of fact upon the ground that there is no evidence to support them, but the exception must be made in apt time and in the proper way. Travers v. Deaton, supra. Assuming that the judge found such facts as warranted the order, and being concluded by them, as much so as if they had been fully set out in the order, the necessary conclusion is that there was no error in vacating the attachment, as there is no foundation for it to rest upon.

[5] The learned counsel for defendant suggested in argument, and this is one of his assignments of error, that the defendants should have been required by the court to give an undertaking under Revisal, §§ 774, 775, but we do not think those sections will bear such a construction. They were intended to apply where the defendant comes in and moves to discharge the property from the attachment upon giving the required security and without regard to the validity of the attachment. They are rather predicated upon the idea that the attachment was properly issued for one or more of the causes prescribed in the statute, and the defendant appears, submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and agrees to file an undertaking, with sufficient surety, in lieu of the attached property, and conditioned to pay the debt if the plaintiff succeeds in the action. A cursory reading of those sections will disclose this as the purpose of their enactment. It was not supposed that plaintiff should be entitled to security from the defendant if the attachment is invalid, or was not properly sued out. The attachment then falls, and the right to security is extinguished. It is said in 3 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. at page 77, citing cases in the notes: "Attachments may be dissolved by traversing in the motion for dissolution the facts alleged in the affidavit as grounds for the attachment by pleading some irregularity of a fatal character in the proceedings, or by giving bond to the sheriff to pay the debt, thereby releasing the property." And at page 84: "It is generally provided by statute that the attached property may be discharged from the attachment lien by executing in favor of the plaintiff, or, in some states, the officer who executes the attachment, a bond, with sufficient security, conditioned upon the faithful performance of whatever judgment shall be rendered in the action." But the point is determined in Bear v. Cohen, 65 N. C. 511, where it is said: "An attachment or other provisional remedy will be vacated without any undertaking by the defendant, by a judge, if on its face it appears to have been issued irregularly, or for a cause insufficient in law, or false in fact." Rowles v. Hoare, 61 Barb. (N. Y.) 266. The rule is well stated in Bates v. Kilian, 17 S. C. 553: "Attachments may be dissolved or defeated upon two grounds: (1) Where some irregularity of a fatal character appears on the face of the proceedings; and (2) because of the fact that the allegations upon which it may issue are untrue. The dissolution in either case may be had upon motion; the first being made upon the papers, and the second upon affidavits as to matters dehors the record. These causes go to the root of the attachment, especially in the last class of cases, and, when they exist, the effect of their interposition is not simply to release the property, but to entirely vacate and set aside the attachment proceedings. Besides this remedy, in cases where the attachment has been irregularly issued, or issued without warrant of law, section 265 of the Code, supra, provides for the release of the property attached, where the attachment has been legally issued, and there is no objection as to its regularity or want of observance of proper form, the effect of which provision, when adopted by the dependant, is to convert the action from one in rem to one in personam, with security by the defendant for the payment of the debt. This is done by permitting the defendant to give bond for the payment of the debt, in the event that the plaintiff's action succeeds, the purpose of an attachment being to obtain security for the debt by securing a lien on property. The bond provided for is substituted in the place of this lien and the property is released." When there is any fatal defect in the attachment proceedings, parties would doubtless avail themselves of the chance offered to attack the process and vacate the same, thereby releasing the property from the lien, without any further liability. The relief provided by Revisal, §§ 774, 775, was without doubt intended primarily to provide for those cases where the attachments are regular and valid, and yet where it would be a hardship to the debtor if he is deprived of the use and enjoyment of his property during the pendency of the action. This remedy respects the interests of both creditor and debtor, as it gives the creditor a security in the form of an undertaking, which is, by the law, considered as reliable as the lien displaced by it, and an adequate protection, while the debtor is restored to the possession of his property. Bates v. Killian, supra.

It appears that an undertaking was given to the sheriff for the release of the property, but what effect it will ultimately have in securing the plaintiff's claim, if established, is not now before us for decision.

No error.

A gift of money or other property by a parent to a child is presumptively an advancement; but the presumption may be rebutted by parol, though there is a recital of the consideration in the instrument of conveyance, and the question whether there is a gift or loan, or an advancement, must be tested by the intention of the parent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Fannie H. Thompson against Marcellus Smith and another, administrators of J. R. Smith, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 74 S. E. 635.

J. H. Fleming, of Raleigh, for appellant.
Bart M. Gatling, of Raleigh, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This case was before us at a former term and is reported in 156 N. C. 345, 72 S. E. 379. We then held that the presiding judge committed an error in affirming the referee's findings of fact, merely because there was, in his opinion, some evidence to support the same, but without himself passing upon the evidence and its probative force, and exercising his own judgment as to whether the facts so found had been established by the proof. The case was remanded, to the end that it might be heard in accordance with this rule. It is now before us upon the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the referee, Mr. John W. Hinsdale, Jr., which have, upon due consideration of the evidence and the law, been confirmed by his honor, Judge James L. Webb. The matter as now presented to us seems to be largely, if not altogether, a question of fact. The action was brought by the plaintiff, Fannie H. Thompson, heir at law and distributee of her deceased father, J. R. Smith, against the defendant Marcellus Smith and A. M. Thompson, his administrators, for an accounting, and the controversy related principally to the question whether certain lands, which the father divided among his children, were to be regarded as gifts or advancements, and, if the latter, the prayer is to have them account for the value thereof, and for the value of the use and occupation of the lands before the title thereto was completely vested by conveyances.

[1] An "advancement" is said to be an irrevocable gift in praesenti of money or of property, real or personal, to a child by a parent, to enable the donee to anticipate his inheritance or succession to the extent of the gift. 14 Cyc. 162. It is thus defined by Chief Justice Pearson in Hollister v. Attmore, 58 N. C. 373: "An advancement is a gift by a parent to a child, of a portion of his estate, in anticipation of the whole or a part of the share to which the child would be entitled at the death of the parent, under the statute of distribution, in the event of his dying intestate." And by Chief Justice Ruffin in Meadows v. Meadows, 33 N. C. 148: "Advancements are understood to be gifts of money or property for the preferment and settlement of the child in life, and not such as are mere presents of small value, or such as are required for the maintenance or education of the child, which the law throws on the father, at all events, or such small sums as are given to the child to defray the expenses of the ordinary pleasures and amusements of youth in their rank of life." It has been said that, "if a son has deserved a good turn at his father's hands, this is no advancement, but a recompense of that which was formerly deserved." Hollister v. Attmore, supra, at page 375. See Tart v. Tart, 154 N. C. 502, 70 S. E. 929, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 952.

If the lands so transferred by J. R. Smith to his children are not advancements, it is conceded that they were absolute gifts, and the donees are not therefore accountable for their value or the value of their use.

[2] The doctrine of advancements is based on the idea that parents are presumed to intend, in the absence of a will, an equality of division among their children. Hence a gift of property or money is prima facie an advancement; that is, property transferred or money paid in anticipation of a distribution of his estate, but the presumption thus raised may surely be rebutted, and parol evidence is competent for that purpose, even though there is a recital of the consideration in the deed or other instrument of conveyance. Ex parte Griffin, 142 N. C. 116, 54 S. E. 1007; James v. James, 76 N. C. 331.

[3] Making proper allowance for the burden of proof, as fixed by the presumption arising out of the nature or circumstances of the gift, the question of whether there was a clear gift, a loan, or an advancement is to be settled by ascertaining what was the intention of the parent. Thornton on Gifts & Advancements, 591; Melvin v. Bulard, 82 N. C. 33; Harper v. Harper, 92 N. C. 300; Kiger v. Terry, 119 N. C. 456, 26 S. E. 38. This rule as to the intention of the testator is not altered by our statutes. Revisal, § 133, and section 1556, Rule 2. So that, as the question is to be determined by the intention of the parent at the time of the transfer, it was, in this case, largely one of fact, which the referee and the judge have settled against the plaintiff, so far as the division of the lands is concerned, and as to the personalty they have properly allowed the plaintiff the sum of $50, which they found, as a fact, was required to make an equal distribution among the children. There is no question of law involved.

[4] We will not review the referee's findings of fact, which are settled, upon a consideration of the evidence, and approved by the judge, when exceptions are filed thereto, if there is some evidence to support them. Boyle v. Stallings, 140 N. C. 524, 53 S. E. 346; Harris v. Smith, 144 N. C. 439, 57 S. E. 122, and cases cited; Thornton v. McNeely, 144 N. C. 622, 57 S. E. 400; Frey v. Lumber Co., 144 N. C. 759, 57 S. E. 464.

There is an exception as to the payment of a note for $350, given by defendant Marcellus Smith to his father, J. R. Smith. The referee and judge found that this note had been paid by the maker to his father; the plaintiff having contended and offered much and very strong and persuasive testimony to show that it had not been. The referee and judge might very well have found as a fact that the payments, though alleged by Marcellus Smith to have been made by him, were not in truth so made, and such finding would have been fully supported by the evidence; but this exception comes within the same rule we have just stated and applied to the other branch of the case, and the finding must stand, as we will not review it. We concur with the referee and judge in their finding of fact that the transfers of land were clear gifts, for the purpose of equality in the division of his real estate by the donor among his children, and not advancements, and we can only say, as to the note, that plaintiff was merely unfortunate in not being able to convince the learned judge and referee that it had not been paid. In both instances, though, the plaintiff must abide by their decision as to the facts, and this overrules both exceptions.

There is no error in the case, and we therefore affirm the judgment.

TOWN OF WARSAW v. MALONE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 9, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 918*)—FISCAL MANAGEMENT—ISSUANCE OF BONDS—SUBMISSION TO POPULAR VOTE.

Priv. Laws 1909, c. 204, providing for the issuance by the town of Warsaw of bonds to establish better sewerage and drainage systems and other public improvements, and requiring the question of issuing the bonds to be submitted to the qualified voters of the town, is a restriction on the power of the town to issue bonds without submitting the question to popular vote, even for necessary purposes, for which, in the absence of statute, the town would have the power to issue bonds.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 918*)—FISCAL MANAGEMENT—ISSUANCE OF BONDS—SUBMISSION TO POPULAR VOTE—"PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT."

The construction and maintenance of bridges is a "public improvement" within Priv. Laws 1909, c. 204, requiring the submission to a popular vote of the question of the issuance of bonds by the town of Warsaw for sewerage and drainage systems and other public improvements.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Carter, Judge.

Action by the Town of Warsaw against C. N. Malone. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Johnson, of Warsaw, for appellant. Charles N. Malone, of Asheville, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action submitted without controversy under Rev. § 803. In July, 1912, the commissioners of the town of Warsaw passed an ordinance to issue $5,000 in town bonds running 30 years and bearing 6 per cent. interest, to be sold at not less than par, "the proceeds to be used exclusively for the purpose of building and maintaining bridges in the town of Warsaw." The purchaser declined to accept the bonds, alleging their invalidity, and this is an action to compel him to do so.

[1, 2] The defendant does not contest that bridges are a necessary municipal expense, and that the town, in the absence of legislative restriction, would have the power to issue bonds for that purpose (Fawcett v. Mt. Airy, 184 N. C. 125, 45 S. E. 1029, 63 L. R. A. 870, 101 Am. St. Rep. 825), but he relies upon chapter 204, Private Laws 1909. The preamble and section 1 of that act provides for the issuance by the town of $5,000 in bonds "to establish a better sewerage system and drainage system and other public improvements." The act provides that the question of the issuance of the said bonds should be first submitted to the qualified voters of said town. The above act of 1909, which fixes the amounts of bonds that could be issued and the purposes for which the proceeds could be used, and requiring the issuance to be first submitted to the qualified voters of the town, was intended as a restriction upon the power of the town to issue bonds even for necessary purposes. Murphy v. Webb, 156 N. C. 402, 72 S. E. 460. The words "sewerage system and drainage system and other public improvements" include bridges which are certainly a public improvement. And this attempted issue of bonds in excess of the $5,000, and without submitting their issuance to the qualified voters, is in violation of the act which has thus restricted the amount of the bonds that could be issued for public improvements, and which required even those to be submitted to the popular vote.

The judgment below which held the attempted issue of these bonds to be invalid is affirmed.

MIDLAND TIMBER CO. v. J. F. PRETTYMAN & SONS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 14, 1912.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 106*)—RIGHT TO SUCH PERFORMANCE—COMPLETE DETERMINATION—CONTROVERSY.

In 1902 the owner of land conveyed the timber thereon by deed to plaintiff's grantor, which provided that it, its successors, or assigns, should have 10 years in which to cut and remove the timber, and such additional time as they desired on the payment of specified sums. Before the expiration of 10 years from the making of the deed, plaintiff contracted to convey the timber to defendant, and also notified the grantor of its desire for an extension of time, and tendered the required sum. Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 143, provides that the court may determine any controversy between the parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights. Held that, as the determination would necessarily affect the rights of the grantor, specific performance of the contract between plaintiff and defendant should not be decreed in a suit to which the grantor was not a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 342-351; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Controversy between the Midland Timber Company and J. F. Prettyman & Sons, submitted without action. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Legare Walker, of Summerville, for appellant. Wilcox & Wilcox, of Florence, L. D. Lide, of Marion, and Octavus Cohen, of Charleston, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of his honor, Judge Shipp. The cause before him was a controversy submitted without action, and heard by him on an agreed state of facts, entered into between the appellant and respondent. The controversy involved the construction of a deed for timber on certain lands and the right of way for a railroad over and through the lands. On January 24, 1902, Emma A. Heape made and delivered to the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company the deed in question, which was duly recorded on February 22, 1902, and subsequently conveyed by them to the Midland Timber Company on June 30, 1910. The Midland Timber Company entered into a contract in writing and in proper form, by which J. F. Prettyman & Sons contracted to buy from the Midland Timber Company, and the Midland Timber Company contracted to sell, the property so conveyed by Emma A. Heape. It is agreed in the agreed state of facts that the contract is valid and binding on both parties.

The Midland Timber Company is a corporation owning timber and timber lands, and Prettyman & Sons is a corporation engaged in the business of cutting, manufacturing, and selling timber and lumber. Under the deed of Heape to the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, there is this: "Second. That said second party, its successors or assigns, shall have, and the same is hereby granted to it or them, the period of ten (10) years in which to cut and remove the said timber from said land, and that in case said timber is not cut and removed before the expiration of the said period, then that the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall have such additional time therefor as it or they may desire, but in the last-mentioned event the said second party, its successors or assigns, shall during the extended period pay interest on the original purchase price yearly, year in advance, at the rate of six per cent. per annum." In the same section, after the words "ten (10) years," and before the words "in which to cut," these words are stricken out, "beginning from the time the said second party, its successors or assigns, begins the cutting and removing of the aforesaid timber from the tract or tracts of lands above described." We find, also, in the deed that the "first party further reserves the right to use any timber from the aforesaid tract or tracts of land for ordinary plantation purposes, connected with the said land, this reservation not to include the right to clear the said land or any of it." The land contains 324 acres, more or less, and the amount paid by the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company to Emma A. Heape was $300. The fourth section in the deed from Heape to the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company is this: "Fourth. That the said first party shall and will promptly pay all taxes that are now due or that hereafter may become due on the said land and timber." That neither the grantee nor his assigns, on January 18, 1912, or January 24, 1912, had commenced to cut and remove the said timber mentioned and described in the conveyance from Heape. That the Midland Timber Company desired to have 10 years' additional time for the purpose of cutting and removing the timber, and notified Heape in writing, on January 18, 1912, and at the same time tendered her $18 for one year in advance, being 6 per cent. on the original purchase price of $300, and obligated itself in said notice to make like payment yearly, by year, in advance, for the extension of 10 years.

A like tender was made to and refused by Heape on January 24, 1912. The Midland Timber Company tendered a deed to Prettyman & Sons as in compliance with its contract to sell, and Prettyman & Sons declined to accept, as it doubted the right of the Midland Timber Company to demand an extension of 10 years beyond the original period named in the deed to the Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, for the purpose of cutting and removing the timber and raised this question. Upon the agreed state of facts, his honor made a decree, on May 23, 1912, sustaining the contention of the respondent, the Midland Timber Company, and decreeing that the appellant should accept the title tendered it by the Midland Timber Company and pay the purchase price as fixed by the contract between them. From this decree appeal is taken.

It will be observed that, notwithstanding the fact that Emma A. Heape has a vital interest in the questions involved in this appeal, the question as to whether she is a necessary party is not raised by any of the parties of record; and, as she is not a party to the action, any judgment herein is not intended in any manner to affect her rights. At the same time, we do not think we should determine this vital question as to the right of the parties to have the time extended, unless she is brought before the court. She has a vital interest in this serious question. The suit is in the nature of a suit to require specific performance; and if this court should determine this question it might seriously handicap her in any future litigation she might have with these parties, should the decision be contrary to her interests.

Justice Hydrick, in Marthinson v. McCutchen, 84 S. C. 265, 66 S. E. 123, uses this language in reference to specific performance: "It is well settled that specific performance rests in the sound discretion of the court, and that the court will not decree specific performance of hard and unconscionable bargains, or where the price is so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience and raise a presumption of fraud (Reese v. Holmes, 5 Rich. Eq. 571), and certainly not where it appears that the contract sought to be enforced does not express the true agreement of the parties, either by reason of fraud, accident, or mistake. The general rule is that, to merit the interposition of the court, it must appear that the contract is fair, just, and equitable. Cabeen v. Gordon, 1 Hill, Eq. 51; Holley v. Anness, 41 S. C. 354, 19 S. E. 648."

Section 143 of Code of Laws, p. 73, says: "The court may determine any controversy between the parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties the court must cause them to be brought in."

In our opinion, there cannot be a complete determination of the controversy without the presence of Emma A. Heape, and she should be brought in. It is the judgment of this court that the decree of the circuit court be reversed and case remanded, without prejudice to the rights of either party; and that either or both of them have the right to make Emma A. Heape a party to the suit.

WILSON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 14, 1912.)

RAILROADS (§ 400*)—PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLECT—NONSUIT.

Where, in an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent from being struck by a train while returning to the station of his destination after being carried beyond by the train on which he had been riding, there was evidence from which it might be inferred that, when struck, he was lying on the track where he could have been readily seen by the engineer and fireman had they not been negligent, it was error to grant a nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1365-1381; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by C. Scott Wilson, as administrator of D. R. Wilson, against the Southern Railway Company and another. From an order of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Order set aside, and case remanded for new trial.

Henry & McLure, of Chester, for appellant. McDonald & McDonald, of Winnsboro, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained on account of the wrongful acts of the defendants in causing the death of plaintiff's intestate.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows:

"(1) That heretofore, to wit, on the 31st day of October, 1906, one D. Rainey Wilson embarked as a passenger on a train of the defendant Southern Railway Company on said line of railway, of which train the defendant Ed. S. Mott was conductor and in charge, for passage from Columbia to Smith's Turnout, and paid his fare to that point, and notified the defendant Southern Railway Company, its officers and agents, of his wish to leave said train at that point, but was carried past said station to Ogden, near which station said D. Rainey Wilson, at the invitation of the agents of the defendant Southern Railway Company, alighted from said train, and was seen afterwards while still on the premises of the defendant Southern Railway Company as a passenger, and while leaving the same for his home, and proceeding to make use of the nearest highway crossing for that purpose, was struck by another train of said Southern Railway Company operated in a wantonly, reckless, and negligent manner, was thereby horribly mangled and killed almost instantly, to the damage of the plaintiff and those for whom he sues, $20,000. (2) That the death of the said D. Rainey Wilson as aforesaid was caused by the willful, wanton, and negligent conduct, omissions, and derelictions of the defendant Southern Railway Company, its servants and agents, as proximate causes thereof (a) in failing to notify the said D. Rainey Wilson of the approach to and arrival at his destination of said train on which he was a passenger; (b) in stopping the said train at Ogden in a dangerous and unusual place, and there inviting the said D. Rainey Wilson to alight; (c) in operating the train that struck the said D. Rainey Wilson in a willful, wanton, reckless, and negligent manner, in failing to give the signals required by law at highway crossings; (d) in failing to give the said D. Rainey Wilson a reasonable opportunity to alight at his destination, and by the joint and concurrent willfulness, wantonness, and negligence of the defendants in failing to notify the said D. Rainey Wilson of the arrival of the train on which he was riding at his destination, and in stopping said train at a dangerous and unusual place at Ogden, and inviting said D. Rainey Wilson there to alight, as proximate causes of said death."

The defendants served separate answers to the complaint, and merely interposed a general denial of its allegations. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit, on the ground that the undisputed evidence showed that the plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser, and that there was no testimony tending to show the breach of any duty which the defendants owed him as such.

In granting the motion for a nonsuit, his honor, the presiding judge, assigned the following reasons: "I will have to grant the motion for a nonsuit. I don't think there is any evidence of such willfulness, wantonness, or recklessness as would make them responsible to a man who was a trespasser on the track, and I think the evidence tends to show, and only tends to show, that at the time he was struck the deceased had ceased to be a passenger." (Italics ours.)

The appellant's first and second exceptions assign error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in holding: "That the deceased was a trespasser on the track of the defendant, when the questions should have been left to the jury, there being some evidence tending to show that said deceased was a passenger, or at least a licensee. That the evidence tends to show, and only tends to show, that the deceased had ceased to be a passenger, although it appeared by the evidence that he had been wrongfully carried past his destination, and discharged at the wrong station, and while in the act of returning to his proper destination was struck without warning, or even being seen by those operating the passenger train; the status of the deceased at the time of the injury thus being a question of fact for the jury." There was testimony to the effect that the plaintiff's intestate purchased a ticket to Smith's Turnout, but that the defendant failed to give him notice of the station, when the train arrived at that point, and he was carried to Ogden, the next station, which was about three miles from Smith's Turnout; that the train ran into a side track at Ogden, where it remained about 30 minutes, waiting for the train to pass, which was going in an opposite direction; that plaintiff's intestate was drinking heavily, after leaving Columbia, where he had gone that morning to attend the Agricultural Fair; that, when the expected train arrived, it failed to give the required signals in approaching the station; that plaintiff's intestate left the train upon which he was a passenger before the expected train arrived, and was not seen alive thereafter, but one of his legs was discovered about 300 or 400 yards from the station on the railroad track, in the direction of Smith's Turnout, the main part of his body was also found upon the railroad track, about 50 yards nearer Smith's Turnout, and other parts of his body were scattered along the railroad track for several hundred yards nearer Smith's Turnout; that there is a path near where the leg was found, leading from the dirt road to the railroad track, and which has been used for years by those approaching and leaving the station.

The following testimony of Wm. O. Pearson, a witness for the plaintiff, is explanatory of this locality: "Q. Do you know where that path comes up from that neighborhood road to the depot? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long has that been used Mr. Pearson? A. Oh, ever since I can mind. Q. What did you say? A. I guess about 10 or 15 years. That is as far as I can mind about it. Q. The public used it going to the station? A. Pretty generally; yes, sir. Q. Do you recollect whether a leg was found north of where that goes out to the road or not? A. Found south of the path, where it goes up the railroad. Q. How far south of the path? A. I reckon something like 10 or 15 feet or yards, or something like that, right close to it. Q. Ten or 15 feet south of the path? A. Yes, sir. Q. A person in getting off at Smith's Turnout—oh, I mean at Ogden—which way would he go in getting to Smith's? A. They would go back down the railroad, if they were wanting to go. That would be the straightest way. Q. Have you any public road leading directly from there to Smith's? A. There is some roads go down the railroad. There is no public road, unless you get in the old Saluda road. That is a public road. Q. That is considerably out of the way? A. Yes, sir, about a mile." Plaintiff's attorneys then propounded this question to the witness: "Q. People making time from Ogden to Smith, which way do they generally go?" Upon the objection of the respondent's attorneys, the court ruled that the testimony, which the plaintiff's attorney sought to introduce, was inadmissible. The motion for a nonsuit was granted upon a misinterpretation of the law. His honor, the presiding judge, did not grant the motion on the ground that the undisputed testimony showed that the plaintiff's intestate had ceased to be a passenger, but emphasized the fact that it only tended to show that such relation no longer existed between him and the railroad company. In other words, he passed upon the sufficiency of the testimony, which can be determined only by the jury.

There is another reason why the nonsuit was improperly granted. There was testimony tending to show that the defendant failed to announce the station at Smith's Turnout within the hearing of plaintiff's intestate, or those in the car with him. The complaint alleges negligence in this respect. The rule is thus stated in 5 Enc. of Law, 565: "It is a well-settled principle of law that a railroad company carrying passengers, in order to afford them opportunity to leave the train at their places of destination, is bound to have the name of the different stations announced upon the arrival of the train, and then to stop the train, for a sufficient length of time, for passengers to get off with safety, and that a railroad company is liable for any loss or injury, which may result to a passenger, by reason of a violation of this duty."

There is yet another reason why there was error in granting the motion for a nonsuit. After discussing the mangled condition of the dead body, the respondent's attorney thus explains the manner in which the accident occurred: "These physical facts appear to be conclusive, as to his position on the track, when he was struck by the train, as it is almost impossible to imagine any other position in which his body could have been that would have produced the injuries testified by these witnesses, except that he was lying down on the track, at the time he was struck." Let us even assume that he was a trespasser, and was killed while lying on the railroad track in a drunken and helpless condition. It does not, however, necessarily follow that the defendant could run over him with impunity. The testimony tended to show that it was a bright night; that the track was straight for about 700 yards from the place where the leg was found, towards the north, and was straight for more than 2 miles in the direction of Smith's. The rule in such cases is thus stated in a note to Central R. R. v. Vaughn, 80 Am. St. Rep. 54, by Mr. Freeman, and quoted with approval in Smalley v. Railway, 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489, and Hiltiwanger v. Railway, 64 S. C. 7, 41 S. E. 810: "The true principle it is conceived is that the engineer should see that the track is clear; but that, when an obstruction is perceived, the proper course to adopt will depend upon whether it is a living or inanimate object, whether it is an intelligent human being, under ordinary circumstances, of discerning the means of securing safety, or a brute which has no guide but mere instinct. If the object seen is an intelligent human being, it seems to be generally agreed that the engineer has the right to presume that he will get out of harm's way before the engine reaches him, and that it is not negligence to act upon that presumption." In the case of Sentell v. Railway, 70 S. C. 183, 49 S. E. 215, the court uses this language in regard to a trespasser: "It makes no difference if the trend of the testimony was that Sentell was a naked trespasser; the defendant owed him no duty, viz., that he should not be treated by the defendant, without some regard to the dictates of humanity. There was positive testimony that the engineer could have seen Mr. Sentell in plenty of time to have stopped the train before reaching him and thus have saved his life. All in all, there was plenty of testimony to show negligence. Therefore the special judge should have refused the motion for nonsuit."

The last question is whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing the plaintiff's motion to amend the complaint, so as to conform to the facts proven. The reason assigned by him was that the amendment would substantially change the cause of action. Ordinarily motions to amend are addressed to the discretion of the presiding judge, and his rulings are not subject of appeal; but, if his ruling is based upon an erroneous principle of law, there may be an appeal. In the present case, an order conforming the complaint to the facts proved would not have changed substantially the plaintiff's cause of action. The exceptions raising this question are therefore sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of nonsuit be set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

HYDRICK and WATTS, JJ., concur.

WOODS, J. (concurring in the result). There is no evidence whatever that the defendant's agent did not call out in the coach where Wilson was the station, Smith's Turnout, which was his destination; on the contrary, the plaintiff introduced evidence of other passengers who heard the station called in other coaches. Wilson was not a passenger when he was killed, for the train had stopped at Ogden between 20 and 45 minutes before, and he had left the car and proceeded on his way towards home, several hundred yards up the track. Even if Wilson's station was not called, that negligence was not the proximate cause of his standing or lying on the track, and being run over at the next station. One or two of plaintiff's witnesses stated that they did not hear the train which probably ran over Wilson give the signal for Ogden station, but another testified positively that the signal was blown, and the engine was running with a brilliant electric headlight. The signal, the light, and the noise of the train were sufficient to warn even a licensee to get off the track if in his senses; and, if the defendant was merely negligent, it was contributory negligence in the deceased not to get off the track on the approach of the train, or to lie on the track in such a condition that he would be heedless of its approach.

But contributory negligence is not a defense against willfulness or wantonness. The duty of a locomotive engineer and a fireman to keep a vigilant lookout ahead, for the sake of passengers as well as those who may be helpless on the track, is urgent, and the failure to keep a lookout may be evidence of recklessness or wantonness. In this case the night of the fatality was bright, and the locomotive had a powerful electric headlight. There was evidence from which it might be inferred that Wilson was lying on the track asleep or drunk, or that he was crossing the track on his way home, and that the place was one where persons were to be expected crossing the track. The evidence also tended to show that those in charge of the engine did not see Wilson at all, for the train did not slow up or stop. From all this the jury might infer that no lookout was kept, and that this was a reckless disregard of the lives of those who might be on the track even as trespassers. Sentell v. So. Ry., 70 S. C. 183, 49 S. E. 215. The evidence warrants, also, a rejection of such an inference, but whether the inference should be accepted or rejected was a question for the jury.

1. EJECTMENT (§ 111*)—COMPLAINT—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Plaintiff in ejectment under his general allegation of title and right of possession to the land described and represented on the plat attached to the complaint was entitled to prove title to the land from any source, whether by conveyance or adverse possession, and hence a reference to the land in the complaint as "Lot No. 2," which was the number of the tract shown on an original survey plat which did not conform to the plat attached to the complaint, did not render a verdict finding for plaintiff the "land in dispute" invalid for uncertainty because its limits as claimed did not correspond to the original plat.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 215*)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—INSTRUCTIONS—MISUSE OF WORDS.

Manifest inadvertence in the use of the word "defendant," where "plaintiff" was intended in an instruction, was not ground for reversal, where the court's attention was not called to the error at the time.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Ernest Gary, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Guy Smalls against John J. La Roche. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Henry Parker, of Charleston, for appellant. Logan & Grace, of Charleston, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The appeal of the defendant in this action for the recovery of possession of a small triangular strip of land involves the sufficiency of the form of the verdict and the correctness of some propositions of law laid down in the charge.

The plaintiff and defendant bought adjoining tracts of land from F. Schaffer, and the dispute arose over the boundary line. The jury found a verdict in this form: "Find for the plaintiff the land in dispute and two hundred dollars damages." A motion for a new trial was refused on condition that the plaintiff should remit $100 from the damages assessed by the jury. The condition was complied with, and the judgment entered accordingly. The defendant contends that the verdict should have been set aside for uncertainty, because in limits and area "the land in dispute" as described in the complaint does not correspond with "the land in dispute" as represented on the plats, and the plats do not correspond with each other. Analysis of the issues will show that the objection is not well founded. F. Schaffer had a tract of 987 acres surveyed and divided by Simons & Howe, surveyors, in January, 1881, On January 20, 1892, he conveyed to Guy Smalls, the plaintiff, one of the lots of land, designated on the plat as No. 22, containing 20 acres, in pursuance of an agreement to sell under which Smalls had been in possession for several years. On August 22, 1907, the defendant, John J. La Roche, acquired his title from Schaffer to the lots designated on the Simons & Howe plat as "lots 23, 24, 25, 26, and the area to the southeast thereof." One of the boundaries of this purchase was the Rockville road, and another was "lands of Guy Smalls known as lot 22." The plaintiff thus sets out the basis of his claim and the description of the land in the first paragraph of the complaint: "That he is now, and at the times hereinafter mentioned was, the owner of and entitled to immediate possession of a certain tract of land on Wadmalaw Island, in the county of Charleston, state of South Carolina, and has been the owner of and in possession of said tract of land for more than twenty years last past, to wit, from on or about the month of June, 1881, which said tract of land is described as follows: Being the western part of lot No. 22; measuring and containing on Rockville road 1.85 chains, and in depth running to the southwest corner of said lot No. 22 52.5 chains, more or less; butting and bounding east on remaining portion of lot No. 22; south by Cherry point; north by Rockville road; west by lot No. 23, which said lot of land is shown by being colored red on the plat hereto attached and made a part of this complaint." The plat referred to in the complaint is not that of Simons & Howe, but a plat made for plaintiff in 1909. Commencing with what appears to be an undisputed corner on the Rockville road, the variance in the plats is as follows: The Simons & Howe plat represents the distance to the line of Guy Smalls' lot 22 as 806½ feet; another, the Barbot plat, introduced by the plaintiff, represents it as 670 feet; and the plat attached to the complaint represents it as 693 feet. Had the jury intended to limit the holding of the plaintiff to lot 22 as laid down on the Simons & Howe plat, they must have found a verdict for the defendant; for measuring the defendant's line 806½ feet from the corner on the Rockville road would have brought the disputed strip within his lines. The Barbot plat introduced in evidence representing defendant's line as 670 feet from the corner on the Rockville road must be rejected, for it gave the plaintiff more than he claimed in his complaint. The Simons & Howe plat and the Barbot plat being thus necessarily eliminated, it is clear that the verdict must be referred to the land in dispute represented on the plat attached to the complaint. Thus all uncertainty disappears, and the meaning of the verdict is made clear.

[1] It is true that the plaintiff in his complaint describes his land as "lot No. 22," but he sets out its boundaries and dimensions by a plat attached, which did not correspond to the Simons & Howe plat. Under his general allegation of title and right of possession to the land described and represented on the plat attached, he had a right to prove title to the land so described from any source, whether conveyance or adverse possession; and the issue of title by adverse possession was therefore properly submitted to the jury. It may be that the plaintiff might have been required to make his complaint more definite and certain by stating whether he claimed only lot 22 as laid down on the Simons & Howe plat, but that point was not before the court.

[2] The court, in the following sentence of the charge, by a manifest inadvertence, used the word "defendant" where we have italicized it for "plaintiff," for the plaintiff and not the defendant had set up adverse possession, and the defendant had claimed that the plaintiff, and not himself, had dispossessed himself of the disputed land at the demand of the true owner, and had thus acknowledged defendant's title and broken the continuity of the alleged adverse possession: "Now the defendant's position is that he did not trespass upon the plaintiff's land, but that he is simply asserting his title to that which under his deed he is entitled to, and the possession which the defendant sets up is not continuous for 10 years. He admits that by dispossessing himself he recognizes the title of the plaintiff in that period, if such is a fact, and you are to say whether that is a fact." If counsel for defendant thought that the inadvertence of saying "defendant" when "plaintiff" was meant was not manifest to the jury, he should have called it to the attention of the circuit judge.

Affirmed.

HENRY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1912.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 55*)—MENTAL ANGUISH.

In the absence of statute, damages for mental anguish cannot be recovered in an action for injuries to personal property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 381*)—ISSUES AND PROOF.

The trial court may properly exclude testimony tending to support irrelevant or immaterial allegations allowed to remain in the complaint or answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1238, 1253-1279; Dec. Dig. § 381.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—NONEXPERT TESTIMONY.

A nonexpert witness cannot give an opinion, unless he states the facts on which it is based.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2292-2305; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 179*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES.

A party cannot complain of the exclusion of testimony, where the questions to elicit that testimony were never propounded to the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1137-1140; Dec. Dig. § 179.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 267*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MODIFICATION OF REQUEST.

Where the court fully covered the law in its charge, modifications of requests are not improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 668-672, 674; Dec. Dig. § 267.*]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 71*)—DAMAGES FOR POLLUTION OF WATER.

Where, at the time plaintiff rented a pasture, which was upstream from defendant's reservoir, the dam was already constructed, that fact gave him sufficient notice to put him on inquiry; and he cannot recover for injuries from the pollution of the stream by matter discharged into the stream by a third party and collected by the dam, save upon showing that defendant negligently constructed and maintained the dam, or willfully or wantonly operated it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 74*)—POLLUTION OF WATERS—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where defendant erected a dam or reservoir under a valid agreement with the owner of the land, his entry being rightful, a tenant of the owner cannot maintain an action for injuries caused by the pollution of the stream by refuse discharged into the stream by a third person and collected by the dam, so long as defendant was not negligent in the erection of the dam.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 62, 63; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 91*)—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

An act based on the belief that it was legal and done for the sole purpose of protecting the actor's right will not subject him to punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 193-201; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 167*)—RIGHT OF EASEMENT.

One having an easement for the maintenance of a dam may do all acts necessary for the complete enjoyment of the same, provided there is no negligence.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Fairfield County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Edward Henry against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Cathcart, of Winnsboro, for appellant. McDonald & McDonald, of Winnsboro, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for actual and exemplary damages, and was tried before the honorable John S. Wilson, presiding judge, and a jury at Winnsboro, S. C., and resulted in a verdict for defendant. It appears from the evidence and pleadings in the case that the defendant entered into an agreement with W. B. Creight in 1901, and by that agreement the defendant acquired the right to erect and maintain a dam on a stream on Creight's land, for the purpose of operating a pumping station to supply its tank of water. The complaint alleges that the Fairfield Cotton Mills were situated on this stream, some distance above this dam, and the refuse from the mills was discharged into this stream. Plaintiff was in possession of a small pasture on this stream, which he had rented from Creight (Creight having died after making agreement with defendant, leaving no will affecting this property, and leaving as his heirs at law a widow and four children); that plaintiff's cattle drank from the water collected in defendant's dam; that in 1905 defendant raised this dam two feet, and it is alleged that this act on defendant's part caused the refuse from the factory to be deposited in the dam, causing the water to be poisoned and polluted, and causing the death of some valuable cattle. Plaintiff alleges that the construction and enlargement of the dam was both willful and negligent. The answer was a general denial, and at the trial the agreement of defendant with Creight was introduced, and defendant introduced testimony showing the death of the cattle was caused by Texas fever. After verdict, plaintiff appeals and files 27 exceptions. These exceptions raise practically four points, and we will adopt the classifications as made on argument before us, as far as possible.

First error, in excluding testimony and restricting cross-examination, as raised by exceptions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8.

[1] Exception 1 cannot be sustained, for the reason that damages for mental anguish, in the absence of bodily injury, cannot be recovered in cases of this character, except under special statutes.

[2] Even though it was alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff had suffered mental anguish, the court was not bound to receive evidence in support of it. In Martin v. Railway, 70 S. C. 11, 48 S. E. 616, the court said that the circuit court has power to exclude testimony tending to support irrelevant or immaterial allegations allowed to remain in the complaint or answer, and that it is not bound to receive such evidence. This is cited with approval in Bromonia Co. v. Drug Co., 78 S. C. 485, 59 S. E. 364.

[3] Exception 2 cannot be sustained, as his honor ruled that a nonexpert witness could not give an opinion, unless he had detailed facts to base it on. Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C. 70, 45 Am. Rep. 761; Chemical Co. v. Kirven, 57 S. C. 448, 35 S. E. 745.

Exceptions 3, 5, and 6, are overruled. His honor was correct in ruling out the testimony. Hand v. Power Co., 90 S. C. 267, 73 S. E. 187.

Exception 4 is overruled, for the reason that his honor was satisfied that the witness had shown sufficiently that he was an expert on Texas fever to express an opinion, and let it go to the jury for what it was worth. In addition to this, the witness did not answer the opinion objected to, and only answered questions to which no objection was made.

[4] Exception 7 is overruled. The testimony sought to be introduced was incompetent and irrelevant, and was properly excluded; and an examination of the record will show that plaintiff's attorney failed to attempt to carry the cross-examination of this witness any further, and did not even ask him the questions which he complains he was not allowed to ask.

Exception 8 is overruled as the testimony of the witness was not in reply to any of the testimony brought out by the defendant. The ruling of his honor in reply to the objection was: "Correct, Mr. Cathcart; you proved that this morning, and there is nothing to contradict that." Here we have the ruling of the court to an uncontradicted fact.

Exceptions 9, 13, and 23 allege error in his honor's charge as to punitive damages; and exceptions 14, 17, 19, and 20 allege error in his charge as to negligent construction of dam, etc. Exceptions 9, 10, 11, and 12 in modifying plaintiff's request to charge.

[5] A careful reading of the charge, as a whole, fails to show that his honor committed any reversible error, or that his charge was prejudicial in any way to plaintiff. He fully covered the law of the case in his own language, and had the right to modify the request to charge submitted to him to conform to his ideas of the language he should use to convey his idea to the jury. Joyner v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 91 S. C. 104, 74 S. E. 825.

[6] While one of the requests to charge was modified to make it more favorable to the defendant than defendant was entitled to, and is somewhat in conflict with the case of Frost v. Berkeley County, 42 S. C. 409, 20 S. E. 283, 26 L. R. A. 693, 46 Am. St. Rep. 736, and cases therein cited, which holds: "If the owner of the land uses it for the prosecution of a business from which injury to his neighbor's property will necessarily or probably ensue, he is liable for damages so resulting, even though he may have used reasonable care in the prosecution of such business"—we think, however, in view of the fact that the dam was there when plaintiff rented the land, he had such notice as should have put him on inquiry as to the right of defendant, and could only recover damages upon showing that the defendant negligently constructed and maintained the dam, or willfully or wantonly operated it. The charge, as a whole, was in accordance with this principle.

[7] The evidence shows that the plaintiff rented from the widow, who, with four children, were the heirs of Creight, who had made the agreement with the defendant to erect the dam, in his lifetime; that the defendant entered the lands, under this right from the owner, in his lifetime; that the entry of defendant was rightful and not tortious, and so long as the defendant was not negligent in the erection of the dam the plaintiff would have no cause of action for negligence. Granger v. Telephone Co., 70 S. C. 528, 50 S. E. 193, 106 Am. St. Rep. 750; Mason v. Telephone Co., 71 S. C. 153, 50 S. E. 782.

[8, 9] As to the exemplary damages, it is said in Gwyn v. Telegraph Co., 69 S. C. 434, 48 S. E. 460, 87 L. R. A. 111, 104 Am. St. Rep. 819: "An act based on the belief that it was legal and done for the sole purpose of protecting actor's right will not subject actor to punitive or vindictive damages." We have examined the record, and failed to discover any evidence that would warrant a verdict for punitive damages. The testimony shows that the cotton mills and dam were both there when plaintiff leased the pasture, and he had notice of the situation when he put his cattle there.

The defendant has raised the height of the dam. "Where one has an easement, such as a right of way, he has the right to do all things necessary for the complete enjoyment thereof, provided there is no negligence." Mills v. Railway Co., 13 S. C. 99; Leltzey v. Power Co., 47 S. C. 464, 25 S. E. 744, 34 L. R. A. 215; Jones v. Railroad Co., 67 S. C. 181, 45 S. E. 188; Lampley v. Railroad Co., 71 S. C. 158, 50 S. E. 773.

[10] The other exceptions raise the point that the Orelight agreement should have been recorded. There is nothing in this exception, and it is overruled. We have considered all exceptions, and do not think any of them should be sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

WATSON v. VIRGINIA-CAROLINA LUMBER CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 11, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 120*)—SALE OF STOCK—AGREEMENTS TO REPURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

The owner of all of the preferred stock of a corporation, who also owned a majority of all the stock, sold shares of common stock to plaintiff under an agreement to repurchase when plaintiff's husband should cease to be the general manager of the corporation at a specified price, plus the proportionate share of the net profits of the corporation during the time they were owned by plaintiff and less the proportionate share of any loss during that time. Under the terms of its incorporation, preferred stockholders of the corporation were entitled to 8 per cent. dividends, which in case there were no net profits were to be deferred until there were sufficient profits. While plaintiff was the owner of the stock, no profits were realized. Held, that it was intended to permit plaintiff to stand on an equal footing with the preferred stockholders, and the unpaid dividends did not constitute a proper item of loss in computing the amount to be paid plaintiff for the stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 495, 504; Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—AGREEMENTS TO REPURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

Under such contract, the burden of proving loss was on defendant, and no loss founded on surmise or conjecture could be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 504, 505; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 120*)—AGREEMENTS TO REPURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

Under such contract it was not proper to charge, as a loss, depreciation in the value of the corporation's plant to the extent of 10 per cent. in addition to charging $1,500 expended in improvements as a loss, where the corporation had never before charged up depreciation as a loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 495, 504; Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—AGREEMENTS TO REPURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

Under such contract, loss upon open accounts could not be charged in the absence of testimony that they were made during the time plaintiff's husband was manager, or of any definite evidence that they should be so charged for some other reason.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 504, 505; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 120*)—AGREEMENTS TO REPURCHASE—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

Prior to the employment of plaintiff's husband as manager, the corporation had sold timber owned by it to a third person taking his notes for the purchase price to be paid by deducting $2 a thousand feet for timber manufactured at the company's plant by such third person. The corporation guaranteed to the third person that there were 4,500,000 feet of timber. All the timber cut by the third person was delivered to the company. While plaintiff's husband was manager, the corporation repurchased this timber for the amount still due the company, assuming liability on the notes given on the original purchase. Held, that the corporation, having guaranteed the amount of timber and having received back all the timber, had suffered no loss and assumed no new liability by agreeing to pay the balance on the notes, since, being liable for any shortage, this was not a new liability, but one attaching at the time of the original sale.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by K. E. Watson against the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This action was for breach of a contract between plaintiff and the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company, the owner of a majority of the stock of the Sumter Lumber Company, under which plaintiff purchased 66 shares of the common stock of the Sumter Lumber Company paying for 25 shares and giving her note for 41 shares. By the contract it was covenanted and agreed that, if plaintiff's husband ceased to be the manager of the Sumter Lumber Company, and if plaintiff should desire to sell her stock, the Virginia-Carolina

Lumber Company would purchase it, paying for the 25 shares at par in cash, and, if the Sumter Lumber Company had made money between the date of the contract and the date of the resale, the company obligated itself to pay for the 41 shares $100 a share, plus the proportion of any profit to which those shares would be entitled in the distribution of profit between the shareholders, and, if it should lose money during such time, to pay $100 a share less the fair share or proportion of such loss which would have to be borne by the 41 shares if the loss was made good by all of the shareholders of the company.

The decree mentioned in the court's opinion was as follows:

"This was an action brought by the plaintiff to require the defendant Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company to comply with the terms of a certain contract, between it and the plaintiff, dated September 1, 1909. The defendants all answered, and the defendant Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company denied that it had obligated itself by said contract to purchase the 66 shares of stock therein mentioned, and alleged that the Sumter Lumber Company had lost money between the periods, September 1, 1909 and May 31, 1910, in such an amount that the plaintiff's proportionate part of said loss exceeded the amount claimed by her. The cause was referred to the master for Sumter county to take and report the testimony. The testimony was taken by the master, except that taken de bene esse, all of which was reported to the court. The cause came on to be heard by me at the summer term of the court of common pleas for the county of Sumter. All of the testimony and exhibits were read, and the cause was fully argued on both sides.

"I agree with the attorneys for the defendants, who stated during the argument that practically the only question before the court was whether the Sumter Lumber Company had lost or made money between the periods above stated. The defendants submitted a statement made by Mr. Charles A. Peple, an expert accountant, which statement upon its face shows a loss between said periods of $6,536.61.

"It appears from the evidence that when C. G. Watson took charge of the Sumter Lumber Company, as its manager, the real estate upon which the plant of the Sumter Lumber Company is located was being carried on said books at the value of $3,500. It further appears from the evidence that, when said books were turned over to the expert accountant after the close of Mr. Watson's administration, said real estate had been put down at $10,000, an increase of $6,500. It further appears that this fact was called to the attention of Mr. Richard T. Yates, the president of said company, and this item was changed and carried back, and the real estate, instead of being carried at the beginning of Mr. Watson's administration at $3,500, was changed to $10,000. The evidence shows that this real estate gradually increased in value from the time it was bought until Mr. Watson ceased to be manager of Sumter Lumber Company, and that said increase was in about the same proportion for the entire time. This real estate was purchased by the Sumter Lumber Company the last of February in the year 1907 and had been owned by them two years and six months before the beginning of Mr. Watson's administration, and this administration continued for a period of nine months. Accepting Mr. Yates' statement that the real estate had increased in value in the sum of $6,500 during the two years and six months, and accepting the statement of their witness, Mr. McLaurin, that the same ratio of increase continued during Mr. Watson's administration, I find that the increase in the value of said real estate during the nine months of Mr. Watson's administration would be about $1,949.94. This increase should have appeared in the inventory of the balance sheets introduced in evidence as a credit, and this would have reduced the loss during said period by said amount. The apparent loss of $6,536.61, reduced by this amount, would leave an apparent loss of $4,586.67.

"Under the contract between the plaintiff and Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company, 41 shares of stock therein referred to should bear their proportionate share of this loss. The evidence shows that there were 400 shares of stock of the Sumter Lumber Company, and the proportionate share of the said 41 shares would be $\frac{41}{400}$ of the above-mentioned sum: $\frac{41}{400}$ of \$4,586.67 amounts to \$470.13, which would be the proportionate share which Mrs. Watson should bear of said loss. In addition to the loss which appears from the statements introduced in evidence, the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company endeavors to have the following items charged as an additional loss during the period of Mr. Watson's administration: $\frac{2}{13}$ of 8 per cent. of \$20,000 preferred stock of Sumter Lumber Company, \$1,200; expense inventory, \$208.50; depreciation in plant, \$3,945; loss on open accounts, \$107.49; loss on Jackson timber deal, \$5,000. This defendant also has attempted to make Mrs. Watson responsible for what it alleges to have lost upon some timber deal in Virginia.

[1] "I find from the evidence that, at the time of the purchase by Mrs. Watson of the 66 shares of stock of the Sumter Lumber Company, the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company was the owner of all of the preferred stock, and this is the stock upon which they wish to charge Mrs. Watson with dividends. I find from the instrument, increasing the capital stock of the Sumter Lumber Company, that the 8 per cent. dividend should be paid out of the net profits of the corporation, and there is no provision for paying said dividend out of any other sum before the final liquidation of the company. The contract under which this action was brought provides that the 41 shares of common stock sold to Mrs. Watson should participate in any net profits which said company might realize during the term of said contract, and that it should likewise charge any proportion of any loss in case said company should lose money during the continuance of said contract.

"It appearing from the evidence that the company realized no net profit during this period, and it appearing from the contract between the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company and Mrs. K. E. Watson that the said company who owned all of said stock agreed to allow the said 41 shares to participate in any profits, and to that extent stand upon an equal footing with the preferred stock, I do not think that the said company can now be permitted to claim a dividend and charge the same against Mrs. Watson's stock. I find that this was not contemplated by the parties when the contract was entered into. In addition to this, I find, as a further bar to this claim, the fact that, according to the terms of the instrument increasing the capital stock of the Sumter Lumber Company, in case there should be no net profits, then the 8 per cent. dividends upon the preferred stock would be deferred until there were net profits sufficient to pay the same, and, in case there should never be such net profits, then the payment should be deferred until final liquidation, and that it then should be paid from the proceeds of said liquidation. Therefore, if Mrs. Watson were now required to bear the proportion of said dividends which her stock represents, the company in subsequent years might realize sufficient net profits to pay all of these dividends, and Mrs. Watson would have sustained an injustice, and, further, this would amount to paying said dividends at this time from the capital stock held by Mrs. Watson when the instrument above referred to provides that the proceeds of the capital stock shall only be accountable for said dividends after final liquidation. Before this time arrives all of said dividends may be paid from the net earnings of the company.

"I therefore hold that this item of $1,200 is not a proper charge as a loss during Mr. Watson's administration.

[2] "The next loss which the defendant seeks to charge up in addition to the loss shown by the statement is the item of expense inventory, amounting to $208.50. I find from the testimony of Mr. Peple that there appears upon the books of the Sumter Lumber Company an asset of $1,251 under the caption of expense inventory. Mr. Peple stated that this was doubtless made up of various items, such as taxes, insurance, interest, etc., which had not yet been expended, and he therefore omitted it from his loss column in the final statement of May 31, 1910. The attorney for the defendant sought to ascertain what proportion of this amount should have been charged into the loss column at that time. The testimony of Mr. Peple upon this point is not sufficiently definite to warrant me in charging $208.50 as a loss during this period. It was incumbent upon the defendant to make an accounting and show some definite loss, and I do not feel warranted in charging against the plaintiff any loss founded upon surmise or conjecture. I refuse to allow this item as a loss during Mr. Watson's administration.

[3] "The next item sought to be charged up as a loss is depreciation in plant account, $3,945.

"The testimony shows that, during Mr. Watson's term, there were expended in improvements and repairs about $1,500, and that this amount was charged to the expense account, which is a branch of the loss account. All the witnesses who testified upon this question said that the Sumter Lumber Company had never before charged up a depreciation upon the plant account, and I find as a matter of fact that such a charge was not in the contemplation of Mrs. Watson and the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company when their contract was entered into. I do not think it would be just to charge as a loss the sum of $1,500, expended in improving the plant, and also charge 10 per cent. upon the value of the plant as depreciation, which would also amount to a direct loss. This had not been the custom of the company, it had never been done before, it had not been charged up by the bookkeeper who kept the books for the company at the time Mr. Watson ceased to be manager, and I do not believe that Mrs. Watson ever agreed that the 41 shares of stock should bear any part in such a loss, in fact the company, would be under the necessity of actually earning $3,945 in the operation of its plant in order to come out even at the end of the year and leave no profits in which the 41 shares could participate, if such a charge were permitted. I find from the testimony that most of the improvements, making up the sum of $1,500 which I have allowed as a charge in the loss account, were improvements made upon the plant just a few months before Mr. Watson's administration ceased, and that they left the plant in better condition than it was on September 1, 1909, and, instead of the plant depreciating in value during his administration, it actually increased, and I therefore refuse to allow this item as a loss during the term of Mr. Watson's administration.

[4] "The next item sought to be charged up as an additional loss is loss of open accounts, $107.49.

"The testimony of Mr. Yates shows that this amount is made up of several items from various individual accounts, and he could not tell which of these accounts were made during Mr. Watson's administration. Of course, they could not be chargeable against Mrs. Watson unless they were incurred during the continuation of her contract, unless there was definite evidence that for some other reasons they should be so charged. In the absence of such testimony, I must refuse to allow this item.

"The next and the last additional item sought to be charged up as a loss is the loss on the Jackson timber alleged to be $5,000. I find as a matter of fact that there was no such loss properly chargeable during this period. There are numerous reasons for my conclusion upon this matter, but it should be sufficient only to enumerate the following:

"The plaintiff contends that the Jackson timber deal was in reality only a method on the part of the Sumter Lumber Company of getting notes from Mr. Jackson upon which to raise some money, and that these were simply accommodation notes.

"The defendants contend that the sale to Mr. Jackson and repurchase were bona fide. In order to arrive at a just conclusion upon this matter, it is well to revert to the original purchase of this timber by the Sumter Lumber Company. Mr. Yates testified that the company had paid $13,500 for this timber, when it originally bought the same. I find, as a matter of fact, that it paid not over $3,500 for the same, and this was a fair market price for it. Mr. Yates testified that he had some claim against Mr. McLaurin which he estimated at $10,000. There was no proof of the claim in any amount, and, even if there had been, it could not increase the value of the timber which was purchased with the money of the Sumter Lumber Company, and, if any loss was sustained in this timber transaction, it was sustained at the time McLaurin made the purchase for the Sumter Lumber Company and when the Sumter Lumber Company dropped this claim against McLaurin. As it appears from the testimony that the Sumter Lumber Company paid all the money that was paid for these several tracts of timber, and this did not exceed $3,500, and the consideration for the McLaurin claim was a few days' service of McLaurin in negotiating the purchase of the timber referred to, I assume that the Sumter Lumber Company could not have had much faith in its claim of $10,000 against McLaurin, if it was willing to settle same for a few days' services of Mr. McLaurin in negotiating the purchase of said timber. The timber therefore having cost only $3,500, or thereabouts, there was nothing to show that it was worth anything like $11,000 at the time of the contract with Mr. Jackson, and, in fact, subsequent events have shown that it was worth nothing like said amount. These facts, together with the testimony of Mr. Jackson, lead me to the conclusion that there was never a bona fide sale from the Sumter Lumber Company to Mr. Jackson, but that this transaction was primarily for the purpose of securing Mr. Jackson's notes upon which to negotiate a loan for a much larger amount than they would otherwise have been able to secure on this timber.

[5] "Even if I had not arrived at the conclusion as above set out, I would still decline to admit this item as a loss because the contract or timber deed between the Sumter Lumber Company and Mr. Jackson provides that the notes for $11,000 were to be paid in the following manner: That is to say, the Sumter Lumber Company should deduct $2 per thousand feet for the timber manufactured at their plant by Mr. Jackson from this timber, and it appears from said contract that this was the only manner in which Mr. Jackson as between these parties could be compelled to pay the notes. In the contract, the Sumter Lumber Company also guaranteed that there were 4,500,000 feet of said timber. Upon this guaranty alone, which was made before the contract with Mrs. Watson, the Sumter Lumber Company made itself liable at the rate of $2 per thousand feet for any shortage in said timber falling below 4,500,000 feet.

"Mr. Yates testified that the company got all the timber which Mr. Jackson cut under this contract, and that it amounted to 1,600,000 feet. This would have paid $3,200 on the notes, and Mr. Yates further testified that they took back all the balance of said timber on said tracts of land, but that it was still upon the land, and they had lost this balance by reason of Mr. Watson's negligence in failing to cut and remove this timber before the expiration of the contracts. So far as this contention is concerned, I find from the testimony that Mr. Watson endeavored to have Mr. Yates locate mills upon the said tracts or allow him to do so for the cutting of this timber, and the testimony of their witnesses show that this was the only practicable means of removing the same. I find that Mr. Yates refused to allow this to be done, and even required Mr. Watson to cancel an agreement which he had made for the purchase of a mill outfit to cut this timber. Of course, if a loss had actually occurred from this source during Mr. Watson's administration, it should be charged up regardless of who was responsible for the same; but I find as a matter of fact that the contracts upon this timber did not expire until, in the case of the Abbott contract, the fall of 1910, and in the case of the other contracts, the summer of 1911, and the Sumter Lumber Company had ample time to cut and remove this timber after Mr. Watson ceased to be manager, and Mr. Yates testified that they were still cutting the short timber from some of these tracts. I therefore find that, if there was any loss upon this timber, it occurred after Mr. Watson's administration.

"The attorney for the defendant argued that in all events the Sumter Lumber Company actually paid $7,768.14 for this timber when they took the same back from Mr. Jackson and assumed liability for the notes which Mr. Jackson had given in payment therefor. It should be remembered that the company had gotten all of the timber that Mr. Jackson cut from the land, and when they canceled the contract it took back the remaining timber standing upon said tract, and, having guaranteed the quantity sold, they made themselves liable at the time of entering into that contract for any shortage in the quantity of timber sold, and, if there was a shortage, then by assuming to pay the balance upon the notes, they were not assuming a new liability, but simply recognizing one which had attached to them from the beginning. This, however, would not show any actual loss in this timber transaction, because, the timber having originally cost less than $3,500, it is very clear from the testimony that the Sumter Lumber Company has received back a great deal more than this amount from said timber.

"So far as the contention of the defendants with respect to the loss upon the timber deal with the Danville Lumber Company is concerned, I find that they have failed both to show any loss in this transaction and to connect Mrs. Watson with the same. The Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company has not made any showing sufficient to enable the court to say that there has been a loss upon this timber.

"I find from the evidence that the timber was gone over before the purchase by Mr. Yates and his estimator, both of whom represented the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company, and they both appeared to be timber men of equal experience with Mr. Watson, and the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company in the purchase of said timber did not rely upon the estimate of Mr. Watson, as is shown by the evidence, and especially in the correspondence of Mr. Yates to Mr. Watson.

"I further find that there is no evidence of any representation made by Mr. Watson which would amount to a guaranty, and, even if there had been, there is no evidence which would make Mrs. Watson responsible in law for such representations, and this claim cannot be allowed as a loss in this accounting.

"In so far as the claim of the defendants is concerned that the Sumter Lumber Company lost large sums of money through the negligence of Mr. Watson, I hold from the terms of the contract that Mrs. Watson was only to be charged with her proportionate share of the loss actually sustained without regard to the negligence or faithfulness of any employé. Besides, I find as a matter of fact that there was no negligence shown on the part of Mr. Watson as manager of the Sumter Lumber Company.

"Having reached the conclusions above stated, I hold, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to have the defendant Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company perform its contract, and repurchase said 66 shares of stock, paying for 25 shares of the same the sum of $2,500 and for 41 shares of the same the sum of $4,100, less $470.13, and in settling for same the defendant shall have the right to cancel as part payment of these amounts, the note for $4,100, without interest, which would leave the said defendant indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,029.87, with interest thereon from the 1st day of June, 1910.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company in the sum of $2,029.87, together with interest upon said amount from June 1, 1910, at 7 per centum, together with the costs of this action, and that upon payment of said judgment the said 66 shares of stock shall become the property of the Virginia-Carolina Lumber Company, and the proper officer of the Sumter Lumber Company is hereby authorized and directed to make the necessary and usual transfer of said stock at such time."

WALKER v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1912.)

1. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—NEGLIGENCE OF TELEPHONE COMPANY—INJURY TO PEDESTRIAN.

In an action for injuries caused by alleged negligent mismanagement of a telephone company, whereby plaintiff was injured by coming in contact with a charged guy wire, evidence held to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

2. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIAN—STATEMENT OF ISSUES.

Where the court, in the instructions, explaining the contention of plaintiff, seeking to recover for injuries caused by coming in contact with an uninsulated guy wire of a telegraph company, stated that plaintiff contended that he did not know the wire was charged, that he went to help a man who had fainted, that there was nothing to warn him that the wire was charged, and he inadvertently made a circuit with it, it was merely a statement of the issues, and not a charge on the facts.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Alexander Walker, by his guardian ad litem, Charles Walker, against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company and the Spartanburg Street Railway, Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bomar & Osborne, of Spartanburg, for appellants. Carlisle & Carlisle and Charles P. Wofford, all of Spartanburg, for respondents.

FRASER, J. [1] This is an action for damages for personal injury. Plaintiff alleges: "That said accident occurred on account of the negligence, carelessness, and mismanagement of the property of said defendants, by reason of their recklessly and willfully maintaining concurrently wires, either charged with electricity or conductors of electricity, erected or strung in close proximity, and in such a manner that one is likely to fall upon or come in contact with the other, thereby sending a heavy charge of electricity through the said guy wire, which was recklessly and willfully allowed to remain in a position that any passer-by acting in a lawful manner, and not as a trespasser would be likely to come in contact with thereby producing possible destructive consequences." Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $345. From this judgment the defendants appealed.

There are 10 exceptions:

1. "(1) In permitting the plaintiff in reply to examine J. L. Lee on matters upon which neither of the respondents had introduced any evidence, and in asking the said witness the following questions, and allowing him to answer the same, against the objections of the respondents, to wit: Q. Did you ever see this guy wire that we have been talking about here that is said to have killed Mr. Huggins and injured Alexander Walker? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see it often? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you ever notice it at night? A. Yes, sir. Q. What result did you see from the passing of that guy wire through that tree near the post? A. I have seen fire in the tree. Q. Did you see that more than once? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long before this accident, if you can fix the time? A. I do not know, sir. Q. Was there any other wire through that tree, except the guy wire we have been talking about? A. No, sir. The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this was allowing evidence to be introduced upon new matter in reply, and after the defendant had closed its case; such evidence not being in reply to any evidence which has been introduced in behalf of the respondents."

The time at which testimony shall be introduced is in the discretion of the trial judge. If the appellants desired to controvert the statements of the witness, they ought to have asked permission to do so. It was merely cumulative any way, as the witness Thomas Williams had testified on the same subject. This exception is overruled.

2. "(2) Because when his honor undertook to tell the jury what rule the Supreme Court has laid down in reference to the duty of a company using electricity over wires, charged the jury as follows: 'And that they lay down the rule that I have just given you, that they must so construct them and so safeguard them—or so insulate them—they must use that degree of care in securing them and insulating them that a man of ordinary prudence and foresight and caution would be expected to use under the same circumstances, to prevent an injury to a citizen or his property'—charged upon the facts contrary to the provision of section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution of this state, and instructed the jury as matter of fact that it was the duty of an electrical company in using ordinary prudence and foresight to 'insulate' its wires. It being respectfully submitted that it depends upon the circumstances, conditions, and surroundings of each particular case whether it is the duty of an electrical company to 'insulate' its wires."

This is not a charge on the facts, but a proposition of law pure and simple. The statement that "that degree of care is required, that a man of ordinary prudence and foresight and caution would be expected to use under the same circumstances," extends from the highest degree to none at all and leaves the whole matter to the jury. This exception is overruled.

3. "(3) Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to charge the request of the respondents the Spartanburg Railway, Gas & Electric Company, No. —, without modification, such request being as follows: 'If a person, without having the right to do so, and being in a place where he had no legal right to be, voluntarily and without any necessity takes hold of a wire belonging to a company with which he is in no wise connected, then such person is a trespasser.' And in connection therewith in instructing the jury as follows: 'I am obliged to tell you, gentlemen, that under the laws of humanity that if a person traveling a highway is called to render aid to one who is suffering, and in response to that call he goes to the place, under those circumstances he would not be a trespasser.' The error being, it is respectfully submitted: (a) That as there was evidence tending to show that the guy wires, at the place where the plaintiff alleges he was injured, was outside of any path and some little distance from the place where the man was lying, who it is alleged Walker was called to assist, and was on private property, the request was sound law applicable to the case, and should have been charged without the addition made by his honor. (b) That by this addition to the defendant's request his honor led the jury to believe that, even if the plaintiff was outside of any traveled path and some little distance from where the injured man was lying, plaintiff would not be a trespasser, ever though he voluntarily, and without necessity, got hold of the guy wire and was injured. (c) Because that by this charge his honor placed it in the power of the jury and led them to believe that a person who simply, because he goes to the assistance of an injured man, would not be a trespasser even though he voluntarily and without necessity, at a place where he has no legal right to be, takes hold of a wire of a company with which he has no connection.

"(4) Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing the request of the respondent the Spartanburg Railway, Gas & Electric Company numbered No. 7, to wit:

'(7) An electrical company is not liable for injuries inflicted upon a trespasser unless it is willfully, wantonly, or intentionally done.' The error being as it is respectfully submitted, that as there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff caught hold of a wire of a company with which he was not connected, and at a point where he had no legal right to be, and where there was no excuse for him to be, it was a question of fact for the jury to say whether or not he was under all of the circumstances a trespasser and, if so, whether he was injured and, if so, whether he was injured by any willful, wanton, or intentional act of the respondents.

"(5) Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in not charging requests numbered 6 and 7, submitted by the respondents the Spartanburg Railway Gas & Electric Company without modification and without qualification, the error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that as there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was injured at a point where there was no necessity for him to be, and where he had no legal excuse to be, it became a question of fact for the jury, under the evidence, to say whether or not he was a trespasser."

"(7) Because his honor erred in refusing to charge the fifth request submitted by the defendant Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, to wit: '(5) I charge you further that if this wire was at a place where the plaintiff had no right to be and he went there as a volunteer and took hold of the wire and the company had no reason to anticipate such an act on his part, that the company owes him no duty to keep such wire in a safe condition, and its failure to keep it in a safe condition would not render it liable for his injuries.' The error being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That this request embodied a sound proposition of law applicable to the facts of this case, and should have been charged by his honor. (b) That as there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff was at a place where he had no right to be, and was a volunteer, and that the company had no reason to anticipate that he would take hold of the wire, the request embodied a sound proposition of law and should have been charged."

These exceptions are based upon the erroneous proposition that there was some evidence that the plaintiff was a trespasser as to these defendants. There is not a word of testimony to show that either of these defendants was in possession of the place of the accident or claimed any right to its possession. In this sense "trespass" is the invasion of possession, and only he whose possession is invaded has the right to protection. A man may be a trespasser himself and yet have all the rights of ownership against all the world except the true owner. These exceptions are overruled.

4. "(6) Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to charge the second request submitted in behalf of the defendant Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, to wit: '(2) I charge you further that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff received his injuries by accidentally grabbing the wire in an effort to prevent himself from falling, and missed the post in attempting to lean up against the post, and that such accident was the proximate cause of his injury, then he is not entitled to a verdict in this case, and your verdict must be for the defendants.' The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that there was evidence tending to show that the injury which came to plaintiff came to him by his attempting to lean against a post, and, being about to fall, he accidentally grabbed the guy wire to stop himself. This request was sound law and applicable to the facts of the case, and was designed to submit to the jury the question whether the injuries which came to the plaintiff came to him from an unforeseen accident, and should have been charged by the court."

His honor could not have charged this request. It is to guard against accidental contact with dangerous instrumentalities that safeguards are required when necessary. The deliberate contact, with full knowledge of the danger, is contributory negligence and a complete defense. This exception is overruled.

5. "(8) Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in refusing to charge request No. 6, submitted in behalf of the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, to wit: '(6) I charge you further that the telegraph company does not guarantee safety of its guy wires, and freedom from the presence of the electricity. It is only required to use reasonable care to keep them in a safe position, and, if you believe from the evidence that the proximate cause of the injury was due to the placing of electric wires in contact with the guy wires, then your verdict must be in favor of the telephone company.'"

"The placing of electric wires in contact with the guy wires" was the negligence complained of, and if his honor had so charged he would have charged on the facts. This exception is overruled.

"(9) Error in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, the plaintiff in this case contends that he did not know that this thing here, this guy wire, was charged with a live wire; that while passing a public highway his contention is that he was called by that old winking man there who was digging up the sod. He said he called to him to come and help with that man who he thought had fainted: and his contention is that in obedience to that call he went there, and had nothing to warn him that this wire was charged, alive with electricity, and inadvertently formed a circuit with it. You see, he was on the ground, which was negative, and if he caught a positive wire that was charged with electricity, that would make a connection.' The error being that in so charging his honor charged the jury in respect to matters of fact in violation of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution of 1895, in that: First, he stated to the jury what the testimony and contention of the plaintiff was in regard to matters of fact at issue; and, in the second place, he charged the jury 'that this guy wire was charged with a live wire' and 'had nothing to warn him that this wire was charged, alive with electricity, and inadvertently formed a circuit with it.' It being submitted that such charge was especially prejudicial to the defendants in view of the clear-cut issue of fact as to whether or not the guy wire was in fact charged with electricity, or whether the plaintiff, by unduly pulling it down, drew the other end of it up into contact with the electric wire, thus forming the circuit."

I think this was a charge on the facts, and this exception should be sustained.

6. "(10) Error in charging the jury as follows: 'And the plaintiff's contention is that a man of ordinary prudence and caution in erecting that guy wire there would have seen the possibility or probabilities of coming in contact with another wire, and they ought to have insulated that wire wherever the public came in contact with it.' The error being that in so charging his honor misstated the issues, in that there was no contention on the part of the plaintiff in the pleadings that the guy wire should have been insulated, and his honor's attention being called thereto, should have corrected said charge."

The complaint alleged that the wire, heavily charged with electricity, was so placed that a person not a trespasser would likely come in contact with it. His honor, explaining the contention of the plaintiff, said plaintiff claimed that the wire ought to have been insulated. That was a legitimate explanation, and not a misstatement of the issue. This exception is overruled.

[2] The majority of the court being of the opinion that the ninth exception should be overruled, because it was a mere statement of the issues between the parties, the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; Robert E. Copes, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Fannie Broughton, in her own right, and as administratrix of the estate of C. E. Broughton, deceased, against J. Eugene Broughton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. D. Graham, of Manning, and Lee & Moise, of Sumter, for appellants. Wolfe & Berry, of Orangeburg, Purdy & O'Bryan, of Manning, and Purdy & Bland, of Sumter, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was brought in 1909 by Fannie Broughton, in her own right as the childless widow of C. E. Broughton and as administratrix of his estate, against his other heirs at law for the assignment of a homestead to her, for the partition of the lands of the estate alleged to consist of a tract of land containing 98 acres, and for the settlement of her accounts as administratrix. C. E. Broughton died in 1908, leaving unpaid a judgment in favor of J. W. Weeks for $634.54 entered May 5, 1904. After this action for partition and assignment of homestead was commenced, Weeks had the sheriff to levy on and sell the 98 acres of land, and Charlton Du Rant became the purchaser at the price of $857. After this credit, there remained a balance due on the judgment of $80.48. Du Rant conveyed the land to A. Levi, and Weeks assigned the judgment to Du Rant. Afterwards Du Rant had the sheriff to advertise under the Weeks judgment the interest of C. E. Broughton in other lands, but the sale was enjoined, and Du Rant and A. Levi were made parties to this action. After the sheriff's sale of the 98 acres of land, David Levi, as assignee of a mortgage executed by C. E. Broughton to Marion Maise, commenced an action for foreclosure. By consent the suit for foreclosure was consolidated with this action. By amendments all other persons interested in the estate of C. E. Broughton or in lands in which he had an undivided interest were made parties, and all the lands were brought under the complaint, so that the estate of C. E. Broughton might be settled and the legal and equitable rights of all parties adjusted. In this state of the case Judge Copes made a decree holding that the plaintiff as the childless widow of C. E. Broughton was entitled to homestead in the tract of 98 acres, and that this homestead was subject to immediate partition between the widow and the other heirs at law of C. E. Broughton. The homestead right and the right to partition being subject to the mortgage debt, the decree provided for the foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the land, and application of the proceeds to the mortgage debt and then to the homestead, and the remainder, if any, to A. Levi, who claimed under the execution sale. The decree further directed that the other lands should be sold, and that a special referee should call in creditors by advertisement, and take and report to the court all testimony offered concerning their claims.

It thus appears that the circuit court adjudged only two points about which there was any controversy: (1) That the childless widow was entitled to homestead against a judgment entered during her husband's lifetime in favor of one of his creditors for a debt which was contracted after the adoption of the Constitution of 1895, although the homestead had not been laid off to the husband; and (2) that such homestead was subject to immediate partition between the widow and the other heirs of the husband. All the rights of Charlton Du Rant, A. Levi, and other claimants, involving the validity and amount of their debts, the effect of the sale by the sheriff on the judgment debt, subrogation, and other legal and equitable claims of creditors against the estate and against each other, were left open. Nothing, therefore, can be considered under this appeal of Charlton Du Rant and A. Levi, except the two points above indicated as adjusted by the decree.

[1] As to the first point, counsel for the appellants admit that a childless widow had a right to have the homestead assigned to her in the lands of her deceased husband under the Constitution of 1868. That question has been long settled. Moore v. Parker, 13 S. C. 436; Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 17 S. C. 9; Yoe v. Hanvey, 25 S. C. 94; Jeffries v. Allen, 29 S. C. 501, 7 S. E. 828. The reasoning of the court in these cases was that the right of homestead was conferred on the head of the family as the representative of the family and for the benefit of its members, and that when the husband had the right in his lifetime, and died leaving no family except his wife, the right continued in her as the surviving member of the family. It will be observed that this conclusion was reached upon consideration of the language of the Constitution itself aside from the legislative enactments on the subject. Although the point was not particularly discussed, but rather assumed, a homestead was allowed to a childless widow in Ex parte Ray, 20 S. C. 246, under the constitutional amendment of 1880. Counsel have presented an elaborate argument in the effort to show that there is an essential difference between the Constitutions of 1868 and 1895, and that the Constitution of 1895 gives no warrant for the assignment of a homestead to a childless widow without a family. The distinction attempted becomes obviously technical and shadowy in view of the reasoning of the court above set out in the cases cited. It is to the head of the family that the exemption is given in the amendment of 1880 and in the Constitution of 1895 as well as in the Constitution of 1868, and, if the widow was entitled to the homestead under the Constitution of 1868 as the survivor of the husband's family, there can be no reason to refuse to regard her as the surviving member of the family and as such entitled to the homestead under the Constitution of 1895.

[2] There is no ground for serious argument that the homestead assigned to the childless widow of C. E. Broughton is not subject to immediate partition among his heirs at law. Saunders v. Strobel, 64 S. C. 489, 42 S. E. 429.

Affirmed.

Attorney General Lyon and B. Frank Kelley, of Bishopville, for petitioner. R. O. Purdy, of Sumter, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. It appearing upon the hearing of this case that there is involved a question of constitutional law, upon the determination of which the entire court is not agreed: Now, therefore, I, Eugene B. Gary, Chief Justice, do hereby call to the assistance of the Supreme Court all the judges of the circuit court, to meet at Columbia, S. C., on Friday, the 6th day of December, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of hearing and deciding said case. It is further ordered that the clerk of the Supreme Court do send to each circuit judge a copy of the opinions in said case.

WOODS, J. A petition having been presented for the changing of the boundary line between the counties of Sumter and Lee, so as to annex a portion of Lee county to the county of Sumter, the Governor appointed the respondents, D. E. Du Rant, J. P. Kilgore, T. S. Du Bose, and Stanyarne Burrows, to investigate and report to him the facts as to area, population, etc., as provided by the act of 1911 (27 Stat. 43). Thereafter this proceeding was instituted to enjoin the respondents from proceeding, on the ground that Lee county, though created since the adoption of the Constitution, became immediately on its formation an "old county," within the meaning of the Constitution, and, not having over 500 square miles, its area cannot be reduced.

At the argument it was stated that whenever the question has arisen before the different Governors of the state they have adopted the view that the expressions "old county" and "old counties," as used in the Constitution, embraced all counties in active existence, whether created before or after the adoption of the Constitution; and that the expressions "new county" and "new counties" were limited in their meaning to counties in process of formation. It was further stated that Governor Blease had appointed the commissioners with the view of having the matter settled by judicial construction.

The following are the portions of article 7 of the Constitution bearing on the question:

"Section 1. The General Assembly may establish new counties in the following manner: Whenever one-third of the qualified electors within the area of each section of an old county proposed to be cut off to form a new county shall petition the Governor for the creation of a new county, setting forth the boundaries and showing compliance with the requirements of this article, the Governor shall order an election, within a reasonable time thereafter, by the qualified electors within the proposed area, in which election they shall vote 'Yes' or 'No' upon the question of creating said new county; and at the same election the question of a name and a county seat for such county shall be submitted to the electors."

"Sec. 3. No new county hereafter formed shall contain less than one one hundred and twenty-fourth part of the whole number of inhabitants of the state, nor shall it have less assessed taxable property than one and one-half millions of dollars as shown by the last tax returns, nor shall it contain less area than four hundred square miles.

"Sec. 4. No old county shall be reduced to less area than five hundred square miles, to less assessed taxable property than two million dollars, nor to a smaller population than fifteen thousand inhabitants.

"Sec. 5. In the formation of new counties no old county shall be cut within eight miles of its courthouse building.

"Sec. 6. All new counties hereafter formed shall bear a just apportionment of the valid indebtedness of the old county or counties from which they have been formed.

"Sec. 7. The General Assembly shall have the power to alter county lines at any time: Provided, that before any existing county line is altered the question shall be first submitted to the qualified electors of the territory proposed to be taken from one county and given to another, and shall have received two-thirds of the vote cast: Provided, further, that the change shall not reduce the county from which the territory is taken below the limits prescribed in sections 3, 4, and 5 of this article: Provided, that the proper proportion of the existing county indebtedness of the section so transferred shall be assumed by the county to which the territory is transferred."

The first section shows clearly that the convention meant by "old county," as used therein, any county which might be in existence at any time in the future when it should be proposed to take action under it looking to the formation of a new county, and by "new county" only those counties proposed and in process of formation under the law. It will be observed that here the provision is that the General Assembly may establish a new county only when the petition comes from certain electors of an "old county" within the area of the "old county" proposed to be cut. There is no provision nor warrant in the Constitution for a new county to be formed from a section of another new county, or by the petition of electors of a "new county." Hence it follows that, if "old county" is restricted in its meaning to counties already in existence at the date of the adoption of the Constitution, there would be no authority in the Constitution for taking a part of any county formed since the adoption of the Constitution for the creation of a new county; and a county formed since 1895, whatever might be its wealth, area, population, and the need of its inhabitants, could never be divided for the formation of a new county.

Section 3, in providing that "no new county hereafter formed," etc., and section 6, in providing that "all new counties hereafter formed shall bear a just apportionment of the valid indebtedness of the old county or counties from which they have been formed," do not necessarily carry the meaning that counties thereafter formed should remain new counties after their formation, but only that new counties formed after the adoption of the Constitution should not, when formed, contain less than the specified population, taxable property, and area, and should bear a just proportion of the valid indebtedness of the old county or counties from which they were formed.

Section 5 confirms most strongly the meaning we have attributed to "old county" and "new county" in the construction of section 1. Clearly the intention of the section was to protect any county of the state actually in existence, whether formed before or after 1895, from having its territory cut within eight miles of its courthouse. But if "old county," in this section, meant only a county in existence in 1895, then there would be nothing to prevent the line of a proposed new county being run to the courthouse door of any county formed since 1895.

From these considerations it seems clear that two of the first six sections of the article require the construction that, in the formation of counties, "old county" and "old counties" should mean any county or counties formed or in existence at any time that proceedings might be instituted looking to the formation of a new county; and that the other four sections are not in any wise inconsistent with this construction.

It will be observed that these sections all relate to the formation of new counties, and have no reference to the change of county lines. The journal of the convention shows that after these sections were agreed on section 7 was proposed as an amendment. It has no reference to the formation of new counties, but relates to an entirely different subject from that covered by the first six sections, namely, the mere alteration of county lines, by which territory would be transferred from one county to another. The words "new county" are not written in it, but by its proviso, "that the change shall not reduce the county from which the territory is taken below the limits prescribed in sections 3, 4, and 5 of this article," means the same thing as if the words of the sections referred to had been set out in it. So this section distinctly enacts that with respect to the change of county lines, there should be a difference between counties existing at the date of the adoption of the Constitution and those created after.

We think, therefore, it is reasonably clear that in providing for the formation of new counties from those already in existence the convention meant by "old county" and "old counties" any county or counties in existence at the date when it should be proposed to form a new county, and by "new county" and "new counties" a county or counties proposed and in the process of formation; but that in the amendment, providing merely for the alteration of county lines, the intention was to divide the counties with respect to population, area, and taxable property into two classes, namely, counties existing at the date of the Constitution and those created after its adoption.

It is true that this construction is subject to the criticism that it gives to the words "new" and "old" different meanings in different sections of the same instrument; but that is not a cogent objection. The general presumption is that the meaning of a word used more than once in the same statute or constitutional provision is identical; but this presumption is by no means conclusive, and and must yield to the intention appearing from consideration of the entire statute or the entire article of a Constitution. The presumption is manifestly weakened when it appears that the words are used, as here, in connection with different subjects. 36 Cyc. 1132; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. 610; Rhodes v. Weldy, 46 Ohio, 234, 20 N. E. 461, 15 Am. St. Rep. 584; James v. Du Bois, 16 N. J. Law, 293; Sunset Telephone Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 265, 118 Pac. 796; Ryan v. State, 174 Ind. 468, 92 N. E. 340; State v. Knowles, 90 Md. 654, 45 Atl. 877, 49 L. R. A. 695; Gernert v. Limbach, 163 Ala. 413, 50 South. 903.

The presumption cannot have any force in this case, where it is plain the constitutional convention could not have intended the unfair, not to say absurd, results which would flow from holding that section 7, in referring to old and new counties with respect to alteration of county lines, meant the same distinction between "old county" and "old counties" and "new county" and "new counties" as was clearly indicated in the preceding sections in providing for the formation of new counties.

On this reasoning I concur in the conclusion that Lee county, having been created since the adoption of the Constitution of 1895, is a new county, within the meaning of section 7 of article 7, providing for the alteration of county lines; but as soon as it was created it became an old county, within the meaning of the first six sections of the article, providing for the formation of new counties.

WATTS, J., concurs.

HYDRICK, J. The petitioners seek to enjoin proceedings which have been commenced to cut off a part of Lee county and annex it to Sumter county. Lee county was created in the year 1902, under the Constitution of 1895, and statutes enacted in accordance with its provisions. It contains 410½ square miles. The territory which it is proposed to take from it contains 9 square miles; therefore over 400 square miles will be left in the county.

The question is whether this reduction of its area can be made without violating the Constitution. Sections 3, 4, 5, and 7 of article 7, which provides the manner in which new counties shall be established and existing county lines altered, are pertinent to this inquiry. They read as follows:

"Sec. 3. No new county hereafter formed shall contain less than one one hundred and twenty-fourth part of the whole number of inhabitants of the state, nor shall it have less assessed taxable property than one and one-half millions of dollars as shown by the last tax returns, nor shall it contain less area than four hundred square miles.

"Sec. 4. No old county shall be reduced to less area than five hundred square miles, to less assessed taxable property than two million dollars, nor to a smaller population than fifteen thousand inhabitants.

"Sec. 5. In the formation of new counties, no old county shall be cut within eight miles of its courthouse building."

"Sec. 7. The General Assembly shall have the power to alter county lines at any time: Provided, that before any existing county line is altered the question shall be first submitted to the qualified electors of the territory proposed to be taken from one county and given to another, and shall have received two-thirds of the votes cast: Provided, further, that the change shall not reduce the county from which the territory is taken below the limits prescribed in sections 3, 4, and 5 of this article: Provided, that the proper proportion of the existing county indebtedness of the section so transferred shall be assumed by the county to which the territory is transferred."

The contention of the petitioners is rested solely upon this construction of the foregoing sections of the Constitution, to wit, that as soon as a county is established it becomes an old county, within the meaning of the Constitution, relative to all counties thereafter created, and is entitled to the benefit of the limitations prescribed in sections 4 and 5 against the reduction of the area, wealth, or population of any old county in the creation of new counties, or in changing existing county lines.

It is but stating a truism to say that "new" and "old" are relative terms. What is new to-day may be relatively old to-morrow, and, as compared to some particular things or events, it may be new a hundred years hence. The meaning which these words were intended to have in the Constitution must be determined by the context and the general rules of construction.

The strongest argument in support of the contention of the petitioners is found in section 7, which gives the Legislature "power to alter county lines at any time, provided, that before any existing county line is altered," the question shall be decided by a two-thirds vote of the people of the territory affected. The words italicized, and the context, show the intention that the word "existing" should have not only its ordinary meaning, in which it refers to things of the present time, but also a relatively future meaning, and refers to lines existing at any time in the future when it should be attempted to alter them. Therefore the lines of Lee county could not be changed without compliance with this provision, although they were not "existing" at the adoption of the Constitution. The second proviso also lends some support to that contention, in that it expressly makes the limitation of section 5, which, in terms, applies to old counties, applicable to all counties in the alteration of county lines, so that, in the formation of new counties, and in the alteration of county lines, no county, old or new, can be cut within eight miles of its courthouse. While there is force in this argument, we do not think it conclusive.

While the intention of the framers of the Constitution is somewhat obscured by a want of clearness in expression, and, perhaps, also, from oversight of and consequent failure to provide for the contingency presented by this case, yet, when we construe together the various provisions of the Constitution upon this subject, the conclusion cannot be resisted that the framers of the Constitution used the words "old" and "new," in the sections above quoted, with reference to the limits of area, population, and wealth of counties, relative to the time when they were speaking. At that time, and as to those matters, they contemplated only the then existing counties and counties thereafter to be created. The one class they denominated "old"; the other "new." Hence, in section 3, we find them saying, "No new county hereafter formed," etc., showing that they used the words "new county" and "county hereafter formed" synonymously. To say that no new county shall contain less than 400 square miles, and to prohibit the reduction of its area below 500 square miles, is such an incongruity of thought and expression as to forbid the adoption of the application of section 4 to counties which may contain less than 500 square miles. While it is true that a new county may contain over 500 square miles, still, when sections 3 and 4 are read together, the conclusion is inevitable that section 4 was not intended to apply to those counties whose minimum area was fixed at 400 square miles.

The second proviso to section 7, that in altering county lines "the change shall not reduce the county from which the territory is taken below the limits prescribed in sections 3, 4, and 5 of this article," seems to be conclusive of the question. If the construction contended for by petitioners is correct, the inclusion of the limitations contained in section 3 in the proviso to section 7 was useless, because in that event there is nothing to which the limitations of section 3 can apply, and the application of the limitations of sections 4 and 5 alone would have better expressed the intention of the lawmakers.

But we find the limitations of section 3 incorporated in the proviso, and we must conclude that they were intended to have some force and effect and apply to some thing. Furthermore, if the construction contended for by the petitioners is sound, the word "old" in sections 4 and 5 is useless. But we find it there, and the rules of construction require us to give it some meaning, if possible; and we must presume that, without it, these sections would not have expressed the intention of the lawmakers. The express incorporation of the limitation of section 5—a section which previously related to the formation of new counties—in the second proviso of section 7, and making it applicable to the alteration of all county lines, notwithstanding the use of the word "old" in that section, is significant as showing, at least, the opinion of the framers of the Constitution that a section which referred only to "old counties" would not apply in the alteration of any county line, unless made to do so by express reference, which tends to show that they did not think of counties thereafter to be formed as "old counties."

It follows that the inhibitions of section 4 do not apply to Lee county, as that is not an "old county," within the meaning of the Constitution, with respect to the limitations therein mentioned, and that the inhibitions of sections 3 and 5 will not be violated by the proposed alteration of the county line.

The petition is therefore dismissed.

WASHINGTON-VIRGINIA RY. CO. v.
BOUKNIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 18, 1912. Rehearing Denied. Sept. 21, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 35*)—SURPLUSAGE.

In an action against a carrier for personal injuries, a count which alleged that plaintiff was a passenger upon defendant's car, that the car was derailed by the defendant's negligence, and that plaintiff was injured, was supplemented by a bill of particulars alleging that in such count the plaintiff relied upon the presumption of negligence arising from the derailment of the defendant's car, the reason for which was not known to plaintiff. Held, that the language alleging negligence on the part of the defendant in running its car upon which plaintiff was injured might be regarded as surplusage, and that the count without such language was sufficient to make out a case of presumptive negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-80; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

2. PLEADING (§§ 193, 313*)—MOTION FOR BILL OF PARTICULARS.

Where defendant desires a more particular statement of the grounds of complaint, his remedy is by motion for a bill of particulars, and not by demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 425, 428-435, 437-443, 949; Dec. Dig. §§ 193, 313.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Where the relation of passenger and carrier exists, a derailment resulting in an injury to a passenger raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1261; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 121*)—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Plaintiff by alleging acts of affirmative negligence did not thereby waive or lose the benefit of the presumption of negligence arising from the nature of the act alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-220, 224-228, 271; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

In an action against a carrier for personal injuries received by the derailment of the car in which plaintiff was riding, the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case by proving the happening of the accident and his injury, and thereby casts upon the defendant the burden of rebuttal and of explaining the circumstances of the accident so as to relieve itself from liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1261, 1262, 1283, 1285-1294; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON DEMURRER.

The overruling of demurrers to the several counts of a declaration of a complaint is not prejudicial to defendant, where the court, at the close of the evidence and on motion of the plaintiff, strikes out such counts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4089-4105; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

7. PLEADING (§ 328*)—BILL OF PARTICULARS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where plaintiff alleged facts and circumstances out of which the presumption of defendant's negligence arose as a matter of law, the allowance of a bill of particulars which alleged that plaintiff relied upon the presumption of negligence which the law created where the cause of the accident was unknown to the plaintiff was not objectionable as tending to make a new case shifting the burden of proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 984; Dec. Dig. § 328.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 971*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES.

The trial court has much latitude in the matter of recalling witnesses; and its action will not be reversed by the appellate court, except for palpable error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3852-3857; Dec. Dig. § 971.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1047*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ORDER OF ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a carrier for personal injuries, where plaintiff alleged both affirmative and presumptive negligence, and where defendant introduced evidence to show that its machinery was in good order, its track in proper condition, and its cars properly inspected, the admission on plaintiff's case in chief of evidence to sustain the issue of affirmative negligence, which after the case was closed, and his counts upon affirmative negligence had been stricken out on his own motion, would have been admissible in rebuttal of the defendant's evidence as to the condition of its machinery, etc., was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4132, 4133, 4146-4152; Dec. Dig. § 1047.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 550*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

Plaintiff, in an action against a carrier for personal injuries, showed the construction of the interior of the car and aisle, the seats on each side, the seat in which she was sitting, and that, by a derailment, she was thrown violently forward from her seat a distance of at least ten feet against the front door of the car, her head going down near the bottom of the door, and her attending physician stated that plaintiff has sustained an impacted fracture of the hip, to cause which a blow would have to be directed against the hip bone, or plaintiff would have had to fall on the hip. Held that, although there was some variance in the evidence, the physician's testimony was admissible, since the jury might have inferred therefrom that plaintiff was thrown against the seat so as to strike the hip.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2366, 2367; Dec. Dig. § 550.*]

11. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—BURDEN OF PROOF—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Where an injury to a passenger happens as the result of a derailment, the burden of proof is upon the carrier to establish that there was no negligence whatever and that the injury was caused by inevitable casualty, or some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent, so that it was without fault.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1261, 1262, 1283, 1285-1294; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

12. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—QUESTION FOR JURY—NEGLIGENCE.

Where plaintiff, in an action against a carrier for personal injuries, makes a prima facie case of negligence, the question whether defendant had shown by a preponderance of the evidence that it was free from negligence was for the jury.

13. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

Where instructions given have fully and fairly submitted every phase of a case presented by the evidence, the refusal of requested instructions is not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

14. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—PERMANENT INJURY TO HIP.

A verdict of $7,500 on evidence that plaintiff, a passenger, about 30 years of age, in the possession of all her faculties, earning $900 per annum as a government clerk, suffered an impacted fracture of the hip, causing her continuous and intense pain and a permanent injury, so that she would always limp, and the shortening of the limb would increase as time went on, was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-385, 596; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Alexandria County.

Action by C. G. Bouknight against the Washington-Virginia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Moore, Barbour & Keith, of Fairfax, and J. R. & H. B. Caton, of Alexandria, for plaintiff in error. Moncure, Wampler & Gloth, of Rosslyn, and Thos. S. Martin, of Scottsville, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. The Washington-Virginia Railway Company owns and operates a line of electric cars from Washington, D. C., to certain terminal points in the state of Virginia, and this action was instituted by the plaintiff in the court below, defendant in error here, against the said railway company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the defendant company. To the final judgment of the circuit court in favor of the plaintiff for $7,500 and costs, the defendant company brings error.

Seventeen bills of exceptions have been taken and made part of the record, and are made the basis of eleven assignments of error in the trial court's rulings, which are relied on for a reversal of said judgment by this court; but, in the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to consider these assignments seriatim or at length.

The leading facts of the case are that the plaintiff on the 9th day of January, 1911, boarded a car of the defendant at East Falls Church, in Alexandria county, Va., paying her fare to Washington, D. C., where she desired to go; that, when about two miles from the city of Washington, the car upon which the plaintiff was riding was derailed, and she was thrown violently from her seat forward for some distance to the floor, and severely injured.

The declaration contains eight counts, to which and to each count thereof the defendant demurred and filed in writing five grounds for its demurrer, but these grounds, in fact, present but two questions: First, as to the sufficiency of the eighth count of the declaration; and, second, whether or not there can be joined in the same declaration counts charging affirmative negligence and counts relying upon the presumption of negligence arising by reason of the facts therein alleged.

[1] The eighth count in the declaration alleges that the plaintiff was a passenger upon the defendant's car; that the car was derailed and by reason of the derailment the plaintiff was injured. The court, upon motion of the defendant, required the plaintiff to file a bill of particulars to this count, which she did in these words: "That in said count the plaintiff relies upon the presumption of negligence arising from the derailment of the defendant's car, the reason for the derailment charged in said count, so far as said count is concerned, not being known to the plaintiff, and she relies upon the presumption of negligence which the law creates in such cases."

It is true that this count in the declaration went further, and charged that the defendant conducted itself so carelessly and negligently that the plaintiff was injured whilst upon its said car, "the said car being derailed by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the said defendant," etc., but, when this count is read together with the bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff, it is made manifest that the defendant was thereby fully apprised of the case it had to meet.

[2] "If a defendant desires a more particular statement of the grounds of complaint, his remedy is not by demurrer, but by a motion for a bill of particulars." Interstate R. Co. v. Tyree, 110 Va. 38, 65 S. E. 500.

The language of the eighth count of the declaration in this case, charging carelessness and negligence on the part of the defendant in running its car upon which the plaintiff was injured, was to be regarded as surplusage, as the count without this language was sufficient to make out a case of presumptive negligence.

[3] Where the relation of passenger and carrier exists, and there is a derailment resulting in an injury to the passenger, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises. Therefore all that it is necessary for the declaration to allege in such a case is the relation of passenger and carrier, the derailment, and the injury by reason thereof, as was done in this case.

The case here is differentiated from the cases relied on for the defendant by the fact that in none of these cases was there, strictly speaking, the relation of passenger and carrier, and therefore the presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier did not arise upon the facts alleged.

[4] In discussing the second question presented by the demurrer, the learned counsel for the defendant make the contention that the plaintiff, by alleging acts of affirmative negligence in the first seven counts of her declaration, thereby waived her right to rely upon the presumption of negligence arising from the derailment of the car; in other words, that counts charging affirmative negligence cannot be joined with counts in which the presumption of negligence is relied upon.

The same contention was made and ably argued in Walters v. Seattle Railroad Co., 48 Wash. 233, 93 Pac. 419, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 793, but was overruled; the opinion of the court saying: "This contention is not tenable. The plaintiff was not deprived of the case proved by a failure to prove all that was alleged. She was only obliged to prove the substance of the issue, and by the substance of the issue is meant the facts essential to a recovery. * * * Doubtless in many cases it is desirable to plead and prove the exact cause of an accident in order that the question of the defendant's negligence may be put beyond the peradventure of doubt, and thus insure a recovery, where otherwise a recovery might be doubtful, if the presumption alone were relied upon. Such was perhaps the purpose of the plaintiff in this instance. But the plaintiff is not to be deprived of the case her pleadings and proof made, merely because she alleged a stronger case than she was able to prove."

The point made in that case and in this is that where a plaintiff does not content himself with alleging generally that he was a passenger on the car, that a derailment or a collision occurred, and that he was injured thereby, but went further and alleged particularly the cause of the accident, the cause alleged must be proved, otherwise the plaintiff cannot recover. In other words, that to such a case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur cannot be applied.

In Kluska v. Yeomans, 54 Wash. 465, 103 Pac. 821, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1121, the court said: "We follow the rule announced in Massachusetts and other jurisdictions which holds in effect that a plaintiff who proves the happening of an accident and is otherwise entitled to certain presumptions arising therefrom does not lose the benefit of such presumptions because he has alleged what he conceived to be the specific cause of the accident." See, also, McNamara v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 202 Mass. 497, 89 N. E. 131, and cases there cited; McNeil v. Durham, etc., R. Co., 130 N. C. 256, 41 S. E. 383.

[5] It is well settled that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies where the facts alleged in the eighth count of the declaration in this case are proven, and the burden is thereby cast upon the defendant of "explaining the circumstances of the accident so as to relieve itself from liability." City & Sub. R. Co. v. Svedborg, 20 App. D. C. 543; Gleeson v. Va. Midland R. Co., 140 U. S. 435, 11 Sup. Ct. 859, 35 L. Ed. 458.

While the burden is always upon the plaintiff to establish his right to recover by the preponderance of the evidence, in cases where the causes of the accident are peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, proof of the happening of the accident establishes a prima facie case which calls for rebuttal and explanation on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff by proving the accident has adduced reasonable evidence, on which the jurors may, if they think fit, find a verdict for him. Scott v. London Docks Co., 3 H. & O. 596; Salmond on Torts, p. 29; Peters v. Lynchburg Trac. Co., 108 Va. 333, 61 S. E. 745, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1188.

[6] In the case in judgment, the plaintiff, upon the close of the evidence adduced, moved the court to strike out the counts of her declaration from 1 to 7, inclusive, which was done. Therefore, the defendant could not possibly have been injured by the ruling of the court upon the demurrers to the declaration.

The defendant, pursuant to the statute (section 3370 of the Code, as amended Acts of Assembly 1910, p. 376), propounded and filed certain interrogatories to the plaintiff, to all of which she made answer, and the refusal of the court to strike out the answers of the plaintiff on the ground that they are evasive and self-serving is made the basis of the defendant's second assignment of error.

We are unable to see any merit in this assignment of error, as the answers of the plaintiff to the interrogatories propounded to her appear to us as being directly responsive to the interrogatories, and are not amenable to the criticism of them made by the defendant. Nor did the court err in overruling the defendant's motion for a continuance of the cause, made because of its ruling refusing to strike out the answers of the plaintiff to said interrogatories which had been propounded to her.

The third assignment of error relates to the refusal of the court to require the plaintiff to file new and further particulars as to the eighth count of her declaration. Practically all that has been said with respect to the first assignment of error applies as well to the third.

[7] It is again insisted in the argument of the third assignment of error, as in the argument of the first, that, as the plaintiff alleged in her declaration negligence and carelessness on the part of the defendant which resulted in the injuries she sustained, she had assumed the burden of proof as to each and every count of her declaration, and was compelled before she could recover to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that her injury was the result of some act or acts of negligence on the part of the defendant; and that the plaintiff could not relieve herself of the burden of proving affirmative negligence on the part of the defendant under the eighth count of her declaration, and make a new case by her bill of particulars so as to shift the burden of proof upon the defendant to show that it was not guilty of any negligence in the performance of its duties towards the plaintiff.

We do not so read the bill of particulars filed by the plaintiff, which but states in plain terms that she relies upon the presumption of negligence which the law creates where the cause of the accident is unknown to the plaintiff; and the eighth count of her declaration, to which the bill of particulars applied, had alleged facts and circumstances out of which the presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant arises as matter of law.

It is needless to repeat in this connection what we have already said going to show that, because a plaintiff in a case like this alleges and attempts to prove more than he is required to do, the presumption of negligence is removed, or the rule of evidence with respect to the burden of proof is changed.

In Dearden v. Railroad Co., 33 Utah, 147, 93 Pac. 273-274, the opinion of the court says: "When it is shown that a person has sustained an injury under circumstances where the maxim (res ipsa loquitur) applies, he is not required in the first instance to prove any particular defect by evidence, other than by the prima facie presumption, although the facts with respect to some defect are unnecessarily alleged with particularity in the complaint. All that the plaintiff was required to aver and prove to entitle him to recover was the relation of passenger and carrier, that the accident through which he received his injuries was connected with the means, or instrumentality, used by the defendant in the transportation, and an injury resulting therefrom. * * * That the plaintiff averred and undertook to show a defective brake chain as evidence of negligence causing the collision did not waive or affect the presumption of negligence arising from the circumstances, etc. The evidence of a defective brake chain which the plaintiff produced was also proof of such negligence, and was in aid of and not adverse to the presumption." McNeill v. Durham, etc., R. Co., supra; Cassady v. Old Colony Ry. Co., 184 Mass. 156, 68 N. E. 10, 63 L. R. A. 288.

In the last-named case the court says: "The defendant contends that, even if originally the doctrine would have been applicable, the plaintiff had lost or waived her rights under that doctrine, because, instead of resting her case solely upon it, she undertook to go further, and show particularly the cause of the accident. This position is not tenable. * * * If at the close of the evidence the cause does not clearly appear, or if there is a dispute as to what it is, then it is open to the plaintiff to argue upon the whole evidence, and the jury are justified in relying upon presumptions, unless they are satisfied that the cause has been shown to be inconsistent with it. An unsuccessful attempt to prove by direct evidence the precise cause does not estop the plaintiff from relying upon the presumptions applicable to it."

[8, 9] The fourth and fifth assignments of error relate to the ruling of the court refusing to reject or to strike out, after the same had been admitted, the testimony of N. L. Martin and Clarence Harrison, witnesses introduced on behalf of the plaintiff to sustain the issue on her part in her case in chief.

There is much force in the contention of the defendant that, if the declaration in the case had contained only its eighth count in the first instance, the testimony of Martin and Harrison would not have been admissible in the plaintiff's case in chief; but it cannot be successfully maintained that, after the defendant had introduced evidence to show that its machinery was in good order, its track in proper condition, and its cars properly inspected, the testimony given by Martin and Harrison would not have been proper in rebuttal. So that, after the case was closed, and upon the plaintiff's motion the counts of her declaration from 1 to 7, inclusive, had been stricken out, the said witnesses might have been recalled to testify for the plaintiff in rebuttal of the testimony that had been introduced by the defendant with respect to the condition of its machinery, track, cars, etc., and therefore the sole question for determination in this connection is, Has the defendant been prejudiced by the order in which the testimony given by Martin and Harrison was allowed to go to the jury for their consideration?

"The examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the trial court, and its exercise is rarely, if ever, to be controlled by an appellate court. Much latitude of discretion should be allowed the trial court in the matter of recalling witnesses, and its action will not be reversed by an appellate court except for palpable error." Burke v. Shaver, 92 Va. 345, 23 S. E. 749; Tate v. Bank, etc., 96 Va. 765, 32 S. E. 476.

We are unable to find anything stated in the testimony of either Martin or Harrison that would not have been proper in rebuttal of evidence introduced by the defendant. Therefore, it was proper evidence to be considered by the jury along with all the other evidence in the case, and the court did not err in refusing to strike it out.

[10] Assignments of error 6 and 7 raise practically the same question, and will therefore be considered together.

Dr. Smallwood, the attending physician of the plaintiff, testifying for her, after explaining the difference between an impacted fracture and a straight fracture and stating that the plaintiff had sustained an impacted fracture of the hip—I. e., the bone was separated and by violence driven one piece into the other—said that, in order to sustain an impacted fracture of the hip, the blow would have to be directed against the hip bone; and in reply to the question, if that fracture could have happened by the plaintiff falling over on her face, the witness answered that she would have to fall on the hip to have a fracture, and the blow would have to come directly on the outside of the femur of the hip bone. The plaintiff and other witnesses introduced in her behalf testified as to the occurrence which resulted in the injuries to her that she was thrown from her seat forward violently to the floor, etc.; and at the close of all the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff to sustain the issue on her part the defendant moved the court to exclude from the record, and to instruct the jury that they must not regard in their consideration of the case the evidence relating to an impacted fracture of the hip bone, "for the reason that, according to plaintiff's own testimony, the blow must have come from the side, and directly on the hip bone, to have produced the character of fracture claimed, and there is no evidence in the record that she had such a blow, and the evidence of all the witnesses for the plaintiff is to the effect that she fell upon her face in the aisle of the car."

That there was some variance in the statements of the witnesses as to what took place and how the plaintiff fell upon the floor when she had been thrown violently from her seat is not at all remarkable or unnatural, and it would have been an unreasonable requirement of the plaintiff that she prove in the most minute detail just how she fell and what she struck. The evidence showed the construction of the interior of the car, the aisle, with seats on either side thereof; that the plaintiff was sitting in the second seat from the front of the car, and was thrown a distance of at least ten feet against the front door of the car, her feet going up and her head going down; and it was for the jury to say upon this and all the other evidence in the case whether or not the plaintiff could have sustained the injury of an impacted fracture of her hip bone. Had the jury been left alone to inferences to be drawn from the evidence, they might reasonably and properly have inferred that the plaintiff was thrown from her seat, across the aisle, against the seat, striking her right hip, then to the floor, and in that way had her hip broken.

The rulings of the trial court complained of in the assignments of error 6 and 7 were clearly right, and therefore these assignments of error are also without merit.

[11] The eighth assignment of error seems to be based upon an erroneous theory of the law that, upon the defendant showing inspection, good condition of track and machinery, the burden of proof shifted to the plaintiff, and she was required to show wherein the defendant had been in these respects negligent.

"Where an injury happens, as the result of an accident such as the record discloses, the presumption is that it occurred by the negligence of the railroad company, and the burden of proof is on the company to establish that there has been no negligence whatsoever, and that the damage has been caused by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent." Southern Ry. Co. v. Dawson, 98 Va. 578, 36 S. E. 996.

"When the physical facts of an accident themselves create reasonable probability that it resulted from negligence, the physical facts themselves are evidential and furnish what the law terms evidence of negligence, in conformity with the maxim res ipsa loquitur." Richmond Ry. Co. v. Hudgins, 100 Va. 413, 41 S. E. 738.

The authorities both in England and America sustain the proposition that a presumption of negligence arises upon proof of a derailment, and that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show that it is without fault. Among the very many authorities in this country are B. & O. Ry. Co. v. Noell, 73 Va. 399; Gilmore v. Brooklyn, etc., Ry. Co., 6 App. Div. 117, 39 N. Y. Supp.

417; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Cooksey, 70 Ark. 481, 69 S. W. 259; Southern P. Co. v. Cavin, 144 Fed. 348, 75 O. C. A. 850; Seybolt v. N. Y., etc., R. Co., 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75; Whalen v. Consol. Trac. Co., 61 N. J. Law, 606, 40 Atl. 645, 41 L. R. A. 836, 68 Am. St. Rep. 723; Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Jones, 108 Ind. 558, 9 N. E. 476. See, also, Fetter on Carriers of Passengers, 480 et seq; Patterson's Ry. Acc. L. 274, note 7, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) note, p. 606; 14 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cases (N. S.) 289, note.

In Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Jones, supra, the court says: "When the plaintiff made it appear that she was a passenger upon appellant's train, and while being carried as such the car in which she was seated left the track, and she suffered injuries thereby, she has shown a state of things upon which a presumption of negligence arose against the railroad company, which stood with the force and efficiency of actual proof of the fact, and was available for her benefit until negated and overthrown, and that such presumption can only be overthrown by proof that the casualty resulted from inevitable or unavoidable accident, against which no human skill, prudence, or foresight, as usually and practically applied to careful railroad management, could provide."

[12] As we have observed, the plaintiff in this case had shown that she was a passenger on a car of the defendant; that the car on which she was seated was derailed, and she was thereby injured, upon which proof the jury might have rendered a verdict for her, and whether or not the defendant had shown by a preponderance of the evidence that it was free from the charge of negligence was a question for the jury; and therefore the trial court did not err in refusing the request of the defendant for a peremptory instruction directing the jury to find a verdict in its favor.

The ninth assignment of error relates to the refusal of the court to sustain the objections of the defendant to certain instructions asked by the plaintiff, and, without citation of authorities, the assignment merely challenges the production of any authority to the effect that a defendant, in a case where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, must not only show that it is free from negligence, but must also give an explanation of the cause of the accident, and show by a preponderance of the evidence that it was guilty of no negligence whatever.

We think that we have already cited ample authority for the rule that where the plaintiff has shown that she was a passenger of the carrier, that while a passenger the car of the carrier upon which she was riding was derailed, and that she thereby sustained injury, she was entitled to recover damages for the injury, unless the defendant showed by affirmative evidence that the accident had been caused by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent; and how else, it may be asked, can a defendant in a case like this show that it was guilty of no fault whatever, except by affirmative proof of facts sufficient to account for the derailment and to explain the reason therefor? In the absence of a satisfactory explanation by the defendant of the cause of the accident, going to show that the defendant was free from fault, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict. Southern Ry. Co. v. Dawson, supra; Richmond, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hudgins, supra; McNamara v. Boston, etc., Ry. Co., supra; Magee v. N. Y., etc., Ry. Co., 195 Mass. 111, 80 N. E. 869; Snyder v. Wheeling, etc., Co., 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 502, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922; Och v. Missouri, etc., Ry. Co., 130 Mo. 27, 31 S. W. 962, 36 L. R. A. 442; Robinson v. St. L., etc., Ry. Co., 103 Mo. App. 110, 77 S. W. 498; Green v. Pacific L. Co., 130 Cal. 435, 62 Pac. 747.

[13] The court in this case, in the instructions to the jury, propounded the law applicable to the facts which the evidence tended to prove in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, and therefore the defendant was without just cause of complaint with respect to the instructions given; and, the case having been fully and fairly submitted to the jury upon every phase of it presented in the evidence, the court did not err in refusing other instructions asked by the defendant.

The remaining assignment of error requiring consideration raises the question, whether or not the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence, and whether or not the damages assessed by the jury are excessive.

[14] The evidence to which we have adverted is of itself sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury in favor of the plaintiff, and, in addition to the fact that there is nothing whatever in the record indicating that the jury in ascertaining the damages acted under the impulse of an improper motive, gross error, or misconception of the subject, the evidence very plainly shows that the plaintiff, about 30 years of age, in the possession of all her faculties, enabling her to earn for her services as a clerk in one of the departments of the United States government at Washington, D. C., $900 per annum at the time she sustained the injuries of which she complains in this suit, suffered an impacted fracture of the hip, causing her continuous and intense pain; that this injury is permanent; that at the time of the trial of this cause her broken limb was one-half inch shorter than the other; that she would always limp, and as time went on the shortening of the limb would increase. In view of these facts, this court would not be justified in disturbing the verdict of the jury on the ground that the damages assessed to the plaintiff are excessive.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and therefore it is affirmed.

STACY v. W. M. RITTER LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 9, 1912.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—LOCATION—DETERMINATION.

Generally, where a boundary description calls for notorious landmarks, as corner trees or natural objects, they are to be regarded as termini, and a straight line is to be run from one terminus to another, regardless of course or distance; but if the description shows that a straight line was not intended, as where a river or other irregular line is clearly indicated, the irregular line must be followed, if by doing so the other terminus can be reached.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-41; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—LOCATION—DETERMINATION.

In ascertaining the location of the boundaries of a tract, a call for the lines of adjoining surveys must be regarded as landmarks with which and to which the grantees of the particular tract had to go, though they were mistaken in supposing that certain trees were located at the corner of one of the adjoining surveys, and a call for the line of an adjoining tract should prevail over a call for course and distance, based on a survey made by one who was not on the ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-41; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 1*)—LOCATION—DETERMINATION.

Where the exact location of a boundary line is uncertain, that construction is favored which gives effect in a measure to every call of the description, and which does least violence to the calls.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County.

Action by A. C. Stacy against the W. M. Ritter Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

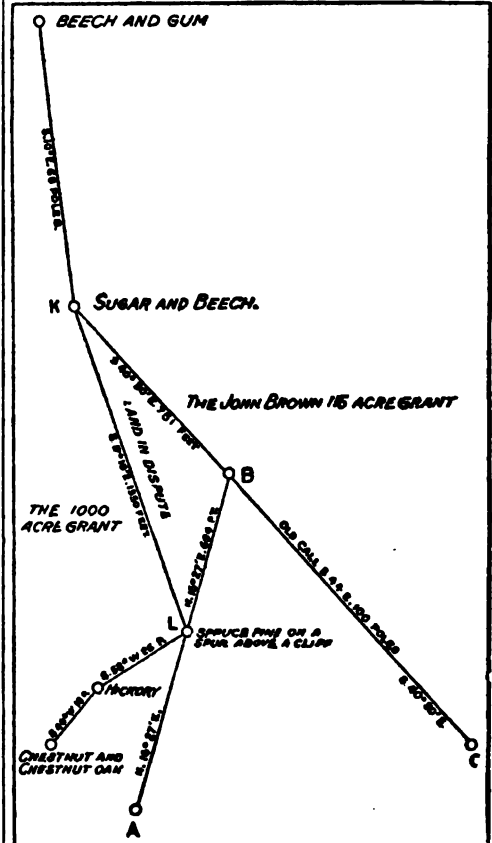

M. O. Litz and Greever & Gillespie, for appellant. W. A. Daugherty and Roland E. Chase, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. The controversy in this case turns upon the description of the land contained in the grant under which the appellee claims. That grant is dated in 1887. The grant under which the appellant claims is dated in 1900. If, therefore, the descriptive calls in the grant under which the appellee holds embrace the land in controversy, there is no error in the decree appealed from.

The grant to Graham and others, under which the appellee claims, after setting out several lines and corners about which there is no dispute, calls for running with a 23-acre survey "N. 70° E. 32 poles to two beech stumps, corner of 115 acres patented in the name of John Brown, with same S. 28° E. 116 poles to a beech and gum; S. 10° E. 68 poles, crossing the creek twice, to a sugar and beech on the bank, corner of a survey in the name of Daniel Blankenship; with the reverse of a part of one line of the same, S. 13° W. 58 poles, to a spruce pine on a spur above a cliff, a corner to Martin Blankenship; with his lines S. 58° (W.) 26 poles to a hickory; S. 40° W. 18 poles to a chestnut and chestnut oak."

A diagram below shows the lines in controversy.

The land in controversy is the triangle shown in the diagram by the lines "K" to "B," "B" to "L," and "L" to "K." The contention of the appellant is that the line from "K" to "L" is the true boundary line of the 1,000-acre grant. The appellee, on the other hand, insists, and the trial court so held, that the lines from "K" to "B" and from "B" to "L" are its boundary lines between the points "K" and "L," which points are recognized corners of the 1,000-acre grant.

[1] The general rule is (and it is not controverted in argument) that where notorious landmarks, as corner trees or natural objects, are called for, they are to be regarded as termini, and a straight line is to be run from one terminus to the other, without respect to course or distance. Smith v. Davis, 45 Va. 50; Marlow v. Bell's Lessee, 54 Va. 527, 531.

While this is the true rule where no other call is found in the grant, but the call to run from one terminus to another, "there certainly may be," as was said by Judge Allen in delivering the opinion of the court in Marlow v. Bell's Lessee, supra, at page 531, "other calls which show the line was not intended to be a straight line, as where a call is to run with a river or a public road from one terminus to another, the stream or road, if it leads to the other terminus, must be followed, though it may diverge from a direct line between the two points. The same rule would apply to a marked line, if there was enough to show that such line, though not a direct line, was intended as a boundary, provided, by following the marked line, the other terminus can be reached."

[2, 3] In the case under consideration, in addition to the call S. 13° E. 58 poles from the sugar and beech at "K" to the spruce pine on a spur above a cliff at "L," there is the further call, running with the reverse of a part of one line of a survey in the name of Daniel Blankenship. That survey does not corner on the sugar and beech at "K," and a straight line run from "K" to "L" does not touch the survey in the name of Daniel Blankenship. If, instead of running direct from "K" to "L," the line is run from "K" to "B" and from "B" to "L," the line from "B" to "L" runs with the Daniel Blankenship survey to the spruce pine called for at "L," which is a corner to Martin Blankenship; but this adds a line to the calls in the 1,000-acre grant. In construing the description in the 1,000-acre grant, a line must be added, as claimed by the appellee, or the call for running with the Daniel Blankenship survey must be disregarded, and a straight line run from "K" to "L," as contended for by the appellant.

It appears that the survey upon which the 1,000-acre grant was issued was not actually made along the disputed boundary, or immediately on either side of it. The maker of that survey testifies that he did not go upon the ground along the disputed boundary line when the survey was made, but took "the metes and bounds of the description of the adjoining tracts." While it appears that the marks on the corner trees at "K" and "L" indicate that they were marked as if the line ran straight from "K" to "L," it further appears that those marks were not made when the survey upon which the 1,000-acre grant was issued was made, and not until after the year 1900. These marks upon the trees at "K" and "L" cannot, therefore, be of any value in determining the location of the boundary of the 1,000-acre grant between those two points.

That grant was of waste and unappropriated lands. It was bounded in many places by the lines of previous grants. This clearly appears from the calls of the grant. The survey upon which it was issued calls for it to begin at a corner of Andrew Baker and Joseph Dougherty, thence with the latter's lines. It calls for a corner in the line of James May, and thence with his line, and for corners in and running with lines in surveys, respectively, to John B. Justus, Jacob Justus, John Brown, Daniel Blankenship, Martin Blankenship, Abner Kerr, and Ashville Smith. These calls, together with a plat of the survey, show pretty clearly that the effort of the grantees in the 1,000-acre grant was to include the vacant land along the lines called for. The land seems to have been vacant along many of these lines, and certainly was along the lines of John Brown and Daniel Blankenship, according to the appellant's own showing; for his claim to the land in controversy is based upon a grant junior to the 1,000-acre grant. It clearly appearing that the boundary of the 1,000-acre grant from "K" to "L" was not actually surveyed, but the description in it taken from the descriptions of the adjoining tracts, that the land up to the line "K" to "B" was then vacant and adjoined the 115-acre grant of John Brown, and that the land along the line from "B" to "L" was also vacant and adjoined the survey of Daniel Blankenship, the fair inference is that the land in controversy was intended to be embraced within the boundaries of the 1,000-acre grant.

There is no question that the line from "K" to "B" runs with a line of the John Brown 115-acre survey, nor that the line from "B" to "L" runs with a line of the Daniel Blankenship survey. The call for these objects must, we think, in legal construction, be regarded as landmarks with which and to which the grantees in the 1,000-acre grant had to go, although they were mistaken in supposing that the sugar and beech was a corner of the survey in the name of Daniel Blankenship. By running to those trees, and then with the John Brown survey until a line of the Daniel Blankenship survey is reached, and then with the reverse of one of its lines to the spruce pine at "L," corner to Martin Blankenship, effect is given in a measure to every call of the grant, and much less violence is done to the calls than if that which is most material should be entirely disregarded, as would be the case if the appellant's contention were sustained and a straight line should be run from "K" to "L."

This case is very similar in its circumstances to the case of Shultz v. Young, 25 N. C. 385, 40 Am. Dec. 413, cited with approval in Marlow v. Bell's Lessee, supra, at page 534, and also to the last-named case. In the former case the deed called to run south with A. B.'s line 310 poles to C. D.'s old corner. A. B.'s line did not reach the corner, but at the end of A. B.'s line it was necessary to run at right angles to reach C. D.'s corner. It was held that the line should be run 310 poles on A. B.'s line, and then a straight line to C. D.'s old corner, as that best conformed to the description of the deed, though it was necessary to run two lines, instead of the one called for.

In the case of Marlow v. Bell's Lessee, the patent of S. called to commence at a certain point admitted to be a corner of M.'s survey, and to run with his line a certain course and distance to a white oak, corner of C., and thence with C.'s line a certain course and distance to another corner of C. Following the first call, it came to a white oak corner of M., but not the corner of C.; but to get to C.'s corner the line must leave the second corner of M. at nearly right angles and run 79 poles, not running on the line of either M. or C. for that distance. The call for the line of M. was, under the circumstances, held to be the correct call, and S.'s patent was construed to include all the land up to the line of M. In disposing of this last-named case, Judge Allen used language which is pertinent and peculiarly applicable to this case. "The [trial] court," he said, "was of opinion that there were manifest and strong reasons for believing that the line called was well known to the parties, and, so believing, determined that the call for the terminus should not overrule the rest of the description. It is equally manifest, from the calls of this grant, the locator here knew that the waste land he was appropriating was bounded in part by older surveys; that he knew the general position of those surveys, and where the lines run; that the surveys were before him; and that he intended to adopt and did adopt the lines of such surveys where called for, precisely as they had been run originally, and to make them the boundaries of his survey. And, those things being so, it seems to me the call for McCoy's line cannot be rejected."

The facts and circumstances of this case are equally as strong, if not stronger, for holding that the call for running with Daniel Blankenship's line cannot be rejected, and should prevail over a call for course and distance in a grant based upon a survey made by a surveyor who was not upon the ground.

We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court should be affirmed.

CAPITAL CITY TOBACCO CO. v. ANDERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 80*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINALITY OF DECISION—TAXING TEMPORARY RECEIVER'S FEE.

A temporary receiver was appointed for the assets of the defendant upon the presentation of a petition, and without notice to the defendant. Subsequently other parties, by intervention, were made coplaintiffs. Upon the hearing of a motion by the defendant, the order appointing a temporary receiver was rescinded, and a receivership refused, which ruling was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Later a sum of money belonging to the defendant in the hands of the temporary receiver was ordered paid to the defendant, and upon the same date, upon an application of the temporary receiver, it was ordered that he be paid a given amount for services rendered, and that the same be taxed against the original plaintiff in the case. The following was incorporated in this last order: "It is the opinion of the court that the receiver's duties are permanently ended, and there can arise no further need for his services; but if it should ever occur that the receiver is called upon to perform any other services, he may then apply to the court for a further order in respect to additional compensation, and in respect to the question of who, and for what amount, any or all of the parties to the cause may be required to contribute to this compensation, the court holding in its breast the right, under such circumstances, to determine whether any part thereof to be paid in the future, or any part of that already paid, should be contributed by the parties, or any of them, including the defendant company." The plaintiff excepted to the granting of both of these orders. The exception to the order taxing the plaintiff with the amount of the fee of the temporary receiver was excepted to on the following grounds: (a) The court was without jurisdiction to pass a final decree in the case at the time; (b) and was without jurisdiction to render judgment against plaintiff in favor of the temporary receiver while the case was pending and before the merits of the plaintiff's case had been determined; and (c) that, if the order were otherwise invalid, the receiver's fee should have been taxed against the two interveners "jointly, or jointly and severally with the plaintiff." In this court the defendants in error moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that it was prematurely sued out. Held, the order or judgment taxing the amount of the temporary receiver's fee against the original plaintiff in the case was final as to the plaintiff. An execution could be issued upon such judgment, and such fee thereby collected from plaintiff. The mere fact that the court reserved the right subsequently to require some or all of the parties to the case to contribute, in order to refund to the plaintiff a portion of the sum which it was ordered the plaintiff should pay, did not prevent the judgment from being final as to plaintiff.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 984*)—RECEIVERS (§ 55*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

In an equitable action it is the province of the judge to determine upon whom costs shall fall; and this determination will not be reversed, unless the discretion of the judge be abused. Civil Code, § 5423, and cases cited in Epps v. Thomas, 131 Ga. 65, 61 S. E. 1117; Fitzpatrick v. McGregor, 133 Ga. 332 (4), 344, 65 S. E. 859, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 50. The judge's discretion was not abused in adjudging that the fee of the temporary receiver should be taxed against the plaintiff, upon whose petition alone the receiver was appointed, which appointment was rescinded as improvident. The receiver having performed all his duties, for which compensation was allowed him in the order, there was no reason why he should have been required to wait until the case had been disposed of before an order should be passed for the payment of his fee; and the judge was not without jurisdiction to grant the order when he passed it.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

The assignment of error in the bill of exceptions upon the order directing the temporary receiver to pay to the defendant below the money belonging to it, and in the hands of the receiver, is not referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, and will be considered as abandoned.

STEPHENS v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1912. Rehearing Denied Sept. 18, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 89, 242, 298*)—CARRIERS (§ 12*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS—RIGHT OF PRIVATE CONTRACT—SELECTION OF AGENT.

A statute which provides a penalty against a common carrier for "refusing to put on sale," or to sell, tickets of a connecting carrier for the transportation of passengers over the connecting line, or any portion thereof, at the rate prescribed by the railroad commission of the state, does not violate the provisions of article 1, § 1, par. 3, of the Constitution of the state, which declares that no person shall be deprived of property except by due process of law.

(a) Nor is such a statute obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws.

(b) Nor does such a statute violate the provision of the Constitutions above referred to because it interferes with and destroys the right of private contract.

(c) Nor because it compels a railroad company to become the debtor of another railroad company against its consent.

(d) Nor because it compels a railroad company to become the agent of another railroad company, or to appoint another railroad company its agent, against its consent.

(e) Nor because it deprives a railroad company of the right to select its own agents, and compels it, against its consent, to transact its business through the agents of another railroad company.

(f) Nor for the reason that it requires a railroad company to enter into contractual relations with another railroad company against its consent.

2. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—REFUSAL TO SELL TICKETS.

Where a connecting line of railroad, having an office or agency, has on sale tickets furnished by another connecting railroad for the transportation of passengers over the latter, and refuses to sell said tickets to a prospective passenger, who applies to the agent of the initial carrier for such tickets at the price fixed by the railroad commission of this state, the railroad so refusing is subject to the penalty provided by Civil Code, § 2755.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING.

The petition, as amended, set forth a good cause of action, and the demurrer thereto should have been overruled.

Error from Superior Court, Carroll County, R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by S. T. Stephens against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Watkins & Latimer, of Atlanta, and S. Holderness, of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error. Lloyd Cleveland, of Griffin, Hall & Hall, of Macon, and R. D. Jackson, of Carrollton, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. Stephens brought his action against the Central of Georgia Railway Company to recover the penalty provided in the Civil Code, §§ 2752 to 2755, inclusive. The petition, as amended, shows substantially the following: The defendant company is a common carrier operating passenger trains from Whitesburg, Carroll county, Ga., to and beyond Newnan, Coweta county, and the defendant is directly and indirectly connected with the Atlanta & West Point Railroad at Newnan, Ga., their tracks crossing there. The most direct route from Whitesburg to Atlanta is over the defendant railway, via Newnan and the Atlanta & West Point Railroad. The rate of fare fixed by the railroad commission from Whitesburg to Newnan is 28 cents and from Newnan to Atlanta, 78 cents making a legal passenger charge from Whitesburg to Atlanta of $1.06, as fixed by the railroad commission. The plaintiff demanded of the defendant, on the dates named in the petition, tickets from Whitesburg to Atlanta, over the connecting line of railroad, and the defendant refused to sell such tickets at the lawful rate fixed by the commission, but charged and secured 15 cents in excess of the legal rate. The failure to sell such tickets at the rate fixed by the commission was in violation of Civil Code, § 2755, and subjected the defendant to the penalty of $1,000, prescribed by that section, for each offense, and suit was brought for $2,000 for the two offenses. It was also alleged that, while the defendant refused to put on sale or to sell tickets as aforesaid, it had, at all times since the rate was fixed by the railroad commission on September 2, 1907, sold tickets from Whitesburg to Newnan for 28 cents, and the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company sold tickets from Newnan to Atlanta for 78 cents. On and from the above date the defendant was authorized to sell and did sell tickets of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad and its own line from Whitesburg, via Newnan, to Atlanta. Tickets reading from Whitesburg to Atlanta over the lines of the defendant company and the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company to Newnan and Atlanta had been placed by the latter company with the defendant company at all times since the 2d day of September, 1907, and it was within the power of the defendant company to sell the plaintiff the ticket applied for over the connecting lines, at the price fixed by the railroad commission. The tickets sold to the plaintiff, reading over such connecting lines of the defendant and the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, were received by these companies for passage over their connecting lines; but, notwithstanding it was within the power of the defendant to sell tickets on the dates on which the plaintiff sought to buy them from Whitesburg to Atlanta over the connecting lines of the two companies, the defendant refused to sell such tickets, though requested to do so, at the price fixed by the railroad commission, but sold such tickets at a price and rate in excess of that fixed by the railroad commission of Georgia. The defendant filed its demurrer to the petition, which was sustained by the trial judge, and the petition dismissed. To this judgment the plaintiff excepted, and brought the case here for review.

[1] 1. This is a suit to recover the penalty provided by Civil Code, § 2755. The facts are substantially set forth above. The material portions of sections 2753, 2754, and 2755 of the Code are as follows:

"No railroad company having an office or agency within the state of Georgia shall refuse to put on sale, or refuse to sell, any ticket of any other railroad company, with which the same may be directly or indirectly connected, at the price or rate fixed by the railroad commission of this state, for passage over lines of such connecting roads, less such amount as may be directed to be deducted from such rate by any one or more of said connecting lines."

"No railroad company operating or doing business wholly or partly within this state shall refuse to put on sale with the agents of any other railroad company, wherewith it may be directly or indirectly connected, tickets for any point upon its line of road, or refuse to receive such tickets for passage over its lines, or refuse to receive and transport baggage which may be checked upon tickets so sold."

"For every violation of any of the provisions of the two preceding sections, the railroad company shall be subject to a penalty of one thousand dollars, which may be recovered in any superior or city court of the county in which such violation may occur. Suit may be brought by the railroad company whose road may be discriminated against, or by the person offering to buy a ticket over such road; and such penalty may be recovered by each of said parties, and the recovery by one shall not be a bar to the recovery by the other."

It is alleged that the defendant company refused to sell tickets of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, its connecting line of railroad, from Newnan to Atlanta, and its own tickets from Whitesburg to Newnan, at the price fixed by the railroad commission of this state, although the defendant had received from the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company and had on sale and did sell tickets over that line and over its own to the plaintiff at a price in excess of the rate fixed by the railroad commission. There is no question raised as to the form of the tickets had and sold.

It is insisted by the defendant in error that the above-recited statute, on which this suit is founded, is invalid and unconstitutional, because it violates the provisions of article 1, § 1, par. 3, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code, § 6359), which declares that no person shall be deprived of property except by due process of law and of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Civil Code, § 6700. We think the case, on this point, is controlled by the decision in the case of Wadley Southern Ry. Co. v. State, 137 Ga. 497 (3), 504, 73 S. E. 741, and therefore no further discussion of it is necessary. See, also, Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 546 (3) 557, 69 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20.

But it is insisted that, even if the act quoted from is not unconstitutional upon the above grounds, it interferes with and destroys the right of private contract with reference to the matters dealt with in said statute, and requires a railroad company to become the debtor of another railroad company and to become its agent against its consent, etc. We do not think that these contentions are sound. The right of the Legislature to pass laws regulating common carriers has been constantly questioned in this state, but this is no longer an open question. The opinion in the case of Georgia Railroad Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694, and the uniform line of decisions subsequent thereto, are to the effect that the Legislature, within its constitutional limitations, has that right. In the Smith Case, supra, it was ruled: "The object of the constitutional provision conferring power upon the Legislature to regulate railroad freights and passenger tariffs, to prevent unjust discrimination and require reasonable and just freights and tariffs, and making it the duty of the Legislature to pass laws in furtherance of this provision, was to give proper protection to the citizens against unjust rates for the transportation of freights and passengers over the railroads of the state, and to prevent unjust discrimination, even though the rates might be just."

The principle of the right of a state or government to regulate carriers and rates for public services performed is not new, but seems to date back to a very ancient period. So far as the writer's research extends, it goes at least as far back as about 2250 years before the birth of Christ, to the reign of Hammurabi, the king of ancient Babylon, who had a complete code of laws for that time. Indeed, our laws of the present day have few underlying principles that do not seem to be contained in this primitive code. In it we read that "if a man be on a journey and he give silver, gold, stones, or portable property to a man with a commission for transportation, and if the man do not deliver that which was to be transported where it was to be transported, but take it to himself, the owner of the transported goods shall call that man to account for the goods to be transported which he did not deliver, and that man shall deliver to the owner of the transported goods five-fold the amount which was given to him." The Code of Hammurabi (2d Ed., University of Chicago Press, 1904) § 112. Again we read: "If a man hire an ox for a year, he shall give to its owner four gur of grain as the hire of a draught ox, and three gur of grain as the hire of an ox." Id. §§ 242, 243. "If a man hire a sailboat he shall pay 2½ se of silver as its hire." Id. § 276. "If a man hire oxen, a wagon, and a driver, he shall pay 180 ka of grain per day." Id. § 271. "If a man hire a wagon only, he shall pay 40 ka of grain per day." Id. § 272. "If he hire an ass to thresh, 10 ka of grain is its hire." Id. § 269. Numerous other instances from this ancient code could be cited. So the principle of regulation is not new, but has come down to us from the ancients.

But we are not remanded to ancient history, or law, for precedent on this question. The constitutional and statutory right to regulate common carriers in this state, within the limitations imposed, is too well settled to require argument or citation of authority. Our Reports abound in decisions on the subject of railroad regulation. The question to be determined in this case is: Has the Legislature the right to compel one railroad to place its tickets on sale with another connecting railroad, and to require the latter railroad to sell them, at the price fixed by the railroad commission? In this case the question does not really come to that, for the defendant railroad had on sale the tickets alleged to have been placed by the railroad connecting with it, and sold them; and the real question is: Is the railroad selling the tickets at a greater rate than that prescribed by the railroad commission of Georgia, subject to the penalty provided by law for the violation of the statute here sought to be enforced? The penalty is "for every violation of any of the provisions of the two preceding sections." Is the sale of the tickets at a rate in excess of that fixed by the railroad commission a violation of any provision of the statute? We think it is. A simple reference to the statute quoted above is sufficient to establish this. If the position of the defendant in error is sound, and can be maintained, the whole law regulating common carriers and requiring railroads to connect, interchange freight, to prevent discrimination, to make physical connection, and the like, is wiped out.

In some of the cases coming to this court on this and similar questions, the same argument was used in those cases as here. In the case of Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. State, supra, it was argued that the Legislature could not, under the police power conferred upon it, require a railroad company to furnish a certain kind of headlight; but this court (135 Ga. 557, 69 S. E. 731, 32 L. R. A. [N. S.] 20) said: "All property is held subject to the police power of this state. The determination by the railroad company that the reflector and the light in use by it constitute an adequate light cannot be conclusive on the General Assembly, which has the authority to exercise the police power of the state, and in the interest of public safety to declare such light inadequate. It is a matter of great importance for the protection of persons and property in the train, the persons on the locomotive, persons and property on the track, and persons and property on other trains with which a collision may be had, that there should be an adequate headlight on such locomotive. The General Assembly, in the exercise of the police power of the state, had the right to require adequate headlights on such engines; and if in conformity to the requirements of such law the railroad company is compelled to do away with the headlights already in use by it and substitute others therefor at its own expense, there is no taking of property without just compensation, in violation of the due process clauses of the state and federal Constitution. In such a case there is no taking of property. The due process clauses are not intended to limit the right of the state to properly exercise the police power in the enhancement of the public safety. The fact that the railroad company will, in order to equip its engines with the required headlights, be forced to do away with the reflectors and lights which it has in use, is only incidental to a compliance with the police regulation and requirement made in the act, which is a valid and reasonable requirement." In the case of Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Minnesota, 186 U. S. 257, 22 Sup. Ct. 900, 46 L. Ed. 1151, it was held: "The act of the Legislature of Minnesota, creating a railroad commission, is not unconstitutional in assuming to establish joint through rates or tariffs over the lines of independent connecting railroads, and apportioning and dividing the joint earnings." "Without deciding whether or not connecting roads may be compelled to enter into contracts as between themselves, and establish joint rates, it is none the less true that, where a joint tariff between two or more roads has been agreed upon, such tariff is as much within the control of the Legislature as if it related to transportation over a single line." See, also, Beale & Wyman on Railroad Rate Regulation, § 830; Wadley Southern Ry. Co. v. State, supra.

It is true this court has held that a shipper cannot require a carrier to issue a through bill of lading (Coles v. Cent. R. Co., 86 Ga. 253, 12 S. E. 749; State v. Wrightsville, etc., R. Co., 104 Ga. 437, 30 S. E. 891), not for constitutional reasons, but for lack of statutory legislation on the subject. Our statute requires one railroad company to receive and take cars from another railroad, as well as freight for transportation. Civil Code, § 2758. The argument here against requiring one connecting railroad to furnish and the other to sell passenger tickets is the same that has been held not sound by this court, and others, in the numerous cases on that question. If the contention is sound that a given railroad has the power to contract with one railroad, and not with another, and it is held that it cannot be required to do so, because you force them to contract with one another, the effect would be to obliterate all the law preventing discrimination. We hold, therefore, that the act under review is not void on the ground that it interferes with and destroys the right of private contract with reference to the matters dealt with in the statute; nor on the ground that it requires one railroad company to become the debtor of another railroad company, or to become the agent of another railroad company against its consent.

[2] 2. In the case of Jones v. L. & N. R. Co., 132 Ga. 11, 63 S. E. 627, the plaintiff alleged neither that the "defendant had been furnished tickets of this kind for sale by such connecting carrier, nor that it had been tendered such tickets for sale and had refused to put them on sale," and hence no cause of action was stated under the statute, and the case was properly dismissed. But here the case is different, and the amendment seems to have been drawn with special reference to the Jones Case, supra, and brings this case within the reasoning in that. It is alleged here that the Central of Georgia Railway Company was furnished the tickets by the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, its connection, and, having the tickets, refused to sell them to the plaintiff at the rate prescribed by the railroad commission, but sold them at a price or rate in excess of that fixed by the railroad commission, and that these tickets were accepted by the two railroad companies, respectively. This case, therefore, comes clearly within the reasoning in the Jones Case, supra. We hold that, when one railroad places its tickets with another railroad, which has an office or agency and physical connection with the former, this is substantially a request to sell such tickets. And if the carrier having them for sale refuses to sell them at the rate fixed by the railroad commission of this state, this constitutes a discrimination within the purview of the statute, and the carrier so refusing violates the sections of the Civil Code first above cited, and is liable for the penalty provided by that statute.

[3] 3. The learned judge in sustaining the demurrer did not state the ground of his decision; hence we look with especial care to each ground, and in doing so conclude that the petition, as amended, set forth a good cause of action, and that the demurrer, both on the general and the special grounds thereto, should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

TERRY v. INTERNATIONAL COTTON CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 20, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 24*)—EXISTENCE OF AGENCY—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

There was evidence sufficient to authorize the court to submit to the jury the question whether the person claimed to be the agent of the plaintiff in fact acted as such or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 722, 723; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 194*)—EXISTENCE OF AGENCY—INSTRUCTIONS.

It being in issue whether a person was bound by the acts of another claimed to have been his agent, either under original authority or by reason of ratification, there was no error in explaining to the jury the rule of law as to the extent of an agent's authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 727-731; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 103*)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—SCOPE AND EXTENT.

Authority to a special agent to obtain the signature of a seller to a prepared written contract for the sale of a certain amount of cotton, without more, does not include within itself authority to make a parol agreement that the cotton shall not in fact be delivered, but that the parties shall settle on the basis of the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time for delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 278-293, 353-359, 367; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 171*)—RIGHTS AS TO THIRD PERSONS—UNAUTHORIZED ACTS OF AGENTS.

If one desiring to buy cotton to be delivered at a future time sent to a special agent a written contract already signed by him, for the purpose of obtaining the signature of the intended seller, and the seller refused to sign the contract, except on the understanding that no cotton was to be delivered, but that the parties would settle on the basis of the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time for delivery (an agreement prohibited by law), and thereupon the agent made such agreement in parol, and the contract was signed and transmitted to his principal, the bringing of a suit by the buyer against the seller for the nondelivery of the cotton did not of itself operate to ratify the parol agreement of the agent; there being no authority in the agent to make such a contract, no evidence of knowledge by the principal, and no act of ratification other than the bringing of the suit.

Error from Superior Court, Randolph County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the International Cotton Company against W. R. Terry. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The International Cotton Company brought suit against W. R. Terry for a breach of a written contract dated July 12, 1909, whereby the plaintiff agreed to purchase and the defendant to sell 50,000 pounds of cotton at 12 cents per pound, to be delivered in merchantable bales at any warehouse in Shellman, Ga., during the month of October. It was alleged that the plaintiff was engaged in the business of buying cotton from producers and selling it to various cotton mills, and this was known to the defendant, and that he was engaged in farming, raising annually approximately 100 bales of cotton. The defendant admitted a prima facie case, and claimed the right to open and conclude the case before the jury. He pleaded that the contract really entered into between him and the plaintiff was a wagering contract, which was illegal, contrary to public policy, and unenforceable; that the written contract attached to the plaintiff's petition was a mere cloak to cover up and conceal the illegality of the transaction between the parties; and that the real understanding and agreement entered into between them was that no cotton was to be delivered under the contract, but that it was to be a mere speculation in "futures."

On the trial the evidence for the defendant, so far as it need be stated, was as follows: He first saw the paper which he signed in the office of J. M. Wooten, at the warehouse of the latter in Shellman. Defendant was passing Wooten's warehouse, and Wooten called him in and told him that he (defendant) could sell some cotton at 12 cents per pound, and that Wooten had a contract ready that the defendant could sign. Defendant told Wooten that he would not sign anything but a "future" contract; that he did not expect to deliver any cotton to anybody. Wooten said that it would be all right; he did not expect any cotton. Defendant then signed the contract. He received from Wooten the dollar recited as a consideration of the contract. About the middle of October the defendant saw Dunn, the manager of the plaintiff. Defendant made an offer to settle the matter by paying a certain amount; but Dunn demanded more, on the ground that the market price was higher, and no settlement was effected. At the time when the question of settlement in money was discussed, Dunn did not say anything about preferring to receive cotton. He did not say anything about wanting cotton. On cross-examination defendant testified: "My idea in making a contract and not delivering the cotton was to hedge, like I have done before. * * * Yes; Mr. Wooten runs a warehouse there, and he and I are good friends. I keep cotton at his warehouse sometimes. I did in 1909. I don't hold any spot cotton. I give him authority to sell it as it comes in. * * * I have been doing business with him that way a long time. We were in the fertilizer business together. I had him hired for wages that year, my recollection is. I don't know whether we were connected, or whether he was hired for wages." One Mizell testified that he was in the warehouse and heard defendant say to Wooten, "I don't expect to deliver any cotton on the contract, but we will settle on the difference, one way or the other," and that the witness walked out and did not hear the reply of Wooten. On cross-examination he testified that he heard Wooten tell the defendant, "I have got the contract here for Mr. Dunn," and "I have sold your cotton and got the contract here," and also mentioned that there were others.

On behalf of the plaintiff, in addition to introducing the written contract on which the suit was based, Dunn, the manager of the agency of the plaintiff at Cuthbert, testified, among other things, as follows: He employed the employees for that territory with the approval of the home office. Any extra help he needed, he decided for himself. He never employed Wooten to represent him or the company. Wooten called him up by telephone during the month of July, prior to the date of the contract, and asked him if he could handle some cotton "over there" at 12 cents per pound. On that day Dunn did not have the price limit from the Albany office that would justify him in paying that price, and answered Wooten in the negative, but said he would see if he could get it later on. The next day he obtained a price by which he could handle the cotton at 12 cents. He called up Wooten, and asked the latter who were the parties that wanted to sell, and Wooten gave him a list of three or four, including defendant, and said he could buy so many bales from each of the parties. Dunn replied that the plaintiff would take the cotton. Dunn prepared the contracts complete, signed them for the plaintiff, and sent them to Wooten. "I had no intention whatever to sell on differences based on the market price, rather than the acceptance of the delivered cotton. At the time the purchase was made, my intention was to get the cotton. That's what they told me from the house—to buy from parties that would deliver the cotton. I never mentioned to a soul about settling on differences until Dr. Terry approached me over there one day when I was shipping cotton. Mr. Wooten had no authority whatever to represent me or the company. * * * Yes; I did make a request of Dr. Terry to deliver me that cotton. When he offered to make the settlement there, I told him and Wooten both that I preferred to have the cotton. That was before this contract was due. * * * When I sent that contract for Dr. Terry's signature, it was not my idea to make a settlement of that kind, based on the cash value. I expected to get the cotton." He sent the contracts to Wooten by mail, and received them back the same way, signed.

The jury found for the plaintiff $1,000 principal, besides interest. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

R. Terry, of Outhbert, and Glessner & Park, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. Jas. W. Harris, of Outhbert, and I. J. Hofmayer, of Albany, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff sued the defendant on a written contract, dated July 12, 1909, by which the former agreed to purchase and the latter to sell 50,000 pounds of cotton at 12 cents per pound, deliverable in the fall. The defendant pleaded that the contract was a wagering contract and unenforceable; the real understanding and agreement between the parties being that no cotton was to be delivered under the contract, but that it was to be a mere contract for "futures," whereby the parties speculated on the market price of cotton, and the losing party was to settle with the winner by paying to the latter the difference between the contract price and the market price. He admitted a prima facie case, and assumed the burden of proof. The jury found for the plaintiff, and, a new trial having been refused, the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. It was contended that there was no evidence to authorize the submission to the jury of the question whether Wooten was the agent of the plaintiff and acting for it in the transaction, and that it was error to submit any such question to them. We cannot agree to this contention. On cross-examination the defendant stated that he and Wooten were good friends and were in the fertilizer business together, that during the year when this transaction occurred Wooten was either employed by him for wages or was his business associate, that Wooten conducted a warehouse, and that the defendant gave him authority to sell his cotton as it came in. The testimony of the manager of the plaintiff's agency at Outhbert was to the effect that he never employed Wooten to represent him or the company; that Wooten called him up by telephone, and asked him if he could handle some cotton "over there" at 12 cents per pound. Another witness testified that he heard Wooten tell the defendant, "I have sold your cotton and got the contract here." While there was evidence tending to show that the manager of the plaintiff made Wooten the plaintiff's agent for the purpose of obtaining the signature of the defendant to the written contract of sale which had been prepared, there was enough to authorize the judge to submit to the jury the question as to whether Wooten was the agent of the plaintiff.

[2] 2. The jury being laymen, and not skilled in the rules of law as to the extent of an agent's authority, it was proper to inform them as to its extent, and what it comprehended under the law.

[3] 3. If Wooten was the agent of the plaintiff, he was a special agent, under the evidence. As matter of authority he was limited by the terms of his agency. Authority to obtain the signature of the defendant to a prepared written contract for the purchase and sale of cotton did not include any authority to make a parol agreement that the cotton should not be in fact delivered, but that the parties should settle on the basis of the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time for delivery. If Wooten made such a contract, it was beyond the scope of his authority, under the evidence, and could not affect the rights of the plaintiff under the written contract, unless his conduct was ratified. Civil Code, § 3595. If such agreement was made and ratified, then the plaintiff was affected by it as if it had been originally authorized.

[4] 4. If both of the parties to the written contract for the purchase and sale of the cotton intended or understood, when the contract was made, that there should be no actual delivery, but a settlement on the difference between the agreed price and the market price, the transaction was invalid. Civil Code, § 4258. But a contract for actual sale and future delivery would be valid. Forsyth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28; McCall v. Herrin, 118 Ga. 522, 45 S. E. 442. There was no evidence that the company, or any agent authorized to bind it in that regard, had any understanding or intent that the contract should be a dealing in "futures," or that the company was engaged in that character of business. If Wooten was the agent of the company, he was only a special agent. The written contract was prepared and signed, and sent to him to have it signed by Terry, and perhaps to pay to the latter the $1 recited as a consideration. The evidence showed no authority on his part to have any additional understanding with Terry as to nondelivery. The question arises whether there was a ratification of his conduct. The presiding judge submitted generally the rule that ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent binds the principal as well as though there had been original authority. But it is contended that, when the company brought suit on the written contract, it necessarily ratified the conduct of Wooten in obtaining it. Terry was charged with notice that the agreement which he asserts he made with Wooten as the agent of the company was beyond the scope of the latter's authority, and one which would render the whole transaction invalid and constitute a misdemeanor. Civil Code, §§ 4258, 4259; Penal Code, § 403. Yet he says he made such an agreement.

In its last analysis, the defense is that a legal written agreement for the purchase and sale of cotton was signed by the buyer and sent to a special agent to obtain the signature of the seller; that the latter, with notice of the want of authority in the agent, nevertheless caused the agent to make in parol an additional criminal agreement, which, if chargeable to the principal, would render the whole void; and that the principal cannot set up the legal contract without ratifying the illegal one. This is no case of obtaining a signature from an innocent party by fraud or misrepresentation; nor is it one where an agent is authorized to make a contract and fix its terms. Terry was not an innocent or defrauded party. According to his defense, he caused a special agent to violate his authority and commit a misdemeanor, which he insists the principal must ratify for his protection. The doctrine that a principal cannot ratify the acts of his agent in part, but must adopt the whole, or none, has no application to such a case, so as to compel the principal to ratify the unlawful agreement of his special agent, made with one who had notice if he seeks to set up the written agreement, which is lawful on its face and authorized. The purchasing company desired to make a legal contract for the purchase of cotton. The seller signed such a contract. He now seeks to set up a supplemental parol agreement with the plaintiff's special agent, who presented the contract for his signature, which would make the contract illegal and invalid. The law declared that the seller could not make such a contract with the principal or the agent. He was charged with knowledge that it was criminal to do so, and that the agent was without authority to do it. Nevertheless the seller declares that he made such an illegal parol agreement with the special agent, and that the principal must ratify the crime if he attempts to set up the legal contract.

A similar rule to that now declared has been applied in a case where an agent for a lender charged a borrower a sum as a commission for making the loan, besides reserving the maximum legal rate of interest on the loan; but this was unknown to the principal and unauthorized by him, and no part of the commission was received by him. McLean v. Camak, 97 Ga. 804, 808, 25 S. E. 493, 494. In that case a deed was made to secure a debt, and in a suit to recover the land the defense was that the deed was void because tainted with usury. Civil Code, § 3442. In the opinion it was said: "The borrower has no right to assume that even a general agent has power to bind his principal by such an agreement; for, the same being illegal and prohibited by law, the borrower is put upon immediate notice that the agent is transcending his general powers and going beyond the legal scope of his agency. Only by showing that the agent was in fact authorized by his principal to reserve the commission can the borrower claim immunity because of an act by the agent which he is bound by law to know was illegal and not binding upon the principal, unless previously authorized or subsequently ratified by the latter." Bringing a suit to recover the land, based on the deed which the agent took for his principal, was not treated as ratification of the taking of commissions. While that decision has been somewhat discussed, the leading principle announced in it has been adhered to, and the language quoted has been copied with approval. Clarke v. Havard, 111 Ga. 242, 252, 36 S. E. 837, 51 L. R. A. 499, where suit was brought by the principal on the note taken for the loan.

The rule that notice to an agent of any matter connected with his agency is notice to the principal (Civil Code, § 3599) does not apply where an agent conspires with the other party. In such a case, the principal is not bound thereby, or charged with knowledge of the facts thus acquired by the agent. Civil Code, § 3800. But really the question here involved is not one of charging the principal with notice of a fact, but whether, outside of the written contract, there was a parol agreement or understanding, not by one of the parties, but by both, and whether, if an unauthorized and unlawful collateral agreement was made by a special agent in parol, the principal was bound to ratify it, if he sued on the written contract.

If there were any errors committed, they were not such as to require a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

W. E. AUSTIN CO. v. T. L. SMITH CO.

T. L. SMITH CO. v. W. E. AUSTIN CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 141*)—TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 66*)—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—ALTERNATIVE JUDGMENT.

It is not error for a trial judge to direct a verdict for the plaintiff, where there is no conflict in the evidence introduced, and it, with all reasonable deductions therefrom, demands a verdict for the plaintiff.

(a) Under a contract between a supply company and another company, the latter was made the agent of the former for the sale of certain concrete mixing machines in a given territory, at a named per cent. discount on the selling price. The machines in issue were placed with the agent, to be paid for at the selling price agreed upon, less 15 per cent. Before the sale of the machines by the agent, the supply company failed, and sold part of its assets, including the machines in question, to the original manufacturer, from which the supply company had originally purchased. The agent company received from the supply company, after the failure and sale, the paper given for the payment of the machines; no payment having been made by the agent thereon. Correspondence between the sales agent and the vendee of the supply company showed that the agent held the machines on consignment for the benefit of the vendee, the plaintiff in this suit, and the former offered to return the machines to the latter. The agent later sold the machines, and, on demand for them made on the agent and the latter's failure to deliver, the plaintiff brought his suit in trover to recover them, and on the trial elected to take a money verdict. The agent company denied that the title to the machines was in the plaintiff, but claimed it was in the defendant. Held, that the trial judge did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff against the defendant for the admitted value of the machines sued for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 336; Dec. Dig. § 141;* Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. §§ 288-294; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 582*)—POWERS AND LIABILITIES—CONTRACTS BETWEEN CORPORATIONS.

It appears from the contract, which was executed in the state of Illinois, that the selling corporation was an Illinois corporation and the purchasing corporation was a Wisconsin corporation, and that the latter did not purchase the franchise of the former, or all of its assets, and the latter did not assume the debts and liabilities of the former, but the former corporation continued to do business in its own name until its failure, some time after the sale. Held:

(a) The transaction between the selling corporation and the purchasing corporation was one of sale, and not of merger.

(b) Where there has been a bona fide sale of the property of one corporation to another, the vendee is not responsible for the existing debts of the vendor, unless the vendee expressly assumes such debts and liabilities.

(c) The court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant against the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2330, 2331; Dec. Dig. § 582.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the T. L. Smith Company against the W. E. Austin Company. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Affirmed on defendant's bill of exceptions, and reversed on plaintiff's bill of exceptions.

John L. Hopkins & Sons, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Westmoreland Bros., of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The T. L. Smith Company, a nonresident corporation, filed a trover suit against the W. E. Austin Company for the recovery of two machines known as "Smith concrete mixers," and of the alleged value of $1,805. Demand for the machines and refusal to deliver were alleged. The plaintiff elected to take a money verdict. The defendant denied the plaintiff's right to recover the machines, set up a cross-action against the plaintiff, on an account alleged to be due by the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company, the predecessor in title of the T. L. Smith Company, for commissions claimed to be due on "concrete mixers" sold by the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company in the exclusive territory named in the contract between the W. E. Austin Company and the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company, said sales running through a certain period of time and amounting to $6,113.75, besides interest. An itemized statement of said account was attached to the petition.

It was alleged in the cross-action that the T. L. Smith Company (hereinafter called the plaintiff) had purchased the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company, an Illinois corporation, and was liable to the W. E. Austin Company (hereinafter called the defendant) on said account. No charge of fraud was alleged as to the purchase of the assets of the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company, but the petition, seeking to fix the liability on the plaintiff, alleged that "the plaintiffs in taking over the assets, contracts, property, liabilities, etc., of the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company, and having, in its own interest and to serve its own ends, caused said company to cease doing business, became, was, and is liable in its place and stead to this defendant for said commissions and said sums." It was also alleged that the plaintiff "took over the business and assets of said Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company. * * * The contract then of force, and which had been entered into with the supply company, was and became binding and obligatory in all of its terms and conditions upon the Smith Company and this defendant."

At the conclusion of the evidence, each side moved the court to direct a verdict—the plaintiff asking for a verdict against the defendant for the value of the property sued for, with interest; and the defendant moving for a verdict disallowing plaintiff's claim, and allowing the defendant to recover the amount of the commissions as contained in the account attached to the cross-action, with interest. The court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the value of the property sued for, with interest to date, and also directed a verdict for the defendant for the amount sued for in the cross-action, with interest to date, and directed that the amount found in favor of the plaintiff be deducted from the amount found in favor of the defendant, leaving the amount due the defendant by the plaintiff, $4,917.68, and judgments were entered accordingly. To this direction each party excepted.

[1] 1. We will consider both cases together, as they embrace the same transactions. Was the direction of the verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the property sued for right, under the facts of this case? We think it was. There was no conflict in the evidence, and the verdict was demanded. The record shows that the defendant entered into a contract, dated June 19, 1907, with the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company, of Chicago, Ill. (hereafter called the Supply Company), by the terms of which the defendant was to become the sole agent of the Supply Company for the sale of certain concrete mixers within certain territory named in the contract. For the sale of the machines the defendant was to be allowed a named per cent. as discount on the selling price agreed upon. In pursuance of this contract, the defendant from time to time did order from the Supply Company mixing machines, and sold them. One order was for the two machines in controversy. Pending the sale of these machines by the defendant, the Supply Company went into liquidation, and sold, on February 11, 1908, a part of its assets to the plaintiff, including the two machines in question, which were originally manufactured by the plaintiff and sold by it to the Supply Company. After the sale of the machines by the Supply Company back to the plaintiff, the defendant company took up the paper given for them to the Supply Company. After the trade between the plaintiff and the Supply Company, the correspondence with reference to the machines in the possession of the defendant was between the plaintiff and the defendant. Defendant in its answer averred, among other things, that "it was not expected, under the course of dealing between defendant and the Supply Company, that the defendant should pay for said machinery until it had sold the same, but at the request and instance of an officer of said company, defendant, as related above, did make out and deliver its two notes. These notes were renewed once or twice; defendant, in the meantime, attempting to dispose of the property, which it failed to do. In the meantime the T. L. Smith Company had taken over the contract of the Supply & Equipment Company, and had assumed ownership of the notes, and by mutual agreement the two notes in question were canceled and returned to this defendant. With this transaction the plaintiff made out and forwarded a form of consignment contract, to which this defendant objected, and which it declined to sign. It was then willing under proper conditions, and if plaintiff demanded it, to treat the goods as being upon consignment, when in fact they were not, and in turn made out a counter contract of consignment, which was forwarded to the plaintiff, and which it in writing declined to accept. No contract of consignment was, therefore, ever entered into between the plaintiff and this defendant."

In addition to other evidence offered by the plaintiff was a letter addressed to the plaintiff by the defendant under date of October 19, 1908, as follows: "We, as previously stated, are perfectly willing to carry the two concrete mixers referred to on consignment account here for you, although they have cost us a great deal more money now for warehouse charges and insurance than we will ever get out of them, or we will accept your proposition to return the mixers to you to Milwaukee, and if you desire us to do so we will, as per our proposition made you recently, prepay the freight on them to Milwaukee. If you desire to have them shipped back, rather than carry them here on consignment, advise us, and we will ship them immediately." The letters of the defendant to the plaintiff recognize the title to the machinery to be in the plaintiff; one of these referring to the mixers as being "here on consignment, for your account." And: "If you have to have them shipped back, rather than carry them here on consignment account, advise us, and we will ship them immediately." Pending negotiations as to a written form of assignment (about which the parties could not agree) of the mixers to the defendant, the latter sold them, and, failing to deliver them to the plaintiff on demand, the trover suit was brought.

The one question, therefore, is: Was the title to the property in the plaintiff or in the defendant at the time of the sale by the latter? We think, when the Supply Company failed, and sold part of its assets back to the plaintiff, including the machines in controversy, and the defendant then took up the paper given to the Supply Company for the property, and recognized by its letters to the plaintiff that the property was held on consignment, that it was a novation of the original contract, which vested the title to the machines in the plaintiff, and made the defendant liable to the plaintiff as the owner of the property in controversy. The contract executed between the defendant and the Supply Company made the defendant the sales agent of the latter, and did not vest the title to the machines in the defendant. The evidence and all the reasonable deductions therefrom demanded the verdict, and therefore the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the property sued for.

[2] 2. Whether the direction of the verdict for the defendant against the plaintiff for $4,917.68 was error depends on whether the transaction between the Contractors' Supply & Equipment Company and the plaintiff on February 11, 1908, was a merger of the two companies, or a sale of one to the other. We think the latter is true, and that the transaction was one of sale, and a partial sale at that. The record shows that the plaintiff did not purchase all of the assets of the Supply Company. It did not purchase the franchise of the corporation. It did not assume the debts and liabilities of the selling company. It was not the successor of the Supply Company, and the latter did not go out of business at the time of the sale. There is nothing to show that the plaintiff had any knowledge of any existing contract between the defendant and the Supply Company, nor that there was any fraud in the transaction with intent to injure the creditors of the selling company. The Supply Company continued to do business in its own name, and was to collect its own accounts and pay off and discharge its own liabilities, and had a given time within which to do this. In the case of Hawkins v. Central Ry. Co., 119 Ga. 159, 46 S. E. 82, this court held that, "where there has been a lawful and absolute sale of a railroad, the grantee is not responsible for the existing debts of the grantor." And see Culberson v. Ala. Const. Co., 127 Ga. 599 (4), 56 S. E. 765, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 411, 9 Ann. Cas. 507; Southern Bell Telephone, etc., Co. v. Jacoway, 131 Ga. 483, 485, 62 S. E. 640; Atlanta, etc., R. Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 138 Ga. 353, 75 S. E. 468. But in the Hawkins Case, supra, it was also ruled that "where there has been no sale, but a merger, and no provision made for the payment of the debts of the absorbed company, the consolidated corporation is liable for the debts of the former, at least to the extent of the value of the property received." In Atlantic & Birmingham Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 127 Ga. 392 (2), 56 S. E. 482, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1119, it was ruled: "Where two corporations effect a consolidation, and one of them goes entirely out of existence, and no arrangements are made respecting the liabilities, the resulting corporation will, as a general rule, be entitled to all the property and answerable for all the liabilities of the corporation thus absorbed."

It does not appear in this case that there was any merger or consolidation of the Supply Company with the plaintiff company, or that the former had gone entirely out of business; but, on the contrary, the transaction was simply a contract of sale by the Supply Company of a portion of its assets to the plaintiff company, and the latter did not agree to be bound for the debts or obligations of the former company. The elements of merger were therefore lacking, and those of sale were present. We rule, therefore, that there was no merger in this transaction, but a sale; and, as the vendee did not assume the debts and liabilities of the vendor, it was not bound therefor, and the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed on the bill of exceptions of Austin Company, and reversed on the bill of exceptions of Smith Company. All the Justices concur, except LUMPKIN, J., disqualified.

GREER et al. v. ANDREW.

ANDREW v. GREER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REFERENCE (§ 101*)—MOTION FOR RE-REFERENCE.

While the method of setting out the rulings of the auditor in regard to evidence admitted or excluded was not one to be commended, and some of the findings were not perfect in form, under the facts, this does not require a reversal of the order overruling the motion for a re-reference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 169-180; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. PARTIES (§ 65*)—OBJECTIONS—STRIKING OUT PARTIES.

An equitable petition alleged, among other things, as follows: The owner of a lot of land contracted with the plaintiff to improve it, the plaintiff furnished a sum of money for that purpose, and that after the land was improved it should be jointly owned by them. The contract was executed; the improvements being erected, and a conveyance of a half interest being made to the plaintiff. The other half interest was conveyed to the son of the cotenant. The original cotenant purchased an adjoining lot, ostensibly for the benefit of the plaintiff and himself. Half of the purchase money was paid by the plaintiff, but her cotenant caused a deed to be made in the name of his son. The cotenant and his son conspired, and used funds arising from the property, which properly belonged to the plaintiff. Partition of the whole, equitable accounting, judgment against both father and his son, and the charging of the interest in the property other than her own with a lien in her favor, were prayed. There was evidence tending to support these allegations. Held, that there was no error in refusing to strike the son as a party defendant, in the nature of a nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. §§ 100-107; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 78*)—PRESUMPTIONS—SPOILIATION.

Spoiliation of evidence raises a presumption against the spoliator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 98, 100; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—EVIDENCE (§ 357*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS.

A woman and man had business dealings, and during her absence from the place where he resided certain letters passed between them. In a litigation between them some years later, the woman offered in evidence parts of two letters cut from the balance with scissors, and apparently containing statements touching the property involved. She testified, in effect, that she was traveling, and had no place to keep a large number of letters which she had received, and destroyed them, except that she thought these two parts of letters might be useful, as they contained memoranda in regard to the property, that they contained all that was in the letters in relation to business matters, and that she destroyed the letters only because she thought they were useless. The defendant did not deny writing the letters, but substantially admitted so doing, and that the parts preserved contained the reference to the business, except that he stated that substantially the same thing as that in one of the excerpts was repeated later for emphasis. Held, that the admission in evidence of the parts of the letters was not error.

(a) Nor was there reversible error in admitting parol evidence of the plaintiff, explaining the mutilation and showing that the language of the writing mentioning "our lot," etc., referred to the land in controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153-4157, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1492-1499; Dec. Dig. § 357.*]

5. AUDITOR'S REPORT — EXCEPTIONS — NO GROUND FOR REVERSAL.

In an equitable action, numerous exceptions of law and of fact were filed to the auditor's report. The presiding judge overruled the exceptions of law, disapproved the exceptions of fact, and entered a decree based on the auditor's report. In the brief of counsel for plaintiffs in error, some of these exceptions were urged, and some were not mentioned. Upon a consideration of the whole case, while there are some parts of the report which may be subject to criticism, nothing appears which requires a reversal.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 984*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT—APPORTIONMENT OF COSTS.

The decree against the defendants being affirmed, and it being the province of the judge in an equitable action to determine upon whom the costs shall fall, it furnishes no ground for reversal on behalf of the defendants that the judge decreed that the costs should be divided between the parties. LEE v. PEARSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 123*)—ACTIONS—PLEADING AND PROOF.

In an action by an owner of land to enjoin a trespass, the plaintiff is not required to plead his muniments of title as a condition precedent to their introduction in evidence.

(a) The partition proceedings were regular, and not open to any objection made to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 186*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CERTIFIED COPY.

A certified copy of the record of a duly recorded mortgage is admissible in evidence, on proof of the existence and loss of the original.

(a) The existence and loss of the original were shown in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 64, 661-673; Dec. Dig. § 186.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 442*)—JUDGMENT (§ 490*)—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—SERVICE OF RULE NISI—COLLATERAL ATTACK ON JUDGMENT.

If the service of a rule nisi to foreclose a mortgage is not made before the term of the court to which it is returnable, and such term intervenes, a subsequent service of a copy of the same rule nisi, without a previous order of court, is insufficient of itself to authorize a judgment of foreclosure. But a judgment of foreclosure rendered under these circumstances is not void, and open to collateral attack, which recites personal service of the rule nisi, that the judgment is rendered by consent, and that a stay of execution is granted to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1301; Dec. Dig. § 442.* Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 926-928; Dec. Dig. § 490.*]

4. MORTGAGES (§ 499*)—FORECLOSURE—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

Where a mortgage on land is foreclosed on the petition of an assignee of the mortgage, in which it is alleged that the mortgage was assigned to the petitioner, and the rule nisi and absolute conform to these allegations, the fi. fa. issued on the judgment absolute, which identifies the previous proceedings, is not invalid because, after the description of the land, the same is designated as the land described in a mortgage given to the transferee and foreclosed by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1478-1485; Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 353*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—DEED PENDING ACTION—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a plaintiff's right to recover depends upon his having title to the land in controversy, his title must be complete at the beginning of the action. Hence a deed in his chain of title, executed pending the action, is inadmissible, notwithstanding a recital therein that it is executed in lieu of a lost deed, where the defendant is not a privy to the person making the recital; but the admission in evidence of the deed in this case was harmless error, because it was made to appear by extraneous evidence that the grantee in such deed, long before the bringing of the suit, bought the land from the grantor, paid the entire purchase money, went into possession of the land after purchasing it, and remained in possession until he conveyed it to a prior grantor of the plaintiff (which deed was produced). Such facts constitute a perfect equity between the vendor and the purchaser, effectual to transmit the title of the vendor to the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1404-1481; Dec. Dig. § 353.* Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

6. RECOVERY OF POSSESSION OF LAND—COMMON SOURCE OF TITLE—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

In its ultimate development the case narrowed to an issue of title to the land in controversy; and as the plaintiffs and defendant claimed title from a common propositus, and that of the plaintiff was prior in time, and was not invalid for any of the reasons assigned in the defendant's attack upon it, the direction of a verdict in favor of the plaintiff was proper.

Error from Superior Court, Crawford County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action between L. L. Lee and J. W. Pearson and others. From the judgment, Lee brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Rodgers, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Mathews, of Ft. Valley, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. There are many assignments of error, but all depend upon the success of the attack made on the plaintiff's title. The plaintiff alleged ownership and possession of a tract of land, and prayed an injunction against the defendant's alleged trespass. The defendant in his answer set up an adverse title. Both parties claimed title from John S. Lee. According to the evidence submitted by the plaintiff, John S. Lee died intestate, leaving a widow, Sarah M. Lee, and five children. His estate was partitioned in the superior court among his heirs, and the land in controversy was assigned to Sarah M. Lee. She mortgaged the land, the mortgage was foreclosed, and the land was sold. The plaintiff derives title by mesne conveyances from the purchaser at the sheriff's sale.

[1] 1. The petition for partition of the estate of John S. Lee was filed by the guardian of one of the heirs, who was a lunatic. Service was acknowledged and 20 days' notice waived by the other co-owners, who filed an answer praying that their share be also assigned to them in severalty. A writ of partition duly issued, partition was made by the commissioners, and a return made, wherein the land in controversy was assigned to Sarah M. Lee. The return was duly made the judgment of the court. Objection was made that evidence of title could not be introduced without reference to it in the pleadings; that it was not shown that the applicant was a duly appointed guardian, or that his ward was of unsound mind, and that the statutory notice was given; nor that the commissioners were duly sworn. None of these objections to this evidence are meritorious.

[2] 2. The evidence was sufficient to show the existence and loss of the mortgage from Sarah M. Lee to the Georgia Loan & Trust Company, and there was no error in receiving in evidence a certified copy of it.

[3] 3. The mortgage from Sarah M. Lee to the Georgia Loan & Trust Company was foreclosed on the petition of Dwight M. Bank, who alleged himself to be the assignee of the mortgage and of the notes to secure the payment of which the mortgage was given. The rule nisi was granted at the March term, 1895, returnable to the succeeding October term, and two entries of service appeared thereon; one dated March 22, 1895, and reciting service of the defendant by leaving it at his most notorious place of abode, and the other dated November 6, 1895, and reciting personal service on the defendant. A rule absolute was granted at the March term, 1896, which contained a recital that, "the plaintiff having agreed with the defendant thereto, it is further ordered that execution upon this judgment be stayed until November 15, 1896." No formal order was shown for the second service, but the bench docket contained these entries by the judge: "Continued to perfect service." "Rule absolute in this case granted by consent, March term, 1896." Several objections were interposed to this record being received in evidence. It will be only necessary to notice one of them, as the others are palpably without merit.

It is contended that there was no authority of law, in the absence of an order by the court, for the sheriff to serve the defendant with a copy of the rule nisi after a term of court at which the money was directed to be paid. Mortgages on realty are foreclosed by petition and rule nisi. The statute provides that, upon filing the petition, "the court shall grant a rule directing the principal, interest and costs to be paid into court on or before the first day of the next term immediately succeeding the one at which such rule is granted, which rule shall be published once a month for four months or served on the mortgagor, or his special agent or attorney, at least three months previous to the time at which the money is directed to be paid into court as aforesaid." Civil Code, § 3276. Service of a rule nisi subsequently to the term of court at which the defendant was directed to pay the money would not be in compliance with the statute. The paper served was functus officio. If at the term of court at which the defendant is directed to pay the money into court no legal service of the rule nisi has been made, the court should either issue a new rule nisi, or pass an order extending the time of payment of the money to the next term of the court. A docket entry alone will not suffice. But the judgment absolute in this case is not void on this account, for the reason that it recites that the judgment was rendered by consent, and a stay of execution was granted to the defendant. This recital will be taken as true, unless the contrary is made to appear.

[4] 4. The petition to foreclose the mortgage was in the name of Dwight M. Bank as transferee, and the rule nisi and absolute followed the petition. The fi. fa. referred to these papers sufficiently to identify each, and an erroneous recital in the fi. fa. that the mortgage was given to the transferee, instead of his transferor, did not render the fi. fa. invalid on the ground of the alleged discrepancy.

[5] 5. The purchaser at the mortgage foreclosure sale was Dwight M. Bank, and the sheriff made a deed to him. It was shown by parol that Bank sold the land to H. A. Mathews, who went into possession of the same under his purchase about the year 1898. The plaintiff introduced in evidence a deed from Dwight M. Bank to H. A. Mathews, bearing date after the bringing of the suit, and reciting that it was executed in lieu of a deed between the same parties to the same land, executed on February 23, 1898, which deed was said to have been lost. Objection was made to this deed coming in evidence, on the ground, among others, that it was executed after the suit was begun. The plaintiff alleged title in himself, and sought to enjoin the defendant from trespassing on the land. The deed was inadmissible as evidence of title, because it was executed after the commencement of the suit, and the recital in the deed could not bind the defendant who did not claim under it. L. & N. R. Co. v. Ramsay, 134 Ga. 107, 67 S. E. 652. But the reception of the deed in evidence was harmless error, as no objection was urged to the plaintiff's proof that Bank sold to Mathews, who paid the purchase money and went into possession of the land. These facts constitute a perfect equity, as effectual to pass title as if the original deed had been produced. Grace v. Means, 129 Ga. 638, 59 S. E. 811.

[6] 6. The defendant's title was derivative from Sarah M. Lee, and originated subsequently to the mortgage of Mrs. Lee to the Georgia Loan & Trust Company. Inasmuch as the plaintiff's title was not invalid for any of the reasons assigned, and as the defendant claimed possession of the land, it was proper to direct a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SUMTER, S.
C., v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 172*)—INJUNCTION—LEVY—PLEADING.

A petition was filed by the trustee in bankruptcy of the Ajax Lumber Company, a corporation, against J. E. Plowden, a bank which held a judgment against him, and the sheriff, seeking to enjoin a sale of the property levied on under a common-law fi. fa. issued upon the judgment in favor of the bank as the property of Plowden, and to have the title decreed to be in the trustee in bankruptcy. It was alleged that Plowden, being the president and acting manager of the Ajax Lumber Company, to whom former owners of the property were indebted, received from such owners a deed for the property in his individual name, but that the consideration therefor was paid by the corporation by Plowden entering a credit for the amount of the purchase price on the account of such former owners on the books of the corporation, and that Plowden, as president, received the property for the corporation; Plowden thereby becoming the mere naked trustee for the use of the corporation. After the deed was so received, Plowden, as president of the corporation, borrowed from T. J. Treadwell $1,050, and gave him as security a deed covering the property conveyed by the deed above mentioned, signing the deed individually. Later a loan of $375 was made under similar circumstances. The total amount of these loans was paid over to Plowden as president of the corporation, and the corporation received the full benefit and use of same. The trustee in bankruptcy did not contest these matters, but set up their validity, and alleged the value of the equity of redemption, and that he was seeking to recover the property in order to apply that for the benefit of his trust. Treadwell was not made a party. The judgment against Plowden was of older date than the deed to Plowden, and the debt on which it was founded had not been created on the strength of the title to the property in question being vested in Plowden. On interlocutory hearing for injunction the sheriff was restrained until further order, and on the final hearing a demurrer filed by one of the judgment creditors of Plowden, setting up (a) that there was no equity in the petition, (b) that there was a misjoinder of parties, in that the Ajax Lumber Company was not a proper or necessary party plaintiff, and (c) that there was a nonjoinder in that Treadwell was not made a party, was overruled; and the judge, to whom the case was submitted on all questions of law and fact, without the intervention of a jury, after hearing the evidence, entered a judgment in favor of the trustee in bankruptcy. Held, the petition was not subject to the de-murrer. See Dodd v. Bond, 88 Ga. 355, 14 S. E. 581.

2. ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—OPINION EVIDENCE.

The assignments of error on the rulings of the judge on the admissibility of evidence, objected to on the grounds of irrelevancy, that the questions propounded by interrogatories were leading, that the foundation had not been laid for the introduction of parol evidence of certain documents, and that certain answers of witnesses were mere expressions of opinion, were without merit.

3. EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT.

The evidence was sufficient to support the judgment.

CITY OF BLAKELY et al. v. SINGLETARY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 71*)—BOARD OF EDUCATION—CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL BUILDING.

Where the city of Blakely had issued and sold bonds to a given amount for the purpose of erecting a new school building, the board of education of that city had authority to select the site for and to construct the building. Chipstead v. Oliver, 137 Ga. 483, 73 S. E. 576. This authority, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the charter of the city, carried with it, by necessary implication, power in such board to possess, control, and expend the fund so raised, in the performance of their public duty in erecting the building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 176; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 147*)—SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 52*)—DEPARTMENTS—PARTIES TO MANDAMUS PROCEEDINGS.

The charter of the city of Blakely (Acts 1900, p. 219), creating the board of education of that city, required the city council of the city of Blakely to convey by deed to the board of education "the property on which the Blakely Institute is located"; and the act further provided that "any other persons or trustees may deed or sell said city board of education property for school purposes." The members of such board are therefore in the nature of statutory trustees. They are public officers. Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 30 S. E. 297, 68 Am. St. Rep. 108. And as "a joint authority given to any number of persons, or officers, may be executed by a majority of them, unless it is otherwise declared" (Civil Code, § 4, par. 5), a majority of the members of the board of education of the city of Blakely had authority to institute mandamus proceedings against the mayor and council of that city to compel them to pass a resolution, directing a named bank to pay to the board the fund raised by the sale of the bonds referred to in the preceding headnote, and which had been deposited in the bank by the mayor and council.

(a) The act creating such board of education did not make it a corporate body, and no formal action on the part of the board as such was necessary for the institution of such mandamus proceedings by a majority of the board.

(b) The ruling here made is not in conflict with the decision in Woodward v. Westmoreland, 124 Ga. 529, 52 S. E. 810, 4 Ann. Cas. 472. There the state board of health sought an injunction to restrain the local board of health of the city of Atlanta from interfering with the enforcement of the rules and regulations of the state board. It was held that the act creating the state board made it simply an agency of the state government to have supervision and control over matters relating to the public health, and that it neither incorporated the board nor authorized its members to bring suit to enforce its rules and regulations.

The act creating the board of education of the city of Blakely did not make the board a mere agency of the city, but, as we have stated above, conferred upon it, among other important rights and duties, the right to hold property for school purposes, to select a site for the school building, to erect such building, and to control and expend the fund raised by the city from the sale of bonds to erect the school building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 288; Dec. Dig. § 147.* Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 126; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§§ 100, 141*)—AUTHORITY OF JUDGE IN VACATION—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ACTS OF CITY OFFICERS.

As the city board of education was entitled to the fund raised by the sale of the city's bonds issued for the erection of a school building, the judge of the superior court did not err in granting, upon the application of the majority of the members of such board, a mandamus absolute during vacation (there being no material issues of fact involved), requiring the mayor and council of the city to pass a resolution directing the bank in which the fund had been deposited by the mayor and council to pay the fund over to the board of education.

(a) This is true, although the mayor and city council had, prior to the institution of proceedings for mandamus and at a special meeting of the council, passed a resolution directing the bank to pay such fund to the board of education, and in pursuance of this resolution the clerk of council drew a check in favor of the city school commissioner, the executive head of the board of education, for the amount of the bond fund in the bank, which check was paid by the bank, and the fund upon which it was drawn was placed by the bank to the credit of the city school commissioner, and subsequently, at a regular meeting of the council, a resolution was adopted rescinding such former resolution, upon the ground that it was void, because the special meeting of council at which it was passed was not called in accordance with certain provision of the charter of the city, and the bank was therefore directed not to pay the bond fund to the city school commissioner, and still later, at a regular meeting of the council, another resolution was adopted, rescinding the second resolution referred to above; the contention of the petitioners being that the adoption of these various resolutions tended to deter the bank from paying the fund to the board of education or the city school commissioner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 205-210, 276-278; Dec. Dig. §§ 100, 141.*]

HOMESTEAD (§ 96*)—PROPERTY EXEMPT—PROCEEDS OF HOMESTEAD.

Where a homestead was duly set apart to one who was the head of a family, and subsequently an order for the sale of the homestead property and the reinvestment of the proceeds thereof in a particular tract of land was duly obtained, and the proceeds of the sale were used by the head of the family, who was designated as trustee to make the sale and reinvestment, as a partial payment upon the tract of land which was to be purchased, the vendor taking the promissory note of the head of the family for the amount of the unpaid purchase money and giving his bond conditioned to convey title upon the payment of the note, and where the purchaser, the head of the family, failed to pay the note at maturity, and the same was sued upon to judgment, and the fl. fa. based on such judgment, after the execution of the escrow deed contemplated by the statute, was duly executed and filed by the vendor, and the land was duly sold under such levy, the head of the family was not entitled to recover the land, in an equitable petition brought for the recovery of the same.

Error from Superior Court, Glascock County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Nannie Usry and others against Augustus Chalker and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Samuel H. Usry filed an equitable petition, in which he set out that some years prior to the year 1896 a certain tract of land which he owned was set apart as a homestead for the benefit of his wife and minor children; that in August, 1896, on application therefor, the judge of the superior court of Glascock county granted an order permitting the sale of said homestead property for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds thereof in a designated tract of land, and petitioner was appointed trustee to make such sale and to reinvest the proceeds as contemplated; that in pursuance of said order the homestead property was sold, and the proceeds were reinvested in the land designated in the order to be purchased, but these proceeds were not sufficient, by about $166, to pay for the new tract of land, which was purchased from Eli Harris; that petitioner took from Harris a bond for title, and gave his promissory note for $166, the balance of the purchase price for the land; that he and his family went into possession of this new tract of land in 1896, where they continued to reside until the year 1900, when petitioner was convicted of the offense of murder, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary of the state, where he was confined until the year 1908; that in 1902, Harris having died, his executor sued to judgment the promissory note of petitioner above referred to; that a fl. fa. was issued and levied upon the land purchased from Harris, and the same was sold by the sheriff to J. W. Whiteley, who received a deed from the sheriff and evicted petitioner's tenants; that the judgment on the promissory note was void; that the sheriff's sale, and consequently the sheriff's deed, was null and void, because based on a fl. fa. which was invalid, being founded on a void judgment; that the land being incumbered with a homestead, and being homestead land, the sheriff was without authority to sell it. Whiteley has sold or in some way let said land to Augustus Chalker, who is in possession of the same. It was prayed that Whiteley be required to produce in court the sheriff's deed to himself, and that it be canceled as a cloud upon petitioner's title; that the same be ordered as to all papers which Chalker took from Whiteley; that Chalker be required to surrender possession of the land to petitioner; and that petitioner have judgment against Chalker for a named amount for rent and use of the land, and have such other and further relief as the case demands.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, in substance as follows: The homestead was lawfully set apart to S. H. Usry, as set out in the petition. The homestead land was lawfully sold, being under an order obtained by E. B. Rogers, attorney for the homestead. All of the money realized from the sale was paid to Eli E. Harris (who knew the facts) on account of the purchase money of the land involved in this suit, and a bond for title was given to Usry individually; he giving his note for the balance of the purchase money. In this transaction E. B. Rogers represented Usry. Harris died, and his executor obtained a lawful judgment against Usry on said note for the balance of the purchase money represented by said note. The land was properly reconveyed to Usry for the purpose of levy, and was sold according to law to J. W. Whiteley. Rogers represented the executor of Harris in obtaining the judgment, and he submitted the bid for Whiteley, who was not present, according to Whiteley's directions. The land was sold for $705. Of this amount about $225 was paid in settlement of the judgment, and the balance was paid by Whiteley to Mrs. S. H. Usry; Usry being at the time in the penitentiary. Chalker holds the land under a bond for title from Whiteley, and has made valuable improvements thereon. Chalker had heard, prior to his purchase, that the land was claimed by Usry as homestead land. He was relying on Whiteley to protect him. The beneficiaries of the homestead are still in life; the wife being one of such beneficiaries. All defendants are eliminated except Chalker and Whiteley. The court decreed that the sheriff's sale of the land was illegal and void, that the sheriff's deed be surrendered and canceled, and that the plaintiff recover the land, subject to the homestead estate. The defendant excepted.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

W. H. Barrett, of Augusta, and E. B. Rogers, of Warrenton, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. T. West, of Thomson, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). Treating this as an action for the recovery of land by the plaintiff as the head of a family, and not as an action for the recovery of land by the plaintiff individually, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff could not recover the land. The homestead property referred to in the petition had been properly sold. An order had been granted by the judge of the superior court for the reinvestment of the funds arising from the sale of homestead property in a certain designated and described tract of land. The plaintiff invested the proceeds of the sale of the homestead property in the land contemplated and designated as the property to be purchased in the order for the sale of the homestead. But with the proceeds of the sale of the homestead property only a partial payment of the purchase price of the acquired property could be made, and the vendor of the property sought to be acquired in the purchase made to the vendee, the plaintiff in this case, a bond for title, and took for the unpaid balance of the purchase money the promissory note of the vendee. The vendee could take, by virtue of the transaction between himself and the vendor of this land, only that interest in the land which was contemplated in the trade between them, and which was embodied in the written instrument executed by the vendor, the bond for title. The vendee acquired only an equity, a right to have the title vested in him by a written instrument upon his compliance with the condition in the bond for title. He did not, as an individual or as a trustee, acquire a title which could be the basis of an action for the recovery of land. The vendor, who took a promissory note for the unpaid part of the purchase money, had the right, under our statute, to sue the note to judgment, and it is admitted in the agreed statement of facts that there was a lawful judgment rendered on the note; and he had the right to enforce that judgment by levy and sale, after executing to the vendee the escrow deed provided by the statute, which put title in the vendee for the sole purpose of effecting the transmission of title by the judicial sale. The judgment rendered by the court was unauthorized by the evidence; this being an equitable suit for the recovery of land, and not a proceeding instituted to trace and recover trust funds which had been diverted or misapplied.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

CROMER v. EVETT. (No. 4,239.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CONTRACTS (§ 128*) — CONSIDERATION — LEGALITY.

Where a father, while his son was under arrest on the charge of cheating and swindling in the purchase of a mule, was induced by the seller to sign, as joint maker with the son, a promissory note for the purchase price of the mule, the inducement being an agreement by the seller that if the father would sign the note he would withdraw the warrant under which the arrest had been made and release the son from arrest and stop the prosecution, the conduct of the payee of the note in thus inducing the father to sign it was both illegal and immoral, and constituted a valid defense, on the part of the father, to the payee's suit on the note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 633-653; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by W. C. Evett against C. C. Cromer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Suit in a justice court was brought against C. C. Cromer on a note made by him and Will Cromer jointly, and payable to Evett, the plaintiff. The trial resulted in a verdict against the defendant. A certiorari sued out by him was overruled, and final judgment entered against him, and he excepted.

The single issue in the case was whether the note was a binding contract; the defense being that the defendant signed the note under duress, and for the purpose of settling a criminal prosecution against his son. The evidence as to this issue was undisputed, and was in substance as follows: The note was for the purchase price of a mule sold by Evett, the plaintiff, to Will Cromer, the son. The defendant told Evett that he "need not sell his son the mule, thinking he would go on the note with him; for he would not do it." Subsequently Evett had Will Cromer, the son, arrested for obtaining goods under false pretenses. It does not distinctly appear what was the false pretense which formed the basis of the criminal charge against the son; but it is fairly inferable from the evidence that it was a statement made to Evett by Will Cromer that his father would sign with him the note for the mule, and that by this false pretense the mule was obtained. The son was arrested under a warrant for this offense; and, while he was under arrest, Evett told the father that if he would sign the note with his son he (Evett) would withdraw the warrant and release the son. The defendant testified: "I signed the note for that reason, and stopped the prosecution." It was admitted, on the hearing of the certiorari that the evidence before the justice showed credits on the note amounting to $18, which were made before the suit was brought; but it does not appear whether these payments were made by the son or the father.

John W. Bale and D. F. Pope, both of La Fayette, for plaintiff in error. Jas. E. Rosser, of La Fayette, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). It was insisted by the defendant in error that the consideration for the note was the purchase of the mule, and not duress or the settlement of a criminal prosecution; and, that even if the signature to the note was obtained by an illegal consideration in the first instance, the payments thereon were a substantial ratification, and made it a valid and binding contract upon both makers. We may dispose of these two contentions by the statement that as to the son the consideration of the note was clearly the mule; for the evidence is undisputed that he, and not his father, bought the mule from the plaintiff. But the evidence is equally clear and undisputed that the only reason why the father signed the note was the promise made by the plaintiff that if he would do so the plaintiff would dismiss the warrant, by virtue of which his son was then under arrest, and would stop the prosecution. According to the evidence, this promise and agreement was clearly the only consideration which moved the father to sign the note with his son. It does not appear whether the father or the son entered the credits on the note; and the burden was on the plaintiff to show, in support of his claim of ratification by the father, that the payments were made by the father, and not by the son.

As to the main contention of the plaintiff in error, that this note was obtained under duress and for the purpose of settling a criminal prosecution against his son, there is no issue; for the evidence is undisputed that before the purchase of the mule he refused to sign the note with his son, and only consented to do so when the son was actually under arrest for a criminal offense, and on the express promise of the payee that, in consideration of his signing the note, he would withdraw the warrant and release the son, and stop the prosecution. In Jones v. Dannenberg, 112 Ga. 426, 37 S. E. 729, 52 L. R. A. 271, it is held that "it is both an illegal and an immoral act to make an agreement, for a consideration, to suppress the prosecution of a criminal offense, whether the offense be of the grade of felony or misdemeanor; and the fact that a note and mortgage were executed by a wife and delivered to the payee of the note on consideration that he would cease to prosecute, and would settle a criminal offense for the commission of which the husband was at the time under arrest on a warrant sued out by such payee, may be pleaded and proved as a defense to the foreclosure of the mortgage so given, even in the hands of one who is the bona fide holder of such note for value, before due, and without notice." See, also, the decision of this court in Lucas v. Castelow, 8 Ga. App. 812, 70 S. E. 184.

In the present case the suit is not by an innocent holder, for value, but by the original payee of the note, whose illegal and immoral act in securing the note to be signed is set up as a defense. In the Penal Code 1910, § 329, it is declared that "if any person, informing or prosecuting under pretense of any penal law, shall compound with the offender, or direct the suit or information to be discontinued, unless it be by leave of the court where the same is pending, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

It was insisted by learned counsel for the defendant in error that there was no proof of the allegation in this case that the prosecution was illegal, and that the burden was on the plaintiff to show it, as, under section 4255 of the Civil Code 1910, "legal imprisonment, if not used for illegal purposes, is not duress." Unquestionably this is true; but in this case, assuming that the arrest of the defendant's son was legal, it was clearly used for an illegal purpose when used for the express purpose of coercing the father to sign the note, in order to have the son released from arrest, and to stop the prosecution. Whether the arrest was legal or illegal is immaterial, as it was used for an illegal purpose. Penal Code 1910, § 329; Deen v. Williams, 128 Ga. 265, 57 S. E. 427.

We conclude that the learned judge of the superior court erred in overruling and dismissing the certiorari and entering up final judgment against the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed.

INTERNATIONAL LIFE INS. CO. v. NIX.
(No. 4,288.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INSURANCE (§ 198)—PREMIUMS—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID.

There being evidence for the plaintiff that the policy of insurance described in his application was not delivered to and accepted by him, that the policy actually tendered to the applicant was for a different sum and of a different kind from that applied for, and was never accepted, the verdict against the insurance company for the amount of the premium paid when the application was made was authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—PREMIUMS—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID.

Evidence was admissible that, after defendant's refusal to issue the policy applied for, the applicant obtained insurance of a similar character from another company. Such testimony was of some evidentiary value upon the issue as to whether the applicant intended to accept the policy actually issued by the defendant, though of a different character from that applied for.

4. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—PREMIUMS—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID.

Evidence that the plaintiff's application for insurance had been rejected by another company some time prior to issuance of the policy by the defendant was irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—PREMIUMS—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID.

It was permissible to prove that the defendant's agent, who took the application and delivered the policy actually issued, stated to the plaintiff that he had been unable to obtain the kind of policy applied for, but thought he could do so at a later date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

It was not permissible to prove that a general agent of the defendant had stated that the plaintiff "was covered by insurance" in his company. Such evidence was merely opinionative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—PREMIUMS—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID.

The question whether the agent who took the application had or had not settled with his principal for the premium was irrelevant to any issue in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 29*)—CONDUCT—REMARKS OF JUDGE.

It was not prejudicial error for the court to remark: "I want to make a statement about what I think about this case. I will confine you to that proposition, whether Mr. Nix accepted this $5,000 policy in lieu of the $10,000 policy. If he did, he would be bound by it. That is all I care to go into." The issue there referred to was the only material question involved in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-84, 508; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

9. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—PREMIUMS—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID.

The receipt for the premium was not inadmissible for any reason assigned.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 235)—ACTION—PLEADING—PLEA OF DURESS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The pleas in these cases contain two defenses: (1) That the notes sued on were obtained from the defendant by duress and threats, and to settle a criminal prosecution against her husband, and were not her contract; (2) that the notes were made to pay her husband's debt, and were therefore void. In each case the trial judge, on oral motion, struck the plea as to duress, and the case went to trial on the issue made by the other plea. Held: (1) The pleas setting up duress in avoidance of the notes were sufficiently full and specific in their allegations, and the trial judge erred in striking them. Whitt v. Blount, 124 Ga. 671, 53 S. E. 205; Lucas v. Castellow, 8 Ga. App. 812, 813, 70 S. E. 184. (2) As to the second defense, that the consideration of the notes was the payment of a debt of the defendant's husband, she being a married woman at the time, the facts were clearly in issue under the evidence, and the trial judge erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs. The judgment overruling the motion of the de-defendant for a new trial must be reversed. Civil Code 1910, § 2993.

KIRBY PLANING MILL CO. v. HUGHES.
(No. 4,169.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 26*)—GROUNDS—ABSENCE OF WITNESS—DILIGENCE.

There was no abuse of sound legal discretion in refusing to continue the trial of the case for the purpose of enabling the defendant to procure the testimony of witnesses residing in Boston, Mass.; the showing for continuance indicating laches, since there was no effort made to procure this testimony until eight days before the case was called for trial, and no reason was shown for this delay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 74-93; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 290*)—AMENDMENT—ANSWER—FAILURE TO VERIFY.

The proffered amendment to the plea being after the time for answer had expired, and setting up new facts, of which the original plea failed to give any notice, and the amendment not being verified by affidavit as required by section 5640 of the Civil Code of 1910, there was no error in refusing to allow the amendment, as the allegations of the amendment did not bring it within the exception to the terms prescribed by that section. Besides, the evidence discloses that the defendant had the benefit of the allegations made in the proposed amendment; the trial judge permitting the defendant, over objection of the plaintiff, to introduce testimony covering the matters alleged in the proposed amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 859-863, 881, 886½; Dec. Dig. § 290.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 303*)—RECORD—GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL—APPROVAL BY JUDGE.

The notes of the trial judge, attached to the approval of the grounds for new trial in the amended motion, practically amount to a disapproval of these grounds; and this court, therefore, will not consider any of the questions made in these grounds of the amended motion. Shierling v. Richland Grocery Co., 9 Ga. App. 271, 70 S. E. 1126.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 457*)—CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 15*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—IDENTIFICATION OF SUBJECT-MATTER—OPERATION OF CUSTOMS.

Where a written order for lumber designated it as "standard 1905," parol evidence was admissible of a general custom among lumber merchants to interpret this description or designation as meaning "short-leaf pine." The testimony was admissible for two reasons: (a) Because it identified the subject-matter of the contract; (b) because it tended to prove the universal custom of the lumber business or trade, which became by implication a part of the written contract. Hartwell Grocery Co. v. Mountain City Co., 8 Ga. App. 727, 70 S. E. 48; Civil Code 1910, section 1, subsec. 4; Barrie v. Miller, 104 Ga. 312, 30 S. E. 840, 69 Am. St. Rep. 171.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1151*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—MODIFICATION.

The uncontradicted evidence showing that the plaintiff had received a double payment of $140.61, for which the defendant had been given no corresponding credit, and that the verdict against the defendant included this double payment, direction is given that the sum of $140.61, with interest thereon, be written off from the amount of the verdict and judgment.

6. COSTS (§ 234*)—APPEAL—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT.

No material error of law appears, and the verdict and judgment, modified as indicated above, being supported by the evidence, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with direction as above indicated. And since the plaintiff in error secured by his appeal to this court a material modification of the verdict against him, the cost of the writ of error is taxed against the defendant in error.

FIRST DIST. AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL SCHOOL et al. v. REYNOLDS. (No. 4,222.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES (§ 10*)—ACTION—WHAT CONSTITUTES SUIT AGAINST STATE.

The industrial and agricultural schools organized, established, and maintained in each congressional district of this state in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1906 (Laws 1906, p. 72 [Civil Code 1910, § 1552 et seq.]) are not such public institutions of the state as would exempt them from suit for contract made by their trustees within the scope of authority delegated to them by the terms of the act in question.

2. COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES (§ 10*)—INDUSTRIAL AND AGRICULTURAL SCHOOLS—RELATION TO STATE.

These branch schools are made departments of the University of Georgia by the act creating them, and the University of Georgia is expressly incorporated as a body corporate and politic, with the right to sue and be sued; and it was the purpose of the Legislature in creating these branch schools that they should stand in the same relation to the state and to the public in this respect as the University stood.

3. COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES (§ 7*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

A contract made by the trustees of the First District Agricultural and Mechanical School for the purchase of furniture for the purpose of equipping the school was within the scope of the authority delegated to them, and is enforceable against the school and the trustees thereof in their official capacity.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; H. B. Strange, Judge.

Action by J. H. Reynolds against the First District Agricultural and Mechanical School and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., and Brannen & Booth, of Statesboro, for plaintiffs in error. Dean & Dean and J. M. Hunt, all of Rome, and Johnston & Cone, of Statesboro, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Ware-Hatcher Furniture Company of Atlanta sold some furniture on open account to the First District Agricultural and Mechanical School, located at Statesboro. $1,000 was paid on the account, leaving a balance of $627.60 due. The vendor was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt, and the trustees, under an order of the bankruptcy court, sold and transferred this account to J. H. Reynolds, who sued out a purchase-money attachment in the city court of Statesboro, naming as defendants in his suit the school and its trustees by name. The defendants, at the appearance term, made a motion to dismiss the suit, on the ground that the school was an integral part of the state, being a state institution, and was therefore exempt from suit, in the absence of legislative consent. The motion was overruled, and, in the absence of any defense, the plaintiff made out formal proof of his account and took judgment. The defendants excepted.

[1-3] The First District Agricultural and Mechanical School was authorized and established under the provision of the act of 1906 (Georgia Laws 1906, p. 72), as codified in section 1552 of the Civil Code of 1910. By this act it is declared that said schools "shall be branches of the State College of Agriculture, a department of the University of Georgia." By section 1553 provision is made for the maintenance of these schools from fees received from the inspection of fertilizers, oils, and other inspection fees received by the department of agriculture in this state. By section 1554 the Governor is authorized to appoint trustees of these schools; and section 1555 provides for the acceptance by the trustees of donations made by any citizen of land, or other property, for the maintenance of said schools, and for the location of such schools; and other sections of the Code give to the trustees authority to equip the schools, and to build and rent property in connection with the schools; and it is contemplated by the act that these schools shall be supported and maintained, not only by limited appropriations made annually by the state, but by private and personal donations. It may be stated that the agricultural and mechanical schools thus established and declared to be branches of the State College of Agriculture, the latter being a department of the State University, are state institutions to a certain extent.

A careful examination of the act creating these schools in the different congressional districts of the state makes it apparent that it was the intention of the Legislature to make them all a part of the State University, standing in the same relation to the state that the State University stands. Now, the trustees of the University are expressly created "a body corporate and politic, by the name of the 'Trustees of the University of Georgia,' by which they shall have a perpetual succession, have and use a common seal, and be a person in law, able to plead and be impleaded, to hold and acquire real and personal estate, with power to lease and otherwise manage the same for the good of the University. All money or property granted by the state, or individuals, for the advancement of learning in general, is vested in such trustees." Civil Code, § 1384. And section 1397 designates the branches of the University, naming among them the State College of Agriculture.

It would seem to follow from the fact that the University of Georgia itself, which may be called the trunk of the tree of education in the state of Georgia, was incorporated as a body politic, with power to sue and be sued, all of its branches, distinctly made a part of the trunk, would be clothed with the same power and be subject to the same law. When the state expressly gave its consent for its University to be sued, this was express consent that all the branches of the University could also be sued. The Supreme Court of North Carolina, in the case of County Board of Education v. State Board of Education, 106 N. C. 83, 10 S. E. 1002, holds that, where the state incorporates an institution and provides, among other things, that it "may sue and be sued as such," this is sufficient consent to its being sued. In Medical College of Georgia v. Rushing, 1 Ga. App. 468, 57 S. E. 1083, this court held that "the Medical College of Georgia is not a public institution of the state because it is designated by law as a branch of the University of Georgia, and it is liable for the torts of its agents in the conduct of its business and within the scope of their authority," and we think, also, that these agricultural and mechanical schools, established under the provisions of the act of 1906, although they are made branches of the State College of Agriculture, are a department of the State University, and that the whole scheme of the legislation relating to their establishment, management, and maintenance contemplates that, although in a measure largely supported by the state, yet when the appropriation is made it ceases to be the property of the state and becomes the property of the individual school, and is held by the trustees of the school for its benefit, and not for the benefit of the state at large. These trustees are authorized to equip these schools, and to maintain and operate them; and it would seem that this would include the right to buy furniture for the school and such other property as would be necessary in its maintenance and operation. In the case of Knight v. State, 137 Ga. 537, 73 S. E. 825, it is held that, where funds arising partly from oil inspection fees and partly from private donations had been turned over to and were in the hands of trustees of a school of agriculture and mechanical arts, established in a particular congressional district, under Civil Code, § 1552 et seq., and were deposited by the treasurer of the board of trustees in his own name, as such, in a bank which was a state depository, and which failed, this did not constitute such a debt due to the state as created a lien in its favor by virtue of its general sovereignty. From that decision it follows that the money of these schools arising from inspection fees and private donations is not the property of the state, but the property of these institutions, and subject to the debts created by the trustees.

A careful study of the legislation relating to the entire system of schools and colleges composing the University of Georgia would seem to indicate that it intended to make all these subsidiary institutions stand in the same relation to the state and the public as the University stands, and be subject to sue and be sued. This is the only reasonable construction to be placed upon such legislation. The Legislature could not have intended to authorize the trustees to maintain these schools, to authorize private donations to be made to them, to authorize their equipment and management, and to put the public on notice of the right to deal with them, without the necessary implication that as to these schools the state would not claim the constitutional exemption from suit. If the public understood that in dealing with these schools through their boards of trustees it was dealing with the state in its sovereign capacity, and would have to resort to the Legislature of the state to be paid debts created by the trustees for the purpose of equipping and maintaining the schools, both the management and usefulness of such schools would be largely impeded, if not altogether destroyed. In embarking in an enterprise which is usually carried on by private individuals or companies, it was the intention of the state to waive, as to this enterprise, its sovereign character, and to confer upon individuals the right to enforce by suit contracts made by the trustees in pursuance of the powers delegated to them by the act. Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. v. Carlton, 28 Ga. 180.

It follows from what we have said that the contract for the purchase of furniture, made by the trustees in behalf of the First District Agricultural and Mechanical School, was clearly within the scope of the authority delegated to them as such trustees. It was a part of their express work in equipping the school; and the vendors of this furniture, or their lawful assignees or transferees, were fully authorized to sue out a purchase-money attachment for the balance due on the furniture, and the lower court did not err in refusing to dismiss the suit.

Judgment affirmed.

PELHAM & H. R. CO. v. ELLIOTT.
(No. 3,579.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Oct. 4, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 210*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

"Under the previous rulings of this court, if a witness has been impeached, it is the duty of the jury to disregard his testimony unless corroborated in material particulars." Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9 (5a), 29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277. It is therefore error, in a case in which the determination of the issue depends almost entirely upon the credibility of a witness whom it is sought to impeach, to refuse a request that section 5884 of the Civil Code of 1910 be given in charge to the jury; the request being in the exact language of that section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 490-494; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 46*)—GROUNDS—SEPARATION OF JURY.

A new trial should not be granted for an irregularity as to the separation of the jury, which was known to counsel at the time, and yet was not brought to the attention of the court until after the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 86½, 87; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 972*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—TIME FOR ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Extension of the time allowed to counsel for argument, when there is no express rule upon the subject, is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judge, and his discretion will not be controlled, unless it is manifestly abused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3847; Dec. Dig. § 972.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1060*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

"Side bar" remarks and irregular comments of counsel, during the course of a trial, cannot be approved as conducive to the decorum of the courts; but they will not be held by a reviewing court to be cause for new trial, unless it is manifest that the conduct or remarks of counsel were necessarily prejudicial to the opposite party, and that the trial judge abused his discretion in not applying sufficiently drastic measures to remove their injurious effect and to enforce order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4135; Dec. Dig. § 1060.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 133*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 29*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1060*)—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—ACTION OF JUDGE.

It is illegal and highly prejudicial to a fair and just administration of the rights of the parties for counsel, in addressing the jury, to comment upon matters not proven, and not growing out of the pleadings. It is the duty of the trial judge to prevent such comments, and he should at least, upon a timely and appropriate request of the party likely to be prejudiced thereby, direct the attention of the jury to the impropriety of the argument and caution them against it. If statements of fact, or comments, unjustified by the evidence, are made by counsel, and it is apparent that the impropriety may be prejudicial to the opposite party, and yet the court takes no action to apply any corrective measure, though requested to do so, a new trial will be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 133.* New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. § 29.* Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4135; Dec. Dig. § 1060.*]

Error from City Court of Cairo; J. R. Singletary, Judge.

Action by A. C. Elliott against the Pelham & Havana Railroad Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. C. Bell, of Cairo, and Lane & Park, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. W. J. Willie, of Cairo, and Smith, Hastings & Ransom, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. A. C. Elliott brought suit against the Pelham & Havana Railroad Company, alleging that while in the discharge of his duty as a conductor on one of the company's trains on December 3, 1909, he was compelled to ride on the top of a car, because there was no caboose; that the car became derailed, and turned over, throwing him from the top of the car to the ground, wrenching his ankle and knee, and tearing and bruising the muscles and nerves of his spine; that his capacity to labor was thereby entirely destroyed, and that he had suffered and always would suffer great pain; that he was 37 years old, and was earning $600 per year, at the time of his injury. The defendant denied that it was operating a railroad at the time of the injury, admitting only that its proposed railroad was in process of construction, and further denied the allegations of negligence, and all other allegations of the petition. The trial of the case resulted in a verdict for $6,000, and the defendant excepted to the refusal of a new trial.

Some of the assignments of error do not present any sufficient reason for the grant of a new trial. Some of the requests to charge were properly refused, because they were imperfect and defective. The instructions requested in some of the requests, to the refusal of which exception is taken, were presented, not in the language requested, it is true, but in the judge's own language, in substantial compliance with the requests. There are a number of exceptions predicated upon the conduct of the judge in failing to prevent certain incidents of the trial, which, it is claimed, prejudiced the defendant's case before the jury, and which were objected to at the time, and several assignments of error predicated upon instructions to the jury which it is insisted were erroneous; but we do not think that any of the above-mentioned assignments of error present sufficient cause to authorize a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial. Disregarding, however, all those assignments of error which we deem to be immaterial, and ignoring those which are without merit, it is our deliberate opinion that upon three grounds of the motion for new trial a new trial is required, if we follow, as we are bound to follow, the previous adjudications of the Supreme Court, as well as of this court.

[1] 1. It is with the utmost reluctance that we set aside the verdict of the jury in any case where there is evidence to authorize it, and this court has not ordered and will not order the grant of a new trial in any case where the trial has been free from substantial error, or even in a case where error has been committed, if the error is not likely to have affected the result, where there is, as in this case, enough evidence to support the finding of the jury. But in a case where the verdict rendered is not the only verdict that could have been reached under the evidence submitted, and it appears that there were errors in the trial which may have affected the result, and especially where, in a close case, all those errors may have tended to influence the jury to believe the witness for one party rather than the testimony for the other party, our duty requires that a new trial be granted, in order that the guaranty that every person shall have a fair trial shall be made effectual. Pretermittting for the present any discussion as to whether the defendant sustained its contention that it was only in the process of construction and had not become a common carrier, it is manifest, upon a review of the evidence, that the case turned upon whether the injuries from which the plaintiff claimed to suffer were received as a result of negligence of the defendant, or whether his suffering was not caused by injuries received prior to his employment by the defendant. Another controlling issue was whether the injury was due to the negligence of the defendant or the negligence of the plaintiff. The controlling issues of the case were largely dependent upon the credibility of the plaintiff himself.

An effort was made to impeach him by proof of contradictory statements, and a proper request to charge the jury upon the subject of impeachment was refused by the court. The court further certifies that the jury were not instructed upon the subject at all. It is well settled, of course, that in the absence of a request a judge is not required to charge the jury upon the law as to the impeachment of witnesses; but it is no less well settled that to refuse an appropriate request upon the subject is error. Though in some cases the refusal of a request that the jury be properly instructed as to the law with relation to the impeachment of witnesses, while error, might not require the grant of a new trial, the question as to whether the failure to charge upon the subject is or is not error must always be determined by the importance of the testimony to the issue, as well as its materiality. In the case at bar the testimony of the plaintiff was most material, and the success or failure of the defendant in discrediting the plaintiff's testimony before the jury was of as vital importance to the defendant as that the jury should believe it was essential to the plaintiff. Though it is usually unimportant that the attention of an intelligent jury be directed to circumstances that may have affected the credibility of a witness who has testified in the case, yet in such a case as the one now before us, where the credibility of the witness as to the very vitals of the case is attacked, not only by testimony denying the facts to which he testifies, but by an attempt to show that his character is such that he is not worthy of belief, it may be a substantial right (and frequently is) to have the court call the attention of the jury to the impeaching testimony, and instruct them as to the effect they must legally give it, in case they believe the testimony introduced for the purpose of impeachment is true. It is true the law leaves it in every case to a party to say how important he considers it to be to his case that the jury shall be instructed as to the rules governing the consideration of such testimony and its effect upon the case; and for that reason, therefore, it is not error for the judge to omit to refer to the subject, if he is not requested to do so. But if a party considers it material, he cannot be deprived of the right to have the jury properly instructed upon this branch of the law merely because he may at his option exercise the right or decline to avail himself of it.

Even if the jury believes the testimony of previous contradictory statements relating to matters material to the issue, and even though the proof of these contradictory statements may impeach the witness to the satisfaction of the jury, they may overlook their right to disregard his testimony entirely, if they are satisfied that he swore willfully and knowingly falsely. For this reason the court should have charged the jury, as requested, that, "when a witness is successfully contradicted as to material matter, his credit as to other matters is for the jury; but if a witness swear willfully and knowingly falsely, his testimony ought to be disregarded entirely, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached evidence. It is for the jury to determine the credit to be given the testimony, where impeached for general bad character or for contradictory statements out of court." The instruction requested was in the very language of section 5884 of the Civil Code of 1910, and, under our view of it, the principle was not inapplicable for any of the reasons stated by the learned counsel for the defendant in error. This section of the Code may be subject to the criticism suggested by Prof. Wigmore (2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1111); but the only point which we can consider is the applicability of the section, for it is the duty of the courts to enforce the law as they find it, and, until repealed, this section is a part of the law. Harris v. State, 1 Ga. App. 136 (3), 57 S. E. 937; Southern Railway Company v. Peek, 6 Ga. App. 43 (1), 64 S. E. 308; McCullough v. Sawtell, 134 Ga. 512 (3), 68 S. E. 89; Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9 (5), 29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277; Rouse v. State, 136 Ga. 356 (4), 71 S. E. 667 (4).

[2] 2. Exception is taken to the court's permitting the jury to disperse and remain separate during the night, while the case was in progress and after a considerable portion of the evidence had been submitted, without consent of the defendant's counsel, and without cautioning the jury or giving them any instruction whatever in regard to the consideration of the case by them, or the making up of their minds upon the same, and without cautioning them not to talk with or accept any courtesies from any one connected with the case; the jury being dismissed without any instructions, caution, or reference of any kind whatsoever. It is insisted that this was especially prejudicial, because the trial of the case attracted attention in the city court of Cairo, the courtroom was crowded, and the case was almost the sole topic of conversation about the hotel and on the streets of the city. This ground of the motion is not fully approved by the trial judge, and hence could not be considered. But in no event should a new trial be granted for an irregularity as to the separation of the jury, which was known at the time to the counsel for the defendant, and yet was not brought to the attention of the court until after the verdict. Riggins v. Brown, 12 Ga. 272; Waller v. State, 2 Ga. App. 636 (3), 58 S. E. 1106.

[3] 3. Error is assigned because the court allowed Hon. Hoke Smith, counsel for the plaintiff, in his concluding argument to the jury, over the written protest of defendant's counsel, to speak several minutes beyond the time allowed by the rules of the court for argument; no additional time having been asked for. It is alleged that the court erred in refusing to grant a mistrial because of this additional allowance of time, and that "it was particularly hurtful to the defendant, because of the great personal influence of said counsel, and the position occupied by him as Governor-elect of the state of Georgia, and because the courtroom was crowded with the friends, admirers, and political supporters of the counsel, who constantly mani-festated the greatest interest in and approval of his argument, which could not but be observed by the jury," and, movant insists, influenced them against the defendant. To this ground the court only gives qualified approval, by certifying that the plaintiff's counsel did speak several minutes longer than counsel for the defendant, and adds that, under the practice in the city court of Cairo, argument of counsel is not limited, and counsel are permitted to argue as long as they please. The court further certifies that, if there was any interest manifested in the argument of counsel or approval thereof, the court's attention was not called to it by movant's counsel. Under this qualifying note, nothing is left for us to pass upon but the fact that counsel for one of the parties spoke longer than the other, and that the court declined to grant a mistrial for this. We certainly could not hold that this was error, or that, under the circumstances as they really occurred, and as certified to by the judge, there was any abuse of his discretion. There are occasions where the circumstances require the judge to intervene ex mero motu, and stop conduct or language in the presence of the jury which may be prejudicial to the rights of the litigant or derogatory to the dignity of the court; but such matters as are referred to in the present assignment of error cannot properly be made ground for exception, unless the attention of the court is called to them at the time. We do not think that the mere fact that counsel exceeds the limit of time allowed by law for argument would ordinarily be good ground for mistrial, for, if time is the only thing the counsel is consuming, he will be more apt to benefit the opposite party, by wearying the jury and thus prejudicing them against his own client than otherwise.

[4] 4. The practice of indulging in "side bar" remarks is not to be approved. The trial judge should do everything in his power to maintain the decorum of his court and advance justice by orderly procedure. However, irregular comments of counsel during the course of trial will not be held by the reviewing court to be error, unless it is manifest that the trial judge abused his discretion, in not applying sufficiently drastic measures to enforce order in a case where it is plain that the conduct or remarks of counsel cannot fail to be prejudicial.

[5] 5. In the fifteenth ground of the amended motion for a new trial complaint is made that the leading counsel for the plaintiff in the lower court, Hon. Hoke Smith, who was then Governor-elect of the state of Georgia, in his concluding argument, referred to his previous knowledge of the plaintiff in the city of Atlanta, when he was a street car conductor in that city, and stated that he believed in the plaintiff, knew that he was injured, believed in his testimony, and believed he was injured to the full extent he claimed. The defendant's counsel objected to these statements, and requested the court to charge the jury that they must try the case on the evidence, and not on the personal belief of counsel. The court declined to do this, and did not even caution the jury in regard to the statements of belief by plaintiff's counsel. In the instructions of the court to the jury there is no reference to the matter, and it does not appear that the remarks to which objection was made were withdrawn or explained. If the question presented were a new one, we should not be inclined to consider that the exception presented a good ground for a new trial in a case in which the evidence would authorize the result reached by the jury, and we would not feel justified in setting aside their verdict merely because of counsel's expressions of his belief. If the question were here presented for the first time, we would unhesitatingly declare our confidence in the ability of a jury of ordinary intelligence to disregard improper argument, and their ability to place their finding upon the facts derived from the sworn testimony of the witnesses and the law as it should be given them in charge by the court. But the question before us is not a new one in Georgia, and the only duty which devolves upon us is to determine whether the argument complained of falls within the well-settled rule, for the infraction of which the grant of a new trial is mandatory, and to inquire whether there is anything in the circumstances of the present case, as they are set before us by the record, which so distinguish it from the cases heretofore adjudicated that we can truthfully say it is not within the general rule.

It may be said, in passing, that the statement, which appears more than once in the motion for new trial—that the distinguished counsel was at the time "Governor-elect of the state of Georgia" has no other bearing than that the effect of improper argument, or of counsel testifying in argument, is always more damaging in proportion to the admitted character and standing of the counsel. A remark or improper argument from an insignificant barrister might be highly improper and illegal, and yet, as a matter of fact, be but little prejudicial or entirely harmless in its effect, while the same remark from one whose learning, character, and ability made him a tower of strength could not be lightly turned aside, and might work untold injury to its object. The statements made by the counsel in the present case must be admitted to trench more largely on the rights of the witness than the remarks of the solicitor general in Georgia Railway & Electric Company v. Dougherty, 4 Ga. App. 614, 62 S. E. 158; but the rule is an old one. Without deciding the question in finality, the court, in Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 511, condemned the practice. In Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 616, the court proceeded to deal with the question at length, and to lay down a definite rule, which has been followed ever since. In view of our personal opinion, as well as of the importance of the matter to the profession, we deem it not inappropriate to quote, in extenso, the reasons of Judge Nisbet:

"We have had occasion to consider the habit of counsel, in addressing the jury, of commenting upon matters not proven and not growing out of the pleadings before, and have been content with visiting it with a decided and emphatic disapproval. Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 522, 523. We entertain no shadow of doubt as to the necessity of pronouncing it, as we now do, illegal and highly prejudicial to a fair and just administration of the rights of parties, either on the criminal or civil side of the court. It is the duty of the court to prevent such comments, and in all cases where this is not done we shall hold, as we rule in this case, that it is good ground for a new trial. There was, it is true, some excuse for the license conceded the solicitor general in this case, in the fact that the counsel for the prisoner had already taken the same liberty in his argument to the jury. The solicitor general, no doubt, felt called upon by the obligations of his office to remove any wrong impression which the argument of the counsel for the prisoner had made as to the credibility of the witness. Disregarding, however, these things, we have no option but to make this the occasion of establishing a rule upon this subject. In doing this, I am sure that it is scarcely necessary to say that we disclaim any purpose of inflicting a personal censure upon the able and upright judge who presided in the cause, or upon the counsel and the prosecuting officer. If no other reason existed for this disclaimer (and there are many), sufficient reason would be found in the usage of our courts, which has gone very far to sanction the habit referred to. Its practical tendency is bad upon the court, the bar, and the jury. If this were all, perhaps our duty would stop with the expression of such an opinion; but this is not all, for in our judgment it is violative of the rights of the citizen litigant in the courts of justice, and, if so, we are not at liberty to stop short of making it cause for new trial.

"It is not foreign to the subject to say that it is the duty of counsel to guard, by the most scrupulous propriety of demeanor, in the conduct of a cause, the dignity and honor of the profession. Connected as it is, most intimately, with the administration of justice, it should be protected most vigilantly from falling into popular disrepute. It ought, as I verily believe it does, to command the respect of the wise, and the reverence of the good. Power and place, hereditary wealth, stupidity in high social position, and even genius, pandering to a popular taste for caricature, jealous of the power which it wields upon governments, have labored to degrade it. Still in this country and in England, if nowhere else, the bar is the ladder upon which men mount to distinction, the lawyer is the champion of popular rights, the class to which he belongs is more influential than any other, and counsel, yes, feed counsel, is indispensable to a fair and full administration of justice. When learning and character, and practiced skill, and eloquence, and enthusiasm, chastened by discretion, are enlisted in behalf of the litigant, he may rest assured that he holds in his counsel the very best guaranty against all forms of wrong and oppression in the administration of the law. It is true that he is paid for his services—and what of that? Are not princes and premiers, presidents and priests, also paid? One thing never yet was bought with money, and that is the soul-engrossing identification of counsel with his client. It is the gratuitous bestowal of his sympathy, drawing forth the masterly powers of his genius and the rich treasures of his learning, that makes the great lawyer, the honored and influential citizen. The approval of conscience and the respect of good men are his reward—far richer than the stipulated fee of these days, or the honorarium of the Roman advocate. If I thus magnify the office of the counsel, it is for the purpose of saying that its very importance makes indispensable the exclusion of the habit which we now condemn.

"But I proceed, claiming the indulgence on account of these general remarks, of the critical professional reader, to test the rule we lay down by strictly legal considerations. That rule is that it is contrary to law for counsel to comment upon facts not proven. He represents his client; he is the substitute of his client; whatever the client may do in the conduct of his cause, therefore, his counsel may do. In relation to his liberty of speech, the largest and most liberal freedom is allowed, and the law protects him in it. The right of discussing the merits of his cause, both as to the law and the facts, is indispensable to every party; the same right appertains to his counsel. The range of discussion is wide—very wide. He is entitled to be heard in argument upon every question of law that may arise in the cause; in his addresses to the jury it is his right to descant upon the facts proven or admitted in the pleadings, to arraign the conduct of parties, impugn, excuse, justify, or condemn motives, so far as they are developed in evidence, assail the credibility of witnesses, when that is impeached by direct evidence, or by the inconsistency or incoherence of his testimony, his manner of testifying, his appearance, or by circumstances. His illustrations may be as various as are the resources of his genius; his argumentation as full and profound as his learning can make it; and he may, if he will, give play to his wit, or wing to his imagination. To his freedom of speech, however, there are some limitations. It has been found difficult to prescribe a legal limitation to the lawyer's liberty of speech in the performance of his duties in a cause. That the discussions should be free is perfectly obvious; and even abuses should be tolerated, rather than a privilege so valuable should be abridged. We feel the delicacy of the ground upon which we tread, and are solicitous of being understood as carrying our present ruling no farther than to cover the precise question made in the assignment.

"Statements of facts not proven, and comments thereon, are outside of a cause; they stand legally irrelevant to the matter in question, and are therefore not pertinent. If not pertinent, they are not within the privilege of counsel. Trial by jury! How imperfect a privilege would that be, if the forms of law were abandoned—if the rules of evidence were disregarded! An essential element in the trial by jury is that their verdict shall be rendered according to the facts of the case, legally produced to them. They are sworn to give their verdicts according to evidence, and if they find without evidence, or against evidence, a new trial will be granted. They cannot even render a verdict upon knowledge within their own breasts; but, if a jurymen has knowledge of facts pertinent to the issue, he may be sworn. The law, with great carefulness, prescribes rules by which facts are to be submitted to the jury. Testimony must be relevant; the best evidence the nature of the case admits must be produced; hearsay is excluded; interest in the witness will disqualify, etc.; and by our own Constitution in criminal cases the witnesses are to be confronted with the prisoner. He has in all cases the right of cross-examination. All these and many more rules are prescribed for the ascertainment of the truth of these facts upon which verdicts are to be rendered. The law to be administered may depend upon the facts proven. 'Ex facto oritur jus.' 'And if the fact,' writes Blackstone, 'is perverted or misrepresented, the law which arises from thence will unavoidably be unjust or partial; and in order to prevent this, it is necessary to set right the fact, and establish the truth contended for, by appealing to some mode of probation or trial, which the law of the country has ordained for a criterion of truth and falsehood.' 3 Black. Com. 330.

"When counsel are permitted to state facts in argument, and to comment upon them, the usage of the courts regulating trials is departed from, the laws of evidence are violated, and the full benefit of trial by jury is therefore denied. It may be said, in answer to these views, that the statements of counsel are not evidence, that the court is bound so to instruct the jury, and that they are sworn to render a verdict only ac-ording to the evidence. While this is true, yet the effect is to bring the statements of counsel to bear upon the verdict with more or less force, according to circumstances; and if they in any degree influence the finding, the law is violated, and the purity and impartiality of the trial are tarnished and weakened. If not evidence, then without doubt the jury have nothing to do with them, and the lawyer no right to make them. And just here the argument might be rested. It is not reasonable to believe the jury will disregard them. They may struggle to disregard them, and still be left involuntarily to shape their verdict under their influence. That influence will be greater or less, according to the character of counsel, his skill and adroitness in argument, and the naturalness with which the statements stand connected with other facts and circumstances in the case. To an extent not definable, yet to a dangerous extent, they are evidence, not given under oath, without cross-examination and irrespective of all precautionary rules by which competency is tested.

"In this case the statements and comments had reference to the character and credibility of the witness. I know of no rule of law which authorizes the credibility of a witness to be impeached or fortified thus. The manner of attacking or defending the character of a witness is fixed by law, and fixed, among other things, that he may not be subject to irregular and irresponsible assaults upon his veracity and fairness. He, as well as parties and counsel, has rights, which it is the duty of the court to protect. It were a cruel injustice to permit his character to be driven to and fro, like the shuttlecock, by outside statements of counsel. Where shall the license stop? If allowed against the credibility of a witness, then with equal reason they are to be allowed as touching the merits of the issue. If crimination is granted, recrimination cannot be refused. If statements on one side are permitted, counter statements on the other cannot be denied. If allowed to men of the highest honor, they cannot be denied to those few to be found in every profession destitute of all honorable principle. The concession, carried out in its legitimate consequences, would convert the stern, inflexible law and order of a court of justice into confusion, uncertainty, and injustice."

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 291*)—FORECLOSURE—AFFIDAVIT AS TO DEBT.

In the foreclosure of mortgages on personality, the statute provides that the mortgagee, in person, or by his agent or attorney in fact or at law, shall make an affidavit before a proper officer, designated by the statute, of the amount of principal and the interest due on the mortgage, etc. This affidavit is a necessary basis of the mortgage foreclosure, and without it the foreclosure proceeding, and the fi. fa. and levy based upon it, are mere nullities, and are subject to collateral attack for lack of such affidavit in any court. Civil Code 1910, § 3286; Meadows v. Alexander, 1 Ga. App. 40, 57 S. E. 901.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 283*)—ACTION ON FORTHCOMING BOND—DEFENSES.

Where property levied upon under an execution based upon an alleged mortgage foreclosure was replevied, and a forthcoming bond made by the plaintiff in the mortgage foreclosure, and it appeared, in a suit on the forthcoming bond, that no affidavit was made as a basis of the foreclosure, the suit was properly dismissed; there being no authority for the levying officer to make the levy or to take the forthcoming bond. The lack of an affidavit as a basis of such foreclosure extended to the validity of the process. Smith v. Lockett, 73 Ga. 104; Oliver v. Warren, 124 Ga. 551, 53 S. E. 100, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1020, 110 Am. St. Rep. 188.

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 271*)—REQUISITES AND VALIDITY—SIGNATURE—ATTESTATION.

A paper purporting to be an affidavit made by the attorney at law for the mortgagee in foreclosure proceedings, but which appears not to have been signed by the affiant or attested by any officer, is not an affidavit, and cannot be the basis of a mortgage foreclosure. In this state the signature of the affiant is necessary to the validity of the affidavit. Riley v. Warrenton, 120 Ga. 368, 47 S. E. 972.

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 175*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—ACTION FOR BREACH.

Where, in consideration of the execution of a bond by a surety company, the condition of which was the faithful performance by the principal of a certain building contract, the principal executed a written instrument as a part of the application for the bond, agreeing to indemnify the surety company "against all loss, costs, damages, charges, and expenses whatever resulting from any act, default, or neglect" of the principal which the surety might "sustain or incur," the indemnity agreement of the principal was not merged in and extinguished by the bond, but suit for its breach could be brought thereon at any time within the statutory period.

2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 316*)—PROVABLE DEBTS—"SUSTAIN OR INCUR."

The liability of the principal to the surety in the bond, under the indemnity agreement set forth above, does not constitute a claim provable in bankruptcy against the estate of the principal until the surety has actually paid the obligee in the bond the damages sustained by reason of the principal's default. No such damage has been sustained or incurred by the surety, within the meaning of the agreement, until after actual payment.

3. BANKRUPTCY (§ 314*) — "ALLOWABLE DEBTS"—"PROVABLE DEBTS."

A deed is not allowable in bankruptcy, unless it is provable; but it may be provable, without being allowable. Allowability implies, not only provability, but also validity; and if for any reason the claim is improper, or if there is a good defense to it, it is not allowable, though it may be provable, as a debt.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against R. P. Williams & Co. and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The case as made by the petition was substantially as follows: The defendants entered into a contract for the building of a schoolhouse in the state of Florida. They executed to the trustees of the school a bond in the penal sum of $7,500, conditioned to faithfully comply with all of the terms of the contract. The bond further provided that, if the principals should fail to comply with the conditions of the contract to such an extent that the same should be forfeited, the surety should have the right to assume the contract and to sublet or complete the building, whichever the surety might elect to do; that in the event of a breach of any of the conditions of the bond the surety should be subrogated to all the rights of the principals under the contract, and all deferred payments and all money and property at that time due and payable, or which might thereafter become due and payable, to the principals under the contract, should be credited upon any claim which the trustees might make upon the surety because of the breach of contract. The bond was issued pursuant to a written application made to the surety company by the contractors, in which application they agreed to indemnify the surety "against all loss, costs, damages, charges, and expenses whatever resulting from any act, default, or neglect of ours that said United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company may sustain or incur by reason of its having executed said bond or any continuation thereof." The agreement further provided: "And we further agree, in the event of our being unable to complete or carry on the aforementioned contract, to assign such plant as we may own, or have upon said work, to the said United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, that it may use the same in the prosecution of said work to completion. We hereby further agree, for ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, to accept the vouchers or other evidence of any losses paid by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company under the aforesaid obligation, together with vouchers, or other evidence of payment, of all costs and expenses whatever incurred by the said United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company in adjusting such loss or in completing said contract, as conclusive evidence against us and our individual estates of the fact and extent of our liability under said obligation to the said United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. And we do further agree, in the event of any breach or default on our part of the provisions of the contract hereinbefore mentioned, that the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety on the aforesaid bond, shall be subrogated to all our rights and properties as principals in said contract, and that deferred payment and any and all moneys and properties that may be due and payable to us at the time of such breach or default, or that may thereafter become due and payable to us, on account of said contract, shall be credited upon any claim that may be made upon the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company under the bond above mentioned." The application, with the agreement made by the contractors therein embodied, was under seal and duly signed by the contractors. The application was made on March 24, 1900, and the bond was executed on March 29, 1900. The contractors having defaulted, suit on the bond was brought against the principals and the surety, and on July 1, 1904, judgment was duly rendered against them, and on February 20, 1905, the surety paid the judgment, amounting to $5,475.88.

The present suit was brought by the surety against the principals in the bond to recover this sum, together with certain sums paid by the surety for attorney's fees, costs, and other expenses, in connection with the litigation. After setting forth the facts above detailed, the plaintiff alleges that by reason of these facts the defendants are liable, jointly and severally, to indemnify and pay over to the plaintiff the loss, costs, damages, and charges above set forth, all of which, it is averred, resulted from the default of the defendants under the contract, for the faithful performance of which the bond was given and the indemnity contract made. The defendants demurred to the petition, upon the ground that it did not distinctly appear upon what cause of action the plaintiff had declared—whether for money paid for the use of defendants, or upon the judgment rendered against the plaintiff, or upon the bond upon which the plaintiff was surety, or upon the application for the bond, containing the indemnifying agreement on the part of the defendants. It is insisted by the demurrer that, if the suit is based upon the application, the petition should be dismissed, because the application was extinguished when the bond was issued, and could not serve as a cause of action against the defendant, having been merged in the bond; that, if the action is based upon the bond, it fails, because the bond was merged in and extinguished by the judgment; that, if the suit is based upon the judgment, it should be dismissed, because it does not appear that the judgment was ever assigned to the plaintiff, and because the action is barred by the statute of limitations; that, if the cause of action is for money paid for defendants' use, it is likewise barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer raised the further objection that the contract made by the defendants with the school trustees is not set forth in or attached to the petition. The demurrer was overruled. The defendants answered, admitting the execution of the bond and the application, copies of which were exhibited with the petition. The answer also admitted the recovery of a judgment in the state of Florida and contained the special defense that on May 28, 1901, the defendants filed their petition in bankruptcy and were duly adjudged bankrupt, and on October 5, 1901, were discharged in bankruptcy.

The case was submitted to the presiding judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts. The amount of liability was agreed upon, if the defendants were liable at all. It was further agreed that on November 9, 1900, the defendants abandoned their contract with the trustees of the school in Florida for the erection of the schoolhouse referred to in the bond executed by the plaintiff as surety; that immediately thereafter the trustees took charge of the building, and on April 13, 1901, completed it, and that on May 14, 1901, they gave notice of its completion to the plaintiff and the surety on the bond referred to, and made demand upon the surety for payment of the amount that they had expended upon the building in excess of the contract price; that on May 28, 1901, the defendants filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and on the same day were duly adjudged bankrupt; that in the schedule attached to the petition it was recited that in April, 1900, the defendants entered into a contract for the building of the schoolhouse referred to in the bond; that to guarantee the completion of the contract the bond was executed, with the plaintiff as surety thereon; and that the school board terminated the contract by taking charge of the building and completing it. It was further recited in the bankrupts' schedule that: "Whether or not there will be any liability on said bond petitioner is unable to say, as the matters involved in said contract and said building and the termination thereof have not been adjusted." In the schedule of creditors whose claims were unsecured appeared the name of the plaintiff, with the statement that the petitioner's liability to the surety company was fully described in another schedule, referred to above. On July 31, 1901, the trustees of the school proved their claim in the bankrupt court for $8,876.08, for money expended in building in excess of the contract price. No dividend was paid to creditors, the assets (amounting to about $301) being consumed in the administration of the estate. On September 20, 1901, the defendants filed their petition for discharge in bankruptcy, and on October 5, 1901, an order of discharge was duly granted. Upon this agreed statement of facts a judgment was entered against defendants for the amount which had been agreed upon as the amount of their liability if they were liable. Defendants have excepted to the overruling of the demurrer, and to the final judgment.

Green, Tilson & McKinney, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. [1] 1. There is no merit in the demurrer. The cause of action declared upon is clearly for the breach of the indemnity agreement embodied in the application for the bond. This agreement and the payment of the premium mentioned in the application constituted the consideration for the execution of the bond. The agreement was certainly not extinguished by the execution of the bond, for upon its face it was to have no force and effect unless the surety company became liable on its undertaking. It is true that the principals in the bond would have been liable over to the surety upon an implied obligation to reimburse it for any loss it might have sustained, even though no express agreement to this effect had been made; but there was certainly no legal objection to the execution of an express agreement, in consideration of the execution of the bond, to do that which the law would have compelled the principals to do without an agreement. The petition set forth a cause of action of the nature above indicated, as it was not barred by the statute of limitations, nor was it subject to any of the grounds of demurrer filed by the defendant.

[2] 2. The only remaining question is whether or not the defense of discharge in bankruptcy was good, and this question depends upon whether the plaintiff's claim was a debt provable in bankruptcy, within the meaning of the bankrupt act. Debts which are provable in bankruptcy are classified in section 63 of the bankrupt act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 562 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447]), which is as follows: "Debts of the bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate which are (1) a fixed liability, as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which would have been recoverable at that date or with a rebate of interest upon such as were not then payable and did not bear interest; (2) due as costs taxable against an involuntary bankrupt who was at the time of the filing of the petition against him plaintiff in a cause of action which would pass to the trustee and which the trustee declines to prosecute after notice; (3) founded upon a claim for taxable costs incurred in good faith by a creditor before the filing of the petition in an action to recover a provable debt; (4) founded upon an open account, or upon a contract express or implied; and (5) founded upon provable debts reduced to judgments after the filing of the petition and before the consideration of the bankrupt's application for a discharge, less costs incurred and interests accrued after the filing of the petition and up to the time of the entry of such judgments. Unliquidated claims against the bankrupt may, pursuant to application to the court, be liquidated in such manner as it shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against his estate." Collier, Bankruptcy (9th Ed.) p. 1355. Unless a debt is an obligation susceptible of being presented in such form as to come within some one or more of the classes of debts designated in section 63, supra, as "provable" debts, whether actually presented or not, it is not defeated by the discharge in bankruptcy. Remington, Bankruptcy, § 628. "And the question whether or not a debt is provable turns upon its status at the time of the filing of the petition." Remington, Bankruptcy, § 629; In re Pettingill & Co. (D. C.) 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 728, 137 Fed. 143; Id., 137 Fed. 840, 70 C. C. A. 338.

[3] There is a distinction between provable debts and allowable debts. A debt is, of course, not allowable unless it is provable; but it may be provable without being allowable. Allowability implies, not only provability, but also validity. If for any reason the claim is improper, or if there be a good defense to it, it is not allowable, although it may be provable as a debt. Remington, Bankruptcy, § 632. Generally, contingent claims are not provable, although some classes of unliquidated demands may be proved in bankruptcy. Mr. Remington thus states the rule: "The test as to whether a claim is really contingent, or is simply unliquidated or unascertained by legal proceedings, would seem to be this: Have all the facts necessary to be proved to fasten liability already occurred? If so, the claim is not contingent, although the liability and the extent of damages may not yet have been ascertained by the consideration of a court as evidenced by judgment or decree, nor even the full extent of damages arising been already suffered. The contingency, in other words, is a contingency of facts necessary to fasten liability at all, not a contingency of the court's judgment on the facts, nor a contingency as to the extent of the damages resulting from the injury. Again, so long as it remains uncertain whether a contract or liability will ever give rise to an actual duty or liability, and there is no means of removing the uncertainty by calculation, it is too contingent to be a provable debt." Remington, Bankruptcy, § 641.

A distinction must be drawn between a contract of indemnity and a contract whereby one person obligates himself to pay another's debt. In the case of a mere contract of indemnity, no action can be maintained for a breach until actual payment by the obligee. The distinction has thus been stated by our Supreme Court in a case where a partner retired and the partner remaining obligated himself to pay the debts of the firm. Upon this point the court said: "The contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time the firm dissolved was one by which the defendant obligated himself to pay the debts of the firm, and in such a case there is a breach of the contract whenever the partner agreeing to pay the debts fails to do so, and the outgoing partner can maintain a suit without having paid anything himself. The rule is otherwise when the contract is simply one of indemnity, or to hold the partner harmless, in which case no right of action arises in favor of the outgoing partner until he has either paid voluntarily or been compelled to pay debts against the payment of which he has been indemnified." Tucker v. Murphey, 114 Ga. 662, 663, 40 S. E. 836. See, also, to the same effect, Harvey v. Daniel, 36 Ga. 562, where it is distinctly ruled that, when a mere indemnity bond is given against the payment of money, the plaintiff, in order to recover for a breach, must show loss or damage sustained by the actual payment of the money, or that which the law considers equivalent to an actual payment; the existence of a mere legal liability to pay not being sufficient. This distinction has received well-nigh universal recognition. See 16 Am. Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) 178; 22 Cyc. 79. In Wicker v. Hoppock, 6 Wall. 94, 18 L. Ed. 752, the Supreme Court of the United States drew the distinction very clearly between the two classes of contracts, and said that in a contract of indemnity the obligee could not recover until he had been actually damaged, and then only to the extent of the injury he had sustained up to the time of the institution of the suit; but, in the case of an agreement to pay, recovery might be had as soon as there was a breach of the contract and the measure of the damages should be the full amount agreed to be paid. See, also, Sapp v. Faircloth, 70 Ga. 690, 693, and Thomas v. Richards, 124 Ga. 942, 53 S. E. 400. If at the time of the filing of the petition the liability of the bankrupt is fixed, so that upon the happening of a contingency the amount could be ascertained by computation, it is a provable claim, if the contingency happens in time to prove the claim under the act, and such a claim may be liquidated, if necessary in the bankrupt court. Loveland, Bankruptcy, 598.

The decisions are not entirely in harmony in reference to the provability of claims of a somewhat similar nature to the one involved in the present case. In Insley v. Gar-side, 10 Am. Bankr. Rep. 52, 121 Fed. 699, 58 C. C. A. 119, the court declined to allow the surety on a bankrupt's bond to prove his claim. In Wood v. U. S. (D. C.) 16 Am. Bankr. Rep. 21, 143 Fed. 424, the court expressed the opinion that the claim of a surety might be proved and liquidated in the bankrupt court, because at the time of the filing of the petition the liability to the surety had been incurred. In Clemmons v. Brinn, 7 Am. Bankr. Rep. 714, 36 Misc. Rep. 157, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1066, it was held that the liability of the defendant upon a replevy bond given to a sheriff was too contingent to be provable against the defendant's estate in bankruptcy. In Re Roth & Appel, 181 Fed. 667, 104 C. C. A. 649, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 270, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that a lease which provided that in case the lessee should be declared bankrupt the lease should terminate, and the lessor should have the right to re-enter, and that in such case the lessees should indemnify the lessor for any loss of rents during the remainder of the term, does not create a fixed liability absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition, and that the liability is altogether too contingent to be provable in bankruptcy. The plaintiff in error relies upon Loeser v. Alexander, 24 Am. Bankr. Rep. 75, 176 Fed. 265, 100 C. C. A. 89, decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit. In that case it was held that, where a deputy collector of taxes executed to the treasurer a bond to faithfully discharge all the duties required of him by law and honestly and faithfully pay over to the treasurer all moneys collected by him, the bond was a personal bond to the county treasurer, who had a right to proceed thereon in his own name, and the liability of the bankrupt upon the bond was not contingent nor unliquidated, but a fixed liability under the bankrupt act, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him; the liability having become fixed upon the failure of the deputy to make payment of the money collected. The distinction between that case and the one now in hand seems to be obvious. The obligation of the deputy was to pay, and the amount he was to pay was absolutely fixed and determined at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed. Reliance is also placed upon the decision in Re Lyons Sugar Co. (D. C.) 27 Am. Bankr. Rep. 610, 192 Fed. 445. In that case, however, it appeared that the liability was absolutely fixed and definitely ascertained at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed, although the surety was not compelled to pay the amount stipulated in the bond until some time after the filing of the petition. The obligation in that case was to pay costs of an appeal. It was held that by the affirmation of the judgment appealed from the claim became "liquidated by litigation," within the meaning of the bankrupt act.

[4] The question whether the contract is strictly one of indemnity, or an absolute obligation to pay the debt of another, depends upon the construction of the contract. "Indemnity" has been defined as the "obligation or duty resting on one person to make good any loss or damage another has incurred while acting at his request or for his benefit." 22 Cyc. 79. Here the obligation was to indemnify the plaintiff "against all loss, costs, damages, charges, and expenses whatever, resulting from any act, default, or neglect" of the principals in the bond, that the surety "may sustain or incur" by reason of the execution of the bond. It is insisted that the word "incur" should be given its ordinary meaning, "to become liable for." See Bank of Indian Territory v. Eckles, 19 Okl. 159, 91 Pac. 695. Several authorities are relied on by the plaintiff in error to sustain this view. Most of them are clearly distinguishable from the present case. For instance, in Jarvis v. Sewall, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 449, the obligation was to pay any sum which the surety "might incur and become bound to pay by reason of having executed the appeal bond." It was held that, in order to recover upon the indemnity bond, it was not necessary to show that the surety had actually paid the costs incurred on the appeal in reference to which the bond was given. The case turned upon the construction of the words "become bound," and they were held to be synonymous with "become liable for," or "liable to pay." So in McBeth v. McIntyre, 57 Cal. 49, where a similar ruling was made, the obligation of the indemnity bond was against all damages, expenses, costs, and charges, and against all loss and liability which the surety might incur. That case turned upon the meaning of the word "liability." The case of Jones v. Childs, 8 Nev. 121, is very similar. The construction contended for by the plaintiff in error does find support in the case of Smith v. Howell, 6 Exch. 730, 86 Rev. Rep. 452, and Mewburn v. Mackelcan, 19 Ont. App. 738.

We do not think that, under a proper construction of the indemnity contract, the principals in the bond became liable to the surety until the surety had actually sustained a loss by payment of some sum of money which it had been compelled to pay on account of the neglect or default of the contractors. At the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed the surety had not sustained or incurred any loss or damage on account of the contractors' default. It is true the default had taken place, and it is also true that the building had been completed by the trustees, and they were probably in a position to ascertain the exact amount of the contractors' liability, but no judgment fixing the amount of the contractors' liability had been obtained. The only information that the surety could have had on the subject was the claim made by the trustees of the school; and, it could not know but that the contractors might have a good defense to the claim, or some part of it, and no judgment was rendered fixing the liability of the contractors until nearly three years after they were discharged in bankruptcy. But the question to be considered is as to the nature of the surety's claim against the bankrupt. The bankrupt owed the surety nothing at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed, because the surety had paid nothing for their benefit, and the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between them until after actual payment by the surety. The only thing the surety could have done would have been to file in the name of the trustees its claim against the bankrupt, in order to have reduced its own liability by whatever might have been recovered out of the bankrupt's estate. The surety had no claim against the bankrupt which it could file in its own name, and the trustees did file their claim, although no dividends were received; the assets being insufficient for this purpose. The liability to the surety by the bankrupt was altogether contingent and might never have arisen. Indeed, we hold that at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed the surety had no claim or debt against the bankrupt which could have been proved in the bankrupt court under section 63 of the bankrupt act.

The result of this conclusion is that the judgment of the trial court in the plaintiff's favor must be affirmed.

BYRD et al. v. COLLINS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 23, 1912.)

EVIDENCE (§ 183*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CONTENTS OF LOST WILL.

Parol evidence of the contents of an alleged lost will is properly excluded where it appears that the will may still be in existence, and there is no showing of any search of testatrix's premises or effects or other places where the will might be found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 605-637; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Peebles, Judge.

Proceeding by R. P. Byrd and others against Mary Collins and others to probate an alleged lost will of Effie Ann Stone. From a judgment denying probate, proponents appeal. Affirmed.

This was a proceeding for the partition of certain lands; the petitioners claiming an interest as heirs of Effie Ann Stone. The defendants pleaded sole seisin, alleging that the said Effie Ann Stone made a will devising the land to the defendant J. H. Byrd, and that this will had been lost or destroyed by some one other than the testatrix. By consent of all parties the trial of the partition proceedings was suspended until the defendant could go before the clerk and probate the alleged will. The clerk refused to admit the alleged lost will to probate, and the propounder appealed to the superior court, where issues were submitted to the jury as to the execution of the alleged will and its contents, and as to whether it had been revoked by the testatrix. It was in evidence by one of the subscribing witnesses to the will that it had been duly executed as prescribed by law. The other subscribing witness did not testify, and his absence was not accounted for. The same witness who testified as to the execution of the will also testified as to its contents, and there was no other proof as to the contents. There was no evidence that any search had been made for the will since the death of the testatrix.

The evidence as to the loss of the will was as follows: "After that she told me that the will was stolen. I was going by her house and she called to me, and she was right near the road, and told me that her will was stolen, and I asked her when it was stolen, and she started to tell me, and one of her nieces who was with her, a girl, came up, and she stopped talking to me, and she said she didn't want everybody to hear her business, and she said she would come to my house and see me. This might have been six or eight months or a year before she died. She came to my house, and told me that her will was taken out of the meatroom. She said she put it in there, in an old coffee pot. She said the reason she put it in the coffee pot in her meatroom was because they like to broke in her trunk when she was about to die, and she said after then she put it in her coffee pot, where she thought nobody would get it, and she said she had John Bams, J. W. Bullock, and Will Bullock to kill her hogs, and said they salted the meat down and put it in her meatroom, and right away she missed her will. After that meat was put in there, she said, a night or two before the will was taken, there was a mighty lampering around the house. Somebody around there was making a noise and all those things, and she said she told them about it, and they told her it was her sister Betsy had come back, and she said, when they got the will, she heard no more of her sister Betsy, and I asked her who she thought got her will, and she said she thought it was Jim Byrd got it, the one she give her property to. That was what she said. She told him that she had put that will in that room, so if she died that he would know where it was. That was just what she said when she told me these things. She said she didn't know what to do about it. I told her she could make another will or deed to give it to whoever she wanted to. She said, if she made another will, somebody would take it, and she said she believed her old will would come up, because she said it was when these men put this meat in there she missed her will."

There was other evidence on behalf of the propounders of declarations of Effie Ann Stone, to the effect that she had made a will and it had been stolen. There was no evidence of any inquiry being made of any one for the will.

At the conclusion of the evidence, his honor withdrew all of the evidence as to the contents of the will, because, in his opinion, there was not sufficient evidence of its loss, and the propounders excepted. The jury answered the issues in favor of the caveators, and from the judgment rendered thereon the propounders appealed.

McNeill & McNeill, of Lumberton, for appellants. E. J. Britt and McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor, all of Lumberton, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. There are several exceptions in the record, but all of them are immaterial, if his honor ruled correctly in excluding the evidence as to the contents of the lost will, as we think he did.

The testatrix may have been mistaken as to the place where she deposited the will, or if she was not, and it was taken on the day of the hog killing by one of the three persons who went in the meatroom, it may still be in existence, and there was no evidence of any search of her premises or among her effects, or of the premises or effects of either of the three persons, nor was John Bams or J. W. Bullock, two of them, examined as a witness. The authorities are all to the effect that, before parol evidence can be offerred to prove the contents of a paper, it must be shown that the most diligent search has been made for the alleged missing instrument.

In Eure v. Pittman, 10 N. C. 371, it was said: "To entitle a party to give parol evidence of the contents of a will alleged to be destroyed, where there is not sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion of its absolute destruction, the party must show that he has made diligent search and inquiry after the will in those places where it would most probably be found if in existence." To the same effect Scoggins v. Turner, 98 N. C. 135, 3 S. E. 719. In 3 Redfield on Wills, p. 15: "But it must in all cases be shown that an exhaustive search has been made for such missing will in all places where there is the remotest possibility that it could be found, before any secondary evidence can be received of its contents." The question here presented was fully considered and the authorities reviewed in Avery v. Stewart, 134 N. C. 289, 46 S. E. 520. It was held in that case to be error to admit parol evidence of the contents of a paper when a witness had testified, "It is lost. I cannot find it," which is stronger than the evidence in this case, and the court then applied the rule that: "If the instrument is lost, the party is required to give some evidence that such a paper once existed, though slight evidence is sufficient for this purpose, and that a bona fide diligent search has been unsuccessfully made for it in the place where it was most likely to be found, if the nature of the case admits such proof. What degree of diligence in the search is necessary it is not easy to define, as each case depends much on its peculiar circumstances; and the question whether the loss of the instrument is sufficiently proved to admit secondary evidence of its contents is to be determined by the court and not by the jury. But it seems that in general the party is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted in a reasonable degree all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest and which were accessible to him." 1 Greenleaf, Ev. (16th Ed.) § 558, 563b.

We are of opinion, on the whole record, there is no error.

No error.

RAILROADS (§ 111*)—CONSTRUCTION—LIABILITY FOR WORK, LABOR, AND MATERIALS—"RAILROAD."

A logging railroad which is standard gauged, steel railed, connected by switch with another railroad, operated by steam engines and standard gauged cars, and has branches extending for convenience into the woods, over which the same engines and cars are used, which branches are sometimes taken up and relaid elsewhere, is a railroad within Revisal 1905, § 2018, relative to the liability of railroad companies for labor performed in constructing a railroad for a contractor, although in 1872, when that section was first enacted, there were no logging railroads in existence, since legislative enactments, in general and comprehensive terms, prospective in operation apply alike to all persons, subjects and business within their general scope coming into existence subsequent to their passage.

Walker and Allen, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Nathaniel Carter against the Coharie Lumber Company. From a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

The plaintiff sued to recover of defendant $83.50 for work done in constructing railroad for defendant. The plaintiff bases his right to recover under section 2018 of the Revisal of 1905. It is admitted that the notice required by the act was properly given and served, and that the action was commenced in apt time. A motion to nonsuit was allowed, and the plaintiff appealed.

Faison & Wright, of Clinton, for appellant. H. A. Grady and Geo. E. Butler, both of Clinton, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The defendant owned and operated a lumber mill and also a standard gauge railroad in connection therewith to Parkersburg on the Atlantic Coast Line, a distance of three miles. This road was connected with branch railroads extending into the woods. The same engine and cars were used over the main stem and its branches. Sometimes a branch is taken up and relaid elsewhere. The defendant entered into a written contract with one Buhman on February 24, 1911, by which Buhman was to operate its railroad and lumber business. The plaintiff was foreman of the railroad construction crew, kept the time, and worked in constructing the branch railroads, laying down cross-ties, spiking rails, and doing other construction work. The defendant claims that Buhman was an independent contractor, and solely liable to the plaintiff, and that section 2018 has no application to defendant. His honor so ruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff testified that he was building the railroad for the defendant under a contractor. Assuming that Buhman was an independent contractor, if defendant's railroad comes within the meaning and spirit of section 2018, the defendant is liable, as it appears that the requirements of the statute have been strictly followed. The defendant's plant constitutes what is called a "logging railroad." It is standard gauged, steel railed, connected by switch with the Coast Line, operated by steam engines and standard gauge cars, and has branches extending for convenience into the woods over which the same engines and cars are used. The description of this road brings it within the definitions of a railroad as given by Rapalje and Bouvier in their law dictionaries. The language of this statute defining a railroad is the same as in the Fellow Servant Act (Rev. § 2646).

In construing that act and its similar phraseology we held that logging roads are railroads within the meaning of the act, and that the term "railroad" embraced any road operated by steam or electricity on rails. Hemphill v. Lumber Co., 141 N. C. 489, 54 S. E. 420; Witsell v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 557, 27 S. E. 125; Schus v. Powers Co., 85 Minn. 447, 89 N. W. 68, 69 L. R. A. 887. We have also held that the law as applied to other railroads in respect to negligently causing fires on their rights of way shall be extended to railroads constructed solely for logging purposes. Craft v. Timber Co., 132 N. C. 158, 43 S. E. 597; Simpson v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 96, 45 S. E. 469. We apply to both classes of railroads the same rule in regard to defective spark arresters. Simpson v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 96, 45 S. E. 469. For these reasons, we see no reason why this defendant should not be classified as a railroad within the meaning of section 2018.

It is contended, however, that this section was first enacted in 1872, and that there were no logging roads in existence then, and that, therefore, they could not have been in contemplation of the Legislature. We are not informed as to that, but we assume the correctness of the statement. The mere fact that "logging railroads" came into more general use since the passage of the act does not alter the case. They are nevertheless "railroads," although used principally for transporting logs. It is a general rule of statutory construction that legislative enactments in general and comprehensive terms, prospective in operation, apply alike to all persons, subjects, and business within their general scope coming into existence subsequent to their passage. McAunich v. M. & M. Ry., 20 Iowa, 338; Schus v. Powers Co., supra.

JONES v. SANDLIN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§§ 58, 59*) — RELIEF — RENTS — IMPROVEMENTS — "DONE."

Under a deed conveying land in consideration that the grantee would cultivate it and give the proceeds to the grantor during her life, and, if the grantee failed to do this and the grantor became dissatisfied, the deed to be null and void and the grantee to have pay "for what she has done," where the grantee failed to perform the agreement, and the grantor thereupon became dissatisfied and brought suit for a cancellation, the grantor was entitled to recover the land and its rental value during the grantee's occupancy, and the grantee was entitled to the enhancement in value of the land from improvements made by her and to the value of her work, labor, and services, but only so far as they were of benefit to the grantor, since the work could not be said to have been "done" for the grantor if of no benefit to her.

2. DEEDS (§ 141*)—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION—ESTATE CONVEYED.

A deed conveying land in consideration of the grantor's support for life, and providing that it would be null and void upon the grantee's failure to perform the agreement, and containing at the end of the warranty clause, the words "I except my lifetime interest," when construed as a whole, reserved a life estate to the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 463; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

3. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 60*)—LIEN—NATURE OF CAUSE OF ACTION CREATING LIEN.

Where a deed in consideration of the grantor's support for life provided that, upon the grantee's failure to perform the agreement, it would become null and void, and the grantee should have pay for what she had done, the amount of recovery by the grantee for improvements, enhancing the value of the land, will be a charge thereon, while the judgment for work and labor performed under the agreement will be merely a personal charge, and the grantor will be entitled to possession on paying the lien for improvements.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Annie E. Jones against Mary F. Sandlin. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

This action was brought to cancel a deed for 42 acres of land, which was executed by plaintiff to defendant, and is alleged to have been placed in the possession of a third party, to be delivered upon compliance with its conditions. It contained this clause: "That said Annie E. Jones, in consideration of one dollar, and a further consideration that the said Mary F. Sandlin keep up and cultivate my house field and give me what is made on said land where I now live, and as long as I live, and if she fails to do this and I become dissatisfied, then this deed is null and void; and she, the said Mary F. Sandlin, to have pay for what she has done out of my property." Then follows a conveyance of the land, with the following words at the end of the warranty clause: "I, Annie E. Jones, except my lifetime interest." The court submitted issues to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows:

"(1) Did plaintiff and defendants contract and agree that defendants were to keep up and cultivate plaintiff's house field and give her what was made thereon as long as she lives, and to take care of plaintiff during her life, and attend to all her wants and pay her rents on all the other land which was cleared on the 42-acre tract on January 12, 1901? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Does the paper writing, called the deed of plaintiff, dated January 12, 1901, contain all of the contract and agreement between the parties to this suit? Answer: ———.

"(3) Have the defendants failed and refused to perform and carry out their agreement and obligations in the contract? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Was there a mutual abandonment of this contract by both plaintiff and defendants? Answer: ———.

"(4½) Did plaintiff and defendants leave it to J. R. Westbrook and R. W. Jones to determine what amount was to be paid by plaintiff to defendants in satisfaction of what they had done, and, if so, what was the amount fixed by them? Answer: No.

"(5) What is the worth of the buildings placed by the defendants on the land? Answer: $560.

"(6) What is the worth of the other labors, such as clearing, ditching, grubbing and fencing, performed by defendants on said land? Answer: Nothing.

"(7) What is the value of the work done by the defendants on the seven-acre house field? Answer: $315.

"(8) What is the value of the services rendered by defendants in getting wood for plaintiff, going to store and mill, waiting on her, and doing any other things of a similar and personal character? Answer: $325.

"(9) What is a fair rental value of the land, other than the house field, which was cleared on January 12, 1901? Answer: $100." Plaintiff tendered two issues, but it seems to us that they are embraced by the sixth issue submitted. He also tendered a third issue: "What is the fair rental value of the 42 acres of land, outside the house field of 7 acres?" This issue was refused. He then excepted to the sixth, seventh, and eighth issues. The court gave judgment to plaintiff for the land, and to defendant for $1,100, and the plaintiff appealed.

Falson & Wright, of Clinton, for appellant. Geo. E. Butler, H. A. Grady, J. D. Kerr, and C. M. Faircloth, all of Clinton, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] As the defendant failed to perform the contract, as appears by the verdict, plaintiff is entitled to recover the land, and must pay to the defendant the value of any improvements the latter has put upon the same. This is what the deed provides, for it says that, upon defendant's default and plaintiff's dissatisfaction, the defendant is "to have pay for what she has done out of the property" of the plaintiff. The first issue seems to have been submitted without objection, and the answer of the jury thereto ascertains the contract of the parties, without reference to the particular words of the deed. But this contract was not complied with by the defendant, and it follows that plaintiff is entitled to recover, in addition to the land, a fair and reasonable rental for the land while in defendant's possession, and the defendant is entitled to the value of the improvements, to the extent that they have enhanced the value of the land, in analogy to cases in which the doctrine of betterments applies (Kelly v. Johnson, 135 N. C. 647, 47 S. E. 674), and, in addition, the reasonable value of any work and labor done or of any services rendered the plaintiff during the period, when she was under defendant's care and defendant occupied the land. If defendant has paid anything to the plaintiff, in part performance of the contract, she will be entitled to a credit therefor. It would not be right, nor is it the law, as we think, that plaintiff should be charged with the value of work done upon the land, except to the extent that she has received a benefit therefrom. If the contract provided specifically that defendant should receive back exactly what she had paid out, or the value of the work and labor and of the improvements, without regard to the enhancement in value of the land, the case would be different. But the deed says that she should have pay for all she has done for the plaintiff; that is, the value of the service rendered to her in work, labor and improvements. Gorman v. Bellamy, 82 N. C. 497; Tussey v. Owen, 139 N. C. 457, 52 S. E. 128; Chamblee v. Baker, 95 N. C. 100; Parker v. Brown, 136 N. C. 280, 48 S. E. 657. It could not properly be said to have been done for her in a legal sense if of no benefit to her. If she had contracted for the particular work and a wage or price was stated, she would be liable for it, but, if none was expressed, the law will imply a promise to pay the reasonable value of the work and labor; that being the measure of recovery, as upon a quantum meruit. It follows, therefore, that in adjusting the difference between the parties the plaintiff will recover the land and its rental value during the occupancy of defendant, and the latter will recover the value of all services rendered, including any increase in value of the land by reason of the improvements placed thereon by her. This is the fair and equitable rule, and the more so as the deed was not annulled by the sole act of the plaintiff, but by the concurrence of both. The defendant failed to perform her part of the agreement, and the plaintiff thereupon became dissatisfied. This is the very condition in the deed, expressed conjunctively, upon which it was to be "null and void." The work to be done and the improvements to be made were not specified in the contract, and therefore we have a case bearing a close resemblance to one where the doctrine of betterments applies, so far as the land is concerned, and, as no price for the labor was fixed, the defendant must fall back upon the promise of plaintiff to pay the reasonable worth of the same, which the law implies. The defendant entered upon the land lawfully and improved the same by consent. It is not equitable, nor according to the contract, that she should lose all she has done in making the improvements, nor, on the other hand, is it right that plaintiff should pay more than she has received in benefit from the same. The general rule is that if one is induced to improve land under a promise to convey the same to him, which promise is void or voidable, and after the improvements are made, he refuses to convey, the party thus disappointed shall have the benefit of the improvements to the extent that they increased the value of the land. Kelly v. Johnson, 135 N. C. 647, 47 S. E. 674; Reed v. Exum, 84 N. C. 430; Luton v. Badham, 127 N. C. 96, 37 S. E. 143, 53 L. R. A. 337, 80 Am. St. Rep. 783; Albea v. Griffin, 22 N. C. 9; Hedgepeth v. Rose, 95 N. C. 41; Pitt v. Moore, 99 N. C. 85, 5 S. E. 389, 6 Am. St. Rep. 489. The cases on this point are very numerous, many of them being cited in Luton v. Badham, supra, and 1 Pell's Revisal, pp. 652, 653, and notes. The recovery is based, not upon the cost of the improvements, but upon the enhanced value of the property. Wetherell v. Gorman, 74 N. C. 603, in which Justice Reade says: "The value of the improvements to the premises is undoubtedly the correct rule; for very expensive repairs might injure rather than improve them." In our case it was evidently contemplated by the parties that if the contract was terminated by the dissatisfaction of the plaintiff, upon default of defendant in performing her part of it, the account between them should be stated upon equitable principles, and that defendant should not lose the benefit of her work and labor, but receive a fair and reasonable compensation therefor.

The verdict upon the first and third issues, and on the issue numbered 4½, will be retained, and the second and fourth issues, not having been answered, are eliminated. The other issues are set aside, and the court will submit new issues in accordance with the views of the law herein expressed, so as to ascertain the legal rights of the parties, unless there is a reference by consent, to find the facts with the conclusions of law thereon, and state the account, which, perhaps, would facilitate the trial of the case.

We have not failed to notice that, by the verdict on the seventh issue, the plaintiff is made to pay the full value of the work done by the defendant on the seven acres, or home tract of land, without any finding as to the rental value of that tract or of what was made thereon. If plaintiff is required to pay for the work and labor on that tract, she should have the fruits thereof or the rental value of the land. This would of itself, regardless of other questions, necessitate a new trial, which should be extended, under the circumstances, to the last five issues, and not merely to the seventh, but, as our decision of other matters produces the same result, we need make no further comment on this question.

[2] Our opinion is that by the deed Annie E. Jones reserved a life estate. The deed must be construed as a whole, and the true intent of the parties thereby ascertained. Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 507, 54 S. E. 386; Featherstone v. Merrimon, 148 N. C. 205, 61 S. E. 675; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 396, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514; Real Estate Co. v. Bland, 152 N. C. 231, 67 S. E. 483; Thomas v. Bunch, 158 N. C. 175, 73 S. E. 899. In Midgett v. Meekins, at this term, 75 S. E. 728, we held that, where clauses of a deed are apparently in conflict, the courts will construe the instrument, notwithstanding the repugnancy, according to its context, and for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, which will be enforced accordingly. But we do not see that this can in any way affect the merits of the case. The entire fee has reverted to the plaintiff, under the facts, and she is entitled to the possession, subject to the equitable rights of defendant.

[3] The amount by which any improvements have enhanced the value of the land will be a charge thereon. Taylor v. Brinkley, 131 N. C. 8, 42 S. E. 336. In other respects the judgment will be only a personal charge. When plaintiff has paid off the lien on the land for improvements, she will be entitled to be let into possession.

New trial.

(160 N. C. 161)

STONE CO. v. RICH et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. PAYMENT (§ 38*)—APPLICATION—RIGHT OF DEBTOR.

A debtor owing two or more debts to the same creditor and making a payment may, at the time, direct its application to any one of the debts, but this right is lost if such direction is not made at the time of payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-103; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. PAYMENT (§ 39*)—APPLICATION—RIGHT OF CREDITOR.

If a debtor, owing two or more debts to the same creditor at the time of making a payment, fails to direct its application, the right to apply it belongs to the creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 104-114; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

3. PAYMENT (§ 46*)—APPLICATION—APPLICATION IN ABSENCE OF APPROPRIATION BY PARTIES.

Where a debtor, owing two or more debts to the same creditor, makes a payment and neither the debtor nor creditor applies it to a particular debt, the law will apply it to the unsecured debt or the one for which the creditor's security is most precarious, or according to its own view of the intrinsic justice and equity of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 125, 126; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

4. PAYMENT (§ 38*) — APPLICATION—APPROPRIATION BY DEBTOR—SUFFICIENCY.

A direction by a debtor as to the application of payments may be shown by an express agreement, by the declaration of the debtor, or implied from circumstances showing the debtor's intention at the time of payment, and the direction need not be expressed in writing nor in any technical or formal words, nor delivered in any particular manner, but will be sufficient if the intention is manifest, and it comes to the knowledge of the other party at the proper time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-103; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

5. PAYMENT (§ 68*)—APPLICATION BY DEBTOR—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A party indebted to another on more than one account and making a partial payment has the burden of proving that at or before the time of such payment he directed its application to the particular debt, and that this direction was made known to the creditor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 195, 202; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

6. PAYMENT (§ 38*) — APPLICATION—APPROPRIATION BY DEBTOR—SUFFICIENCY.

Entries in a debtor's books without the knowledge of a creditor are insufficient in law to show an appropriation of payments by the debtor to any particular debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-103; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Allen, Judge.

Action by the Stone Company against A. D. Rich and others. From a judgment, the defendant named appeals. Judgment appealed from set aside, final judgment affirmed, and action dismissed.

Faison & Wright, of Clinton, for appellant. H. A. Grady, of Clinton, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This case was before us at a former term, under the title of Stone Company v. McLamb & Co., A. D. Rich, and Others, 153 N. C. 378, 69 S. E. 281. We then held that Mrs. M. M. Vann, a feme covert, was liable for the debts of the firm of McLamb & Co. under the statute (Revisal, § 2118), and that the order appointing a receiver of the partnership effects was erroneous and should be vacated, and the property, which was under mortgage to A. D. Rich, should be restored to him. The case was remanded for the settlement of the other matters involved. The parties thereupon agreed that an issue be submitted to a jury to ascertain if a payment of $333, made by McLamb & Co. to Rich, should be applied to the debt of the firm, amounting to $1,650, which is secured by his mortgage, or to an unsecured debt of $300, held by him against McLamb & Co. The jury returned the following verdict: "Should the $333 credited to A. D. Rich on page 453 of the ledger be applied to the mortgage debt of McLamb & Co. to A. D. Rich? Answer: Yes." The court adjudged upon the verdict that the payment be so applied. The defendant's exception raises the question whether there was any evidence to show that he had been instructed by the firm to so apply the payment; he having requested the court to charge substantially that there was none. We have examined the testimony carefully, and have failed to find any evidence to sustain the charge of the court or the verdict of the jury. The most that can be made of it, when considered favorably to McLamb & Co. and the other interested parties, is that the firm made some payments at different times aggregating $333, and entered them upon its books as credits on the mortgage notes, but did not direct Rich how to apply them, and Rich did not know of the entries until some time after they were made, when he promptly objected to them. It was then agreed that they should be applied to the unsecured debt. It is admitted that Rich did not apply the payments to either of the debts.

[1-3] There is no rule in the law better settled than the one in regard to the application of payments. (1) A debtor owing two or more debts to the same creditor, and making a payment, may, at the time, direct its application to any one of the debts. The right is lost if the particular application is not directed at the time of the payment. (2) If the debtor fails to make the application at the time of the payment, the right to apply it belongs to the creditor. (3) If neither debtor nor creditor makes it, the law will apply it to the unsecured debt or the one for which the creditor's security is most precarious, or, as sometimes expressed, according to its own view of the intrinsic justice and equity of the case. Sprinkle v. Martin, 72 N. C. 92, and cases cited; Vick v. Smith, 83 N. C. 80; Moss v. Adams, 39 N. C. 42 (Anno. Ed.); Jenkins v. Beal, 70 N. C. 440; Ramsour v. Thomas, 32 N. C. 165; Wittkowski v. Reid, 84 N. C. 21; Long v. Miller, 93 N. C. 233; Lester v. Houston, 101 N. C. 605, 8 S. E. 366; Pearce v. Walker, 103 Ala. 250, 15 South. 568. The weight of authority is that the debtor must direct the application at or before the time of his payment, and that he cannot do so afterwards. 30 Cyc. p. 1230, and cases in note.

[4] A direction by the debtor as to the application of payments may be shown by an express agreement with the creditor, by the declaration of the debtor, or it may be im-piled from circumstances showing the debtor's intention at the time of payment. 30 Cyc. p. 1230. Again: The communication need not be expressed in writing, nor in any technical or formal words, nor the instruction delivered in any particular manner. It will be sufficient if the intention is manifest, and that it comes to the knowledge of the other party at the proper time. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 448. "It is certainly too late for either party to claim a right to make an appropriation after the controversy has arisen, and, a fortiori, at the time of the trial." U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. 721, 737, 6 L. Ed. 199.

[5] When a party indebted to another on more than one account makes a partial payment, the burden of proving that at or before the time of such payment he directed its application to a particular debt, as pleaded by him, and that this direction was made known to his creditor, is upon the debtor. Pearce v. Walker, supra. Coming to the special facts of this case, it is said in Parsons on Contracts (6th Ed.) § 630: "It is not necessary that the appropriation of the payment should be made by an express declaration of the debtor; for, if his intention and purpose can be clearly gathered from the circumstances of the case, the creditor is bound by it. If the debtor, at the time of making a payment makes also an entry in his own book, stating the payment to be on a particular account, and shows the entry to the creditor, this is sufficient appropriation by the debtor. But the right of election of appropriation is not conclusively exercised by entries in the books of either party until those entries are communicated to the other party." But the cases nearest to the present in matters of fact are the following: Manning v. Western, 2 Vernon, Ch. 606, 23 Eng. Reprint, 996, where it appeared that defendant, being indebted to plaintiff on specialty and also by simple contract, or a running account, made several payments of sums in gross, and entered them in his own book, as paid upon the specialty. It was better for the debtor that the payment should go to the simple contract, which did not bear interest. The Lord Chancellor said: "Although the rule of law is that quicquid solvitur, solvitur secundum modum solventis, yet that is to be understood when at the time of payment he that pays the money declares upon what account he pays it; but, if the payment is general, the application is in the party who receives the money, and the entries in the defendant's books are not sufficient to make the application." So in Frazer v. Bunn, 8 Carr. & P. 704 (34 E. C. L. 592), where a performer at a theater had arrears of salary due to him, and a payment was made to him without any direction at the time as to its application, it was held that an entry by the debtor in his books was not a sufficient direction unless brought to the creditor's knowledge at the time; otherwise, if he had stated for what specific portion of the indebtedness it was intended or had the entry been made known to the creditor, in which case it would have been evidence of such an appropriation as would be binding on the creditor. Lord Abinger said: "If Mr. Jones had expressly paid this for what was due to the plaintiff between February and June, the plaintiff would have been out of court, but, so far from that, he states that he did not tell the plaintiff on what account he paid it, neither did he show him the book. If he had shown the plaintiff the book in which he had entered it as for a particular period, that would be evidence of appropriation, but that was not so; and I think that the plaintiff is at liberty to apply those payments to the other parts of what had been due to him, and that, therefore, he may recover for the rest of his claim, which is within the dates stated in the particulars." In a case with substantially the same facts (Terhune v. Colton, 12 N. J. Eq. 232) the court, after stating the general rule as to the appropriation of payments, held that, while the intention of the debtor to apply the payment to a particular debt or part of a debt may be shown by circumstances attending the act of payment, they must be known to the creditor, or the intention to do so must be signified to him in some way, and that an entry in his own books of account by the debtor is insufficient to determine the application in his favor, as he had not, by showing the entry to the creditor, or otherwise, indicated his intention as to how the money should be applied. The result of the cases is that an undisclosed intention to apply the payment will not do. The right of the creditor to apply the payment, when the debtor by his silence has lost control of it, is stated more in detail by Justice Rodman, in Jenkins v. Beal, supra: "The rule is that, where a debtor owes several debts to a creditor and makes payments, he may appropriate the payments to any of the debts he may please; but, if he fails to do so at the time, the creditor may appropriate them as he pleases (subject to some exceptions not material here) at any time before he brings suit for the balance." And in another case the court held: "Although as between the immediate parties the creditor has a right to appropriate when the debtor has failed to do so, yet this right must be exercised within, at the furthest, a reasonable time after the payment, and by the performance of some act which indicates an intention to appropriate. It is too late to attempt it at the trial." Harker v. Conrad, 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 301, 14 Am. Dec. 691; Reiss v. Scherner, 87 Ill. App. 84. Where neither party has exercised his right of appropriation, and a dispute subsequently arises, the court will make the application, as we have seen, and in doing so will, as a general rule, apply the payment to the debt which is unsecured or the least secured, upon the assumption that the debtor would desire to pay all his debts, and this disposition of the credit most nearly accomplishes that result, or, in other words, the law pursues this course, as it intends that all men shall be honest and fully perform their just obligations, and adopts this method as the one which an honest man would unselfishly choose, if left to himself to act in the premises. It simply does what the debtor should have done if prompted by just motives. Leeds v. Gifford, 41 N. J. Eq. 464, 5 Atl. 795; Turner v. Hill, 56 N. J. Eq. 293, 39 Atl. 137; Terhune v. Colton, 12 N. J. Eq. 238, in which cases the law upon this subject is clearly stated with peculiar reference to the same state of facts as are presented in this case.

[6] As the burden was upon McLamb & Co. to show that they had directed how the payment should be applied, at the time it was made, and as the mere entries, without the knowledge of A. D. Rich, were, in law, insufficient to show such an appropriation of the money, the court should have instructed the jury that there was no evidence of an appropriation by the debtor, McLamb & Co., and to answer the issue, "No," as the law applied the payment to the unsecured debt or open account. For this error the verdict and judgment thereon are set aside.

It appears that while the issue was found against the defendant A. D. Rich, and judgment entered thereon that the payment, $333, be applied to the mortgage debt, the court has given a final judgment in favor of A. D. Rich by dismissing the action as to him and taxing the plaintiff with the costs of said defendant. As our decision disposes of the principal question in the case, and is given upon facts virtually admitted, or at least uncontroverted—that is, the book of McLamb & Co. and the oral testimony, which the parties agreed should be decisive of their rights, so far as the application of the payment is concerned—the defendant A. D. Rich would seem to be entitled to the final judgment. It will therefore be allowed to stand, and the action is dismissed as to him. The plaintiffs have called our attention to the anomaly presented in this case of a verdict against Rich and judgment on the same, and then a final judgment in his favor. With this before him, he expresses a doubt as to Rich's right of appeal and some wonder at the course of the proceeding. We have decided the question as to the payment to prevent any prejudice to the defendant A. D. Rich likely to grow out of the verdict and judgment thereon, which he should have the right to review by appeal, and by holding that our decision disposes of the merits of the case, in so far as Rich is affected. We thus sustain the final judgment, as consistent with our decision upon the payment, and thus reconcile what was done with orderly procedure.

Appellees will pay the costs of this court.

Action dismissed.

PARTIN v. PRINCE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 21*)—ORIGINAL OR COLLATERAL PROMISE.

Where a person orally promised another that, if she would put money in his hands for investment, he would guarantee its safety, this was not a promise to answer for the debt of another within the statute of frauds; there being no other debt contracted or contract made except the contract of guaranty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

2. GUARANTY (§ 16*)—CONSIDERATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where money was placed in a person's hands for investment, and he was given absolute control over it in reliance on his promise to guarantee its safety, there was a sufficient consideration to support the guaranty if any consideration was needed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-17; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

3. GUARANTY (§ 16*)—CONSIDERATION—NECESSITY.

Where a contract of guaranty is contemporaneous with the principal debt, no other consideration is necessary; the contract being founded on the consideration existing between the parties, but, if the guaranty is made afterwards, a new consideration is necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-17; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. GUARANTY (§ 16*)—CONSIDERATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a person receiving money for investment and guarantying its safety invested it in a concern for which he was agent or representative, his pecuniary interest in the transaction was a sufficient consideration for the guaranty if a consideration was necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-17; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by Mrs. G. W. Partin (Lorenza Partin) against R. E. Prince. From a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

W. B. Snow and J. W. Bunn, both of Raleigh, for appellant.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff sued to recover $500 which the defendant procured from the plaintiff for the purpose of investing the same. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant promised to guarantee the investment at the time the money was placed in his hands at his request, that the defendant had the use and control of the money without any direction from the plaintiff, and that this formed a consideration which supported the guaranty. The defendant claimed that the transaction, upon the plaintiff's own showing, was a promise to answer for the payment of the debt of another, and, not being in writing, it comes within the statute of frauds and is void. His honor, being of opinion with the defendant, sustained the motion to nonsuit.

The plaintiff supports her alleged cause of action with a written guaranty contained in a letter of the defendant to the plaintiff, dated November 8, 1906. The plaintiff testified that the defendant came to see her, and told her that he heard that she had some money, and he desired to know if she wanted to lend it out, saying that he could invest it better out of the state, as then she would not have to pay taxes on it. The plaintiff testified the defendant went to see her several times, and each time endeavored to persuade her to let him invest the money. She at first refused because she did not want it invested away from home. The last time the defendant came he said, if she would let him have it, "he would guarantee it to be safe, and that she could look to him for the amount, and not to these other men." It appears that upon the faith of that guaranty the plaintiff let the defendant have $500. The statements of the plaintiff are fortified and corroborated by the letter of November 8, 1906. The defendant offered no evidence.

[1] In our view, his honor erred in supposing that this transaction, if the evidence is taken to be true, presents the ordinary case of a promise to answer for the debt of another. At the time of this transaction there was no other debt contracted. The only contract that had been made was between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that contract is a guaranty; that is to say, an obligation of the guarantor and separate and distinct from the obligation of a principal debtor. Carpenter v. Wall, 20 N. C. 279; Coleman v. Fuller, 105 N. C. 328, 11 S. E. 173, 8 L. R. A. 380; Tell on Guaranties, 1; Smith on Mercantile Law, 277.

[2, 3] We think that the fact that this money was placed in the hands of the defendant at his request, and that he was given absolute control over it upon the faith of his promise to guarantee its safety, is a sufficient consideration to support the contract, but we doubt if any consideration is necessary, for, where the contract of guaranty is contemporaneous with the principal debt, no other consideration is necessary, because the contract is founded upon the consideration existing between the parties. It is otherwise, if the guaranty be made afterwards without any new consideration. Green v. Thornton, 49 N. C. 231.

[4] It appears further in the evidence that the defendant invested this money in a New Jersey concern without consultation with the plaintiff who evidently relied entirely upon his guaranty, which concern was doing business in Raleigh and the defendant was its agent or representative.

If a consideration is necessary, the pecuniary interest of the defendant in the transaction is a sufficient consideration to support the guaranty. Whitehurst v. Hyman, 90 N. C. 487; Dale v. Lumber Company, 152 N. C. 651, 68 S. E. 134, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407; Peele v. Powell, 156 N. C. 558, 73 S. E. 234; Whitehurst v. Padgett, 157 N. C. 424, 73 S. E. 240.

We think his honor erred in sustaining the motion to nonsuit.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

DEATH (§ 103*)—FIRES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where the evidence tended to show that plaintiff's intestate was burned to death while trying to beat back a fire started on defendant's right of way through its negligence, and protect her land and dwelling, and that it subsequently reached her land, and the dwelling was only saved by the efforts of her neighbors, the court erred in holding, as a matter of law, that she was guilty of contributory negligence, since, while a distinction is made between risks allowable when human life is at stake and those allowable when the destruction of property is threatened, it is the right and duty of an owner to make every reasonable endeavor to save his property from destruction; and in passing on his conduct full allowance should be made for the natural impulse prompting the effort, and for the emergency under which he acted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 141; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by Norvella McKay, administratrix of Kate Howell, deceased, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From the judgment plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

"The plaintiff alleged that the defendant was a corporation, doing and carrying on the business of a railroad and a common carrier, and that on the 30th day of March, 1910, it ran its locomotive on its right of way and negligently permitted coals and sparks of fire to be emitted from its locomotive, and that said sparks and fire ignited combustible matter which it had allowed to accumulate on its right of way, and that the fire communicated to the lands and premises of one Kate Howell, who, while prudently and carefully attempting to stay the progress of the fire and prevent the destruction of her property and dwelling, caught on fire and was burned to death, and the plaintiff alleges damages in the sum of $25,000. The defendant, answering the complaint, denied that it was guilty of any negligence as alleged in the complaint, and alleged that if plaintiff's intestate was injured she was injured by her own negligence in attempting to put out fire not upon her own land, where no property in which she was interested or owned was in danger, and her own negligence attributed to and was the approximate cause of injury."

The following issues were prepared for submission to the jury:

"(1) Was the injury and death of the intestate of the plaintiff caused by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? Answer.

"(2) Did the intestate by her own negligence contribute to her death? Answer.

"(3) What damage is the plaintiff entitled to recover, if any? Answer."

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the court stated to plaintiff that he would charge the jury, if they were satisfied by the greater weight of the evidence that the fire started on the defendant's right of way, to answer first issue "Yes"; otherwise "No." If they believed the evidence, to answer second issue "Yes." In defense to this intimation, plaintiff, having duly excepted, submitted to a nonsuit and appealed.

H. L. Cook, of Fayetteville, for appellant. Rose & Rose, of Fayetteville, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). There was evidence tending to show: That intestate lived alone in a cabin on a wooded tract of land, in which there was a small clearing or two, and that on March 20, 1910, said to be Wednesday, a fire, originating on defendant's right of way and negligently started from one of the company's trains, burned over the intervening lands towards the intestate's property and partly over her own land. That it proved to be an extensive fire, and several of the neighbors, at different places, were engaged in trying to extinguish it. One of them heard the intestate cry out on Thursday morning, but was unable to go to her, because engaged in endeavoring to save his own property. That on Friday or Saturday morning the dead body of the intestate was found on a path about the dividing line where the fire was approaching her own from Col. Broadfoot's adjoining tract. That all the clothing was burned off, except the shoes, and a pine top lying near, half beaten or worn out, and her tracks along the path, and some burning shreds of her clothing along the edge of the fire, gave indication that she had caught fire while engaged in the effort to beat back the fire and protect it from making further progress towards her land and dwelling. On these the facts, chiefly relevant to the second issue, we think there was error in the ruling of the court. While our decisions would seem to make some distinction between the risks allowable when human life is at stake and those when the destruction of property is presently threatened, all of the authorities, here and elsewhere, are to the effect that it is both the right and duty of an owner to make every reasonable endeavor to save his property from destruction; and that in passing upon his conduct full allowance shall be made for the natural impulse prompting the effort, and for the emergency under which he acts. Norris v. Railroad, 152 N. C. 515, 67 S. E. 1017, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1069; Burnett v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 261, 43 S. E. 797; Rexter v. Starin, 73 N. Y. 601; 29 Cyc. p. 524. Pegram v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 303, 51 S. E. 975, 111 Am. St. Rep. 818, 4 Ann. Cas. 797, cited, and to some extent relied upon by defendant, does not contravene, but is in full recognition of the general principle as stated; the case only deciding on this question that, where an employe, who had escaped from a burning building and was in a place of safety, voluntarily returned to same in an effort to recover his employer's property, an instruction that imposed only one limitation upon his right to recover—that he must not act recklessly—was erroneous."

Applying the controlling position as sustained by the authorities cited, the court below was clearly not justified in holding, as a matter of law, that the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence; the facts in evidence tending as they do to prove that she was burned in the effort to beat back a fire which threatened her property, and even her home. And to show that this last apprehension was not groundless, it further appears that the same fire, though delayed for a time, probably by a small clearing which intervened, did subsequently reach her yard, and the dwelling was only saved by the efforts of her neighbors.

For the error indicated, plaintiff is entitled to a new trial; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

STATE v. ALLEN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 882*)—SPECIAL VERDICT—EFFECT—INDICTMENT.

A count of an indictment charging that an express agent did unlawfully solicit orders and proposals to purchase intoxicating liquors from a certain person and other persons whose names are to the jurors unknown was repudiated by a special jury finding that defendant did not solicit orders for whisky from any person or persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2092; Dec. Dig. § 882.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 169*)—CRIMINAL OFFENSE—INTERSTATE ORDER.

Where an express agent received from a buyer a certain sum which he sent with an order for whisky to a firm in another state, and the next day received and delivered whisky to the buyer, and where he acted merely as the agent of such buyer and for his accommodation, he was not in view of the commerce clause of the federal Constitution, guilty of a criminal offense under Revisal 1905, § 3534, providing that any one who shall unlawfully procure and deliver whisky to another shall be deemed in law the agent of the vendor and be guilty of a misdemeanor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 187, 188; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

3. COMMERCE (§ 41*)—INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS.

Where a sale of whisky is consummated in another state by order of one who as agent for a buyer sends the order from a place in the state where a sale is prohibited, the commerce clause of the federal Constitution will protect such agent from indictment under the state laws for his acts, though he receives the particular parcel of whisky inclosed in a general package of whisky addressed to different parties, all of which he delivers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 30, 31; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. COMMERCE (§ 41*)—INTERSTATE SHIPMENT—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—WILSON ACT.

The Wilson Act (Act Aug. 8, 1890, c. 728, 26 Stat. 313 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3177]), providing that intoxicating liquors transported into prohibition territory shall be subject to the operation of the laws of the state or territory, does not take away the force of the commerce clause of the federal Constitution to protect from indictment one who as agent for a buyer orders an interstate shipment of whisky.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 30, 31; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

5. COMMERCE (§ 60*)—PLACE OF SALE—INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Revisal 1905, § 2080, making the place of delivery of intoxicating liquors the place of sale, does not apply to a sale fully consummated in another state and where the subject-matter of the transaction is properly regarded as interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 91-95; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 223*)—CRIMINAL OFFENSE—ALLEGATION AND PROOF—SUFFICIENCY.

A person cannot be successfully prosecuted under a charge of engaging generally in the unlawful business of selling whisky, but there must be allegation and proof of the specific conduct which constitutes a breach of the criminal law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 263-274; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Ferguson, Judge.

J. L. Allen was acquitted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors and ordered discharged, and the State appeals. No error.

The bill of indictment was as follows:

"The jurors for the state upon their oath present that J. L. Allen, late of the county of Wake, on the 15th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve, with force and arms, at and in the county aforesaid, did unlawfully and willfully sell for gain one-half gallon intoxicating liquor (corn whisky) to B. M. Green, he, the said J. L. Allen, not then and there having a license to sell intoxicating liquor, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state. And the jurors for the state, upon their oath, do further present that said J. L. Allen, of the county and state aforesaid, on the 15th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve, with force and arms at and in the county aforesaid, did unlawfully and willfully, for himself and as agent for persons, firms and corporations, whose names are to the jurors unknown, solicit orders and proposals of purchase by the jug and bottle of intoxicating liquors of and from one B. M. Green, and other persons whose names are to the jurors unknown, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, against the peace and dignity of the state."

The jury rendered the following special verdict: "The defendant, J. L. Allen, resides at Wake Forest in said county, and has been for many years the agent of the Seaboard Road and of the Southern Express Company at that place. On the 17th day of June, 1912, between 2 and 3 o'clock in the evening, one B. M. Green applied to the defendant at Wake Forest to have shipped to him a half gallon of corn whisky from Petersburg, in the state of Virginia, the cost of the whisky being $1.05. The defendant, Allen, at Wake Forest received the money, $1.05, and sent it to the said firm in Petersburg, state of Virginia. The defendant did not know the price of the whisky, but left it to the firm in Petersburg, Va., to send such corn whisky as they could for the money inclosed. That the said money was sent by mail that evening, leaving Wake Forest about 5:45 p. m. June 17, 1912, and the whisky came by express over the Seaboard Air Line Railway the next day, reaching Wake Forest between 3 and 4 o'clock p. m. That the said half gallon of corn whisky came along with whisky shipped to other parties, to whom it was addressed, and bore the name of B. M. Green on the package. That about half past 4 o'clock on the evening of the 18th of June, 1912, the said Green came to the express office and asked for his whisky. The defendant, Allen, handed him the original package of whisky, upon which was written the name B. M. Green. That the said whisky came along with other packages addressed to other persons, and also bearing the name of B. M. Green, in order to save the express charges. That the said Allen had previous to this on a number of occasions sent money for whisky for various persons, at their request, to different firms at Petersburg, Richmond, and Norfolk, in the state of Virginia. That the said Allen was not the agent of any of the said firms, and has no interest whatsoever in the transaction, but his purpose was merely to accommodate the said persons, and he received nothing whatsoever from the said persons or the said firms as compensation in these transactions. That he, the said Allen, did not solicit orders for whisky from any person or persons, and did not order any whisky for any minor or any of the students at Wake Forest. That he did order for everybody else who applied to him. That the said defendant Allen's compensation as express agent at Wake Forest was 10 per cent. on the net receipts at that point on all business of every character done at Wake Forest, and he received no other compensation from the said express company other than the 10 per cent. upon the said receipts from all sources on the said express company's earnings at Wake Forest. That the shipments of whisky to Wake Forest by express was increased only in proportion to the increase of other express freight with the last few years. That there is a large quantity of whisky shipped by freight and also by express, other than that shipped to the persons aforesaid. That the said whisky is shipped to Wake Forest addressed to persons living at various distances from Wake Forest and in other townships and counties. It is shipped in such quantities to Wake Forest because of the fact that the persons doing their trading at Wake Forest find it more convenient for them to have it shipped there. That the said whisky was in the original package in which it was shipped, and was sealed up when received, and was delivered to the said Green in the same condition in which it was received, and was not at any time intermingled with other property in the said state. That since the first of the year 1912 shipments by express have averaged about $50 per month, shipped in the manner aforesaid from the points aforesaid in the state of Virginia, on account of the money sent as aforesaid in the manner aforesaid by the defendant, and for the month of June, 1912, the amount may have reached $100. The jury for their special verdict say: 'We find the foregoing facts; and, if on the said facts the court is of the opinion that the defendant is guilty, then we find the defendant guilty as charged in the bill, and, if the court is of the opinion that the defendant is not guilty upon such findings, then we find the defendant not guilty.' Upon the foregoing special verdict the court is of the opinion that the defendant is not guilty. And thereupon the jury for their verdict say that the defendant, the said J. L. Allen, is not guilty."

Motion for new trial and to set aside verdict overruled and state excepting. From judgment discharging defendant state again excepted and appealed.

T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., T. H. Calvert, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Jones & Bailey, of Raleigh, for the State. A. Jones & Son and Douglass, Lyon & Douglass, all of Raleigh, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The defendant was tried on a bill of indictment containing two counts: (1) An unlawful sale of whisky to one B. M. Green "at or in said county"; (2) that he "unlawfully for himself and as agent for persons, firms, and corporations whose names are to the jurors unknown did solicit orders and proposals to purchase by the jug and bottle of intoxicating liquors from one B. M. Green and other persons whose names are to the jurors unknown," etc.

[1] The second count in the bill, if it be considered as embodying a criminal accusation, can only amount to a charge of attempting to effect an unlawful sale to B. M. Green or other persons to the jurors unknown by unlawfully for himself and as agent for persons, firms, and corporations soliciting orders for whisky. Apart from any legal considerations which might arise as to the substance of this charge, the prosecution must fall here for the very sufficient reason that the basic facts upon which it is made to rest are expressly repudiated by the special findings of the jury as follows: That the said Allen was not the agent of any of the said firms, and has no interest whatsoever in the transaction, but his purpose was merely to accommodate the said persons, and he received nothing whatsoever from the said persons or the said firms as compensation in these transactions. "That he, the said Allen, did not solicit orders for whisky from any person or persons, and did not order any whisky for any minor or any of the students at Wake Forest. That he did order for everybody else who applied to him."

[2] The question then recurs as to the guilt or innocence of defendant under the 1st count in the bill, that of making an unlawful sale to B. M. Green at or in said county, etc. On this charge the special verdict by correct interpretation finds that defendant, who was depot and express agent at Wake Forest, N. C., at the request of B. M. Green, received from him $1.05 and sent same with an order for whisky for said Green to that amount to a firm in Petersburg, Va.; that the whisky came the next day by express over Seaboard Railroad in a package containing half gallon corn whisky, addressed to said Green, and was delivered to him as purchaser; that defendant received no profit for the transaction, and acted throughout as agent of the buyer and for his accommodation. There is a statute in North Carolina (Rev. § 3534) which provides that, if any one shall unlawfully procure and deliver whisky for another, he shall be deemed in law the agent of the vendor, and be guilty of a misdemeanor. Interpreting the act in State v. Burchfield, 149 N. C. 537, 63 S. E. 89, it was held that the same applied to the case of procuring whisky by purchase from an illicit dealer in prohibited territory and delivering it to another; Associate Justice Walker in the opinion saying: "The meaning of the section is not very aptly expressed, but the Legislature has sufficiently declared the intention to make it criminal for any person to procure liquor from an illicit dealer by purchase and deliver to another when both the purchase and delivery are made in a place where the sale of liquor is prohibited by law." And in another case at the same term (State v.

Whisenant, 149 N. C. 515, 63 S. E. 91), referring to this and other sections of the prohibition statutes, it was held: "(1) Revisal, § 3534, making it criminal for one to procure whisky for another by reason of an unlawful sale, has no application when the sale is not illegal or when our state legislation on the subject cannot apply to and affect the transaction by reason of the commerce clause in the federal Constitution. (2) When one acts entirely as the agent of the buyer in ordering whisky to be sent from another state, and has no interest in the whisky, and has no part in the sale as vendor, or his agent or employé, he is not indictable under Revisal 3534. (3) A sale of whisky consummated in another state by order of one as agent for the buyer sent from a place in the state where the sale is prohibited is not indictable under the commerce clause of the federal Constitution, and state legislation cannot affect the transaction in respect to its criminality until and after there had been a delivery within the state."

In that case the facts were, as ascertained and acted on by the jury, that the prosecuting witness had given defendant the money and requested him to make an order for some whisky with one that defendant was sending for himself to a wholesale grocery house at Knoxville, Tenn. The money and order were sent as requested, and the whisky delivered to the witness as in its receipt by defendant. In our opinion this authority is decisive, and fully supports the ruling of his honor on the facts as presented in the special verdict.

[3] It was contended for the state that the commerce clause of the federal Constitution should not afford protection in this case, for the reason that there were other parcels of whisky for other persons in the same general package which contained that for Green, and that defendant made himself guilty in delivering the different parcels to the parties, Green among others, to whom they were, respectively, addressed. This position was presented and rejected by this court in State v. Trotman, 142 N. C. 662, 55 S. E. 599, a ruling made in deference to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, the final arbiter on these questions, in Caldwell v. State of North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 23 Sup. Ct. 229, 47 L. Ed. 336, and in which it was held: "An ordinance under which a license fee may be required from an agent of a nonresident portrait company, who receives from such company pictures and frames manufactured by it to fill orders previously obtained, and, after breaking bulk and placing each picture in the frame designed for it, delivers them to the respective purchasers, is invalid as an attempt to interfere with and regulate interstate commerce." The facts and the decision in the Trotman Case referred to appearing in the headnote as follows: "In an indictment for selling patent medicine, etc., without license contrary to Rev. §§ 5150, 5151, where the jury by a special verdict found that certain citizens of this state gave orders for the medicines on a drug company in another state, which were forwarded to, received, and accepted by the company in that state, and the goods shipped from that state to the defendant, the drug company's agent in this state; that each package was wrapped in a separate parcel with the name of the purchaser marked thereon, and then packed in one crate and shipped to defendant, who distributed same in the original form to the purchaser—held, that the defendant was not guilty, as he was at the time engaged in interstate commerce."

[4] The principle recognized and applied in these cases is in no wise affected by the federal statute, sometimes called the "Wilson Act," which provides: "That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such state or territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such state or territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise." Chapter 728, 26 Statute L. 313, 3 Fed. Statutes Annotated, p. 853. That legislation was enacted to minimize or remove the effects of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States theretofore recently rendered. Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 Sup. Ct. 681, 34 L. Ed. 128, to the effect that, under the commerce clause of the federal Constitution, a vendor could not only import whisky from one state to another, notwithstanding the prohibition laws of the latter state, but could sell it there in the original package. The statute has been declared a constitutional enactment with the limitation that it does not operate to restrain or affect a continuous shipment of whisky from a vendor in one state to a vendee in another, and there delivered to such vendee in the original package; this being the case now presented for consideration. Wilkinson v. Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 11 Sup. Ct. 865, 35 L. Ed. 572; Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 42 L. Ed. 1088.

[5] We were referred, also, to the North Carolina statute (Rev. § 2080), by which in the case of intoxicating liquors the place of delivery is made the place of sale. The validity of this statute has been approved by this court as to sales within the state. State v. Herring, 145 N. C. 418, 58 S. E. 1007, 122 Am. St. Rep. 461; State v. Patterson, 134 N. C. 612, 47 S. E. 808. But this statute may not be held to apply to a sale fully consummated in another state, and where the subject-matter of the transaction is properly regarded as interstate commerce, and, as such, protected from interfering state regulations. On the facts, this sale was consummated in the state of Virginia, and the shipment as we have just shown must be considered and dealt with as interstate commerce till delivery in the original package to the purchaser. Caldwell v. State, supra; State v. Trotman, Rhodes v. Iowa, supra.

[6] It was further urged for the state that, while the facts referred to might, when standing alone, have the effect of exculpating defendant, there are other facts embodied in the special verdict tending to establish that defendant was engaged generally in the unlawful business of procuring whisky for others in prohibited territory, and this sale to Green should be held criminal as an instance and incident of the general unlawful business, especially the finding which says "that he did not solicit orders from any one nor order for any minor or any student of Wake Forest College, but did order for everybody else who applied to him." This position assumes the very question which is in debate, and proceeds upon a theory not contained in either count of the bill of indictment, and which could not be made the basis of a valid indictment. A citizen cannot be successfully prosecuted under a charge of engaging generally in the unlawful business of selling whisky. For various and altogether sufficient reasons, in a charge of that character, there must be allegation and proof of specific conduct constituting a breach of the criminal law (State v. Tisdale, 145 N. C. 422, 58 S. E. 998, 13 Ann. Cas. 125)—a requirement guaranteed by our Constitution and necessary in common fairness to enable a defendant to properly prepare his defense and to protect him from a second prosecution on the same state of facts. Accordingly the bill of indictment, in this case, as stated, charges on the first count an unlawful sale to B. M. Green at and in Wake county; second, an unlawful attempt to make such a sale by soliciting purchases, on his part, in behalf of persons, firms, and corporations to jurors unknown.

Unless guilty by reason of the conduct referred to and described in one or the other of these counts, there has been no crime against him either charged or proved, and for the reasons stated neither charge can be successfully maintained on the facts established by the verdict.

No error.

Ex parte WILSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

PARTITION (§ 107*)—DECREE—CONCLUSIVE-NESS.

One who was a party to ex parte partition proceedings, was present at the sale, and received her share of the purchase money, could not thereafter have the judgment and sale set aside for division as to her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 362-374; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Ferguson, Judge.

Ex parte proceeding in the name and on behalf of John E. Wilson for partition. From a judgment dismissing a petition of Mrs. Colin Lee to set aside the judgment and sale entered, she appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Kerr, Sr., for Mrs. Colin Lee. Geo. E. Butler and Cyrus M. Faircloth, both of Clinton, for Bryant Timber Co. Faison & Wright, of Clinton, for appellee John E. Wilson.

PER CURIAM. This cause was before the court at a former term (148 N. C. 439, 62 S. E. 520). Mrs. Colin Lee now moves in the original cause to set aside the judgment and sale for division as to her. Her own deposition proves she was made a party to the partition proceeding, was present at the sale, and received her share of the purchase money. His honor properly dismissed her petition.

Affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF LUMBERTON v. BROWN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 497*)—INDORSEMENT—BONA FIDES OF INDORSEE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2205, which provides that to charge an indorsee of a note with notice of infirmity in it he must have had actual knowledge thereof, or his action in taking it must have amounted to bad faith, the burden was on the maker of a note, in a suit thereon by a purchaser for value before maturity from one to whom the maker gave the note, to show that plaintiff knew of the infirmity relied on by the maker, or acted in bad faith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1675-1687; Dec. Dig. § 497.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 525*)—ACTION BY INDORSEE—BONA FIDES—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a note by an indorsee, evidence held insufficient to charge plaintiff with knowledge of any fraud in its inducement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1832-1839; Dec. Dig. § 525.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Lumberton against J. P. Brown. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action upon certain issues, of which the following is the first: "Did the plaintiff purchase the note described in the complaint for a valuable consideration and before maturity, in good faith, and without any knowledge of any fraud in its execution? Answer: Yes."

McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor, of Lumberton, for appellant. McLean, Varner & McLean, of Lumberton, for appellee.

BROWN, J. Plaintiff seeks to recover upon a promissory note for $750, dated July 3, 1908, interest from date due December 10, 1908, signed by defendant, payable to and indorsed by himself.

The defendant pleads that said note was given for stock in the Seminole Security Company; that the stock was worthless; and that he was induced to subscribe to said stock by the false and fraudulent representations of H. M. McAllister, cashier of plaintiff.

There are 41 assignments of error, 38 of which relate to the rejection and admission of evidence. We have examined them all, and find no error of sufficient importance to necessitate another trial. Very many of the exceptions are taken to rulings which, if erroneous, constitute only harmless error at best.

[1] It is contended that the judge erred in instructing the jury, if they believed the evidence, to answer the first issue "Yes." Taking any view of the evidence, the plaintiff is a holder in due course. Revisal, § 2208; Bank v. Hatcher, 151 N. C. 359, 66 S. E. 308, 134 Am. St. Rep. 989. The defendant gave the note to Shaw, who discounted it before maturity to the plaintiff, for value. Plaintiff issued its certificate of deposit to Shaw for the net sum and paid it. The burden is then cast upon the defendant to show infirmity in the paper and knowledge upon the part of the plaintiff at time the note was discounted of such facts as will make out a case of bad faith upon the part of the plaintiff in taking the paper. Revisal, § 2205; Bank v. Fountain, 148 N. C. 590, 62 S. E. 738; Bank v. Burgwyn, 108 N. C. 62, 12 S. E. 952; Manufacturing Co. v. Summers, 143 N. C. 102, 55 S. E. 522.

[2] Assuming, for argument's sake, that the bank is bound by the acts of its cashier, McAllister, we find no evidence of fraud or bad faith on his part. According to defendant's testimony, he purchased the stock from Edwards & Shaw, the Seminole Company's agents, and gave his note for it. Their representations were of a very glowing, promissory character (Williamson v. Holt, 147 N. C. 515, 61 S. E. 384, 17 L. R. A. [N. S.] 240), such as promoters frequently indulge in when "boosting" their enterprises. Cash Register v. Townsend, 137 N. C. 652, 50 S. E. 306, 70 L. R. A. 349. According to his own admission, defendant did not rely upon their statements, but asked McAllister's opinion. The latter gave defendant names of many persons, presidents of banks, cashiers, and others, who had invested in the stock, and stated that he had personally subscribed for some of it himself. There is no evidence whatever that the cashier's statements to defendant were false, much less knowingly so. Even the evidence for defendant shows that they were true. One of the trustees was president of the largest bank in Columbia; another was a bank president and chairman of the state Democratic executive committee; another was ex-president of a large woman's college and president of a large printing establishment. The insurance commissioner of South Carolina, a witness for defendant, said: "The standing of these parties was the very best financially, socially, and religiously." It was shown that over 150 bankers and business men had indorsed the proposition, and that their company had over 1,200 stockholders. The fact that the Seminole Company was wrecked by its officers six months later is no evidence of bad faith or fraud upon the part of McAllister.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

HAMILTON v. HINES BROS. LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 18, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 247*) — NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Even if a master was negligent in requiring a servant to pass over a skeleton car while in motion, or to use the link and pin coupler, or to lean over between the cars to uncouple, those facts, while evidence of negligence, could not have been the proximate cause of death, where the intestate passed over the car, uncoupled the car in safety, and, after doing so, unnecessarily placed himself in a dangerous position on the bolster, when there was another safe way for him to leave the car.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 795-800; Dec. Dig. § 247.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 61*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE.

Where the plaintiff and defendant are negligent and the negligence of both concur and continue to the time of the injury, the negligence of the defendant is not in the legal sense the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 297*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Contributory negligence presupposes negligence on the part of the defendant but not proximate cause; hence, in an action for death of a servant, a verdict finding that "intestate was not killed by defendant's negligence," and that "plaintiff's intestate contributed to his death by his own negligence," is not inconsistent as supporting a decree either for plaintiff or defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1195-1198; Dec. Dig. § 297.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*)—REVIEW—VERDICT.

In an action for death of a servant, where a verdict finds that the intestate was not killed by defendant's negligence, and that "intestate contributed to his death by his own negligence," the reviewing court need not examine errors as to the first issue, because the second issue is determinative of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 8331-3342; Dec. Dig. § 843.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1052*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Even where the court erroneously permits a witness to state certain things, it is not prejudicial where, on cross-examination, the witness was asked substantially the same question, and gave the same answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4171-4177; Dec. Dig. § 1052.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS TO INSTRUCT.

A prayer for instruction was properly denied where it related to something as to which no issue was submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS FOR INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for death of a servant, an instruction is objectionable which is predicated upon the theory that the intestate was killed while uncoupling a car, while the contributory negligence alleged and relied on was that the uncoupling had been finished, and that he negligently stood on the bolster when it was unnecessary to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by H. K. Hamilton, administrator, against the Hines Bros. Lumber Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is the second appeal by the plaintiff in this cause; the first being from a judgment of nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and is reported in 156 N. C. 519, 72 S. E. 588. This appeal is from the jury's verdict; the usual issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and amount of damage being submitted to the jury without objection.

The defendant lumber company maintains certain logging or tram roads, operated exclusively for the purpose of bringing its logs from its logging woods out to its main line. The tramroad upon which the accident occurred for which this action is brought connects with its main line of road, and runs from it out into the timber woods. The train consisted of 12 or 13 log cars, 2 of which, about midway the train, were loaded with feedstuff for the camp. The object was to place the empties upon the spur, and thus connect all the empties, and then proceed to the camp with the engine and loaded cars alone. The log cars in use by the defendant were such as are in general and common use by lumber companies. They were skeleton log cars, with four stringers, about six by six, six inches apart, running lengthwise down the middle of the cars, across which there was a bolster at either end of the car about three feet from the coupling. The cars were coupled together with link and pin, and, in addition to the bolsters at either end of the car, there was a beam about four by six inches across the car between the bolster and the coupling. The bolsters are about twelve inches in width, and extend in length over beyond the wheels. The top of the box of the wheel (called the journal box) is of a flat surface (about eight inches square), and is about two feet from the bolster, and could be used in stepping on and off the car.

The plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendant as fireman on Friday before he was killed. It was a part of his duty to couple and uncouple, and to do the switching. The work desired of the intestate upon the day of the injury was to uncouple certain cars while the whole train was backing, then to get off the car after so uncoupling, go to the switch below, getting there in time to change the switch (after the cars he had uncoupled had gone into the switch) before the next cars, which were to be uncoupled, had reached the switch, so that the latter cars cut off by the witness Emmerson would go straight down the track. Then the switch was again to be changed to let the other cars go therein. The two loaded cars, about the middle of the train, were to go straight down the track, and the empties in front of and behind the two loaded cars were to be placed in the spur. There was no standard or arms on the car from which the intestate was to alight. The engineer was backing at a rate of somewhere from five to eight miles per hour, and it was a slight downgrade, and, when the cars were uncoupled, they separated and ran down the track of their own motion. It is undisputed that the plaintiff was ordered to do this work, and it is not denied that the method set out was the method adopted and used by the defendant.

It is admitted that there are two ways that this shifting of cars could be accomplished, one by the method above set out—that is, not stopping the motion of the train—and the other by backing the cars into the spur, stopping, uncoupling, then moving out, backing straight down the track, stopping, uncoupling the cars desired to be left on the main track, then moving up and backing the other cars into the spur, and stopping, uncoupling, and leaving them. Plaintiff's witnesses testify that the loss of time by the use of the latter method is from three to five minutes, while the defendant's witnesses estimate as much as fifteen minutes' loss thereby. It is not disputed that plaintiff had to go out from the engine over the moving skeleton log cars on the stringers, sit down on the beam and pull out the pin, so as to uncouple,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

then get off the car in order to proceed with his duties and change and rechange the switch. The intestate fell from the car and was killed by the car running over him. The plaintiff contended that he fell while pulling out the pin, and the defendant contended that he had finished uncoupling the cars, and that he unnecessarily stood up on the bolster and fell from that position. Evidence was introduced to sustain both contentions.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? Ans.: No.

"(2) Did the plaintiff's intestate contribute to his death by his own negligence, as alleged in the answer? Ans.: Yes.

"(3) What sum is plaintiff entitled to recover? Ans.: (No answer)."

Judgment was rendered upon the verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Geo. V. Cowper and Y. T. Ormond, both of Kinston, for appellant. Loftin & Dawson and Rouse & Land, all of Kinston, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. Admitting, for the purposes of this appeal, that the defendant was negligent, the controversy on the first issue was reduced to the question of proximate cause, and on the second to the inquiry whether the plaintiff was negligent, and, if so, was this the real cause of death.

[1] If it was dangerous and negligent to require the plaintiff's intestate to pass over a skeleton car while in motion, or to use the link and pin coupler, or to lean over between the cars to uncouple, those facts, while evidence of negligence, were of the past, and could not have been the proximate cause of death, provided the intestate passed over the car, leaned over and completed the uncoupling in safety, and, after doing so, unnecessarily placed himself in a dangerous position on the bolster, when there was another safe way for him to leave the car.

[2] It became then most important to ascertain the position of the plaintiff at the time he fell, and if the defendant was negligent, and the intestate was also negligent in unnecessarily going into a place of danger, both concurring in causing death, the negligence of the plaintiff was proximate, and it was proper to answer the first issue in the negative and the second in the affirmative. Phnix v. Durham, 130 N. C. 360, 41 S. E. 932; Curtis v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 440, 41 S. E. 929; Harvell v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 262, 70 S. E. 389. In the last case cited, the court states the rule as follows: "If, however, the plaintiff was negligent, and this negligence caused him to stumble and fall, he could not recover, although the defendant was also negligent, because this would present a case of concurrent negligence, and it is well settled that when the plaintiff and defendant are negligent, and the negligence of both concur and continue to the time of the injury; the negligence of the defendant is not in the legal sense proximate."

[3] This view is not in conflict with the statement that contributory negligence presupposes negligence on the part of the defendant (Whitley v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 989, 29 S. E. 783; Graves v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 9, 48 S. E. 502), because in the first issue two facts are involved—(1) negligence; (2) proximate cause—and it cannot be said that contributory negligence presupposes proximate cause. If it did so, the second issue would be a vain and useless thing. It follows, therefore, that there was a phase of the evidence which supported the findings of the jury, and that the verdict is not condemned as inconsistent, which rests "upon the ground that there are two responses to different issues, one of which would support a decree for the defendant, while the other would entitle the plaintiff to recover." Stern v. Benbow, 151 N. C. 463, 66 S. E. 445. In Baker v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1017, 24 S. E. 415, the jury answered the first and second issues "Yes," and awarded the plaintiff $1,000, and the court held the finding upon the second issue determinative, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment, and in Harris v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 162, 43 S. E. 589, the three issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and last clear chance were answered "Yes," and damages were awarded, and upon these findings a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was sustained.

[4] The jury in the case before us has answered the first issue "No" and the second issue "Yes," and as we have seen that these findings are supported by the evidence, and are not inconsistent, and as the plaintiff cannot recover as long as the answer to the second issue stands, it is not necessary for us to consider the exceptions (about thirty in number) arising upon the first issue, if no error is shown affecting the second issue. Ginsberg v. Leach, 111 N. C. 15, 15 S. E. 882; Allen v. McLendon, 113 N. C. 325, 18 S. E. 206.

There are several exceptions bearing on the second issue.

[5] The first is to permitting a witness for the defendant to say there was a safer way to get off the car than by walking on the bolster. If this was erroneous, it is not prejudicial because on cross-examination the witness was asked substantially the same question and gave the same answer.

The other exceptions on this issue are to the refusal to give certain prayers for instructions and to parts of the charge as given.

[6] The first prayer for instruction was properly denied, because it relates to assumption of risk, as to which no issue was submitted to the jury, and it also appears that his honor substantially instructed the jury as to the degree of care required of the intestate, as the plaintiff requested, when he said: "While the law requires an employer to furnish a reasonably safe place for its employé to work, and reasonably safe appliances with which to do his work, it requires of the employé, the servant, to go about his work in a reasonably prudent manner. While he may trust that his employer or master has furnished a reasonably safe place and appliances in which to do the work, provided the danger is not so obvious that a reasonably prudent man would see that in doing the work he was in greater danger of getting hurt than not getting hurt, he may go about the work, but he is required to exercise reasonable caution and prudence himself, because it is his duty to take notice of the conditions which surround him, and he must exercise the care of a reasonably prudent man. This the defendant contends the plaintiff did not do, and that he was careless in getting up and getting on the bolster, and not careful to take care of himself so as to stoop down as he might have stooped down by exercising reasonable care."

[7] The material part of the second prayer is also covered by the above excerpt from the charge, but the instruction is also objectionable, upon the ground that it is predicated upon the theory that the intestate was killed while uncoupling the car, while the contributory negligence alleged and relied on was that the uncoupling had been finished, and that he negligently stood on the bolster when it was unnecessary for him to do so. His honor stated distinctly to the jury that the contention of the defendant was that the intestate was negligent in getting up and standing on the bolster, which was not a method employed by the defendant. In other words, the plaintiff said that his intestate was required to pass across a skeleton car while in motion, to sit on a beam, to lean over and uncouple, and that while performing this duty he fell and was killed, and requested his honor to charge the jury upon this theory he would not be guilty of contributory negligence, unless the danger was so apparent and obvious that a reasonable person would have refused to attempt to do the work, while the defendant did not contend that he was guilty of contributory negligence if injured in this way, but that, after he had uncoupled, he negligently stood on the bolster and was injured. The other exceptions on this issue are to parts of the charge which follow approved precedents.

We have examined the exceptions to the first issue, and do not intimate that any were well taken, but as we find no error on the second issue, which determines the appeal, it is not necessary to discuss them.

No error.

WILKINS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 89*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DAMAGE IN SHIPMENT.

The consignee under an ordinary bill of lading may not as a general rule reject the goods because the same have been wrongfully damaged in the course of shipment, but must receive the goods and hold the company for the injury done, being required, further, to do what good business prudence would dictate in the endeavor to minimize the loss; but, when the entire value of the goods has been destroyed and the injury amounts practically to a total loss, the consignee is justified in refusing them, and may sue for the entire amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 324-330; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 134*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DAMAGES IN SHIPMENT—ENTIRE LOSS.

In an action by a consignee for damages to a keg of syrup which had soured and for a penalty for delay in allowing the claim, evidence held to warrant a finding that there was a total loss, although the keg was probably in good condition and worth about 25 cents, thus relieving the consignee from the duty of accepting the goods, and giving him the right to sue for the entire value of the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 588-593, 607; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 159*)—DAMAGES TO GOODS—NOTICE.

Where a railroad freight agent by mistake denies to a consignee for several months that the goods have arrived, during which time they spoil, so that the consignee refuses to accept, the time of offering to deliver to the consignee is the time of delivery within the bill of lading requirement that claims for damage must be made within four months after delivery, or a reasonable time therefor in case of failure to deliver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 669-672, 699-703½, 711-714, 718, 718½; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Allen, Judge.

Action by R. E. Wilkins against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action upon appeal by defendant from the judgment rendered in the justice of peace court. The action was instituted for the recovery of $4.85 damage to a keg of syrup shipped from Bamburg, S. O., to the plaintiff at Kinston, N. C., and for $50 penalty for failure to pay the claim within the time allowed by statute. The defendant denied liability, and denied that the claim was ever properly filed, or that claim was filed within the time allowed by the contract or by law.

On the trial plaintiff testified in his own behalf in substance as follows: "I bought 10 gallons of an especially fine grade of syrup for table use in Bamburg, S. C., on March 31, 1910, paying in cash 42½ cents per gallon for the syrup and 75 cents for the keg. The bill of lading was sent four or five or six days later. This is the bill of lading. [Bill of lading is introduced by the plaintiff.] Bill of lading is dated March 31, 1910, and is made out in plaintiff's proper name. I made inquiry at both depots to know if the syrup had come. I made continuous effort to get the syrup. Some days after I had gotten home—it may have been three weeks—I asked if it had come, and kept it up, inquiring every time I came home. Sometimes I stayed maybe five weeks. I found out it had not been delivered. I went down to see both agents. I went to the A. C. L. depot once or more times. I also asked them many times over the phone, and also went personally. The A. C. L. notified me some time the latter part of August or in September, 1910, by card, that it was there. When I made inquiry to get it out, they said it was not there. I asked what became of it. The agent said it had been delivered. I said, 'Who to?' I said, 'Look again.' He looked and found it, and I went down and examined it, and found it was sour. I refused to take it. It was in bad condition and sour and of no value to me, and I so stated to defendant's agent, and he helped sample it. I filed claim in writing with Mr. Cleary, agent of A. C. L. Railroad Company in Kinston. The exact date I filed the claim in writing is November 22, 1910, being the date the agent gave me receipt for bill of lading. Agent wanted bill of lading to go in the claim filed. He wanted me to give it over to him. I said, 'No,' that the syrup was in his hands. I would not give it to him until he said, 'We would rather you would,' and I said, 'Out of courtesy to you I will do it, but I don't have to do it.' My claim was for damages to the syrup—$4.85, actual cost of syrup and keg. The claim has not been paid. * * * I filed claim for syrup and keg, which is $4.85. I paid 75 cents for the keg. I don't know that keg was in good order, and keg soured with the contents. So far as I know, the keg was intact, and the trouble was the sour liquid. Syrup was of absolutely no value. I don't know that it would make vinegar. It was syrup I bought. I didn't want it otherwise. It was August or September. It must have been September. It was the latter part of August or September. I would not know the date, except for this receipt [witness holding receipt for bill of lading in his hand]. I presented claim for $4.85—$4.10 for the syrup, and 75 cents for the keg. The bill of lading was not the claim. I presented written claim. I remember presenting separate written claim, other than bill of lading. It was the bill of cost of the syrup, and I presented the claim with the bill of lading. * * * I refused to take it. I refused to take the keg. It would not have paid me to take it. A sweet keg, I suppose is worth 75 cents and a vinegar keg 25 cents. * * * Bamburg is 150 or 200 miles on the Southern from Kinston; the Southern being a connecting carrier on the A. C. L. Railroad Company." Defendant offered in evidence bill of lading, and the station agent at time of trial testified that he was unable to say from records in the office that the keg of syrup had arrived at Kinston on April 12, 1910, and on the waybill was consigned to A. E. Williams, and showed a delivery from Southern to A. C. L. at Columbia, S. C.

The court, among other things, charged the jury: "If the keg could have been utilized in any way, so as to save anything to the company, it was his duty to do it, but if the whole thing was worthless, so there would have been no saving to the railroad company, then he would not be responsible for not taking it out. The burden is upon the plaintiff to show by the greater weight of the evidence that he has been damaged, and to what extent, and to what amount. So, if you find by the greater weight that they did receive this syrup and retained it till it was worthless—the claim is that it was there from April to August—and during the summer it soured and became worthless, and if you find that it is so, and the syrup was worthless, then you will say that the value is $4.10 and 75 cents, making $4.85 or a less amount. Whatever you find to be the amount of his damages, so answer it in figures, whatever you find that amount to be." Defendant excepted to the charge, and, after verdict, entered motion as follows: "Upon the admission of the plaintiff that a reasonable time for the arrival of the shipment in controversy was 10 or 15 days from March 31, 1910, and the evidence of the plaintiff being that the shipment did arrive at Kinston on April 12, 1910, and the plaintiff further admitting that he filed the claim sued on with the defendant on the 22d day of November, 1910, the defendant moved the court to adjudge that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the penalty demanded in this action."

Rouse & Land, of Kinston, for appellant. W. D. Pollock and G. V. Cowper, both of Kinston, for appellee.

HOKE, J. Section 2634, Revisal, in effect provides that every claim for loss or damage to property in shipment by a common carrier shall be adjusted as to intrastate shipments within 60 days from time of filing same with the company's agent and within 90 days in case of shipments from without the state under a penalty of $50 for "each and every such failure," and with proviso that the penalty is not enforceable unless the party aggrieved in his action shall recover the full amount of the claim. Defendant resists recovery (1) because the amount of the claim should be reduced by the value of the keg; (2) by reason of a clause in the bill of lading in terms as follows: "Claims for loss, damage or delay must be made in writing to the carrier at the point of delivery or at the point of origin within four months after delivery of the property, or, in case of failure to make delivery, then within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed. Unless claims are so made the carrier shall not be liable." But on the facts in evidence we are of opinion that neither position can be sustained.

[1] In contracts of affreightment, the consignee under an ordinary bill of lading may not as a general rule reject the goods because the same have been wrongfully damaged in the course of shipment. Under usual conditions, he must receive the goods and hold the company for the injury done, and he is required further to do what good business prudence would dictate in the endeavor to minimize the loss. The principle, however, does not obtain when the "entire value of the goods has been destroyed and the injury amounts practically to a total loss." In such case the consignee is justified in refusing the goods, and may sue for the entire amount. Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1365; Manufacturing Co. v. Railway, 62 Wis. 642, 22 N. W. 827, 51 Am. Rep. 725; Brand v. Weir, 27 Misc. Rep. 212, 57 N. Y. Supp. 731; 5 A. & E. (2d Ed.) p. 384.

[2] And so it is here. This was a shipment of syrup, and the evidence justified a verdict for the entire loss. The keg was only an incident, too small to be regarded, 25 cents at the most, and the claimant testified that it would not pay him to try and utilize it.

[3] And we do not think on the facts as presented that the restrictive stipulations in the bill of lading afford protection for defendant. There is authority to the effect that on these facts, when the goods are in evidence, rejected on account of their damaged condition and all the facts and circumstances fully known to the company's agent, the provision relied upon should be held to have no application whatever (Kime v. Railroad, 156 N. C. 451, 72 S. E. 485; 6 Cyc. p. 507; Moore on Carriers, p. 337), and in any event we are of opinion that the time which elapsed while the goods were in the defendant's depot and when the consignee was misled as to their placing by assurances to the contrary on the part of defendant's agents should not be counted to the claimant's prejudice. Under these circumstances, the offer to deliver in August should be held as the time of delivery under the first clause of the bill of lading if the same applies, and to waive or displace the requirement contained in the second clause that the "claim be filed within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed." Hutchinson on Carriers, § 444; Moore on Carriers, pp. 335, 336.

In any aspect of the matter, therefore, we are of opinion that the stipulations of the bill of lading do not affect the result, and the objections urged to the validity of plaintiff's recovery must be overruled. There is no error and on the record the judgment is affirmed.

No error.

HENDERSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 866*) — REVIEW — NONSUIT.

On appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, the Supreme Court cannot weigh the evidence to determine the existence of the material facts, or which theory arising under the evidence shall be adopted; its duty being to decide merely whether there is any evidence worthy of consideration by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3467-3475; Dec. Dig. § 866.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 866*)—REVIEW ON NONSUIT.

In reviewing a judgment of nonsuit, the Supreme Court must give to the evidence the interpretation most favorable to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3467-3475; Dec. Dig. § 866.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—JURY QUESTION.

If the evidence merely raises a possibility or conjecture of existence of negligence, a nonsuit should be ordered; but if the more reasonable probability is in favor of plaintiff's claim of negligence the question should be submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-353; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 121*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is on plaintiff in a negligence action to prove the allegation of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-220, 224-228, 271; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 398*)—INJURIES ON TRACK— NEGLIGENCE—DISCOVERED PERIL.

In order to recover for death on a railroad track, on the ground of discovered peril, while decedent was in a helpless condition, plaintiff must prove that decedent was on the track in an apparently helpless condition, and that the engineer could have discovered him by ordinary care in time to stop the train before striking him, and that decedent was killed as the result of the failure to exercise such care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1356-1363; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 400*)—INJURY ON TRACK— JURY QUESTION.

Evidence in an action for decedent's death on a railroad track, in which it was claimed that the engineer could have discovered his presence on the track in a helpless condition by exercising due care, held to justify nonsuit, it not raising a reasonable probability of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1365-1381; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 577½*)—TESTIMONY BEFORE CORONER.

In an action for decedent's death on a railroad track, a statement by the engineer, made before the coroner, that he saw a man lying on his left side with his hat on his head, so he could not tell whether he was white or black, was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2410; Dec. Dig. § 577½.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Onslow County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Charles Henderson, administrator, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This is an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the intestate of the plaintiff. The defendant denied negligence, and alleged that the death of the intestate was caused by his own contributory negligence. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, his honor rendered a judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

D. E. Henderson and D. L. Ward, both of New Bern, for appellant. Frank Thompson, of Jacksonville, and Moore & Dunn, of New Bern, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The only question presented by this appeal is whether there is any evidence fit to be submitted to the jury, and in considering it we cannot weigh the evidence for the purpose of seeing if it satisfies us of the ultimate fact sought to be proved; nor can we exercise the power, committed by the law to the jury, of saying which theory arising upon the evidence shall be adopted.

[2] Our duty is performed when we determine whether there is any evidence worthy of consideration, and in its performance we are not permitted to accept a view of the evidence favorable to the defendant, as a jury would have the right to do, if one is presented which sustains the contention of the plaintiff; the law requiring us, on a motion to nonsuit, to give to the evidence the interpretation most favorable to the plaintiff.

[3] If, so considered, the evidence does no more than "raise a possibility or conjecture of a fact," a judgment of nonsuit ought to be sustained (Cobb v. Fogalman, 23 N. C. 440; Lewis v. Steamboat Co., 132 N. C. 909, 44 S. E. 666); but if the "more reasonable probability" is in favor of the plaintiff's contention the question ought to be submitted to the jury. Fitzgerald v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 535, 54 S. E. 391, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337.

The statement of the law in this last case is pertinent. "It is very generally held that direct evidence of negligence is not required, but the same may be inferred from facts and attendant circumstances; and it is well established that if the facts proved establish the more reasonable probability that the defendant has been guilty of actionable negligence the case cannot be withdrawn from the jury, though the possibility of accident may arise on the evidence. Thus, in Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 58, it is said: 'The plaintiff is not bound to prove more than enough to raise a fair presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant and of resulting injury to himself. Having done this, he is entitled to recover, unless the defendant produces evidence to rebut the presumption. It has sometimes been held not sufficient for the plaintiff to establish a probability of the defendant's default; but this is going too far. If the facts proved render it probable that the defendant violated its duty, it is for the jury to decide whether it did so or not. To hold otherwise would be to deny the value of circumstantial evidence. As already stated, the plaintiff is not required to prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt, though the facts shown must be more consistent with the negligence of the defendant than the absence of it. It has never been suggested that evidence of negligence should be direct and positive. In the nature of the case, the plaintiff must labor under difficulties in proving the fact of negligence; and, as that fact is always a relative one, it is susceptible of proof by evidence of circumstances bearing more or less directly on the fact of negligence—a kind of evidence which might not be satisfactory in other classes of cases open to clear proof. This is on the general principle of the law of evidence which holds that to be sufficient and satisfactory evidence which satisfies an unprejudiced mind.'"

The allegation of negligence in the complaint is that the deceased was down on the track in an apparently helpless condition, and that the engineer of the defendant could have discovered him, in time to stop the train before reaching him, by the exercise of ordinary care.

[4, 5] The burden was on the plaintiff to prove the truth of this allegation, and to establish in the minds of the jury: (1) That the deceased was down on the track in an apparently helpless condition; (2) that the engineer could have discovered him, in time to stop the train before reaching him, by the exercise of ordinary care; (3) that he failed to exercise such care, and as a direct result the deceased was killed. Olegg v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 294, 43 S. E. 836.

[6] Applying these principles, we are of opinion that there was error in entering the judgment of nonsuit, and we forbear from discussing the evidence at length for fear we may present arguments in behalf of the plaintiff, without giving those favorable to the defendant. It was in evidence: That about two hours before the deceased was killed he was asleep in a path near the crossings. That he was awakened, and went to Sabiston's store near by. That he remained at the store a short time, and went back to the railroad at Sabiston's crossing. That he was walking, and went up the railroad in the direction his body was afterwards found. That he was drunk and staggering; one witness saying "both sides of the road was his." That about two hours after leaving Sabiston's crossing his body was found near a trestle of the defendant across Cary's branch, which was about two miles from the crossing. That the head was severed from the body, and was on one side of the track, and the body, according to one witness, on the other side, and, according to another, between the rails; and an arm under the trestle. That the body was mangled, or, as one witness expressed it, "badly chewed up," "badly mashed up." That there was evidence of blood on the rail; a witness testifying: "Q. Did you see any blood, and where did you see it? A. That was on the north side of the trestle, and a bundle on this side—a bundle of overalls. Q. What did you see on the roadbed? A. I didn't see anything unusual, except where the man was cut to pieces on the trestle. Q. Where was that? A. On the northeast side of the trestle. Q. Right on the side of it? A. You may say the first tie; right on the roadbed between the first and second tie. Q. With reference to the T iron, where was it? A. It must have been right over the T iron on the east side. Q. How far did you see the evidence on the track from where you first observed the condition? A. Over there south, it was about half a dozen or eight ties, as far as it was. He was cut right alongside of the trestle after we crossed. Q. Where was the head? A. When I first observed the head, it was down in the ditch. Q. How far was that from the other edge of the trestle? A. The head was north side of the trestle, eight or ten cross-ties from the trestle. Q. Where was the body? A. Right on the other side, just clear of the T iron. Q. With reference to the railroad track? A. Right side of the track, just clear of the track on the edge of the cross-ties, on this end. Q. (the Court). Was any part of the body between the rails or outside the rails? A. To the best of my recollection, the head was on one side of the railroad in the ditch, and the body was on the other side of the track, and the arm was down under the trestle. I believe the other arm was badly mangled. That the deceased was killed by a passenger train, which stopped a short distance beyond the body. That no whistle was sounded. That it was a clear day. That an object down on the track, about the place the defendant was killed, the size of a man, could be seen from the direction the train was running 1,065 yards, and that it was a man, if one was on the track, a distance of 265 yards. There is other evidence tending to establish the contention of the defendant.

[7] His honor properly excluded the statement of the engineer, made before the coroner, that he saw a man lying on his left side with his hat on his head, so he could not tell whether he was white or black. Southerland v. Railroad, 106 N. C. 100, 11 S. E. 189.

We are of opinion the plaintiff is entitled to have the evidence considered by a jury. Reversed.

HOLDER v. NORTH CAROLINA R. CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 396*)—INJURIES ON TRACK—BURDEN OF PROOF—NEGLIGENCE.

The burden was on plaintiff, suing for intestate's death on a railroad track, to prove that intestate's appearance while sitting on the cross-tie was such as to lead one of ordinary prudence to believe that he was helpless; plaintiff seeking to recover on that theory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1341-1343, 1357; Dec. Dig. § 396.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 398*)—INJURIES ON TRACK—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE.

Evidence, in an action for intestate's death by being struck by a railroad train, held not to show negligence by the company resulting in decedent's death, so that a nonsuit was properly entered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1356-1363; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A ruling admitting a part of the answer in evidence is immaterial, in an action for intestate's death by being struck by a train while sitting on a cross-tie in an apparently helpless condition, where it did not tend to prove that decedent was in an apparently helpless condition, but merely that he was sitting on the tie.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Cline, Judge.

Action by James Holder, administrator, against the North Carolina Railroad Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate. The defendant denied that it killed the deceased, or that it was negligent, and pleaded contributory negligence. There was no eyewitness to the killing; the plaintiff relying on circumstantial evidence.

The deceased was going from the railroad about sunset, and he was then staggering, and acted like a drunken man. About dark he was going to the railroad, and this is the last time he was seen alive, as far as the evidence discloses. His body was found the next morning, about 7 o'clock, in a sitting position on the end of a cross-tie, and while in that position several trains passed and did not touch him. There was no sign of the body being dragged or mangled; and there were no wounds, except two in the back of his head. There was evidence that he could have been seen sitting on the cross-tie in time to stop the train. There was no evidence of failure to sound the whistle or ring the bell.

The position of the body, and other circumstances, are described by a witness for the plaintiff, as follows: "I went to the place where the man was found dead on the Southern Railroad track on the 3d day of April, 1910. I was there early Sunday morning, somewhere around 7 o'clock. This spot is near my house. Back beyond where this man was found, there was a curve in the track where it goes into a cut; that is, coming back this way from where the man was found in the cut. In going from here to Clayton, he was found on the left-hand side of the track. There is a grade this way; but from where the engine emerges from the cut it is almost level. There is a public road that crosses the railroad. There is a public road that crosses the railroad a little beyond where the man was found. I think it was about 80 feet. The crossing was west from where he was found. I do not know the distance it is from the point where the man was found to the edge of the cut. I did not step it, because it had been surveyed by both parties. It was in my field where the body was found. There was no one there at all when I got there. I looked at the man, and all around the track, to see what I could learn. No one else was there until I left. I will describe to the jury how I found him, as best I can. You all know how cross-ties are. As well as I remember, the man was sitting with his left foot extended and right foot under him. He was in his shirt sleeves. He had his coat on his right arm, and part was across it, and the right arm was between the two cross-ties, and his head was resting on right arm between the cross-ties, and still his body was higher. He was sitting on the end of the cross-ties. I did not touch his body. I saw a wound on the back of his head that I judged was the cause of his death. I did not see any blood. I looked down the side of his face to see if I could see any blood, and there was very little. I saw no blood anywhere else. On that morning I went up about as far in the direction of Raleigh as that crossing, about 80 feet. Only saw a little blood on his face. My recollection is not distinct as to how his coat was cut. I simply remember he was in his shirt sleeves, and his coat was on his arm, and a part across the iron. The man's head was bending towards the east. I do not have any recollection of any train passing along there that night. Of course, I know when the regular trains pass; but on that particular night I did not pay any attention to it. I know along about that time, just a few days before and a few days after this man was found there, that the trains on the Southern Railway customarily passed that point at night. I know the regular schedule immediately before and immediately after. The first train that would pass after sundown would be the midnight train that is due at Clayton at 12 o'clock, which is the mixed train coming west. There is a freight train going east that passes that point about 10 o'clock. That would be the next train after sundown. There is a passenger train that leaves here about 7:30 that passes there about 8. I think at that time that it passed a little before dark. The schedule has been changed. After the midnight train the next train would be the one that leaves here at 4:30 and passes there something after 5. The next one is the one that passes Clayton at 7:30, and that would bring you up to next morning. I was not present or near the body when the west-bound passenger train comes along. I saw it after coroner came and moved it. When I first went up there, of course, I had curiosity to see what killed the man; but the wound on the back of the head seemed a little indistinct. I did not look at it very closely. Did not examine it when I went back. When I saw the body the second time, they had taken it off the track, and were preparing to move it away. I did not look for any blood at that time."

At the conclusion of the evidence, judgment of nonsuit was entered, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Douglass, Lyon & Douglass and R. N. Simms, all of Raleigh, for appellant. W. B. Snow, of Raleigh, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. The evidence in Clegg v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 293, 43 S. E. 837, in which a judgment of nonsuit was sustained, was "that plaintiff's intestate was seen going in the direction of defendant's track, and was later found dead, lying by the side of the track where a dirt road ran parallel with it, but not at a crossing, and with bruises from which it might be reasonably inferred that he had been knocked off the track and killed by defendant's engine. The track was straight at that point for half a mile, possibly more. Part of the back of intestate's head was knocked off. There was no eye-witness to the death, whether he was killed by the engine, or, if so, whether he was on the track or close by it when struck, or whether he was walking or sitting down or lying down on the track. There was no sign of the intestate having been dragged; nor had he been run over by the engine. The killing was at night. There was evidence by plaintiff's witnesses that there was no sign of blood on the cross-ties and some evidence to the contrary," and the court, speaking through the present Chief Justice, said: "If the deceased was either walking or sitting or lying down on the track, this was evidence of contributory negligence. Hord v.

Railroad, 129 N. C. 305 [40 S. E. 69]. If walking or sitting down, the engineer (nothing else appearing) had a right to presume he would get off before the train struck him, and there would have been no negligence on the part of the defendant, inferable from the mere fact, without further evidence, that the deceased was killed while on the track, for the engine had the right of way. If deceased had been helpless, lying down on the track, and the engineer, with proper outlook, could have seen him in time to avoid killing him, and did not do so, this would have been negligence rendering the defendant liable, notwithstanding the previous contributory negligence of deceased; and that the track was straight for half a mile or more was evidence to go to the jury that if he had been lying down the engineer, with proper outlook, could have seen him. But there was no evidence tending to show that he was lying down (McArver v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 380 [40 S. E. 94]), and the burden of showing that the deceased was helpless on the track was upon the plaintiff. Hord v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 305 [40 S. E. 69]. The evidence of some blood on the track (though contradicted by plaintiff's other witnesses) was equally consonant with deceased having been struck while walking or sitting down."

The evidence in this case is much more favorable to the defendant than was the evidence in the case cited, because here the plaintiff has shown that his intestate was sitting on the end of the cross-tie at the time he was struck by the train of the defendant, if it struck him, and is in all material aspects like that in Upton v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 173, 38 S. E. 736.

[1] As no presumption of negligence arises from the killing of the deceased, and as the engineer had the right to presume, up to the last moment, he would get off the cross-tie, if he was sitting up, the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that his appearance while on the cross-tie was such as to lead a man of ordinary prudence, in charge of the train, to believe he was unconscious or helpless; and we find nothing in the evidence that amounts to more than conjecture or speculation as to this fact.

The circumstance that the head was bent over at the time the body was found, chiefly relied on by the plaintiff, is explained by the strong probability that a blow causing death could not have been received without making some change in the position of the body; and when death ensued it was natural for the head to drop.

It also appears that several trains passed the body while on the cross-tie without touching it, which would indicate a change in the position of the body after it was struck, if the deceased was killed by a train of the defendant.

[2] We are therefore of opinion that the evidence is not of such character as to justify submitting it to the jury.

There is a marked distinction between this case and that of Henderson v. Railroad, 75 S. E. 1002, at this term. In the Henderson Case the killing was admitted, and it was in the daytime. There was evidence that no whistle was sounded; that the deceased was found asleep by the side of the track about two hours before his death; that when aroused he walked up the track in the direction his body was afterwards found, staggering; that when found the body was on one side of the track, the head on the other, one arm under the trestle, and the other badly mangled; that there was blood on the rail; and none of these circumstances appear in this.

[3] The ruling on the admission of a part of the answer is immaterial, as it has no tendency to prove that the deceased was in an apparently helpless condition, but simply that he was sitting on the end of a cross-tie. Affirmed.

CULBRETH v. HALL et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 39*)—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

In an action to convert a deed into a mortgage for fraud, evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on the character of the instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 112, 113; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—FRAUD—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action to have an absolute deed declared a mortgage, the gravamen of the action was the fraud of the grantee, and not mutual mistake, a charge that the plaintiff must sustain her allegation, not only by the greater weight of evidence, but by evidence, clear, strong, cogent and convincing, was not erroneous as to defendant, though the court failed to charge that there must be evidence dehors the deed before it could be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—FRAUD—INSTRUCTIONS.

The failure to charge on the necessity of evidence dehors the deed was not erroneous, where there were facts in evidence inconsistent with the claim of absolute ownership on the part of the defendant, such as gross inadequacy of price, possession retained by plaintiff, and no demand for rent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

4. LIS PENDENS (§ 24*)—NOTICE OF PENDENCY OF ACTION—EFFECT OF SUMMONS AND COMPLAINT.

Where, in an action to convert a deed into a mortgage for fraud, the complaint contains the names of the parties, the object of the action, and a description of the land to be affected, it has all the requisites of a lis pendens notice, and, though no separate and formal notice was filed, a defendant to whom a transfer was made, and who had the deed probated and registered after the issuance of the summons and the filing of a duly verified complaint, had legal notice of the plaintiff's equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lis Pendens, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-46; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

5. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 130*)—JURISDICTION.

Where a mortgagor remains in possession, he is not a tenant, and the mortgagee has no right under the landlord and tenant act to a summary proceeding, so that, where in ejectment before a justice against one who claimed as mortgagor in an action previously commenced to have a deed declared a mortgage for the fraud of the mortgagee, such mortgagor pleaded that the justice had no jurisdiction on the ground that the title relied on is in controversy, and averred her title as set out in her complaint, and there was no evidence that she had attorned to the plaintiffs, the justice's judgment which did not pass on the subject of her tenancy, but simply directed her removal, was void, and would not operate as an estoppel in the previously commenced suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

6. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—DEED ABSOLUTE IN FORM—OUSTER FROM REALTY—DAMAGES.

Where, in an action to have a deed declared a mortgage, the plaintiff recovered her entire estate in the property subject to the mortgage lien, she was not also entitled to have the value of her equity of redemption, but merely the rents from the date when she was ousted from the property by summary proceedings until the time when it was restored to her, together with such other actual damages as she may have sustained by reason of her wrongful ouster.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Jane Culbreth against M. M. Hall and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

These issues were submitted:

"(1) Was Jane Culbreth induced to sign the deed to M. M. Hall, instead of a mortgage, by the fraud of defendant M. M. Hall, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) What amount did defendant Hall pay Melvin at the time the deed was executed by Melvin to the plaintiff, Jane Culbreth? Answer: $319.

"(3) Did the defendant Wilson have legal notice of plaintiff's cause of action by her complaint on file as a lis pendens, prior to the registration of his said deed for said lands? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Is plaintiff estopped by the proceedings and judgment of R. H. Hubbard, J. P.? Answer: No.

"(5) What damages has plaintiff sustained by reason of the defendant Hall failing to permit the plaintiff to redeem said land and wrongfully conveying same to his codefendant, Wilson? Answer: $361.17."

From the judgment rendered the defendants appealed.

Faison & Wright, of Clinton, for appellants. George E. Butler, of Clinton, for appellee.

BROWN, J. This action is brought to convert a deed into a mortgage, upon the ground of fraud, the plaintiff averring that she was induced by the fraud of the draughtsman to sign the instrument, thinking it was a mortgage, instead of an absolute deed. We have examined the 18 assignments of error, and find nothing in the record that justifies us in directing another trial.

[1] 1. It is contended that his honor should have sustained the motion to nonsuit. The plaintiff's evidence tends to prove that she purchased a dwelling house and lot from one Melvin, and owed him a balance of $319 on it; that the property was worth about $700; that she applied to defendant Hall for a loan of $319; that, after some "chaffering," defendant agreed to lend plaintiff $319 on two years' credit at interest, and that Hall paid said sum to Melvin for her, and Melvin executed a deed to plaintiff. The deed from plaintiff to Hall was written by his son, James Hall, a notary public, who also probated it. The plaintiff testifies positively that the transaction was a loan, and not a sale, and that the notary fraudulently substituted an absolute deed for a mortgage. There is abundant evidence to support the plaintiff's own testimony. It is in evidence that she is an illiterate, ignorant colored woman of excellent character, and the "washer-woman" for Hall's family; that she had purchased the property from Melvin and made payments on it; that the exact sum she obtained from Hall was the sum she owed Melvin; that Hall agreed to lend it to her for two years; that plaintiff remained in possession for twelve months, without any demand for rent; that she listed the property for taxes, and claimed it as her own. The motion to nonsuit was properly denied.

[2] 2. It is contended his honor erred in not charging the jury that there must be evidence "dehors the deed" before it can be set aside. His honor charged the jury that the plaintiff must sustain her allegations, not only by the greater weight of evidence, but by evidence clear, strong, cogent, and convincing. The theory upon which this case was tried was that the defendant Hall fraudulently and falsely substituted an absolute deed for a mortgage and took advantage of plaintiff's ignorance. The gravamen of the action is a pure fraud, and not mutual mistake. In view of this, it may be open to doubt as to whether his honor did not err on the side of the defendants as to the quantum of proof. In Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, the subject is elaborately discussed by Justice Avery, and it is held that, where it is sought to have a deed declared void because its execution was obtained by false and fraudulent representations of the grantee, the degree of proof, as stated by his honor in the case at bar, is not required. We think his honor's charge under the facts of this case is not justly open to exception by the defendants. Cobb v. Edwards, 117 N. C. 245, 23 S. E. 241; Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 48 S. E. 775, 68 L. R. A. 776; Ely v. Early, 94 N. C. 1; Wilson v. Land Co., 77 N. C. 447.

[3] Besides, there are facts in evidence dehors the deed, and inconsistent with the claim of absolute ownership upon the part of Hall, such as gross inadequacy of price; possession retained by plaintiff, and no demand for rent. Kelly v. Bryan, 41 N. C. 287.

[4] 3. It is contended that his honor erred in holding that the defendant Wilson had legal notice of the plaintiff's equity. His honor correctly directed the jury upon the record evidence to answer the third issue, "Yes." The summons was issued and a duly verified complaint filed on January 13, 1911. The deed from Hall to Wilson was not probated or registered, nor is there any proof of its delivery until January 16, 1911. The complaint has all the requisites of a lis pendens, and contains the names of the parties, the object of the action, and a description of the land to be affected. It was therefore unnecessary to file a separate and formal notice. Arrington v. Arrington, 114 N. C. 151, 19 S. E. 351; Collingwood v. Brown, 106 N. C. 362, 10 S. E. 868.

[5] 4. It is contended, further, that a summary proceeding in ejectment before a justice of the peace operates as an estoppel, and precludes the plaintiff from prosecuting this action. The record shows that the proceeding aforesaid was commenced on the 20th of February, 1911, and this action was commenced and the complaint filed on the 13th of January, 1911. In the summary, proceeding the defendant, Jane Culbreth, pleaded that the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction, for that the title to real estate is brought into controversy, and she set out in her answer the pendency of this suit in the superior court of Sampson county, averring all of the several facts which are alleged in her complaint in this action. There is no evidence that she ever attorned to Hall, and no claim by Wilson that she ever attorned to him. On the contrary, she stoutly denied any tenancy, but averred that she went into possession as a purchaser from Melvin, and has never surrendered that possession to any one. It is to be observed that the justice of the peace did not find it a fact that Jane was a tenant of either Hall or Wilson, but, without any such adjudication, simply ordered that she be removed from the premises.

It is contended by the counsel for the plaintiff that this summary proceeding was a part of the fraudulent scheme to "oust" the plaintiff from her property, and there is color for such allegation, but in our view the whole proceeding was void on its face, in view of the plea of title set up by the defendant in the said proceeding, and in the absence of any adjudication of tenancy by the justice of the peace. It appears from that record that the justice did not pass on that question, but simply directed the removal of Jane from her property. The superior court had prior to this assumed jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter, as well as over the persons interested, and its judgment is necessarily final. In speaking of estoppel arising from the possession of landlord and tenant, Mr. Justice Hoke says: "It is incident to the tenure and the enjoyment of the right, after the relationship has ended and the enjoyment has ceased in the one case, or the possession has been surrendered in the other, the question is then at large, and it is open to the tenant to show the truth of the matter." Tise v. Whitaker-Harvey Co., 144 N. C. 514, 57 S. E. 212. It is settled that the Landlord and Tenant Act does not apply to a mortgagor who is allowed to remain in possession, and on demand after default refuses to surrender possession; and the provisions of that act cannot be extended by any contrivance so as to give to the mortgagee the benefit of having summary proceedings. Greer v. Wilbar, 72 N. C. 593; McCombs v. Wallace, 66 N. C. 481.

[6] 5. There are some exceptions relating to the fifth issue in respect to the measure of damage which it is not necessary to consider. We think his honor applied the proper rule of damage in the event that the plaintiff had lost her equity of redemption by the fraudulent conduct of Hall, but that is not the case, for she has recovered her entire estate in the property as against both of these defendants, subject to the lien of $319 and interest. Therefore she is not entitled to recover the value of her equity of redemption as assessed under the fifth issue, but she is entitled to recover of these defendants the rents of the property from the date when she was "ousted" up to the time when it shall be restored to her, together with such other actual damages as she may have sustained by reason of her wrongful "ouster," which sum will be credited upon the $319.

At the next term of the superior court the presiding judge will submit an issue in order that such damages and rents may be ascertained.

The judgment of the superior court is modified and affirmed. The costs will be taxed against the defendants.

Affirmed.

(160 N. C. 205)

BERGER v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. NUISANCE (§§ 65, 72*) — INJUNCTION — PROOF.

The court will not enjoin the erection of a sawmill which is not a nuisance per se, but is of special benefit to the public, even though its erection be prohibited by a city ordinance, where plaintiff does not offer tangible, and not mere speculative, proof that it will be a nuisance in fact, and show special injury peculiar to himself, especially where it strongly appears that the object of the suit as well as of the ordinance whose passage plaintiff secured was to prevent the defendant becoming a local business rival of plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 158-160, 170, 171, 164-169; Dec. Dig. §§ 65, 72.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*) — ORDINANCES—NUISANCE—POWER OF COURT.

The power to declare by a city ordinance what shall constitute a nuisance is not so absolute as to deprive the court of its power to determine whether such an ordinance is reasonable in its application to any particular case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 155, 1378, 1379; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*) — ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

Any city ordinance may be declared void if in itself or because of the peculiar facts and circumstances which give rise to its adoption, or with reference to which it must be enforced, it will be unreasonable and oppressive in its operation.

4. NUISANCE (§ 59*)—DEFINITION.

A "nuisance" is confined to such matters of annoyance as the law recognizes, and for which it gives a remedy by way of redress or abatement, or in a proper case, by restraining process.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by N. B. Berger against R. H. Smith and another. From a nonsuit ordered, plaintiff appeals. No error.

M. T. Dickinson, of Goldsboro, and Winston & Biggs, of Raleigh, for appellant. Langston & Allen, of Goldsboro, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This case was before us at a former term, and is reported in 156 N. C. 323, 72 S. E. 376. We then held that the sawmill which it was alleged the defendant was about to erect in violation of the ordinance was not a nuisance per se, and we remanded the case in order that it might be submitted to a jury to ascertain if it was a nuisance in fact. At the trial, the court, upon plaintiff's evidence, ordered a nonsuit, and plaintiff appealed.

[1] It appeared by the evidence that the mill had not been built, but that defendant only intended to build it, and plaintiff testified that its operation, if it was built, "would be annoying to his family by reason of noise, smoke and flying trash, and would expose his property to fire." He also stated that it would depreciate the value of his property and other property in the same block. There was more evidence to the same effect. There are some things which, in their nature, are nuisances and which the law recognizes as such. There are others which may or may not be so; their character, in this respect, depending on circumstances. This case would seem to fall directly within the principle as applied in Dorsey v. Allen, 85 N. C. 358, 39 Am. Rep. 704. The facts of the two cases are almost identical, and, in substance, they are sufficiently alike to make that case a controlling authority. In the Dorsey Case plaintiff sought to enjoin the erection of a planing mill and cotton gin, which had already been begun, and he alleged, as does the plaintiff in this case, that the operation of the mill and gin, when finished, would render their dwellings not only uncomfortable, but unfit for habitation, by reason of the noise of the machinery, that they would be exposed to increased perils from fire, and that their property would be greatly impaired in value. The court, approving the order of the judge refusing an injunction to stop the progress of the work in its early stages, as being unnecessary for the protection of the plaintiff, said: "Before operations were commenced, there was no increased danger from fire, and no disturbing noise made requiring judicial interference, and the relief could be obtained after the results were definitely ascertained, if the plaintiffs should be found entitled to it. The nuisance, if incidental and not necessary to the proper conduct of the business, or inherent and inseparable from it, could then be abated, and the defendant's knowledge of the pending suit would take from him all just cause of complaint when it should be so adjudged. But it would be an unwise exercise of power upon such uncertainty as to the practical working of an undertaken enterprise and its consequent effects, for the court to interpose and prevent its being carried out, with its promises of substantial and lasting benefits to a community, because of the discomfort and inconvenience a single family or a small number of persons may experience from its presence in their vicinity, so inconsiderable when weighed in the scale with the public interests. While it is true that a business lawful in itself may become so obnoxious to neighboring dwellings as to render their enjoyment uncomfortable, whether by smoke, noxious and offensive odors, noises, or otherwise, as to justify the protecting arm of the law, yet there must be the ascertained and not probable effects apprehended. When the anticipated injury is contingent and possible only, or the public benefit preponderates over the private inconvenience, the court will refrain from interfering." The following authorities support the same view: "Where an injunction is asked to restrain the construction of works of such a nature that it is impossible for the court to know, until they are completed and in operation, whether they will or will not constitute a nuisance, the writ will be refused in the first instance. Nor in such a case will the motion for an interlocutory injunction be allowed to stand over until the work is so far executed that its character may be determined. It is proper, however, under such circumstances to dismiss the bill without prejudice to any further application which plaintiffs may think themselves entitled to make." 1 High on Injunctions (4th Ed.) § 743. "A court of equity will grant injunctions to prevent undoubted and irreparable mischief; and it may thus act on the application of individuals, not only in the case of a private nuisance, but where the individuals suffer special injury, in the case of public nuisances also. But the courts will only exercise this power in a case of necessity, where the evil sought to be remedied is not merely probable, but undoubted. And it will be particularly cautious thus to interfere where the apprehended mischief is to follow from such establishments and erections (as, for instance, a public mill) as have a tendency to promote the public convenience." Per Gaston, J., in Barnes v. Calhoun, 37 N. C. 199. This was said by the learned judge after confessing that the strong leaning of the court's opinion was with those who thought that the apprehensions of the plaintiff were not without foundation. Ellison v. Commissioners, 58 N. C. 57, 75 Am. Dec. 430, furnishes another illustration of the principle. The plaintiff there sought to enjoin the laying off of his land for a cemetery. The court strongly intimated that a cemetery was not a nuisance per se, and would not be either a public or private nuisance, in fact, if it was properly arranged and sufficiently drained and in other respects carefully supervised. If it threatened or proved to be actually deleterious to the health of the people of the vicinity, the case would be different. The word "nuisance" was held, in its legal sense, to be confined to such matters of annoyance as the law recognizes and for which it gives a remedy by way of redress or abatement, or in a proper case, by restraining process. "The unpleasant reflections," said Judge Manly, "suggested by having before one's eyes constantly recurring memorials of death is not one of these nuisances. Mankind would, by no means, agree upon a point of that sort, but many would insist that suggestions thus occasioned would, in the end, be of salutary influence. The deathhead is kept in the cell of the anchorite, perpetually before his eyes as a needful and salutary monitor. The nuisance which the law takes cognizance of is such matter as, admitting it to exist, all men, having ordinary senses and instincts, will decide to be injurious." "The subject of nuisances, private as well as public, has undergone much discussion in the courts during the past few years. Amongst other principles established is one which we think definitive of the rights of the parties now before the court. It is settled in respect to private nuisances, that where the nuisance apprehended is dubious or contingent, equity will not interfere, but will leave complainant to his remedy at law"—citing Drewry on Injunctions, 242; Barnes v. Calhoun, supra; Atty. Gen. v. Lea, 38 N. C. 301; Simpson v. Justice, 43 N. C. 115. In Atty. Gen. v. Lea, supra, the court held: "A court of equity will refuse to interfere by injunction in the case of the erection of a mill dam, unless it is shown that it will be a public nuisance, or, if it will be a private nuisance only to an individual, unless it manifestly appears that so great a difference will exist between the injury to the individual and the public convenience, as will bear no comparison, or that the erection of the dam will be followed by irreparable mischief." The court refused an injunction against the erection of a turpentine distillery in Simpson v. Justice, supra, because the nuisance was not certain, but only contingent, and required the fact of nuisance to be first established. It was said therein that the jurisdiction of the court to enjoin in the case of private nuisance is of recent origin, and is always exercised sparingly and with great caution, because, if, in fact, there be a nuisance, there may be an adequate remedy at law, depending somewhat, of course, upon the nature of the nuisance, citing Atty. Gen. v. Nichols, 1 Ves. 338, and an anonymous case before Lord Thurlow in 1 Vesey, Jr., 140. There is an obvious difference, said Judge Pearson, between a thing which is a nuisance in itself and one which may or may not be a nuisance, according to the manner in which it is used; a turpentine distillery and like structures being of the latter class. If they make noises or generate "smoke, blacks, and soot," or tend to diminish property values, those facts must appear by proof, and not be left to mere conjecture. No one should be prevented by a resort to this extraordinary process of the court on the part of his neighbor, with nothing more than a supposed grievance, from engaging in an enterprise which is not only lawful, but beneficial to the public, because of the unfounded fear or apprehension of the plaintiff that the value of his property may be impaired or that he may suffer some inconvenience from smoke and noise. His appeal for the intervention of the "strong and omnipotent arm of the court" is answered by Chief Justice Pearson in Hyatt v. Myers, 73 N. C. 232: "If a man, instead of contenting himself with the quiet and comfort of a country residence, chooses to live in a town, he must take the inconvenience of noise, dust, flies, rats, smoke, soot, and cinders, etc., and he cannot in law complain of the owner of an adjoining lot, by reason of smoke, soot, and cinders, caused in the use and enjoyment of his property; provided the use of it is for a reasonable purpose, and the manner of using it such as not to cause any unnecessary damage or annoyance, and he takes all prudent precautions to avoid annoying his neighbors, and even then neither a court of law nor a court of equity will treat it as a nuisance unless the damage is material, so as to exceed what the owner of property ought to be allowed to put upon the owner of property adjoining, in the reasonable enjoyment of his own property, under the maxim, 'Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas,' which depends upon the circumstances of the case. 'Does the nuisance arise from an establishment made for personal gratification or mere private profit? Or does it promote the convenience of the public?' What is the extent of the damages? If slight, the courts of law may treat it as a nuisance, and give a remedy in damages. If great and irreparable, so that compensation cannot be made, then a court of equity will interfere by injunction. These general principles are announced and discussed in Dargan v. Waddill, 31 N. C. 244, 49 Am. Dec. 421, a case showing when courts of law give relief, and in Eason v. Perkins, 17 N. C. 38, a case showing when courts of equity will interfere by the extraordinary writ of injunction." A good legal definition of an actionable nuisance will be found in Dargan v. Waddill, supra: "A stable in a town lot is not, like a slaughter pen or a hog sty, necessarily or prima facie a nuisance. But if it be so built, so kept, or so used as to destroy the comfort of persons owning and occupying premises and impairing their value as places of habitation, it does thereby become a nuisance. If the adjacent proprietors be annoyed by it in any manner which could be avoided, it becomes an actionable nuisance, though a stable in itself be a convenient and lawful erection." See, also, Wilder v. Strickland, 55 N. C. 386; Privett v. Whitaker, 73 N. C. 554, in which Justice Rodman classifies nuisances. Joyce in his treatise on Nuisances, § 102, states the same general rule: "The fact that a business which is lawful may become a nuisance after it has been commenced is not a sufficient ground for enjoining the same. It must clearly appear to the satisfaction of the court that it will become a nuisance. So it has been said in this connection: 'Before a court of equity will restrain a lawful work from which merely threatened evils are apprehended, the court must be satisfied that the evils anticipated are imminent and certain to occur. An injunction will not issue to prevent supposed or barely possible injuries.'" All the authorities tend to the conclusion that plaintiff must offer tangible proof of the fact of nuisance, when there is no nuisance per se, before the court will interfere to stop the erection of a building or the prosecution of a lawful business, especially if it will be beneficial to the public, and in the latter case not unless the private injury is greater in proportion than the public benefit. The court will not act upon speculative proof, or such as furnishes ground only for a conjecture.

The plaintiff has not brought his case within these principles, so as to induce the court to interfere in his behalf. We have said in this case at the former term that the mill in question is not a nuisance per se, and the authorities, as we have shown, sustain that view. We also held that he must prove that it would be, in fact, a nuisance. This he had not done. It is evident that plaintiff, when testifying, was merely giving his opinion or conjecture as to what might occur should the mill be erected. In other words, he is simply declaring that to be a nuisance per se which the law says is not such a nuisance. How can be know, at this time, whether the mill, if properly built and carefully operated, will injure him in such a way as to be a legal nuisance? His fears and apprehensions of injury may be purely imaginary and utterly groundless, for it is possible, or even probable, that the defendant can so construct and operate it as to avoid any substantial injury to the plaintiff. It appears, also, that plaintiff has built and operated a cotton gin since the dwellings were erected within 50 yards of them, which is nearer than the mill will be, and yet no complaint has been made against it. There is also strong proof that the ordinance was procured at the instance of the plaintiff for the purpose of destroying the competition of defendant, his business rival, with him, and we may add that it also tends strongly, if not conclusively, to show that the ordinance was adopted, not to protect the public or individuals against a threatened nuisance, but in furtherance of plaintiff's scheme to thwart the efforts of his business competitor and thus cripple him. Although this is not to be taken as conclusive against plaintiff's supposed equity, it is matter which might be considered and turn the scale in a doubtful case, and tends, certainly, to show that his apprehensions of injury are either not entertained at all, or are greatly exaggerated. Ellison v. Commissioners, supra. As we said in Durham v. Eno Cotton Mills, 141 N. C. 615, 54 S. E. 453, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 821: "When an injunction is sought to restrain that which it is apprehended will create a nuisance, the proof must show that the apprehension of material and irreparable injury is well grounded upon a state of facts from which it appears that the danger is real and imminent." There is no proof in this case which amounts to more than a mere guess that the mill stack will emit an unusual quantity of smoke or cinders or that the mill will be so constructed as to produce disagreeable noises, or that it will seriously impair the value of adjacent property. It did not occur to the plaintiff while operating his own gin, under like circumstances, that such a result would follow, and his fear only arose, as suggested, with his apprehension of a dangerous rivalry in business quickened him into activity, and he became suddenly alarmed about the consequences of something which he had been substantially doing himself for about ten years. If the fears, real or assumed, of the plaintiff, as to the effects of the proposed mill upon the comfort of his family and the value of his property, be realized, he will not be without redress. The courts of law will be open to him, and he will go into them with more grace, having by these proceedings put the defendant on his guard. Wilder v. Strickland, supra.

[2] We have not made any special reference to the ordinance, as we hold that there is no sufficient evidence in law of any nuisance in fact, and this is the question we ordered to be tried below. As in harmony with the view then taken of the case by this court, we may add these authorities. Judge Dillon says, with reference to the power of a municipal corporation to pass ordinances for the suppression or abatement of nuisances: "Such powers, conferred in general terms, cannot be taken to authorize the extrajudicial condemnation and destruction of that as a nuisance which, in its nature, situation or use, is not such." 1 Mill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) §§ 95, 374. And in River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 91, 46 Am. Rep. 6, we find the following safe and conservative rule stated: "We do not deny that the General Assembly may confer upon municipal authorities the power to abate nuisances, and to declare what shall be deemed nuisances, but the latter power cannot be so absolute as to be beyond the cognizance of the courts to determine whether it has been reasonably exercised in a given case or not"—citing Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. Ed. 984, in which the Supreme Court of the United States, through Mr. Justice Miller, said: "But the mere declaration by the city council of Milwaukee that a certain structure was an encroachment or obstruction did not make it so, nor could such declaration make it a nuisance, unless it in fact had that character." The ordinance in this case was manifestly directed against this particular building, and had the effect, if not intended, to prevent the defendant, by the erection of his mill, from injuring the business of his local rival; but, even if intended to promote the public welfare and safety, it has not been shown to be a nuisance, and this sustains the nonsuit and the order dissolving the injunction, whatever the ground of his honor's decision may have been. This was not an effort of the commissioners to establish fire limits, conceding that they have the power, under the town charter, or inherently, to do so, but to declare that to be a nuisance which is not one per se, nor, in fact, so far as the proof tends to show. We do not question the power of the municipal board to enact ordinances prohibiting the erection of dangerous buildings in proper cases.

[3] But any ordinance may be declared void if, in itself, or because of the peculiar facts and circumstances which gave rise to its adoption, or with reference to which it must be enforced, it will be unreasonable and oppressive in its operation. That is what, in substance, we formerly decided in this case. 156 N. C. 823, 72 S. E. 376. Plaintiff cannot maintain an action against defendant for committing a public nuisance, unless he shows special injury peculiar to himself, and this he has not done. High on Injunctions (4th Ed.) §§ 757, 761, 762, 764, 828. We have not overlooked the fact that defendant has built his gin and mill on an adjoining lot about the same distance from plaintiff's lot as the other mill, if erected, would have been, and there has been no word of protest against it, so far as appears.

This case is distinguishable from Raleigh v. Hunter, 16 N. C. 12, Vickers v. Durham, 132 N. C. 880, 44 S. E. 685, and Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 61 S. E. 267, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 15 Ann. Cas. 715, in which the public health was threatened by the building of a milldam, or a sewage disposal plant, or a hospital for the treatment of tuberculosis, where the evidence was of a satisfactory and tangible character, and created strong probability that the act proposed to be enjoined would, if committed, constitute a nuisance, and the injury was imminent. Our case belongs to a class quite different and represented by Simpson v. Justice, 43 N. C. 115, Hyatt v. Myers, 71 N. C. 271, s. c., 73 N. C. 232, Dorsey v. Allen, supra, Hickory v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 451, 55 S. E. 840, and others to be found in our reports, in which the injunction was prayed against buildings or enterprises of great public utility or benefit. The distinction between the two classes is clearly shown by Justice Hoke in Cherry v. Williams, supra.

The record discloses no error in the case. No error.

(160 N. C. 286)

WOMACK v. CARTER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 23, 1912.)

1. ACTION (§ 38*)—SINGLE CAUSE OF ACTION.

A complaint, in an action for the recovery of money, which alleges in one count that defendant's testator took possession of the land of plaintiff, leased the same and collected the rents for the use of plaintiff to the amount demanded, now held by defendant for his own use, and which alleges in another count that the land of plaintiff was leased by defendant's testator to tenants, and that he wrongfully converted to his own use the rents collected by him, and which alleges in another count that defendant's testator wrongfully took possession of the land by his tenants, and unlawfully withheld the same from plaintiff, a reasonable rental value for the land being the sum demanded, states but one cause of action in several ways, based on one and the same transaction, and seeking in the end the recovery of the sum demanded, and is good as against a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 549; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. TRESPASS (§ 40*)—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

A complaint, in an action for the recovery of money, which alleges that defendant's testator took possession of plaintiff's land, situated in a designated township and county, and leased the same and collected the rents, and failed to account for them, but converted them to his own use, etc., sufficiently describes the land as against a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-88; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

3. TRESPASS (§ 40*) — HILARY RULES OF PLEADING—APPLICABILITY.

The Hilary rules of pleading have never been in force in North Carolina.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-88; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 367*)—UNCERTAINTY—REMEDY—MOTION.

Where the complaint in an action for the recovery of money alleged to have been collected by defendant's testator, who took possession of plaintiff's land, leased it, and detained the rent or converted the same to his own use, is uncertain in the description of the land, the remedy of the defendant is by motion for a more definite and certain statement under Revision 1905, § 496.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1173-1193; Dec. Dig. § 367.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 193*) — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY AS AGAINST DEMURRER.

A complaint cannot be overthrown by a demurrer unless it is wholly insufficient, and it must be fatally defective before it will be rejected on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 428-443; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

6. MONEY RECEIVED (§ 17*) — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint in an action for the recovery of money, which alleges that defendant's testator wrongfully took possession of plaintiff's land by tenants, and unlawfully withheld the same from plaintiff, a reasonable rental for the land being a specified sum, states a cause of action for money had and received to the use of plaintiff as against a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Money Received, Cent. Dig. §§ 54-68; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

7. PLEADING (§ 367*)—UNCERTAIN PLEADINGS—MOTION TO MAKE SAME MORE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN—DISCRETION OF COURT.

A motion to make a pleading more definite and certain is addressed to the discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1173-1193; Dec. Dig. § 367.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by Winder C. Womack against A. G. Carter, administrator. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hoyle & Hoyle and J. W. Ruark, all of Sanford, for appellant. McIver & Williams, of Sanford, for appellee.

WALKER, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,140, and in his complaint he states his cause of action in three different ways: (1) That defendant's testator took possession of certain land situated in Sanford township, Moore county (now Lee county), the property of the plaintiff, leased the same to tenants, and collected the rents for the use of the plaintiff, to the amount of $1,140. That said amount has never been paid to plaintiff, but is now held by defendant for his use. (2) In the next count, if it may be so called, it is alleged, in substantially the same words, that the land of plaintiff was leased by defendant's testator to tenants, and the rents collected by him; the only difference between the two counts, if there be a difference, being that it is alleged in the second count that the said real estate belonged to plaintiff and the rents were payable to him, but instead of paying them to plaintiff, the defendant's testator collected the same, to the amount of $1,140, and wrongfully converted them to his own use. (3) The third count alleges, in substance, that defendant's testator wrongfully took possession of the land by his tenants, and unlawfully withheld the same from plaintiff; a reasonable rental for the land being $1,140.

[1] The defendant demurred upon the ground that, while the complaint alleges a wrongful possession of the land by defendant's testator and demands the rents and damages, it does not describe the premises with sufficient certainty, so that they may be identified by the defendant and he may intelligently answer the complaint. Plaintiff moved for judgment on what he calls the first and second causes of action. This motion was denied, and properly so, as the complaint states but one cause of action in three several ways. It is all one and the same transaction, and plaintiff seeks, in the end, to recover $1,140, which was received by the defendant as rent for his lands. Simpson v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 95, 45 S. E. 469. Whether it was received under a contract of lease between plaintiff and defendant's testator, or whether the testator entered upon the land wrongfully and received its rental value, can make no difference. Plaintiff would be entitled to recover the $1,140 in either view; in the last, because he could waive the tort and recover in contract for money had and received. For the same reason the court should not have sustained the demurrer, as it did. In the first place, the entire complaint showed clearly and beyond any possibility of doubt, and de-defendant could surely not have been misled thereby, that plaintiff was seeking to recover the rental value of the land, which had been collected from his tenants by defendant's testator.

[2, 3] But the demurrer is based upon the specific ground that the land is not sufficiently described, and is bad if there is a sufficient description, even if that kind of objection can be taken by demurrer. The land is described as belonging to plaintiff, and situated in Sanford township, Lee county, and the same which defendant's testator took into his possession and leased to tenants, and for which he collected the rents in the month of May, 1910. This would seem to be sufficiently definite in an action of this nature. In Whitaker v. Forbes, 68 N. C. 228, it was alleged that the defendant unlawfully and forcibly entered upon a tract of land in Enfield, Halifax county, the property of plaintiff, and did then and there pull down and destroy a frame house of great value, for which damages for the tort were prayed. Defendant demurred upon the ground "that the complaint does not sufficiently describe the lot and premises on which the trespass were done." With reference to the ruling by which the demurrer was sustained, this court, by Justice Boyden, said: "The sole question in the cause is as to description of the land and premises in an action of trespass. It is not necessary to decide how this would be in an action for the recovery of the land; but we think the authorities are abundant that the description is all that is required in an action for trespass quare clausum fregit. It is true that by the rules of pleading in England adopted at Hilary term, 4 Wm. IV, in trespass quare clausum fregit, the name of the close or abutments must be stated, or a special demurrer will be sustainable; but those rules have never been in force in our state, having been adopted since our separation from the mother country. We presume that it was an omission to notice the fact that these rules were not in force here, which misled the defendant in filing a demurrer in this case, as it is clear that previous to the adoption of this rule it was entirely unnecessary to describe the locus by name or abutments. See 1 Lan. 847, note 1, where it is expressly said 'that it is sufficient for the plaintiff to allege the trespass to have been done in a ville or parish only, without mentioning any place, for it is not material; and if the plaintiff does mention a place, the defendant may justify in another place without a traverse, and the plaintiff must ascertain a place in a new assignment.' In Buller's Nisi Prius, page 92, it is said that, 'if in trespass quare clausum fregit a man declare generally in such a ville, the defendant may plead liberum tenementum, and, if the plaintiff traverse it, it is at his peril; for the defendant, if he have any part of the land in the whole town, he shall justify it there, and therefore the better way for the plaintiff is to make a new assignment.' * * * If in an action quare clausum the plaintiff set out the abutments of his close, he must on the trial prove every part thereof. Buller's Nisi Prius, 98. This makes it hazardous to attempt such description. It has been the unvarying practice in our state for the last 50 years to declare as in the case before us, and in such action it has never been deemed necessary to describe the close by name or by the abutments."

[4] We do not think the defendant could well be misled to his prejudice by the description; but, if he was uncertain as to the nature of the particular charge against him, he should have moved the court for a more definite and certain statement of the cause of action, under Revisal, § 496. Allen v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 550, 27 S. E. 78. The court no doubt would have granted the application, if made in good faith.

[5, 6] Again: The demurrer was evidently directed against the last statement in the complaint, which we may, for the sake of argument, call a count, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer as to that detached portion, as upon the whole complaint it could be seen that a sufficient cause of action was alleged. A complaint cannot be overthrown by a demurrer, unless it is wholly insufficient. It must be fatally defective before it will be rejected as bad. Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 216, 56 S. E. 874, and cases cited; Bank v. Duffy, 156 N. C. 87, 72 S. E. 96; 4 Enc. of Pl. & Pr., 74. Plaintiff has stated a good cause of action for money had and received to his use (27 Cyc. 878), and also for its conversion (Paalzow v. Estate Co., 104 N. C. 439, 10 S. E. 527; Womble v. Leach, 88 N. C. 86). The demurrer should have been overruled. If defendant, when the case goes back, still entertains, in good faith, a doubt as to what land is meant, the court may require a more specific description for his enlightenment. We do not know but that the court should be liberal in requiring more definite statement in a pleading, where the application for a better one is made, not vexatiously, but for the sake of being better informed as to exact nature of the allegation, so that the party who seeks more light may the better answer the charge.

[7] This motion, of course, is addressed to the discretion of the court. Allen v. Railroad, 120 N. C. 548, 27 S. E. 76; Smith v. Summerfield, 108 N. C. 284, 12 S. E. 897; Conley v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 692, 14 S. E. 303. Without expressly commending or approving the form in which plaintiff has stated his cause of action in the complaint, good though it may be, we are of the opinion that the defendant's remedy, if he had any just ground to ask for a better pleading, was by motion, and not by demurrer. The case is remanded, in order that the parties may proceed as they may be advised. We reverse the judgment sustaining the demurrer, but without prejudice to the right of plaintiff to plead de novo, if so minded, or of defendant to move for a more definite statement of the cause of action, even if it lacks in certainty or fullness. We leave the matter of amendment to the discretion of the judge.

CAMPBELL v. RALEIGH & C. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 23, 1912.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 55*)—DAMAGES TO LAND—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE.

Where a railroad embankment, alleged to have caused damage to plaintiff's land, was constructed in 1901, and at the time of its erection produced the same physical conditions necessarily causing the same substantial injury and interference on plaintiff's land that ever since existed, a suit for damages, not instituted until September 17, 1908, was barred by Revisal 1905, § 394, subsec. 2, limiting suits for damages caused by the construction of a railroad, or repairs thereto, to five years after the cause of action accrued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 299-306; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Peebles, Judge.

Action by Pink Campbell against the Raleigh & Charleston Railroad Company to recover damages to plaintiff's land caused by the building of a railroad embankment. Plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit and appeal. Affirmed.

McNeill & McNeill and Britt & Britt, all of Lumberton, for appellant. McLean, Varner & McLean and McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor, all of Lumberton, for appellee.

HOKE, J. Our statute (Revisal, § 394, subsec. 2) provides as follows: "No suit, action or proceeding shall be brought or maintained against any railroad company by any person for damages caused by the construction of said road, or the repairs thereto, unless such suit, action or proceeding shall be commenced within five years after the cause of action accrues, and the jury shall assess the entire amount of damages which the party aggrieved is entitled to recover by reason of the trespass on his property." The summons in this action was first issued on September 17, 1908, and on a perusal of the entire testimony, that of plaintiff and others, it clearly appears that the embankment complained of was constructed by the Carolina Northern Railroad Company in 1901 and has been since maintained; that the rights and interests of said company have been duly conveyed to the present defendant, the Raleigh & Charleston Railroad Company. It further appears that the embankment, at the time of its erection, produced the same physical conditions, necessarily causing the same or substantial injury and interference on plaintiff's land, that have existed since.

Upon the admitted facts, therefore, and in any aspect of the matter, plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations above quoted. Pickett v. Railroad, 153 N. C. 150, 69 S. E. 8; Stack v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 366, 51 S. E. 1024; Ridley v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 84, 32 S. E. 325. This being true, and the statute having been properly pleaded, it would serve no good purpose to consider and pass upon the other questions presented in the record, and the judgment of nonsuit will be affirmed. Oldham v. Rieger, 145 N. C. 258, 58 S. E. 1091; Cherry v. Canal Co., 140 N. C. 422, 53 S. E. 188, 111 Am. St. Rep. 850, 6 Ann. Cas. 143.

WATSON et al. v. NORTH CAROLINA HOME INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 28, 1912.)

INSURANCE (§ 328*)—FIRE POLICY—FORFEITURE—CHANGE OF INTEREST.

The owner of certain insured property placed two mortgages thereon, and then for a recited consideration of $2,260 executed a deed in fee to the holder of the second mortgage, which deed, though absolute on its face, was claimed to have been given to secure the landowner's indebtedness. Held, that such instrument constituted a change in the interest or title of the insured, and, having been executed without the consent of the insurer, increased the risk and avoided the policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by J. A. Watson and another against the North Carolina Home Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Winston & Biggs, of Raleigh, for appellant. Lockhart & Dunlap, of Wadesboro, for appellees.

BROWN, J. Plaintiffs sue to recover upon a standard policy of insurance on the house of plaintiff Ivey, issued March 19, 1908; the same having been destroyed by fire September 28, 1910. The defendant pleads such a change in the interest and title of the insured in the property subsequent to the policy as avoids it.

It is admitted that Ivey executed a mortgage to a certain bank for $1,500 on this property on February 2, 1909, and another mortgage thereon June 12, 1909, to plaintiff Watson, and on February 23, 1910, for a recited consideration of $2,260, he executed a deed in fee to Watson. It is stated in the case that, while the mortgages are yet uncanceled, nothing is now due on them, and that the deed, although absolute on its face, was in effect given as security for the indebtedness then due by Ivey to Watson. The policy sued on is standard in form (Rev. § 4760), and contains the usual provision forfeiting the policy in case of a change in the interest or title of the insured in the property without the consent of the company.

We do not think this case is governed by Jordan v. Insurance Co., 151 N. C. 343, 66 S. E. 208. In that case we passed on the title of the insured at the date of the contract, and held that an equitable ownership, such as a vendee in possession, constituted sole ownership, and fulfilled the terms of the policy. In this case the title of the insured at date of the contract is not in question; but it is the subsequent change in such title and interests that, it is contended, avoids the policy according to its terms. It must be admitted that the execution of mortgages upon the property for $2,280, subsequent to the policy, greatly decreased the interest of the insured in it, and increased the hazard to the insurer. That such a change in the interest and title of the insured forfeits the policy has been repeatedly and consistently held by this court. This was first held in Sossaman v. Insurance Co., 78 N. C. 147, in which, after referring to the adverse view in other states, Judge Rodman says: "A different view has been commonly taken in this and in other states. But we were referred to no case in which it was held that giving a mortgage did not work forfeiture, where the terms of the condition were as comprehensive as they are in this case." That policy contained a provision similar to the one in the case at bar.

At the same term at which the Jordan Case was decided we said in Modlin v. Insurance Co., 151 N. C. 41, 65 S. E. 608, that "It is well settled by the decisions of this court—differing from the courts of some of the states—that the giving of a mortgage effects such a change of title and interest of the assured as avoids the policy, when not assented to by the assured in the manner prescribed by the policy." Many other cases hold that, in this as well as other states, the common law prevails, and a mortgage deed passes the legal title at once, defeasible by the subsequent performance of its conditions. Briggs v. Insurance Co., 88 N. C. 141; Gerlinger v. Insurance Co., 133 N. C. 407, 45 S. E. 773; Hayes v. Insurance Co., 132 N. C. 702, 44 S. E. 404; Mordecai's Law Lectures, 534. In referring to this principle of law in Weddington v. Insurance Co., 141 N. C. 234, 54 S. E. 271, 8 Ann. Cas. 497, Mr. Justice Walker says: "The validity of a provision in a policy of insurance against the creating of incumbrances without the consent of the insurer can hardly be contested at this late day. It has now become the settled doctrine of the courts that the facts in regard to title, ownership, incumbrances, and possession of the insured property are all important to be known by the insurer, as the character of the hazard is often affected by these circumstances." It is useless to multiply authorities upon this subject.

The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and, upon the case agreed, judgment will be entered for the defendant.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF CHILLICOTHE v. H. L. & L. F. McSWAIN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 17, 1912.)

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 364*)—RIGHTS OF THIRD PARTIES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 255a, authorizing a third party to assert title to attached property, the owner of property attached and sold as the property of defendant is not precluded from recovering against plaintiff by having notified or failed to notify the sheriff and plaintiff that he owned the property, or by having accepted the proceeds of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 1327; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 70*)—TITLE TO GOODS—CONDITIONAL SALES—BILLS OF LADING.

Possession by a bank of a draft with bill of lading attached as transferee thereof, the bill of lading containing the recital, "Order Notify F. M. & J. B. Pinson," a buyer from the consignor's vendee of the corn shipped, is only prima facie evidence of the consigning seller's intention to retain title until payment of the draft.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 240-242; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 58*)—BILLS OF LADING—ASSIGNMENT—EFFECT.

Assignment of a bill of lading by the owner thereof carries the title to the goods covered by it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 179-190; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 58*)—BILLS OF LADING—ASSIGNMENT.

A bill of lading is a negotiable or quasi negotiable instrument, and on transfer thereof, with draft attached, covering a shipment intended for a buyer from the consignor's vendee, nothing said or done by the vendee nor by the buyer or anybody else could affect the transferee's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 179-190; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

5. ATTACHMENT (§ 374*)—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—VALUE OF GOODS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for wrongfully attaching plaintiff's corn as that of another, evidence held insufficient to raise an issue as to value.

6. ATTACHMENT (§ 376*)—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—ATTORNEY'S FEES—RIGHT TO RECOVER.

One suing for wrongful attachment of his property as that of another is not entitled to an attorney's fee paid to obtain release of the attachment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 1386; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

Watts, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by First National Bank of Chillicothe against H. L. & L. F. McSwain. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

The following are defendants' exceptions and grounds of appeal:

"(1) That the presiding judge erred in refusing defendants' motion for nonsuit on the ground that it appeared that plaintiff had intervened in another action wherein H. L. & L. F. McSwain are plaintiffs and Adams Grain & Provision Company is defendant by filing notice of a claim to the proceeds of the sale of the corn, which claim was denied, thus making in said action the issue of such proceeds, and, having accepted such proceeds in such other action, plaintiff is estopped to say it did not consent to such conversion, and that such intervention into said other action is an election of remedies barring the present action raising the same issue, and, having so intervened, plaintiff here is bound by all proceedings in the other action, such as the sale of the corn and its price at said sale, and that the present action is barred by appearance in the other pending action, and the order of nonsuit on this ground should have been allowed and made.

"(2) The bill of lading, being attached to draft on consignee, Adams Grain & Provision Company, was only prima facie evidence of an intention by Standard Cereal Company to reserve title, and the only evidence as to the contract and real intention of Standard Cereal Company and Adams Grain & Provision Company being the testimony of Mr. Selden, who testifies that, upon receipt of notice that the corn had been accepted by his customer at Cross Hill, his company was to take up the draft and forward bill of lading to Cross Hill, and it appearing that notice of such acceptance of corn at Cross Hill was telegraphed to Adams Grain & Provision Company on February 28th, and it not appearing that said Adams Grain & Provision Company had any notice of any attachment till March 7, 1911, and said Adams Grain & Provision Company having exercised full control and dominion over said car of corn, such as allowing full inspection, the court should leave it to the jury to say what was the contract between Standard Cereal Company and Adams Grain & Provision Company, and to say whether or not it was complete on acceptance of corn by customer, and whether or not title to said corn then vested in the Adams Grain & Provision Company, and the court erred in solving all such questions of fact against defendants.

"(3) Reservation of title by shipper being a question of intention of seller and purchaser, the plaintiff bank claiming only to have bought the draft and to hold bill of lading only as collateral security, Adams Grain & Provision Company being consignee in this bill of lading, the court erred in not holding that the bank dealt in the bill of lading as collateral subject to agreement, contract, and intention of consignor and consignee, and the court erred in not leaving these issues of fact under the testimony to the jury.

"(4) That the presiding judge erred in directing a verdict, thus violating the constitutional provision against charging on the facts, when the amount of damage and the value of the corn was in dispute, since a fair sale in a town of 12 or 15 stores, after due advertisement, is as good if not higher evidence of value, as a mere recollection of an opinion as to the prevailing contract price at the time, and it was error to take this issue of fact from the jury, when under such conflict of parol testimony more than one inference as to the value of the corn might reasonably be drawn.

"(5) That the presiding judge erred in taking from the jury the issue of estoppel, when it appeared from the testimony that plaintiff knew on March 6, 1911, that the car of corn had been attached, and on said March 6, 1911, telegraphed their attorneys, Ferguson, Featherstone & Knight, to protect the interests of plaintiff, and that said attorneys knew said corn had been ordered sold as perishable property, and lived in same town with the sheriff, who after 24 hours' advertisement sold same on March 8, 1911, and nevertheless plaintiff's said attorneys failed to give said sheriff or the defendants herein, or their attorneys, any notice whatever, and allowed said corn to be sold as the property of Adams Grain & Provision Company, and, having stood silent and having thus consented to a conversion of the corn into cash, plaintiff should be estopped to say that said corn was worth more than the price brought at such public sale, and this issue should have been submitted to the jury.

"(6) It is respectfully submitted that the presiding judge erred in not leaving to the jury the issue under proper instructions as to whether or not the plaintiff bank by appearing and intervening in the former suit in attachment, and by accepting and receipting for the proceeds of the sale of the corn attached and sold as perishable property, elected as its proper remedy, its relief in such former action, and whether or not plaintiff bank is now estopped to prosecute this action for trespass on the case. In other words, to claim and receipt for the money representing the corn is inconsistent with a subsequent claim, as set up in this action, that the corn of plaintiff bank was attached and sold unlawfully. Plaintiff bank is not entitled to both the proceeds of its corn, and also to an action for damages for converting its corn.

"(7) It is further respectfully contended that the presiding judge erred in not holding that the sale of perishable property in judicial proceeding is for the benefit of all persons interested in the property, and that the price for which such perishable property is sold is the true measure of its value. And it was error for the presiding judge to refuse nonsuit which was made upon the ground that since the plaintiff bank knew that the car of corn in question had been attached, and knew that the corn had been ordered to be sold by the court, and instructed its attorneys to protect its interests and since said attorneys knew that the said car of corn was to be sold, and since it was sold without any objection or protest by the plaintiff bank, or their attorneys, and since the plaintiff bank, by their attorneys, did appear in said action, and did claim the proceeds of the corn, to wit, the money into which the corn had been converted by order of court, and the court and the plaintiff bank having receipted for this money, and the claim of plaintiff bank to the money having been traversed by the defendants in this case, the plaintiff bank was estopped to seek another remedy for its alleged wrong, and should have been held to have elected its remedy by intervening in the suit in which attachment was issued, and having so intervened, and, an issue of title having been made up, plaintiff bank was bound by the record of the case as it found it, and was bound by all prior proceedings, and a motion for nonsuit upon this ground should have been sustained, and an order of nonsuit passed."

F. P. McGowan, of Laurens, and J. J. McSwain, of Greenville, for appellants. Ferguson, Featherstone & Knight, of Laurens, for respondent.

WATTS, J. In February, 1911, F. M. & J. B. Pinson, merchants doing business at Cross

Hill, S. C., ordered from Adams Grain & Provision Company, a corporation, located at Richmond, Va., a car load of corn. The Virginia corporation bought the corn from Standard Cereal Company, grain dealers at Chillicothe, Ohio, which company shipped the same to Adams Grain & Provision Company, at Cross Hill, S. C., "Order Notify F. M. & J. B. Pinson." The Standard Cereal Company drew a draft on Adams Grain & Provision Company for $389.20, the amount due for the purchase money of the corn, which draft, with the bill of lading attached, was sold to First National Bank of Chillicothe, the plaintiff. When the car of corn arrived at Cross Hill, and before the draft was paid, the defendants brought suit against the Adams Grain & Provision Company and had the corn attached as the property of said company. The said company entered a special appearance in said suit, and sought to have the attachment dissolved, upon the ground that the corn was not its property, but that of the plaintiff herein, and also to set aside the service of process in said action. See case of H. L. & L. F. McSwain against Adams Grain & Provision Company, now before this court. Under an order passed in said cause, to which the plaintiff herein was not a party, the car of corn was sold, as perishable property, and brought 58 cents per bushel, the original sale to the Pinsons having been at 75 cents per bushel. The sale by the sheriff, under the order of the court, was made on March 8, 1911. On March 18, 1911, the plaintiff bank, which was the owner of the draft, with bill of lading attached, notified the sheriff and the attorneys for the McSwains that it was the owner of the corn, and that it demanded the possession thereof. The McSwains, the plaintiffs in the attachment proceedings, failed to give the bond required by the statute, and on April 8, 1911, the sheriff paid to the attorneys for the bank, $238.49, which amount represented the proceeds of the sale of the corn. The receipt given to the sheriff sets out: "This receipt is simply on account, and is not accepted in full of the amount due it." After the service of the notice of claim of ownership by the bank upon the attorneys for the McSwains, the attorneys for the McSwains served upon the bank's attorneys what they designated as a "notice of contest," in which notice was given that they contested the claim of the bank as to the ownership of the corn, that they would give the bond required by law, and that the bank would be required to file security for costs, etc. But, as before stated, the bond was not given. Thereafter the plaintiff bank brought this action, setting forth, in substance, the foregoing facts, alleging that the defendants illegally and unlawfully took possession of and sold its property; that the defendants acted wantonly and willfully in so doing; that it was forced to employ counsel to vacate the attachment, and to secure the proceeds of sale from the sheriff and demanding judgment against the defendants for the sum of $500. The cause was heard before Judge Gage and a jury, at the November term of the court of common pleas for Laurens county. At the commencement of the trial, the plaintiff notified the court that it would withdraw the allegations of the complaint, upon which it sought to recover punitive damages, and would only ask for actual damages. The trial resulted in verdict against the defendants (directed by the court) for $142.25, the difference between 58 cents per bushel, which the corn brought at sheriff's sale, and 75 cents per bushel, the actual value. From judgment for said amount, duly entered, both plaintiff and defendants appeal to this court.

The plaintiff appeals upon one ground, viz., that the circuit judge erred in not including in the judgment the sum of $20, paid by the plaintiff to attorneys for professional services, in vacating the attachment on the proceeds of sale and in securing said amount from the sheriff. The defendants appeal upon various grounds set out in the record, which will be hereafter considered.

We will first consider plaintiff's exception. The defendants, through the sheriff, as their agent, seized and took possession of plaintiff's property. Because of such seizure, which the court holds herein to have been illegal and unlawful, the plaintiff was forced to employ counsel to procure a dissolution of the attachment and get possession of its property in the hands of the sheriff. For the services thus rendered, the attorneys charged and the plaintiff paid the sum of $20. It must be borne in mind that these services were not rendered in defending the suit upon its merits, but solely in freeing plaintiff's property from the lien of the attachment illegally put there by the defendants. Under these circumstances, we hold that the amount paid to the attorneys was a proper element of damage sustained by the plaintiff and recoverable in this action. In an exhaustive note to Tisdale v. Major, 68 Am. St. Rep. 273, Mr. Freeman goes into the question very thoroughly, and shows that the great weight of authority is in accord with the above holding. In Livingston v. Exum, 19 S. C. 229, it was held that attorneys' fees paid in procuring a dissolution of an injunction could be recovered from the plaintiff. In Hill v. Thomas, 19 S. C. 230, the same doctrine was laid down. See, also, Moorer v. Andrews, 39 S. C. 427, 17 S. E. 948, where the principle laid down in these cases was approved and followed. True, in these cases, the fees were allowed as damages for procuring the dissolution of injunctions; but in principle, there is no difference. In the one case a plaintiff illegally ties up defendant's property by injunction; in the other, by attachment. It must be borne in mind, however, that we hold that such fees are only allowable, not for procuring a dissolution of injunction or attachment by a fight on the merits, but by motion, or otherwise, before a trial on the merits is had. The plaintiff's exception is sustained.

We will now consider the exceptions of the defendants.

[1] The first exception complains that the court below erred in refusing the motion for nonsuit, upon the ground that plaintiff's notice to the sheriff, claiming the property attached in effect made the plaintiff a party to the attachment suit; that plaintiff thereby consented to the sale of the corn, is now estopped to say that it did not consent, and that, when the plaintiff accepted the sheriff for the proceeds of sale on account, such payment precludes and estops plaintiff from bringing this action. In other words, defendant's position in effect is that if A. levies upon and sells the property of B. in a suit against C., and B. notifies the sheriff and A. that he claims the property, and A. concedes that he has had sold the property of the wrong person, and B. accepts the proceeds of sale in part payment, that he is precluded from holding A. accountable for the damages which he has sustained by reason of the illegal levy and sale. We cannot hold any such doctrine. The contrary is the law. See Dudley & Caston v. Green, 46 S. C. 202, 24 S. E. 188. Again, the statute (section 255a of the Code 1902) relied upon by the defendants, when correctly construed, is against the view contended for by defendants. It expressly provides that, when the property of some person other than the defendant is attached, such person can come in, and give notice and assert his title. If the plaintiff contests the rights of such third person, and, within the time therein prescribed, executes to such third person a bond to indemnify him against loss, in case the plaintiff loses, an issue shall then be made up to try the title to the property. If the plaintiff fails to give the bond, he concedes the right of such third person to the property. Ford v. Calhoun, 53 S. C. 110, 30 S. E. 830. There was never any intervention on the part of the plaintiff in the attachment suit, and the plaintiff was not bound by any of the orders passed therein.

In this connection defendant's fifth, sixth, and seventh exceptions will be considered.

The fifth complains that the circuit judge erred in not submitting the issue of estoppel to the jury, when it appeared that plaintiff knew on March 6th that the corn had been attached, and on said day telegraphed its attorneys to protect its interest; that said attorneys knew that the corn had been ordered sold, as perishable property; that the attorneys lived in same town with sheriff, who after 24 hours advertisement sold same on March 8th; that the attorneys failed to give sheriff or defendants notice of plaintiff's claim, and that, having stood by and thus consented to a conversion of the corn into cash, plaintiff should be estopped to say that the corn was worth more than it brought at the sale, and from recovering more than the proceeds of sale. The record shows that the order of sale was passed on March 4th; that plaintiff's attorneys consented to the sale as attorneys for Adams Grain & Provision Company; that the attorneys did not at that time represent the plaintiff; that they were first wired to by the plaintiff to look after its interest on March 6th. The sale was made on March 8th. We cannot very well see how, under these circumstances, there was any issue of estoppel to submit to the jury. Admitting all these facts, what was there in the conduct of plaintiff, or its attorneys, to create an estoppel? We confess that we can see nothing. If the plaintiff has the sheriff, as his agent, to seize the property of a third person, not a party to the suit, the plaintiff assumes the risk, and must abide by the consequences. We know of no rule of law which makes it obligatory upon such third person to hunt the sheriff up and give him notice that he claims the property upon penalty (if he does not do so) of losing his property, or being forced to accept what the property brings, in lieu of all damages. If the property should bring its full value, and there should be no basis for punitive damages, such third person, if he obtained the proceeds of sale, probably could not complain for the reason that he would have sustained no injury. In the case at bar the plaintiff might very well have thought that the property would bring its value, and that obtaining the proceeds of sale would make him whole. But, if it brought less than its true value, he has his action for the difference, notwithstanding the fact that he accepted the proceeds of sale in part payment. This exception is overruled.

What has been said with reference to the fifth and first exceptions applies to and disposes of the sixth and seventh exceptions, which are also overruled.

[2] We must also overrule the second and third exceptions. These exceptions, to state them in substance, raise the question that there was some issue of fact as to the ownership of the car of corn, at the time it was attached, which issue of fact ought to have been submitted to the jury. It may be true, and doubtless is, that the possession of the draft and bill of lading by the plaintiff was only prima facie evidence of an intention on the part of Standard Cereal Company to retain the title to the corn until the draft was paid. But there is nothing in the testimony to rebut such prima facie evidence. The draft and bill of lading were put in evidence. They show on their face that the corn was shipped to Adams Grain & Provision Company, "order notify F. M. & J. B. Pinson." The agent of the provision company, whose testimony is uncontradicted, shows that the corn was owned by the holder of the draft and bill of lading; that his company had no interest in it except $10 commissions, in case the sale had been completed and the car delivered and paid for. The cashier of the plaintiff testified positively that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the draft and bill of lading and that they came to it, for value, in the due course of business, from Standard Cereal Company, the shipper.

[3] The cereal company was the owner of the bill of lading and when it assigned it to the plaintiff it carried the title. Bank v. R. R. Co., 25 S. C. 222; American Nat. Bank v. Henderson, 123 Ala. 612, 26 South. 498, 82 Am. St. Rep. 147; Greenwood Grocery Co. v. Canadian County Mill & Elevator Co., 72 S. C. 454, 52 S. E. 191, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, 110 Am. St. Rep. 627, 5 Ann. Cas. 261; McMeekin v. Southern Ry., 82 S. C. 471, 64 S. E. 413; 38 Am. Dec. 409, note. The defendants' attorneys seem to have the idea that there was some evidence to go to the jury as to the ownership of the corn, because of inferences which they think might be drawn from certain communications had by the Adams Grain & Provision Company with its alleged agent at Cross Hill and the Pinsons, to whom the corn had been bargained, after the corn arrived there. We do not see that any inferences of benefit to the defendants can be drawn from such testimony. But such inferences, if they could be drawn from the testimony, could not avail the defendants.

[4] A bill of lading is a negotiable or quasi negotiable instrument, and when the shipper, who was the owner, transferred it, for value, to the plaintiff, nothing that might have been said or done by Adams Grain & Provision Company, the Pinsons, or anybody else could affect the title of the plaintiff thereto. A quotation from Bank v. Railroad Co., supra, is in point. On page 225 of 25 S. C., Judge McIver said: "As to the third subdivision of the first exception, we think it is too plain for argument that, if there was any understanding or agreement between McCauley & Co. (the shippers) and the Lawrence Manufacturing Company that the cotton should be delivered to that company without the production of the bills of lading, it would be a palpable fraud upon the bank, unless the bank knew of such arrangement at the time it discounted the drafts, and acquiesced therein. * * * The remarks just made show that the first subdivision of exception second cannot be sustained; for, even if the jury did believe that there was such a contract as that mentioned, the right of the plaintiff to recover would not thereby be defeated, inasmuch as to produce such result the jury must also believe that such contract was known to and acquiesced in by the bank."

[5] This brings us to the only remaining exception, to wit, the fourth. This exception alleges error in directing the verdict, for the reason, as alleged, that there was some testimony from which the jury might have inferred that the corn brought all it was worth at the sale. The undisputed testimony shows that the corn was worth 75 cents per bushel at the time of the sale. Mr. Owings, the sheriff, so testified. Defendant's witness, Mr. Ropp, testified to the same thing. The defendants themselves went on the stand, and were silent as to its value. But in addition to all this, and what is absolutely conclusive, it appears that the Pinsons, who had originally bought the corn, stood ready to take it at 75 cents, and would have done so, had not the defendants had it attached and sold. We do not see in the testimony any issue as to the value of the corn which should have been sent to the jury. The exceptions, in full, should be included in the report of this case.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified by adding to the judgment of plaintiff the sum of $20 paid by it as attorney's fees, and that the clerk of the circuit court do so correct the said judgment. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

HYDRICK, J. [6] We concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice WATTS, except in the conclusion that plaintiff is entitled to recover the fee paid its attorneys for obtaining the release of its property from the attachment under which it was levied upon as the property of Adams Grain & Provision Company. In ordinary actions at common law for damages for breach of contract or for tort, in the absence of malice, or circumstances which warrant the infliction of vindictive damages, the decisions of this court have been against the recovery of attorney's fees as damages. Brown v. Spann, 3 Hill, 324; Ferguson v. De Hay, 2 McMul. 228; Jeter v. Glenn, 9 Rich, 380; Welch v. Railroad Co., 12 Rich. 292; Loeb v. Mann, 39 S. C. 470, 18 S. E. 1. In the case last cited, which was an action of claim and delivery and for damages for the unlawful seizure of the plaintiffs' property as the property of one Perry, by the defendant, as sheriff, under a chattel mortgage given by Perry to one Bleman, this court held that plaintiffs could not recover the fee paid their attorneys, and quoted with approval from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Oelrichs v. Spain, 15 Wall. 211, 21 L. Ed. 43, as follows: "In actions of trespass, where there is no circumstance of aggravation, only compensatory damage can be recovered, and they do not include the fees of counsel. The plaintiff is no more entitled to them, if he succeed, than is the defendant if the plaintiff be defeated. Why should a distinction be made between them? In certain actions ex delicto vindictive damages may be given by the jury. In regard to that class of cases, this court has said: 'It is true that damages assessed by way of example may indirectly compensate the plaintiff for money expended in counsel fees, but the amount of these fees is not to be taken as a measure of punishment, or a necessary element in its infliction.'" Following that quotation, this court said at page 471 of 39 S. C., at page 3 of 18 S. E.: "We regard it as well settled in this state, both by decisions here and in the Supreme Court of the United States, that counsel fees are not allowable as part of the plaintiff's damages, for the reason that they cannot be said to be the necessary result of the act done by the defendant." With practical unanimity the courts of other states have reached the same conclusion. In Bogard v. Tyler, 78 S. W. 138, 25 Ky. Law Rep., 1416, the syllabus reads: "Where plaintiff claimed certain property attached as the property of another, and was successful in maintaining his claim against the attaching creditors, he was not thereafter entitled to recover attorney's fees expended in defending his right to the property in an action against the attaching creditors." To the same effect are Worthington v. Morris, 98 Ky. 54, 32 S. W. 269; McGill v. Fuller, 45 Wash. 615, 88 Pac. 1038; Strauss v. Dundon (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 503. In Livingston v. Exum, 19 S. C. 223, Hill v. Thomas, 19 S. C. 230, and Moorer v. Andrews, 39 S. C. 427, 17 S. E. 948, it was held that a party enjoined might recover a reasonable attorney's fee paid for procuring a dissolution of the injunction; but in each of those cases an injunction bond had been given, as required by statute, wherein plaintiff agreed to pay to the defendant enjoined such damages as he should sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court should finally decide that plaintiff was not entitled to it, and the fee was allowed under that provision in the bond. But this is not an action on such a bond; but it is an action at common law to recover damages for the unlawful seizure of the plaintiff's property as the property of another. We do not see upon what principle it can be distinguished from any other action at common law to recover damages for the unlawful seizure of the property of another, either under legal process, such as execution, or in actions in claim and delivery, or under distress for rent, or a past-due chattel mortgage, or for any other cause.

A majority of the court concurring in this view, the judgment below is affirmed.

TURNER v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1912.)

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by B. L. Turner against J. E. Martin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Stanyarne Wilson, of Spartanburg, for appellant. L. A. Phifer, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action upon an account. There was an order of reference to the master, to take the testimony and report upon all issues involved, both law and fact. In his report he recommended that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for a certain sum, and the defendant filed exceptions to said report.

After hearing argument, his honor, the circuit judge, overruled the exceptions, and confirmed the master's report, whereupon the defendant appealed upon a single exception, assigning error on the part of the circuit judge in ruling that the damages alleged in the fourth paragraph of the defendant's answer were too remote.

It is only necessary to refer to the exceptions and the master's findings of fact to show that the exception assumes the existence of facts found against the defendant by the circuit judge.

The exception is therefore overruled, and the appeal dismissed.

SHEFFIELD et al. v. CHANCEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)COUNTIES (§ 192)—ASSESSMENT—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY—NECESSITY.

Inasmuch as the injunction granted in the present case may have the effect of preventing the county authorities from levying a tax necessary to discharge the legal indebtedness of the county, and as the judgment granting the injunction was based upon an erroneous construction of the law appertaining to the controlling question involved in the case, the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for another hearing, in order that the judge below may modify the injunction, so that it will not prevent the enforcement of item 1 of the tax levy to an extent necessary to discharge the accumulated debts of the county legally incurred within the limitation prescribed in section 507 of the Civil Code of 1910.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. O. Worrill, Judge.

Suit by John C. Chancey and others against O. H. Sheffield and others to restrain the collection of certain items of the tax levy of 1911. From a decree granting the writ, defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded, with direction.

John C. Chancey, C. S. Middleton, and R. H. Sheffield, citizens and taxpayers of Early county, brought their petition against the board of commissioners of roads and revenues for said county, consisting of Sheffield and others, and against J. J. Smith, treasurer, and J. C. Loyless, tax collector, and prayed for an injunction against the collection of certain items of the tax levy for the year 1911, alleged to be illegal and exorbitant. The tax levy attacked is as follows:

"1. To pay indebtedness due, or to become due, during the year, or past due, 2 mills. 2. To build or repair courthouse or jail, bridges or ferries, or other public improvement, according to contract, 2 mills. 3. To pay sheriffs, jailers, or other officers fees they may be legally entitled to, out of county, $\frac{2}{10}$ mills. 4. To pay coroners all fees that may be due them by the courts, $\frac{1}{10}$ mills. 5. To pay the expenses of the county for bailiffs at court, nonresident witnesses in criminal cases, fuel, servants' hire, stationery and the like, $\frac{1}{10}$ mills. 6. To pay jurors a per diem compensation, $\frac{15}{100}$ mills. 7. To pay expenses incurred in supporting the poor of the county, as otherwise prescribed by the Code, 1 mill. 8. To pay any lawful charge against the county, $\frac{25}{100}$ mills. 9. To open up, improve, and maintain the public roads, 4 mills.

"In addition to the above assessment, it is hereby ordered that the tax collector shall collect from the respective school districts herein named the amount opposite the name of each district, for the purpose of supplementing the state school funds in support of the public schools in each district, where such tax is levied: Rock Hill district, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mills; Sowhatchee district, 3 mills; Cedar Springs district, 3 mills; Springfield district, 5 mills; Centerville district, 3 mills; Kestler district, $2\frac{1}{2}$ mills."

It is alleged that the amount of taxes levied, exclusive of the tax for public roads, for the support of paupers, and for public bridges and buildings, is 4 mills, which is $1\frac{1}{2}$ mills in excess of 50 per cent. upon the state tax of 5 mills; that a tax of $\frac{5}{10}$ of 1 mill upon the taxable property of the county would raise a sum sufficient to discharge the liabilities of the county for the current year for its poor, and an equal amount will be sufficient to build, repair, and maintain the public buildings and bridges; that it is the intention of the tax collector to collect the amounts raised under the levy and turn the same over to the county treasurer; and that it is the intention of the treasurer to mingle all the sums collected for the various purposes set forth in the levy into one common fund, and to pay county warrants out of the common fund, without keeping the fund separate and paying the sums collected for a specific purpose only upon the obligations contracted for the specific purpose.

The defendants answered that the county of Early was indebted, on January 1, 1911, "exclusive of about $3,000 to the First National Bank of Arlington," in the sum of $12,921.55, as follows:

To Dr. J. H. Crozier, borrowed money	$ 2,080 00
To Mrs. R. A. Chipstead, borrowed money	1,000 00
To bonds and interest due January 1, 1911.....	3,250 00
To Good Roads Machine Company (contract)	2,000 00
To Disinfectant Company (open account 1910)	1,046 00
To Bank of Arlington.....	3,081 00
	$15,632 95

It was further answered that the revenues for public buildings, bridges, etc., under the levy for the year 1911, would be $9,257.80; that the commissioners expended in that year, in the erection of bridges, $2,030, according to an itemized statement attached, for repairing the courthouse $325, in repairs on bridges $1,000, none of which building and repairing items exceeded $300, said building and repairing having been done with the material and labor furnished by the defendants; that there are certain other bridges over named streams and designated places which in the aggregate will cost $9,600, which must be erected as soon as funds are collected for that purpose and in the early part of 1912; that there were no funds on hand for the purpose of meeting the expenses incurred for maintaining the poor of the county on January 1, 1911; that the levy for 1910 for paupers was $534.18 less than the amount expended for said purpose, and that the commissioners borrowed $1,945.35 with which to maintain the poor of the county for the year 1911; that there is now outstanding against the county this obligation and $339 in unpaid warrants issued to the parties themselves, an itemized statement of which warrants is attached to the answer; that the rate of increase in the expenses of maintaining the paupers of said county for the last three years has been 40 per cent. per annum; that the amount raised in the present levy is not enough to meet the monthly payments to the paupers of the county as they become due between now and the next tax levy for this specific purpose. It is admitted that the tax collector intends to collect the taxes as levied, under the law, and turn the same over to the treasurer of the county; but it is denied that it is the intention of the treasurer to mingle the funds collected for specific purposes into one general fund, as charged in the petition.

The plaintiffs offered evidence showing that the grand jury of the county, during the spring term, 1911, made no recommendation with regard to the levying of any taxes for the year 1911, nor had any prior or subsequent grand jury convening in said county during the year 1911 made any recommendation in regard to the levying of taxes. The defendants introduced affidavits of J. J. Smith, treasurer of the county, showing that there was an indebtedness against the county, on January 1, 1911, for debts incurred by the county during the year 1910 and becoming due during the year 1911, aggregating $15,512; that at the beginning of the year 1911 there was nothing to the credit of the pauper fund of the county; that the county commissioners had to borrow money with which to meet the current expenses of the year; that the expense of maintaining the poor was a part of the current expenses; that this money was borrowed of Mrs. Chipstead and Dr. Crozier; that of this borrowed money there was used enough to pay off the warrants issued to the paupers, which amount represents all moneys paid to paupers for the year 1911, and the balance of $339 is now outstanding, unpaid by the treasurer; that the amount of said money borrowed for the current expenses from the above-named parties, spent or used in paying warrants to the county paupers, was $1,945.35, which sum has not been paid to the parties from whom it was borrowed, and is now outstanding against the county; "that the sums of money borrowed the present year by the county of Early through its board of commissioners of roads and revenues from Mrs. R. A. Chipstead and J. H. Crozier was not paid out for the special purpose of supporting paupers, and it was not deposited with deponent to be paid out for the specific purpose of supporting the paupers, but was held as a general fund and was paid out on the county's warrants as they were presented to deponent, first presented being first paid, without regard to the nature of the liability which the warrant was given to discharge, some being paid out generally for the expenses of the county as they arose, and all done by order of said county commissioners."

The court rendered the following judgment: "It appears affirmatively from the pleadings and the evidence in this case that the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Early county, in making the assessment of taxes for that county for the year 1911, not only made assessments of taxes for public buildings and bridges, and also for the support of the poor, authorized to be collected as extra taxes, and taxes for improving and maintaining the public roads, and also for educational purposes, but also, in addition thereto and over and above the assessment, made other assessments of taxes for the purposes enumerated under subsections 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 9 of section 513 of the Civil Code of 1910, which last-mentioned assessments amounted in the aggregate to 4 mills, and to 1½ mills in excess of 50 per cent. upon the state tax of 5 mills. It also affirmatively appears that such assessment was made by the board of commissioners without the recommendation of the grand jury. This being true, I conclude that under the provision of section

508 of the Civil Code, and the ruling of the Supreme Court in Waller v. Perkins, 52 Ga. 238, 239, and Sullivan v. Yow, 125 Ga. 327, 54 S. E. 173, the commissioners of roads and revenues of Early county, in the absence of a recommendation by the grand jury authorizing it, were without authority to assess said sum of 4 mills on the amount of the state tax, and that said excess of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mills over and above the sum of 50 per cent. on the amount of state tax is unauthorized and illegal. It is therefore ordered, considered, and adjudged that J. C. Loyless, the tax collector of Early county, be and he is hereby enjoined and restrained from collecting as county taxes for the present year, exclusive of said extra and special taxes so assessed, and which are not interfered with, any sum so assessed by said commissioners for said county taxes for Early for the present year in excess of $2\frac{1}{2}$ mills, or 50 per cent. upon the state tax."

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). The important and controlling question involved in this case is whether the levying of a tax to pay accumulated debts is one of those included in the provision for recommendation by the grand jury, or whether the ordinary or county commissioners can levy it, without regard to any recommendation of the grand jury. This question involves the determination of whether section 507 of the Civil Code of 1910 is to be construed in connection with and as affected by sections 508 and 510. Without going back of the Code of 1863 to determine the origin of the legislation involving these sections, their status and history from that time may be considered with a view to reaching a proper construction of them.

In the original Code the levy of taxes for certain specified purposes, such as the erection of courthouses, jails, etc., was authorized without recommendation of the grand jury. By section 481 of that Code it was declared: "Justices of the inferior court have power to raise a tax for county purposes, over and above the tax they are herebefore empowered to levy, and not to exceed fifty per cent. upon the amount of the state tax for the year it is levied, provided two-thirds of the grand jury at the first or spring term of their respective counties recommend such tax." By section 483 it was declared: "If from any cause such grand jury is not impaneled, or they adjourn without taking any action thereon, or they refuse to make such recommendation sufficient to discharge any judgment that may have been obtained against the county, or any debt for the payment whereof there is a mandamus, or the necessary current expenses of the year, such justices may levy the necessary tax without such recommendation." By section 485 provision was made for a creditor to compel a tax to be levied or for a taxpayer to resist it. Section 486 stated the purposes for which county taxes should be assessed: One of them was: "To pay the legal indebtedness of the county, due or to become due during the year, or past due." After this followed the section upon which the present controversy mainly rests. It reads as follows: "When debts have accumulated against the county so that one hundred per cent. on the state tax, or the amount specially allowed by local law, cannot pay the current expenses of the county and the debt in one year, they shall be paid off as rapidly as possible, at least twenty-five per cent. every year."

It will be seen at a glance that these sections are far from clear, and are difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile with each other in all respects. The authority to levy a tax of 50 per cent. upon recommendation of the grand jury, over and above the special tax already authorized, is followed by a provision, in case they fail or refuse to make the recommendation, which mentions the payment of any debts in judgment or for which there is a mandamus, as well as current expenses of the year. This apparently contemplates primarily a recommendation of the grand jury to levy a tax to pay such debts, and the action of the justices of the inferior court only in the event they failed to make recommendation. Here, also, only a particular class of debts is mentioned. On the face of it, the second section above quoted contains no express limitation as to amount. But this court held that the two should be construed together, and that the authority of the justices, or their successors, the ordinary or county commissioners, to levy without recommendation, was not more extensive than the power to levy with a recommendation. Waller v. Perkins, 52 Ga. 234. The next section, in stating the purposes for which county taxes may be levied, refers to the "legal indebtedness of the county," and does not confine it to a debt which may have been reduced to judgment or in regard to which a mandamus may have been obtained. Then follows the provision already quoted, which no longer adheres to the 50 per cent. limitation, but provides that, if debts have accumulated against the county, so that "one hundred per cent. of the state tax" cannot pay the current expenses and the debts in one year, they shall be paid off as rapidly as possible, at least 25 per cent. each year.

The inferior court having been abolished, in later Codes the ordinary or county commissioners took their place in regard to county taxation. These provisions were contained in the Code of 1868 and in those of 1873 and 1882 in the same order in which they occurred in the Code of 1863. In 1881 the Legislature passed an act providing for cases where the spring term of the court might adjourn before the grand jury had made their general presentments. In the Code of 1882 this act was incorporated as a part of the section already existing for cases where a grand jury was not impaneled or failed to act. Thus at the close of that section appears the proviso: "Such tax shall not exceed the levy last recommended by a grand jury for such county." In this form it was incorporated into the Code of 1895, and again in that of 1910, and each time was adopted by the Legislature. As, however, the limitation upon the power of a previous grand jury was the same as that upon the grand jury for that term, this did not materially affect such limitation, as already construed by this court.

In Arnett v. Griffin, 60 Ga. 349, a county tax of 199 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the state tax was levied and resisted. This court upheld the levy. In doing so it determined what item could be levied without recommendation of the grand jury, and that their aggregate was more than 99 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., thus leaving approximately 100 per cent. over and above such special items. Referring to the decision in 52 Ga. 233, supra, Jackson, Judge, said that it was there held that the ordinary could levy a tax for county buildings without recommendation of the grand jury; that besides this he could levy to pay judgments, etc., not exceeding 50 per cent.; and that as to accumulated debts, where 50 per cent. would not pay them, the grand jury may go to the extent of 100 per cent. to pay them, and in such cases creditors have the right to 25 per cent. of this sum, if there be not enough to pay the current expenses and the debt. It was accordingly held that, the grand jury having recommended 100 per cent., and the special items which could be levied without recommendation covering 99 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the whole levy was legal. This recognized the fact that a levy to pay indebtedness fell within the purview of the grand jury to recommend, subject to the right and duty to make the levy if they failed or refused to act. The same rule is recognized in the case of Sullivan v. Yow, 125 Ga. 326, 54 S. E. 173. In that case 50 per cent. was mentioned as the limit, but no accumulated debts were involved, so that the 100 per cent. limit could apply.

The codifiers of the Code of 1895 took the section with reference to accumulated debts from the position which it had occupied since the adoption of the Code of 1863, and placed it along with sections touching special and extra taxes, in advance of the section authorizing the ordinaries to raise a tax for county purposes, "over and above the tax they are hereinbefore empowered to levy, not exceeding fifty per cent. upon the amount of the state tax for the year it is levied," upon recommendation of the grand jury; and in that position it was adopted in the Code of 1895 and that of 1910. Perhaps the reason for the transposition arose from the radical change made by the Constitution of 1877 in regard to the incurring of indebtedness by counties and municipalities. Prior to that time debts had been incurred with great freedom, and sometimes unwisely and disastrously. The constitutional convention determined to put a check upon extravagance or the incurring of indebtedness by such political bodies. They therefore provided that no county or municipal corporation should incur any new debt except for a temporary loan to supply casual deficiencies of revenue, not to exceed one-fifth of 1 per cent. of the assessed value of the property therein, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof at an election for that purpose. It was also declared that at or before incurring any bonded indebtedness the county or municipality should provide for the assessment and collection of an annual tax, sufficient in amount to pay the principal and interest of said debt within 30 years from the date of the incurring of said indebtedness. Civil Code 1910, § 6564. As the Constitution thus required a permanent provision for the collection of a tax to pay bonded indebtedness, as to such indebtedness it superseded and rendered unnecessary any recommendation of a grand jury in regard to it. As to indebtedness other than bonded indebtedness, this was also prohibited, except upon an election, and excepting a loan to meet casual deficiencies. It being thus provided that debts could not be incurred merely at the will of the ordinary or commissioners, but required the sanction of a popular vote, it is probable that the codifiers, therefore, thought that a complete change had been made in the status of debts which could be legally incurred by the county, and that they thereafter occupied a fixed position. By section 440 et seq. of the Code of 1910 provision is made in regard to election for the purpose of incurring bonded indebtedness. In the notice to be given it must be specified what amount of bonds are to be issued, for what purpose, what interest they are to bear, and how much principal and interest is to be paid annually, and when the bonds are to be paid off. By the act of 1904 (Civil Code 1910, § 463 et seq.) a similar provision is made in regard to incurring indebtedness other than bonded indebtedness; and in this it is also declared that the notice shall specify the amount of the debt to be incurred, for what purpose, what amount of the debt is to be paid annually or at stated periods, and the terms of the contract under which the debt is to be incurred.

Thus by the Constitution counties are prohibited from incurring any indebtedness except in the manner therein pointed out, and they are required to make provision in advance in regard to the payment by taxation of bonded indebtedness. And by the acts of the Legislature similar provision as to specifying the times of payment of debts other than bonded indebtedness is required. This works so radical a change in the old system of creating debts that it would be useless to say that the county was bound to provide in advance how and when the debt should be paid and the people should ratify that declaration, and yet the payment should depend upon a recommendation of a grand jury. And, as said above in the case of Sullivan v. Yow, supra, there were no accumulated debts, and what was said in that case had no application to the section of the Code now under consideration. We are of the opinion, therefore, that under the present status of the law, if there is a legal indebtedness of a county incurred in a manner authorized by law, it is contemplated that it shall be paid in the manner previously fixed, and that the tax levy of the difference between the current expenses and 100 per cent. upon the state tax can be made without recommendation of the grand jury. This is reinforced by the requirement that at least 25 per cent. shall be paid in each year, and the fact that the creditor may bring mandamus to compel the levy of the tax and any taxpayer may contest the proceeding. With a legal indebtedness and the terms of payment fixed upon a county in a manner prescribed by the Constitution, with the right in the creditor to proceed by mandamus to compel the levy of a tax for the purpose of its payment, with a provision for the levy of the difference between the amount of the current expenses and the amount of the state tax, and a requirement for the payment of at least 25 per cent. per annum, the recommendation of the grand jury could neither prevent nor assist in the carrying out of the law in this regard, and it would be more ornamental than substantial. If the indebtedness is a contractual one, and is legal under the Constitution and law, it requires no recommendation of the grand jury to levy a tax for the difference between current expenses and 100 per cent. on the state tax to pay it. We are dealing here with the question of contractual debts, and not with liabilities arising from the breach of a contract, or the like. No question of such liability is raised in this case, or as to taxation to pay it, and it is unnecessary now to discuss their status. If a debt is legal and legally incurred, and is not paid at the time when it falls due, it remains a legal debt and ranks as an accumulated debt.

It is evident that the presiding judge placed a different construction upon section 507 of the Civil Code from that above indicated as the proper one. It is clear that the amount necessary to pay the bonded indebtedness falling due (alleged to be $3,250) is a proper item of the tax levy. As to other matters which are claimed to be debts of the county, and which are not covered by specific items of the tax levy, such as for the support of paupers, maintenance of public buildings, etc., it does not appear with sufficient clearness whether they are in fact legal debts of the county, so that this court may give direction in regard to them. We deem it best to reverse the judgment and remand the case to the court below, with direction that he rehear it and determine what part of the tax which it is proposed to levy and collect under item 1 of the tax levy may properly be enforced and what cannot.

Judgment reversed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN COLLEGE OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY et al. v. NOLAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 776*)—DISMISSAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

Where, upon an application for mandamus, a general demurrer to the answer of the respondents and a motion to strike the answer are overruled, and this ruling of the court below is brought to this court by writ of error, and the bill of exceptions contains no assignment of error upon a final ruling of the court, this court is without jurisdiction to entertain the writ of error; and in the present case the writ of error is dismissed, but leave is given to the plaintiffs in error to withdraw the copy of the bill of exceptions on file in the court below and file the same as a pendent lite bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3115-3119; Dec. Dig. § 776.*]

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Petition by the Southern College of Medicine and Surgery and others for a writ of mandamus against C. T. Nolan and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Dismissed.

Clay & Morris, of Marietta, and J. W. & J. D. Humphries and Jno. L. Hopkins & Sons, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. D. W. Blair, of Marietta, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for defendants in error.

BECK, J. The Southern College of Medicine and Surgery, a corporation under the laws of Georgia, F. E. Gibson, and others, filed their petition for mandamus against C. T. Nolan and others, composing the State Board of Medical Examiners for the Regular School of Medicine.

"The defendants filed an answer to said petition, and to this answer petitioners filed a demurrer, and likewise a motion to strike said answer and to make the mandamus absolute. Upon hearing said demurrer to said answer and the motion to strike said answer, the court, on the 8th day of June, 1912, overruled said demurrer, and also overruled and denied the motion to strike said answer. Said judgment overruling said demurrer was made on June 8, 1912. The judgment overruling the motion to strike said answer, and denying said motion, was made on June 8, 1912. Petitioners except to the judgment overruling said demurrer to the answer, and assign the same as error, and say that the court erred in not sustaining said demurrer and striking said answer, upon each and every ground named in said demurrer. Petitioners except to the judgment of the court overruling their motion to strike the answer of the defendants, and assign said judgment as error, and say that said motion to strike said answer should have been sustained by the court upon each and every ground named in said motion."

The quotation just set forth states all the motions that were made by the parties on the hearing of the application for mandamus, and all the exceptions made to the ruling of the court upon motion of the parties. While no formal motion was made to dismiss the bill of exceptions, suggestion is made in the brief of counsel for defendants in error that the writ of error is prematurely brought to this court, as the case is still pending in the court below, and that this court is without jurisdiction to entertain the writ of error. We are of the opinion that the contention of the defendants in error is clearly correct. Undoubtedly the case is still pending in the court below. No ruling was made by the court which finally disposes of the cause, and no exception is taken to any decision or judgment of the court, which, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiffs in error, would have been a final disposition of the cause as to them. The exceptions are, as is disclosed in the statement of facts, to the overruling of the general demurrer to the defendants' answer and the refusal to strike the same. Had the plaintiffs in error excepted to the refusal of the court to make the mandamus absolute, then, although the court had overruled the motion to strike the answer and the plea, it would have been competent for plaintiffs in error to bring the cause to this court by writ of error, and have the decision upon the motion to make the mandamus absolute reviewed here, under the rulings in the cases of Southern Ry. Co. v. Atlanta Stove Works, 128 Ga. 207, 57 S. E. 429, and Tarver v. Mayor of Dalton, 134 Ga. 462, 67 S. E. 929, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 20 Ann. Cas. 281. But in the present case, while the plaintiffs in error made a motion to have the mandamus made absolute, it is not recited in the bill of exceptions that the court made an express ruling upon that motion, though it may be inferred that the court denied it. Such a ruling, as we have stated above, would have been a final disposition of the case; but no exception is taken to that ruling.

We therefore hold that the case is prematurely brought to this court, and that the court cannot at this time entertain jurisdiction thereof. But direction is given that counsel for plaintiffs in error be permitted to withdraw the copy of the bill of exceptions on file in the court below, and file the same as a pendente lite bill of exceptions.

Writ of error dismissed, with direction. All the justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., disqualified.

BRYAN v. JONES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUDGMENT (§ 951*)—FORMER RECOVERY—EVIDENCE.

Under the pleadings and evidence in the case, the court did not err in directing the jury to return a verdict sustaining the plea of former recovery and of res judicata.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1809-1812; Dec. Dig. § 951.*]

Error from Superior Court, Lumpkin County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Martin Bryan against W. H. Jones, as administrator. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

O. J. Lilly, of Dahlonega, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Perry and W. B. Sloan, both of Gainesville, and R. H. Baker, of Dahlonega, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Martin Bryan brought suit against W. H. Jones, administrator of the estate of G. W. Bruce, deceased, to recover the value of services rendered to the deceased during the closing days of his life, covering a period of several months, and consisting in the plaintiff's remaining with, and nursing and caring for, Mr. Bruce, and looking after his household and business affairs. The administrator answered generally, and filed a special plea of former recovery and of res judicata. Upon the trial of the issue made by this special plea the court directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the plea and against the plaintiff. The evidence introduced by the administrator in support of his plea of res judicata was the record in a former suit between the said Jones, administrator, as plaintiff, and the said Bryan, as defendant, in which suit the administrator sought to recover from Bryan certain furniture and certain money, consisting of gold coin and currency, which it was alleged belonged to the estate of Bruce and was wrongfully carried off and retained by Bryan. In his answer to that suit Bryan denied that he had in his possession any money or property belonging to the estate of Bruce, and averred that all money and property taken possession of by him was so held by virtue of a gift from Bruce, and was paid to him on account of services rendered the latter. Upon the issues thus made the jury returned a verdict in favor of Bryan as to the currency and in favor of the administrator as to the gold and the furniture. The judgment in that case was relied upon by the defendant in the present case to establish the plea of former recovery.

We are of the opinion that under the facts of this case the verdict finding that the plea of former recovery and of res judicata had been established was properly directed by the court. The record of the former suit, containing the pleadings in that suit, the evidence introduced by the plaintiff and defendant in the same, and the judgment of the court, shows affirmatively that a certain amount of currency and of gold coin, amounting to $440, had been turned over by G. W. Bruce, the intestate of the administrator, who is the defendant in the present suit and the plaintiff in the former suit, to Bryan, the plaintiff in the present suit. Bryan, in his plea filed to the former suit, alleged, among other things: "G. W. Bruce gave the defendant the remainder of said money, together with said gold watch referred to in said petition, and said household and kitchen furniture, stating to defendant then and there that said money, watch, and household and kitchen furniture was given to him on account of his services rendered to the said G. W. Bruce and wife. The defendant took and carried away from said house only such money, property, and furniture as was given him by the said G. W. Bruce, and nothing more. The allegations in paragraph 7 [that is, of the petition in the former case, which charged that Bryan admitted having in his possession certain furniture, a watch, $500 in gold coin, and other moneys, and claimed that they had been given to him by G. W. Bruce] are substantially true; but defendant says that he has and holds possession of said furniture, watch, and money by virtue of a gift from the said G. W. Bruce to the said defendant, as is set forth in answer to paragraph 6 of said petition." While the defendant, in his plea in the former suit, does call the money and property turned over to him a "gift," he also shows that it was given to him on account of his services rendered to the said Bruce and his wife. The jury trying the former case found for the plaintiff "as to the gold and the furniture and watch, and for the defendant as to the currency and that pertaining to the currency." On the trial of the former case evidence was introduced tending to show that the defendant admitted getting some currency and also about $500 in gold coin. The defendant also introduced in that case one witness, P. L.

Lee, who testified that on one occasion, just a few days before the death of Bruce, the latter "talked to Martin, told him something. I could not tell what he was telling, and he asked Uncle Jack, he told him, 'Nothing,' that he had just come there to wait on him, and didn't want nothing. I never heard him tell Martin; Uncle Winse talked low. Martin [Bryan] then got the money out from Uncle Winse's head, and gave Babe $100, gave me $50, and my wife $50, and Uncle Jack $50. He told Martin he could have the rest, or balance—one. Martin never done anything, only just hung up the pants; told Uncle Winse there was nothing in the pockets. That was about five days before he died. * * * During the time that I had known them, Uncle Winse had been pretty feeble most of the time. Martin Bryan looked after their affairs, by getting their wood, looking after them, and when they needed anything they always sent for Martin. He also looked after the fencing and repairs of any kind. Uncle Winse said that night that he was glad he had lived long enough to give the money to his friends who had waited on him. He said this after the distribution. * * * Martin Bryan was to have that, and what was in the house. Uncle Winse told him that what was in the house was his. That was the night he gave the money out, just after. If there was any money left after the distribution, I never saw it. Martin Bryan made this distribution. I don't know whether there was any left in his hands or not. Uncle Winse told him the balance of it was his. I never heard Uncle Winse say how much money he had there—always told me he had enough to do him and Aunt Nancy. The night the money was distributed, I was sitting out on the porch when he first called us. I went in, but could not tell what he told Martin when he went to get the money. He pulled Martin down over him and said something to him. I saw Martin get the pants from under the pillow. The money was in a little tobacco sack. I mean to say that I saw only $250 in that pocket. I did not count it. I saw it after it was counted. I counted mine and my wife's. I do not know how much there was in the pocket altogether. I do not know how much there was left. I heard Uncle Winse say that Martin could have the balance. I don't know how much there was. I never saw it to count. All I saw was what was counted out. Uncle Winse did not have the money in hand at all. He had it under his head. Martin Bryan paid out the money. Babe and Uncle Jack were asked by Uncle Winse how much he owed them. The best I remember, he says to Bryan that 'the balance or rest is yours, and that will pay you for waiting on me.' That money was in greenbacks."

While the plaintiff in this case, the defendant in the former suit, did not pray for any affirmative relief, or for further recovery, it is clear, under the evidence and the pleadings in the former suit, that the distinct issue was made and litigated as to whether the defendant was entitled to the currency and gold for his services; and that necessarily involved the question as to whether or not the administrator's intestate had settled with the plaintiff in the instant case for his services. And when the jury returned in the former case a verdict in favor of the administrator for the amount of gold which was in the defendant's possession, and in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff in the present case, for the currency, it was the equivalent of finding that there had been a settlement between the administrator's intestate and the defendant in that case for the latter's services. While Bryan, the plaintiff in error, in his pleadings referred to the gold coin and the other moneys which he had in his possession, and which came from the administrator's intestate, as a gift, he also alleges that it was given him on account of his services. The expressions thus used in the pleadings, "gift" and "given him on account of his services," may create an ambiguity; but the pleader cannot himself take advantage of this ambiguity. It is manifest, from the pleadings and the evidence introduced on the former trial, that the plaintiff in the present case submitted to the court and jury the contention that all the money which he had received from Bruce had been gotten by virtue of the latter's obligation to pay for the services rendered him; and the jury having found that a part of the money—that is, the part which was in gold coin—should be returned to Bruce's administrator, thus finding to that extent against the defendant, the plaintiff in the present suit, upon the issue made in the former suit as to whether that money had been delivered to him in payment for his services, he will not be permitted to set up his contention that the money which he had been permitted to hold by the former verdict of the jury was not in full payment of his claim for services.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*)—REVIEW—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

There being no bona fide effort to brief the evidence in the case, the so-called brief of evidence being largely composed of objections to evidence and the argument of counsel thereon, colloquies between counsel and between counsel and the court, and various statements of the court in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, such document will not be considered as a brief of evidence. Accordingly, this court will not review the evidence; and, as no question is presented by the bill of exceptions which can be intelligently considered and passed upon without reference to the evidence, the judgment below must be affirmed. *Anderson v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 5, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—REVIEW—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

Error was assigned upon the judgment overruling a motion for new trial. The motion contained the general grounds, and numerous special grounds by amendment. Most of the latter were based upon rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, some upon the charge of the court, and one upon an omission to charge, without a written request. A careful consideration of each ground fails to show any error of law requiring the grant of a new trial; and, the evidence being sufficient to support the verdict, the discretion of the trial judge will not be disturbed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 648*)—REVIEW—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

When a bill of exceptions assigning error upon the refusal of an interlocutory injunction was certified by the judge and filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court, a document purporting to be an agreed brief of the oral and documentary evidence, which was presented to the judge and approved by him as a correct brief of the evidence submitted on the hearing, and which was so presented and approved subsequently to the certification and filing of the bill of exceptions, cannot be considered by this court as a brief of evidence. See Eubank v. Mayor, etc., of Eastman, 120 Ga. 1048, 48 S. E. 426; Glover v. State, 128 Ga. 1,

It appears that the material allegations of fact in the verified petition were denied on oath in the answer of the defendants, and the parties were at issue; and therefore this court cannot adjudge that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing an interlocutory injunction. A corporation, which legally acquires all the property of a partnership, does not thereby become responsible for the partnership debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 97-100; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by the Greenberg-Miller Company against the Everett Shoe Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Error was assigned upon a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's case on general demurrer. According to the allegations of the petition, as amended, the plaintiff sold a bill of merchandise to the firm of Parks & Everett, composed of J. J. Parks and S. A. C. Everett. Parks sold out his interest to Everett, and the latter organized the defendant corporation, which "took over the stock and assets of the old firm." Parks had no other property than that transferred to Everett. Everett "put all his stock of merchandise * * * into the new corporation, receiving therefor stock" in the corporation. There was no actual sale, but the partnership was merely absorbed by the corporation, and the pretended sale was in fraud of creditors of the partnership, and the transaction made the partnership insolvent. Everett died, leaving no estate, except the stock in the corporation, and that was hypothecated to his personal creditors. A judgment was prayed against the corporation on account of the alleged debt contracted by Parks and Everett.

West & Dasher, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. J. R. L. Smith and W. A. Thompson, both of Macon, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. The petition is to be construed most strongly against the pleader. The general allegations as to fraud, insolvency, and absorption of the copartnership by the corporation are mere conclusions of the pleader. The substantive allegations of fact show a sale by Everett to the corporation and receipt of a consideration, the value and sufficiency of which is not questioned. The sale, therefore, must be regarded as lawful. The corporation was a different entity from the firm, and there was no promise by the firm to the latter, or to its creditors, to pay the debts of the firm. The attempt, therefore, is to hold the corporation liable merely because it lawfully acquired the property of the partnership. It has been previously ruled by this court that under the circumstances enumerated the corporation will not incur liability. Culberson v. Alabama Construction Co., 127 Ga. 599, 56 S. E. 765, 9 L. BECKER et al. v. DONALSON et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 352*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

E. C. Becker paid the purchase price of land, and a deed was taken in his name. It was an issue as to whether this was his individual transaction, or was one for the Donalson Lumber Company (a corporation); the deed being taken in his name merely as security, and the purchase money paid as an advancement, the corporation thereby becoming his debtor. Relatively to such an issue it was not erroneous to admit in evidence from the ledger books of the corporation certain accounts of E. C. Becker, which, among other items, included one purporting to show the corporation to be his debtor for the amount of the purchase money; it appearing from other evidence that E. C. Becker had examined the books and footed up the account, and made no denial that the corporation was his debtor.

(a) The object of the evidence was not to prove the correctness of the account, and the books were not inadmissible because there was no compliance with the statute in regard to preliminary proof of the correctness of the books of account, when offered for such purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1398-1403; Dec. Dig. § 352.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 122*)—AUTHORITY—ADMISSIONS—ACTS OF AGENT.

Another issue involved the contention of Donalson that, even if the land was not purchased for the corporation, E. C. Becker subsequently authorized Donalson to make sale of all his holdings at the domicile of the corporation, including the land in dispute, and that in pursuance of such authority a sale was made, and the entire purchase price paid, thereby obligating E. C. Becker to convey the land to the purchaser under whom Donalson claimed. In view of this contention, and certain evidence as to the authority of B. A. Becker, which did not appear on the former trial, relative to his agency, and other evidence as to acts upon the part of E. C. Becker, when considered in connection with the evidence as to the consummation of the sale and the acceptance of the purchase price by E. C. Becker, there was no error in the rulings of the court admitting in evidence a certain letter and telegram from B. A. Becker to Donalson in regard to a price that E. C. Becker would accept for his interest in the Donalson Lumber Company, and testimony as to the agency of B. A. Becker, or relative to what Donalson did in advertising and consummating a sale of the property, and other evidence as referred to in the second division of the opinion.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 120*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In view of the pleadings, and of other evidence by the same witness, there was no error in excluding certain testimony of Donalson to the effect that he was one of the purchasers of the property, and that he and Williams, his joint purchaser, had an agreement that a new company should be organized, after the purchase from Becker, which should take over all the property of the Donalson Lumber Company.

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 120*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The relevancy of certain documents which the judge excluded from evidence was not made to appear.

5. TRIAL (§§ 242, 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IN-ADVERTENT ERROR—CHARGE AS WHOLE—"PREPONDERANCE OF THE TESTIMONY."

The judge charged: "By a 'preponderance of the testimony' is meant that superior weight of the evidence upon the issues in the case, which, while not enough to wholly free the mind from a reasonable doubt, is yet sufficient to incline the reasonable and impartial minds of the jury to one side of the issue rather than to the other. The burden is upon the defendant in this case to make out his case under the rule of law just given you, and in the cross-bill filed by the defendant the burden is upon him, the defendant, to make out against the plaintiff under the same rule of law the contentions set out therein." Held:

(a) It clearly appears from the context that the use of the word "defendant" was a mere slip of the tongue, and that the word "plaintiff" was intended to be used.

(b) The judge elsewhere charged: "A parol contract for land should be so clearly, strongly, and satisfactorily shown and proven as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the agreement or contract." In the light of the entire charge, that portion of it copied above, on which error was assigned, affords no cause for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 569-576, 705-713, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. §§ 242, 296.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—GROUNDS—HARMLESS ERROR.

The general charge, giving the rule as to the impeachment of witnesses, while not authorized by any evidence in the case, was not cause for a new trial, because under the facts of the case it was not calculated to injure either side.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

7. OTHER ASSIGNMENTS WITHOUT MERIT.

Other assignments of error upon the charge of the court were not meritorious.

8. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL REFUSED.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by John E. Donalson and another against E. C. Becker and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

M. E. O'Neal, of Bainbridge, and Pope & Bennet, of Albany, for plaintiffs in error. Donalson & Donalson and T. S. Hawes, all of Bainbridge, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. This case was before the Supreme Court on a former occasion. Becker v. Donalson, 133 Ga. 864, 67 S. E. 92. In that instance Donalson had recovered, and Becker excepted to the judgment of the trial court refusing a new trial. On review in the Supreme Court the judgment was reversed. On the subsequent trial Donalson again recovered. Becker moved for a new trial, and excepted to the judgment overruling the motion. It is unnecessary to refer to the character of the suit, further than to say that it was one for specific performance and other equitable relief.

[1] 1. E. C. Becker paid the purchase price of the land, and the deed was taken in his name. It was an issue whether this was his individual transaction, or was one for the Donalson Lumber Company (a corporation); the deed being taken in his name merely as security, and the purchase money paid as an advancement, the corporation thereby becoming his debtor. It was contended in the motion for new trial that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of the defendants, the ledger kept by the Donalson Lumber Company, which contained the account of E. C. Becker with the company. The items thus objected to were as follows: "1897, Apl. 9. By D. purchase of 625 acres of land July 6/94 1,250.75," and "Aug. 24th. To Ledger #4—300 3,726.25." The footing of the column in which the last-quoted item appears amounted to $3,726.25; such item being the only one in that column. The column in which the first item above quoted appears footed up the same amount, there being two other items in this column. The account and the two items quoted were objected to as being irrelevant, and not competent to bind E. C. Becker, because, as contended by the defendants, he had no knowledge of the entry of such items on the books, and on the further ground that no preliminary proof as to the correctness of the books, as required by statute, had been submitted in order to let the books in as evidence.

In reference to this account John E. Donalson, a witness for the plaintiffs, testified as follows: "There was no complaint by E. C. Becker as to the correctness of this account. This addition and footings on this page were made by B. A. Becker; that includes the $3,726.25 brought forward from the other page, and also the price of land in question." B. A. Becker, a witness for the defendants, testified: "I kept the books of the Donalson Lumber Company. That is my handwriting; those figures represent the totals of these columns. I added them up, and it makes a balance of $46,186.55; that entry of August 24th, 'By ledger 3, page 590, $3,726.25,' is Mr. E. C. Becker's handwriting in 1897. * * * I understand bookkeeping. We would not put those entries in there now; that entry means the balance from the old page—we added at the top instead of these before it. I added it up. It showed the Donalson Lumber Company owed my father $46,186.55 balance. That is ledger No. 3; that is the account of Ed. C. Becker, 1895; in 1897 it showed a credit balance of $3,726.25 on these books; that is on page 590 ledger No. 3, account of Edward C. Becker. * * * That part of that account of $46, 186.55 is based on $3,726.25 brought forward from this ledger No. 3, page 590; it was brought there as a balance of August 24th."

It appears from this evidence that the item of $1,250.75, which was the price of the land in question paid by E. C. Becker, constituted one item of the account which footed up $3,726.25, which footing showed the total indebtedness of the Donalson Company by account to E. C. Becker, and that he himself made the entry of August 24, 1897, showing such total indebtedness by the company by account to him. It is clear that this evidence tended to show that he knew of the entry of $1,250.75, the price he paid for the land, as it was necessarily included by him in the entry of $3,726.25 which he made. (This evidence did not appear from the record when this case was formerly before this court, when it was ruled that the entry of $1,250.75 was not admissible as against E. C. Becker.) The evidence objected to was admissible on the second trial, in the light of the other evidence above referred to, as against E. C. Becker, as tending to support the contention of the plaintiffs that the property was bought for the Donalson Lumber Company, and that E. C. Becker merely advanced the money under a contract that it should be repaid, and that thereafter he should convey the title to the corporation.

The book admitted in evidence, which contained the account of E. C. Becker with the Donalson Lumber Company, in which the items above quoted appeared, was admissible without complying with the provisions of Civil Code, § 5769, relating to preliminary proof for the admission of books of account in proof of the accounts contained therein. The account was not admitted for the purpose merely of proving it, but as tending to show that the Donalson Lumber Company was acting in pursuance of its contention that the land in question was purchased by E. C. Becker for the company, and that the company owed him the purchase price which he had paid for it, and that E. C. Becker had seen the account containing such entries, and had made no objection to the account, but had himself made the entry therein as to the amount of the credit due him in the account, which might have included the price he had paid for the land, all of which tended to show acquiescence on his part as to the above-stated contention of the company.

[2] 2. The plaintiff introduced a letter from E. C. Becker to John E. Donalson, dated August 15, 1898, the substance of which was that Becker would "give no more options, but an offer of $29,000 for my interest in the company, including all obligations I hold against the company, also including Bontie's [B. A. Becker's] interest, including receipt in full for what obligations the company has against Bontie—it also includes the 600 acres of land in my name—I would accept; and if you should not find party that would give that by end of September, I wish you would recommend some attorney to me, so that I could get order of sale of property under second mortgage, as you would then have better chance, with company obligations out of way, and clear title, to sell the whole of it for more than $29,000 and cost of sale. $29,000 is the lowest I will take, as it would then net me a loss of $50,000. I hope you will agree with me on my views."

After the introduction of this letter, the witness Donalson was permitted to testify: "Acting under that letter, I commenced trying to find a sale for the Donalson Lumber Company property. Eventually I issued a circular, dated January 20, 1899, and this is the circular. [The circular describing the mill, lands, and numerous other property of the Donalson Lumber Company, and offering all for sale, there being included in the lands offered about 3,000 acres of land, which Donalson testified belonged to him individually, and also the 625 acres now in controversy.] I mailed one of them by due course of mail to E. C. Becker, at St. Louis, Mo., in an envelope properly sealed and stamped, at his address, deposited in the post office, at Donalsonville, Ga. I consulted with Mr. B. A. Becker frequently about this matter; read this to him in manuscript before I had it [the circular] printed. There were a number of those circulars lying on Mr. B. A. Becker's desk. I don't know whether he ever read it afterwards or not. Some time after Mr. W. T. Williams came to me with that identical circular in his hand, and we talked it over. I mailed this circular to all the names I could get of parties who were mill men, trying to find a purchaser. My recollection is that we duplicated that circular, identically the same thing, but dated it a little later, probably March; that it, the same way, was mailed all over the country. After a while Mr. W. T. Williams came to Donalsonville, and had that very circular which we now have in evidence, and wished to buy this property. He went over it—was there several days, and finally offered to give me $60,000, and that was to include some land that I owned in my name. I do not recall the number of acres, but the amount agreed on for my land was six thousand and odd dollars, and the Donalson Lumber Company land and property was fifty-three thousand and odd dollars; the two making up $60,000. We went to Savannah, had a conference with Mr. Williams' associates, and the result was we came back to Donalsonville with a promise on the part of one of them that he would come over to Donalsonville soon and close the matter up. It was John Cummings, and he did not get over till about the middle of October [1899]. Mr. Becker went over to Bainbridge and got Mr. A. L. Townsend as his lawyer, and we met on the night of October 18th to close this matter up. They submitted one paper, which was admitted by the defendants in their answer to be correct. The sale to Mr. W. T. Williams was consummated thus."

The defendants objected to the admission of this evidence, on the ground that it was irrelevant, and insisted that the facts shown thereby could not constitute an estoppel as against E. C. Becker, for the reason that his offer, as contained in the letter of August 15th, was expressly limited as to the time intervening since that date and the end of September following; it not being contended by the plaintiffs that any of the circulars were issued, or any of the transactions which finally culminated in the sale to Williams were made, prior to the end of September, and E. C. Becker not having received the circular until after the sale made to Williams, and the sale not embracing any land whatever, but being simply a sale of the mortgage and other obligations held by E. C. Becker and B. A. Becker against the Donalson Lumber Company, including one-fourth of the capital stock of the Donalson Lumber Company. It is now contended that the sale could not amount to an estoppel as to more than a one-fourth interest in the lands in controversy; it appearing from the evidence of Donalson that at the time of the sale to Williams there was an agreement between him and Williams that upon the consummation of the sale he and Williams would reorganize the sawmill of the Donalson Lumber Company as "co-owners," and that the sale to Williams was really a sale to him for the benefit of himself and Donalson, and that the negotiations therefor were conducted by Donalson, acting for Williams and himself, and hence the knowledge of Donalson of the fact that the title to the lands was not in the Donalson Lumber Company would be imputable to Williams, and therefore there could be no estoppel. The court overruled the objections and admitted the evidence, and error was assigned.

The admissibility of this evidence did not depend upon its sufficiency to constitute an estoppel. It would be admissible if upon any theory it tended to elucidate any issue involved in the case. One of the plaintiffs' contentions was that even if, in the first instance, the land was bought by E. C. Becker for himself, and there was no parol contract between Becker and the Donalson Lumber Company by which Becker should convey to that company upon repayment of the purchase price, nevertheless the offer contained in the letter of August 15th was a proposition to sell the land, and that this offer was never withdrawn, but that after its submission Donalson acted upon it, and from time to time had further negotiations with E. C. Becker directly, and with B. A. Becker, who was alleged to be the agent of E. C. Becker, relatively to a sale of the property, until a sale was eventually consummated on October 17, 1908. There was evidence of agency upon the part of B. A. Becker for

E. C. Becker, which was not introduced upon the former trial. B. A. Becker had attained the age of majority before any of these matters testified about occurred; and E. C. Becker testified that while B. A. Becker was a minor he did not have full authority to represent him at Donalsonville, but after his majority he did, and that "I may have written him to sell the land to the best advantage. I believe I did, probably a month or two before the sale of the mortgages." The defendants were contending that the offer of August 15th had expired, and that the sale which eventually took place had no connection with that offer, and consequently did not include the land in dispute. In view of this contention, there were such issues between the parties as, in connection with the other evidence as to the consummation of the sale and the acceptance of the purchase price by E. C. Becker, and as to the right of B. A. Becker to represent him as agent, authorized the admission of the evidence objected to.

For similar reasons it was not error, over the objection that it was mere hearsay, to admit in evidence a letter and telegram from B. A. Becker to J. E. Donalson, dated March 6, 1898, to the effect that B. A. Becker was of the opinion that he could get E. C. Becker to accept a certain sum for his interest in the Donalson Lumber Company, especially as soon thereafter E. C. Becker did submit to J. E. Donalson a proposition to substantially the same effect as that which B. A. Becker thought that he might induce E. C. Becker to make.

Nor was it error, over the objection that it was irrelevant, to permit the witness Donalson to testify concerning the circulars advertising the property of the Donalson Lumber Company for sale, referred to in his evidence hereinabove quoted: "I mailed one of them [the circulars] by due course of mail to Mr. E. C. Becker, at St. Louis, Mo., properly sealed and stamped, and the proper number of two-cent stamps on it, and mailed to Mr. Becker in St. Louis, Mo., with the proper address at which we had been addressing him, and deposited in the post office at Donalsonville, Ga."—notwithstanding E. C. Becker testified that he did not receive the circular until after the sale.

Nor was it error to permit the witness Donalson to testify: "We had them [the circulars] there in the office of the Donalson Lumber Company. I consulted with Mr. B. A. Becker frequently about this matter, and read this [the circular] to him in manuscript before I ever had it printed, and I read it to B. A. Becker in manuscript, and there was a number of them lying on his desk. I don't know whether he ever read it afterwards or not"—the objection to the evidence being that it was irrelevant, and that no notice to or conduct of B. A. Becker could bind or affect the rights of E. C. Becker by estoppel or otherwise, and that the rights of E. C. Becker were the only ones insisted on by the defendants.

Nor was it error to admit the testimony of John E. Donalson, as follows: "I told B. A. Becker that Williams would buy the properties, but did not wish to pay more than $15,000 in cash, and would give his notes for the remainder, and he (B. A. Becker) asked me what he was to get, and I told him: 'You get the offer your father made of $29,000.' He said: 'That has been some time ago.' I replied: 'Yes; but we are willing to pay the interest. Make it up, and give us a memorandum of the amount, so we can arrange it.' He went to his desk and began to write. The train was approaching, and about the time he finished what he had written the train blew, and I came by and asked him for the paper, and he handed me this paper. Mr. Williams and myself were going to Savannah to get the money to complete the arrangements, and we were going to take that train." The objection to this testimony was "that it was irrelevant, because no notice to or acts of B. A. Becker could bind or affect the rights of E. C. Becker, or raise any estoppel against him; the defendants relying solely on the rights of E. C. Becker."

Nor was it error to admit the testimony of John E. Donalson, as follows: "During that time that the timber was being cut off of that land [the land in controversy] B. A. Becker was there at Donalsonville. We cut the timber, but there was no entry made on the books about it, because we treated it as our own. B. A. Becker was also superintendent, about that time, of the logging teams. The timber was hauled to a place called Rillaville, about two miles from Donalsonville, which was the terminus of the tramroad, and there put on the log train and brought to the mill. Mr. B. A. Becker was down that tramroad nearly every day, and made up the pay rolls, and he knew as much about the business as I did. He was right there, and knew all about it, and knew that the timber was being cut. We cut that timber during 1894 and 1895; and in the fall of '96 we turpentine it. B. A. Becker was there at Donalsonville then and all during the two years and a half that we were timbering it, and during the years 1896, 1897, and 1899, while we were turpentine it. He was bookkeeper and superintendent, and looked after the physical properties. Those lands were located about three miles from the mill, and not over one-fourth of a mile from the tramroad. Mr. B. A. Becker was superintendent of the mill, and had charge of the logging and everything else, and his duties frequently called him into the woods; in fact, as often as he could leave his books he was there. He was constantly in the woods, probably two or three times a week, on the road looking after things. In 1898 and 1899, at the time we had gone beyond Rillaville, I could stand on the car and see those white boxes in the fall of the year one-fourth of a mile, and down at the corner where we crossed 143, one-half of the lot next to it, 142, was turpentine, and there was an open field between that lot and a portion of this timber."

The objection urged to its admissibility was that the evidence was irrelevant, and that no notice to or conduct of B. A. Becker could bind or affect the rights of E. C. Becker; it being contended that B. A. Becker was not the agent of E. C. Becker, or otherwise in privity with him, so as to bind him by knowledge or by estoppel, at the time referred to in said testimony. Some of this evidence related to acts tending to show notice to B. A. Becker before he had attained his majority, while other parts of it related to such acts as occurred after his attainment of majority, and of which he must have had knowledge. Even if it would have been improper to admit the evidence as to acts which occurred before his majority, the evidence was objected to as a whole; and, the acts which occurred after the attainment of majority by B. A. Becker being clearly admissible as tending to show notice to him as the agent of E. C. Becker, the testimony as a whole should not be excluded, and it was not error to overrule the objection.

Nor was it error to overrule the objections urged to the admissibility of the evidence set out in the thirteenth ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial, which was alleged to be, but was not, all of the evidence tending to show agency upon the part of B. A. Becker for E. C. Becker.

[3] 3. The fourteenth ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial begins as follows: "Because movant contends, plaintiffs in said case claiming that the defendants were estopped to set up title to the land in controversy, subsequent to the sale by E. C. Becker and B. A. Becker to W. T. Williams of the mortgages and other interests in the Donalson Lumber Company, on October 17, 1899, for the reason that W. T. Williams was led, by the conduct and silence of E. C. Becker and B. A. Becker, to believe that the lands in controversy belonged to the Donalson Lumber Company, when the said W. T. Williams made said purchase," etc. The ground then sets forth that the court erred in excluding from evidence certain testimony of John E. Donalson, which the defendants sought to bring out, to the effect that Williams did not purchase the land in controversy for himself alone, but for himself and Donalson, and that there was an understanding between them that a new company should be organized after the purchase of the land, which should take over all the property of the Donalson Lumber Company, etc. It does not appear anywhere in the record that the plaintiffs made any such claim as to estoppel against the Beckers, nor does it appear from the records that the plaintiffs claimed that Williams bought the property for himself; but, on the contrary, it was set forth in the petition that Williams and Donalson purchased from the Beckers, for a given sum, all their interest in the Donalson Lumber Company. Moreover, it appears from the brief of evidence that John E. Donalson testified substantially to everything that this ground of the motion complains that the court would not allow him to testify to.

[4] 4. The fifteenth ground of the amendment to the motion complains as follows: Defendants offered in evidence a certain statement of facts made in 1898 by John E. Donalson, relative to the organization of the Donalson Lumber Company, its assets and liabilities, which, among other things, recited that specified portions of the capital stock of the corporation which had been issued to B. A. Becker and E. C. Becker were issued without any consideration having been paid to the corporation therefor. After stating the facts, the question was propounded to an attorney at law: "Would the creditors of the Donalson Lumber Company, in view of the above recitals, have the power to force Mr. E. C. Becker and B. A. Becker to pay into the company the full value of their stock, for which they never paid anything, or to pay so much thereof as would be necessary to liquidate their claim?" The attorney advised that the stockholders named would be liable to the creditors. The statement of facts was offered in evidence alone, and also in connection with the opinion to which it was attached; and, upon objection urged by the plaintiffs that the documents were irrelevant, the court excluded them. This evidence was not admissible, as contended by counsel for plaintiffs in error in their brief filed in this court, for the reason that it "showed that Mr. Donalson, as well as Mr. Becker, had participated in the illegal organization of the corporation, and no rights could grow out of such a transaction." It is not made to appear in what way the organization of the corporation was illegal, or how the question at issue between the parties to the case could be affected by such evidence.

[5] 5. The sixteenth ground complains that the court, after charging the jury, "By a preponderance of the testimony is meant that superior weight of the evidence upon the issues in the case, which, while not enough to wholly free the mind from a reasonable doubt, is yet sufficient to incline the reasonable and impartial minds of the jury to one side of the issues rather than to the other," then charged: "The burden is upon the defendant in this case to make out his case under the rule of law just given you, and in the cross-bill filed by the defendant the burden is upon him, the defendant, to make out against the plaintiff under the same rule of law the contentions set out therein."

The exceptions to the charge were as follows:

"(a) Because the same was confusing to the jury, in that the effect of said charge was to place the burden upon the defendant in all branches of the case; and (b) because, even if the use of the word 'defendant,' where it first occurs in said last-quoted charge, were a mere slip of the tongue, and even if the jury had so understood it, and understood that the court intended to use the word 'plaintiff,' still movant insists that the charge was error, for the reason that, the plaintiffs' case being one for specific performance of an alleged parol contract for the sale of land, movants insist that the plaintiffs should be required to make out their case by evidence so clear and unequivocal as to satisfy the minds of the jury to a reasonable certainty, that the rule as to preponderance of evidence as defined by the court in the charge first quoted in this ground would not apply."

It is evident that the use of the word "defendant" was a mere slip of the tongue, and that the word "plaintiff" was intended to be used by the judge. This clearly appears from the context in which this instruction was given, as well as the full, clear, and implicit instructions elsewhere given on the subject of the burden of proof. The charge as to the preponderance of evidence was not error, in view of the instruction, elsewhere given, that "a parol contract for land should be so clearly, strongly, and satisfactorily shown and proven as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the agreement or contract." This instruction was certainly as strong as the defendants were entitled to. Warren v. Gay, 123 Ga. 243, 51 S. E. 302.

BUTLER v. SAMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 28, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VERDICT—ERROR IN CHARGE—GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL.

Under the pleadings and the evidence, a verdict was demanded for the defendant; and if there was any error in the charge, as complained of, it would not require the grant of a new trial.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 145*)—RELEVANCY—REMOTE-NESS.

The plaintiff tendered in evidence a statement of account rendered by him to the defendant, showing the balance claimed by plaintiff on account of the transactions involved in the suit, together with a letter from the plaintiff, offering to accept the defendant's note therefor. These documents bore date more than two years after the sale, and were properly rejected by the court.

3. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY (§ 8*)—ACTION ON CONTRACT.

Where a contract for the purchase of land provided for the delivery of 9,000 shares of certain mining stock at the price of 40 cents a share cash value in settlement of the balance of the price, the vendor, in case of the vendee's refusal to deliver the stock, could not recover the balance of the price in cash.

4. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY (§ 8*)—CONTRACT—BREACH.

Where a contract for the sale of land provided for the payment of the balance of the price in mining stock, the vendor, on the purchaser's refusal to deliver the stock, could not recover the value of the stock at the time it was delivered, in the absence of evidence showing its market value at that time.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; W. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by R. E. Butler against W. A. Sams. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

In an action by R. E. Butler against W. A. Sams the petition alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $3,600 principal, and interest, by reason of the following facts: On September 20, 1907, petitioner sold to defendant described land for $10,000, $6,400 of which was to be paid in cash on January 1, 1908, the balance to be paid on the date last mentioned in "9,000 shares of Los Colorado mining stock, par value $1 per share, at the price of 40 cents per share, cash value." The contract of sale was evidenced by a bond for title. On January 2, 1908, the defendant paid the amount which had been promised to be paid in money, received from the plaintiff a warranty deed, and promised in a "day or two" to deliver to plaintiff the 9,000 shares of stock. The land was worth $10,000, and the stock was represented by the defendant to be of the value of 40 cents per share, and was accepted at such value by plaintiff, and in fact at that time it was bringing that price on the market. The defendant failed to deliver the stock, though frequent demands had been made for it, and in the meantime it depreciated in value, and was worthless at the time of the institution of the suit. After alleging in substance as above set forth, the petition further alleged that, defendant "having failed and refused to turn over said stock according to his contract, and said stock having become worthless, petitioner brings this suit for the balance purchase money of said land, to wit, $3,600, with interest from January 1, 1908, at 7 per cent. per annum," and prayed for process, and that "plaintiff have a verdict and judgment for said principal sum, with interest as above set out." The petition contained a second count, which was in substance as above indicated, except that, instead of suing "for the balance purchase money," it was alleged that the suit was "for the value of said stock at the time the same should have been delivered to petitioner." On the trial the plaintiff abandoned the second count, and relied solely on the first. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

Mozley & Moss, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error. D. W. Blair and Clay & Morris, all of Marietta, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1-4] Properly construed, the first count was an action on the contract for money, being the balance of the purchase price alleged to be due for the land. By the record before us there was no agreement to pay the balance of the alleged purchase price otherwise than in stock; and hence there could be no recovery by the plaintiff under the first count. There was no evidence to show the market value of the stock at the time it was contracted to be delivered; and hence there could be no recovery under the second count. Under these circumstances, a general verdict in favor of the defendant was demanded by the evidence; and if there was any error in the charge of the court, as complained of, it would not require a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CLARK v. RAMSEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUDGMENT (§ 460*)—PETITION TO SET ASIDE—SUFFICIENCY.

The petition to set aside the judgment was not subject to general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 879-891; Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by L. C. Clark against W. W. Ramsey and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. N. Hardeman, of Louisville, for plaintiff in error. M. C. Barwick, of Augusta, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. The petition of the plaintiff in error, which was to set aside a judgment, was dismissed on demurrer. She alleged that an ejectment suit was brought against her by W. W. Ramsey to the October term, 1909, of Burke superior court. When served with the pleadings in the case, she employed counsel and surrendered all her papers to him. Counsel prepared her defense, but did not file it. He was ill at that term of court, and had a leave of absence. At the trial term the attorney was still ill, and had a leave of absence for that term of the court. The client was an old and infirm woman, unable to attend court on account of her age and feeble health, and relied upon her counsel to protect her rights. She was under the impression that her counsel had filed her defense, and made inquiry about her case at each term, and was informed of her counsel's illness and his leave of absence. At the trial term Ramsey's attorney knew of the employment of her attorney, of his illness, and leave of absence, and took undue advantage of her condition and the illness of her counsel in pressing the case to judgment. By amendment she alleged a good defense against the ejectment suit.

The petition was equitable in its nature, and prayed equitable relief. "Equity will interfere to set aside a judgment of a court having jurisdiction only when the party had a good defense of which he was entirely ignorant, or where he was prevented from making it by fraud or accident, or the act of the adverse party, unmixed with fraud or negligence on his part." Civil Code, § 4585. Sudden illness of counsel has been treated as an accident or misfortune, and judgments have been vacated in cases where counsel was stricken with serious illness incapacitating him from filing a defense or representing his client, where the client was ignorant of counsel's illness. Howell v. Ware, 133 Ga. 674, 66 S. E. 884; Robinson v. Carmichael, 134 Ga. 654, 68 S. E. 582. There can be no question that at the trial term neither counsel nor client was in laches. The former had a leave of absence, which was an assurance to the latter that her case would not be tried. Besides, it is alleged that opposing counsel was aware that counsel represented the client in the particular case and had a leave of absence for that term of the court. Good faith would have required him to disclose this information to the court; and it is not to be presumed that with this knowledge the court would have allowed the case pressed to trial.

As to the case being in default at the appearance term, and whether that default should be opened, depends upon the conclusion, under the facts alleged, whether counsel or client was negligent. The allegation is that counsel was sick, and on account of such sickness a leave of absence had been granted to him. While the time of his employment is not definitely alleged, it does appear that counsel was retained immediately after the service of the suit upon the client. That he was not ill at the time of his employment is inferable from the fact that he advised with his client, accepted her papers, and prepared her defense. From these facts, as against a general demurrer, we may conclude that counsel was stricken with illness, and was prevented from filing the defense on that account.

Was the client negligent? She was an old and infirm lady, residing some distance from the county seat. Because of her old age and feeble health, she was unable to attend that session of the court. She was under the impression that her defense had been filed. She made inquiry about her case, and was informed of her counsel's illness, and that a leave of absence had been granted him by the court. Under such circumstances, we do not think the client was guilty of laches.

A motion to set aside and vacate a judgment cannot be determined by any fixed rule, but depends upon the circumstances of the case. Storey v. Weaver, 66 Ga. 296. We think that, under the allegations of the petition, admitted to be true on demurrer, the petition should not have been dismissed on general demurrer.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

JONES v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 26, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 362*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—EXPRESS TRUST.

It was erroneous to overrule an appropriate motion to strike certain portions of the plea of the defendants, which, in effect, sought by parol to ingraft an express trust upon a deed to land, and subsequently to permit witnesses to testify in support of such portions of the plea, over the objection that the testimony sought by parol to establish an express trust to land, and was irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1147-1155; Dec. Dig. § 362.*]

2. PAROL EVIDENCE.

The ruling above announced has no application to so much of the defendant's plea as related to the personal property involved in the suit, concerning which there was no effort to declare a trust.

3. PARTITION (§ 46*)—PARTIES DEFENDANT.

There was no error in the ruling of the court permitting certain persons to be made parties defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

Error from Superior Court, Taliaferro County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by Wesley P. Jones against Edward P. Jones and others. Verdict for defendants. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Wesley P. Jones instituted an action against Edward P. Jones, alleging that plaintiff and defendant, as tenants in common, owned described land, which had been conveyed to them by John F. Holden, and certain farm tools and other personal property, which they had purchased and used on the farm, and that the defendant had been in exclusive possession of the property, and refused to recognize the plaintiff as a part owner in the property, or account to him for certain rents derived from the same. There were prayers: (a) For receiver; (b) for an accounting for rents, etc.; (c) for partition and general relief and process.

The defendant in his answer admitted that the land had been conveyed to plaintiff and defendant, as alleged; but in paragraphs 5 to 19, inclusive, of his answer, he set up a parol contract, alleged to have been entered into prior to the conveyance, among the family of the father of plaintiff and defendant, including them, to the effect that the land should be purchased and paid for by all of them, and upon the purchase price being fully paid the title should be taken in the name of the plaintiff and the defendant, but that their father and mother should live on the land and have it as their own for a home as long as either one of them should live, and any one or more of the children who remained unmarried and wished to live there with their mother and father should have the right to do so, and upon the death of both the father and mother the place should then belong absolutely to plaintiff and defendant. By virtue of this family arrangement all of the several members of the family, including plaintiff and defendant, contributed to the payment of the purchase money and succeeded in making full payment, which was followed by execution of a deed conveying the property to plaintiff and defendant, as above stated. After the property had been so conveyed, the entire family, including plaintiff and defendant, continued to reside on it and carry out the terms of the parol agreement for several years; and plaintiff never repudiated the contract until shortly before the institution of the suit, and none of the others ever repudiated it. The personal property referred to in the suit was purchased by the use of the "common fund" produced by all the members of the family in conducting the farm, and by common consent it was understood that all of it should be the property of their mother and father. By reason of the foregoing facts the mother and father have a life interest in the land, and ought to be made parties. It would be inequitable and unjust, and a fraud against the other members of the family, if the plaintiff were allowed to have the land partitioned, and irreparable damages would result from a breach by plaintiff of the family agreement. Whereupon it was prayed: (a) That the father and mother should be made parties; (b) that the interest of all parties in the described real and personal property be fully protected by decree; (c) that specific performance be decreed; (d) that injunction issue; and (e) that the court frame such decree as would meet the exigencies of the case.

By order of court the father and mother were made parties defendant, and allowed given time in which to answer. Within the time provided answer was filed by them, in which they adopted the answer filed by the original defendant. The plaintiff moved to strike each and all of paragraphs 5 to 19, inclusive, of the original defendant's answer, on the ground that no defense was set up therein. He also moved to strike the answer of the defendants who were made parties by amendment, on the grounds: (a) That they were not proper parties; (b) that the answer set forth no defense. The court overruled the motion to strike, and the plaintiff excepted pendente lite. On the trial the plaintiff objected to certain evidence, submitted by the defendants, which tended to prove the parol agreement among the family, which was set up in the portion of their answer which plaintiff had moved to strike; the objection being, in substance, that such evidence was irrelevant, and its purpose was to set up an express trust by parol evidence. The court admitted the evidence. A verdict was rendered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, in which complaint was made of the admission of the evidence above referred to. The motion was overruled. A bill of exceptions was subsequently certified, in which error was assigned on the exceptions pendente lite, and also on the order overruling the motion for a new trial.

J. A. Beazley, of Crawfordsville, and Noel P. Park, of Greensboro, for plaintiff in error. A. G. Golucke, of Crawfordsville, and Sam H. Sibley, of Union Point, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The facts of this case in substance are similar to those involved in the case of Wilder v. Wilder, 138 Ga. 573, 75 S. E. 854. In that case the property involved was bought with money belonging to the defendant, her sister, and her son, under a parol agreement that the title should be made to the son, and that the property should be held for the defendant, subject to the right of the sister and son to live in the house as long as the defendant occupied it as a home; and it was held that the effort was to create an express trust by parol, which, under our statute, cannot be done. That ruling, when applied to the facts of the present case, is controlling. Accordingly, the court erred in refusing, on motion, to strike so much of the answer of the defendants as sought to set up the parol contract in reference to the land. Counsel for defendants in error strongly rely upon the ruling in the case of Holmes v. Holmes, 106 Ga. 858, 33 S. E. 216. That case, however, is distinguishable from the case of Wilder v. Wilder, supra, and the present, in that the ruling there made was based upon the holding that the grantee in the deed to the property in which the trust was sought to be set up paid no part of the purchase money for the property. The opinion laid stress upon the point that the grantee named in the deed paid no part of the purchase money, and thereby indirectly recognized the principle ruled in the case of Wilder v. Wilder.

[2] 2. The ruling above announced does not apply to the personal property involved in the suit. According to the allegations of the plea, the personal property was paid for with funds common to all the family, and title to it was not placed exclusively in the plaintiff and the original defendant, as was done in regard to the land. Under such circumstances it was competent for the defendants to set up, and, upon proof, enforce, the alleged parol agreement relatively to the personal property.

[3] 3. The plaintiff's mother and father, by the terms of the plea, were alleged to have such an interest in the personal property as to render them proper parties to the suit.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 28, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A ground of a motion for a new trial based upon the admission of evidence should state what objection was made thereto when it was offered at the trial, and should affirmatively show that the objection was then urged; otherwise, no question is raised for determination by the court. McFarland v. Darien, etc., R. Co., 127 Ga. 97, 56 S. E. 74. Under this rule the assignments of error based on the grounds of the motion for new trial complaining of rulings in admitting certain evidence cannot be considered.

ROGERS v. BROWN, Governor.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 28, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. BAIL (§ 58)—RECOGNIZANCE—REQUISITES.

It is essential, to the validity of a recognizance for the personal appearance for trial of a person charged with a penal offense, that the bond show on its face the cause of the arrest. Nicholson v. State, 2 Ga. 363.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. §§ 263-277; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. BAIL (§ 58*)—RECOGNIZANCE FOR APPEARANCE—REQUISITES.

But it is not necessary that the offense be stated with the same degree of particularity as is required in an indictment; and it is sufficient if the offense be named generally as "accessory after the fact," which under Penal Code, § 48, if nothing more appeared, would be equivalent to a charge as for a misdemeanor. See Rich v. Colquitt, 61 Ga. 197; Vinson v. Northen, 94 Ga. 698, 19 S. E. 991.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. §§ 263-277; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. BAIL (§ 90*)—FORFEITED RECOGNIZANCE—REQUISITES—FORFEITURE.

But in a proceeding to forfeit a recognizance of the character described in the first headnote, where the evidence relied on to support the action shows that the only charge preferred against the principal was an indictment as accessory after the fact by receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, and the indictment failed to allege that the principal thief had been convicted (Penal Code, § 168), or that the principal thief could not be taken so as to be prosecuted and convicted (Penal Code, § 169), the indictment for these reasons being fatally defective (Jordan v. State, 56 Ga. 92), the evidence did not support a judgment of forfeiture, although it was shown by extrinsic evidence, which was admitted over appropriate objection, that the principal thief had been convicted (McDaniel v. Campbell, 78 Ga. 188; Candler v. Kirksey, 113 Ga. 309, 38 S. E. 825,

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Sept. 27, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)NEW TRIAL (§ 38)—GROUNDS—GRANT OF NONSUIT.

A case was referred to an auditor, who made his report. Exceptions of law and fact were filed thereto. The court overruled all the exceptions of law, and all exceptions of fact, except one, which was sustained. Upon the report and brief of evidence, as amended by the ruling sustaining the exception of fact, the court awarded a nonsuit. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, complaining that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. The motion was amended by the addition of two grounds, the first of which was disapproved and the last approved by reference to the record, which disapproved the recital of fact. Held that, inasmuch as the grant of a nonsuit is not reviewable by motion for new trial (Buchanan v. James, 134 Ga. 475, 68 S. E. 72), there was no error in refusing a new trial.

1. FINES (§ 1½*)—HUSBAND AND WIFE (§§ 171, 232*)—NATURE OF FINE — CONTRACTS BY WIFE—GUARANTY—"DEBT."

To a suit of foreclosure by a transferee of a note and mortgage on realty the defendant interposed a plea to the effect that she was a married woman at the time of the execution of the note, and that "the note and mortgage" were given for the debt of her husband, and the transferee took them with notice of these facts. On the trial here was evidence to the effect that the defendant's husband, having been convicted of a misdemeanor, was in jail under a sentence to pay a fine. The defendant testified that she called on the agent of the payee to pay the fine, and the latter asked, "Will you give me security for him paying it back and working it out?" The note was given, "so that, if Sam [the husband] did not stay there and work out" the fine, "I would pay it for him." Defendant's husband had been working for the payee, and thereafter continued to do so, "working to pay that debt." There was no evidence that the husband made any promise to the payee to induce him to pay the fine, or that he was consulted in regard to the negotiations which led to the payment of the fine. He was in jail when the note was executed. Defendant further testified: "When I saw Judge Brewton, I got the mortgage fixed up. I signed it. He paid the money in his office to get [defendant's husband] out of jail. * * * I did not get it, and did not pay it."

On the subject of notice, the evidence was to the effect that the plaintiff transferee was an agent of the payee and successor to the agent who paid the fine, and that he knew that the defendant's husband was "working out this debt." In the presence of the defendant the plaintiff was told by another person, in the spring of 1908 before the transfer in August, that she was the wife of the convict whose fine had been paid, and at the same time she asked the payee, in the presence of the plaintiff, "How long before my note will come back to me?" and was informed, "It won't be very long." Held:

(a) The fine imposed on the husband of plaintiff was not a "debt" due by him to the state.

(b) Under the evidence, the contract to repay the amount paid out in discharge of the fine was the original undertaking of the wife, and in no sense in payment of or as security for a debt due by her husband.

(c) If the debt had been that of the husband, the evidence was insufficient to show notice of such fact to the transferee.

2. RAILROADS (§ 376*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON OR NEAR TRACK.

Where an intoxicated person fell or lay beside a railroad track, and the engineer of an approaching train supposed him to be a discarded tie, and, having kept a constant lookout, used every means in his power to stop the train on discovering that it was a person, the railroad company is not liable.

Action by Annie Willis against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Osborne & Lawrence and Shelby Myrick, all of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Johnson, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The plaintiff in error sued the railway company for the homicide of her husband, and excepts to the direction of a verdict in the defendant's favor. The undisputed evidence shows that the deceased, while in a drunken condition, lay or fell down by the side of the defendant's track in the nighttime, and was struck by the pilot on the engine and killed. The case turns upon the testimony of the engineer, the only eyewitness to the killing, and whose testimony upon material points is undisputed. The point for determination may best be understood from the following quotation from the engineer's testimony: "This track out there is perfectly straight, a level track. After we passed Central Junction, I was looking ahead of my engine. At that time they were laying new rail between the C. & A. crossing and the junction, and there were lots of cross-ties and new iron lying to the side of the track; and I noticed something—as I thought a cross-tie—lying close to the track. I do not mean it was between the two rails. You understand, when they are putting in these new ties, they run them up, throw them to the side of the ties, wherever they find a bad tie there, and when they come to it they put it in. And I thought it was a tie that was lying there, and I got very close to it—I suppose 100 feet possibly—and I saw it raise up that way, and I slammed the brakes on before I shut the engine off, and I shut the steam off after the brakes were on. I did that for the simple fact that I did not have time after I discovered it was a man. That was the first time I discovered that it was a man. Had he not moved or raised his head, the engine would have gone by him without any danger; the train would have gone by him; he would not have been touched at all; but he raised up. He was not between the rails. He was not on the track at all. He appeared to me as though his head must have been either at the end of a cross-tie, or right between a cross-tie. The engine did not strike him; only the side of the pilot struck him. Just the edge of the pilot struck him in the head, and I slammed the brake on. * * * As to how close I was to him when he first raised his head up, I would say between 100 and 150 feet. I am satisfied it was not any more than that. I could not have stopped my train, within the distance that I saw him, without striking him, before my engine got to him; not when I discovered it was a man, and he raised up."

[1, 2] The case is, in our opinion, absolutely controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court in Southwestern Railroad v. Hankerson, 61 Ga. 115, and Moore v. Southern Ry. Co., 136 Ga. 872, 72 S. E. 403. In the Hankerson Case, supra, it appeared: That the engineer saw an object lying on the track, just beyond a crossing, which he took to be a hog that had been killed by a freight train just ahead of him. When he got within 100 or 125 yards of this object, he discovered that it was a man, lying between the rails, with his head on a stringer close up to the rail and his body and legs doubled up toward the next stringer and between them. That as soon as he saw this he put on his brakes, reversed his engine, and sounded the whistle. That from the time he discovered it was a man, and not a dead hog, he did everything he possibly could have done to prevent the injury to the person lying on the track. The Supreme Court held: "If one voluntarily becomes drunk, and consequently falls down, or lies down, in a state of insensibility on a railroad track, so that he is injured by a passing train, he cannot recover for injuries so received, even though there may have been contributory negligence on the part of employes of the road." In Moore's Case, supra, the man injured was sitting upon the end of a cross-tie in the nighttime. There was testimony that the engineer had stated, when at a distance of several hundred yards away, that he saw an object on the track, but thought it was a dog. It was held that a nonsuit was properly granted.

[3] Counsel for the plaintiff contend that, inasmuch as there was testimony for the plaintiff that at the place where the deceased was killed the public had for many years been accustomed to use the track longitudinally as a walkway, it was a question for the jury whether or not the engineer should have been on the lookout for persons on the track, and whether or not he exercised ordinary care and diligence. This evidence does not help the plaintiff's case for two reasons: In the first place, it does not appear that the company knew of this use of its track by the public, or consented to it, either impliedly or expressly. For this reason, the principle announced in Shaw v. Georgia Railroad, 127 Ga. 8, 55 S. E. 960, has no application. In the second place, the undisputed evidence shows that the engineer was on the lookout; that he saw an object lying near the track which he honestly mistook for a cross-tie; and that, after discovering that it was an animate object, he did everything in his power to stop the train.

Counsel insist that the case is controlled by the decision of this court in Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Pelfry, 11 Ga. App. 119, 74 S. E. 854; but there are at least three distinguishing features between that case and the present case. In the first place, in that case the engineer was in doubt as to what the object was. It was a suspicious object. He asked his fireman what it was, and the fireman replied that he did not know. He thereupon increased the speed of the train, and, instead of keeping his eyes fastened upon the track, he took them off and looked around again up the track when it was too late to stop the train, after discovering that a man was lying prone upon the track. That case was decided upon its peculiar facts, and this court did not intend to hold (nor could it hold, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court on the subject) that, where an engineer honestly believes that an object upon or near the track is an inanimate object, and keeps on the lookout, and, as soon as he discovers that the object is a human being, does everything in his power to prevent injury to such person, the company would be liable. Indeed, in the very case relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff, the general rule is thus announced: "If a railway engineer sees a person lying on the track at some distance away, and honestly mistakes him for an inanimate object, failure to check the speed of the train, or take other precautionary measures, will not render the company liable." The present case was within the general rule as announced by the Supreme Court of this state, and not within the exception within which, on account of its peculiar facts, the Pelfry Case was held to come. There was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

In the motion for a rehearing, counsel insist that there was such a conflict in the evidence, both in reference to the question whether the deceased was drunk and voluntarily went upon the track in this condition and the question whether the company knew of the prior use of the track as a footway, as to demand the submission to the jury of the question whether the deceased was guilty of such gross negligence as to prevent a recovery. For the purposes of this case it may be conceded that counsel have correctly apprehended the evidence, and that the court was wrong in stating, in the original opinion, that the evidence was undisputed that the deceased in a drunken condition lay or fell down upon the track, and that there was no evidence that the company knew of the use of the track as a footway. Let it be conceded that the deceased was not drunk. It is utterly immaterial how he came to be upon the track, so long as the company's employes had nothing to do with his presence there, and did not discover him in time to avoid killing him. Let it be admitted that the deceased was not at fault, and that the company was bound to look out for him. His widow must recover, if at all, not because her husband was free from fault, but because the company was negligent. In what does the negligence consist? The engineer was on the lookout. He could have been no more diligent in this respect if he had anticipated the presence of the deceased.

Surely counsel do not mean to contend that the train must creep along at all points on the track where pedestrians have, without the company's permission, previously used the track longitudinally as a footway. The engineer had his eyes open and his vision riveted upon the track. He saw what he thought was a cross-tie. He had no reason to suspect it was anything else. We cannot agree, as counsel contend, that the jury could arbitrarily say the engineer had no right to assume the object was inanimate, but that, in the exercise of ordinary care, he could have known it was a man. He says he was honestly mistaken—that he used his eyesight, and that he had no reason to believe the object was other than he first thought it to be. There is nothing to dispute this testimony. The company was not negligent, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, even though her husband was wholly free from fault.

Motion denied.

The evidence in this case conclusively showing that the intoxicating liquor found in the place of business of the accused was brought and placed therein without his knowledge or consent, and that he was in no wise connected therewith, and it not appearing that he had any knowledge that the liquor was there, the verdict of conviction was without evidence to support it, and was therefore unauthorized by law.
